

Christwiki

The story of Christianity on one timeline, tied to its primary sources.

Edition of 4 October 2026 · christwiki.org

Contents

How to read this book 6
Timeline 7
- Primeval History 8
- The Patriarchs 22
- Exodus and Conquest 46
- Judges and the United Monarchy 82
- The Divided Kingdom and the Prophets 122
- Exile and Return 187
- The Second Temple Period 238
- The Life of Jesus 284
- The Apostolic Age 376
- The Church under Rome 482
- Councils and the Christian Empire 569
- The Early Middle Ages 737
- The High and Late Middle Ages 837
- The Reformation 1000
- Enlightenment, Awakenings and Missions 1180
- Modern and Global Christianity 1339

Threads 1514
- Covenant and Promise 1515
- Temple and Worship 1517
- Kingship and Messiah 1520
- Prophets and Prophecy 1523
- Scripture and Canon 1525

Mission and Expansion 1528
Persecution and Martyrdom 1532
Church and State 1535
Creeds and Councils 1540
Papacy and Church Order 1543
Monasticism and Religious Life 1546
East and West 1548
Reform and Reformation 1551
Revival and Unity 1554
People 1556
Aaron to Archelaus 1557
Arethas of Najran to Blaise Pascal 1586
Blandina to Clement XI 1616
Clement XIV to Edward VI 1644
Eleazar ben Yair to Frederick the Wise 1673
Friedrich Schleiermacher to Hazael 1703
Heinrich Plütschau to Irenaeus 1732
Irene of Athens to John Hyrcanus 1763
John Keble to Julian the Missionary 1794
Justin Martyr to Martin V 1824
Marutha of Maypherkat to Necho II 1852
Nehemiah to Peter the Great 1881
Peter Waldo to Romulus Augustulus 1911
Ronald Hall to Tawadros II 1940
Teresa of Ávila to Vladimir Lenin 1969
Vladimir the Great to Zerubbabel 1999
Places 2022
Aachen to Caesarea in Cappadocia 2023
Caesarea Maritima to Faras 2063
Fayette, New York to Judean Wilderness 2105
Kadesh-barnea to Monte Cassino 2146
Moscow to Philippi 2185
Pi-Ramesses to Smyrna 2226
Speyer to Zwolle 2268

Sources 2301
The 'Prophet Movement' in Congo to Acts of the Council of Constantinople (879–880) 2304
Acts of the First Zurich Disputation to Aeterni Patris 2330
Against Apion to Apology 2354
Apology and Defence to Biblia, das ist, die gantze Heilige Schrifft Deudsch (1534) 2379
Biblical Authority in Evangelism to Bull of Excommunication against Michael Cerularius 2404
Bull to the University of Oxford against John Wycliffe to The Christian Manifesto: Direction of Endeavor for Chinese Christianity in the Construction of New China 2427
Christian Topography to Church allowed abuse by priest for years 2453
Church History to Common Worship: The Calendar 2477
Communiqué of the Holy and Sacred Synod of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, 11 October 2018 to The Council of Nicaea (325), canons and synodal letter 2502
The Creed of Nicaea to Decrees of the Council of Constance 2526
Decrees of the Council of Ferrara and Florence to The Didache (The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) 2550
Dignitatis Humanae to The Elephantine Memorandum of Bagohi and Delaiah (TAD A4.9) 2574
The Elephantine Offer of Payment for the Temple (TAD A4.10) to The Filioque: A Church-Dividing Issue? 2598
Final Documents of Medellín to Gaudet Mater Ecclesia 2623
Gaudium et Spes to Histories (History of the Franks) 2647
History to History of the Mongols (Ystoria Mongalorum) 2672
The History of the Origin and First Ten Years of the British and Foreign Bible Society to In Darkest England and the Way Out 2695
In Defence of Flaccus (Pro Flacco) to Joint Declaration of Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill of Moscow and All Russia 2716
Joint Declaration of Pope Leo XIV and Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I to Le Renouveau charismatique: orientations théologiques et pastorales (Malines Document 1) 2743

Lectures on Revivals of Religion to Letter to the Bishops of Africa (Ad Afros) 2767
Letter to the Danbury Baptist Association, 1 January 1802 to Letters . . 2791
Letters to Life of Antony 2815
Life of Augustine to Lingerings of Light in a Dark Land 2841
Little Book on the Beginnings of the Order of Preachers (Libellus) to The Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone) 2864
Message of the Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church to Nican Mopohua 2889
The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed to On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers 2912
On the Councils (De Synodis) to Papyrus 46 2935
Papyrus 52 (Rylands Greek P 457) to Privilege for Scholars (Authentica Habita) 2960
Privilege for the Scholars of Paris to Relations of Russia with the East in Church Affairs 2984
Relations of the Orthodox Church with the Rest of the Christian World to Responses to the Questions of the Bulgars 3008
The Restoration of the Fulness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ: A Bicentennial Proclamation to the World to Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 3032
Sic et Non to Summa Theologiae 3057
Summary Inscription 7 of Tiglath-pileser III (Nimrud Tablet K 3751) to The Treatment of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire, 1915–16 3080
The Treaty of Münster (Instrumentum Pacis Monasteriensis) to The Waldensians: Origins (Chiesa Evangelica Valdese) 3106
Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 to 天主教、基督教开展“三自”爱国运动 (The Catholic and Protestant churches launch the “Three-Self” patriotic movement) 3129
Method and sources 3142

How to read this book

The timeline comes first, era by era and event by event. After it come the threads that run through the eras, then the people, the places and the sources in alphabetical order, and last the page that says how this book is made.

Every underlined name is a link: touch it to go to that person, place, source or event. Each of those entries lists the events it belongs to, so there is always a way back.

A citation in brackets names the passage a sentence rests on. Touch it to see the source: what it is, who wrote it and when, and where it can be read.

Every date carries one of four labels that say how sure it is:

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Undated. Narrated by the source with no datable setting.

This book is made from Christwiki (christwiki.org) and made again whenever an entry changes. This is the Edition of 4 October 2026.

Timeline

361 moments from Genesis to today. Each shows when and where it happened, how it connects to the rest, and the primary sources it rests on.

Primeval History Before recorded chronology 8
The Patriarchs c. 2100–1800 BC (traditional) 22
Exodus and Conquest c. 1500–1200 BC 46
Judges and the United Monarchy c. 1200–930 BC 82
The Divided Kingdom and the Prophets c. 930–597 BC 122
Exile and Return 597–c. 400 BC 187
The Second Temple Period c. 400–4 BC 238
The Life of Jesus c. 6 BC – AD 33 284
The Apostolic Age c. AD 30–100 376
The Church under Rome AD 100–313 482
Councils and the Christian Empire AD 313–600 569
The Early Middle Ages AD 600–1054 737
The High and Late Middle Ages 1054–1500 837
The Reformation 1500–1650 1000
Enlightenment, Awakenings and Missions 1650–1900 1180
Modern and Global Christianity 1900 to the present 1339

TIMELINE

Primeval History

Before recorded chronology

Genesis opens with creation, the first disobedience, the flood and the scattering of the nations. The text gives these events no datable setting.

The first eleven chapters of Genesis set the stage for everything that follows: a good creation, humanity made in God's image, a rupture, and a world that needs mending. Later Scripture returns to these chapters constantly. Christian traditions read them in different ways, from literal history to theological narrative, and this wiki places them at the head of the timeline without assigning years.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Creation Undated 9

The Fall Undated 12

The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Undated 15

The Tower of Babel Undated 19

PRIMEVAL HISTORY

The Creation

Undated · Undated

Genesis opens with God making the heavens and the earth in six days and resting on the seventh. It then tells how the first man and woman were made and placed in the garden of Eden.

Genesis begins: "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth" (Genesis 1:1). The earth is at first formless and empty, dark and covered with water (Genesis 1:2). Then, over six days, God speaks and things come to be: light; the sky; dry land, seas and plants; sun, moon and stars; sea creatures and birds; land animals and, last, human beings (Genesis 1:3–27). Humankind is made in God's image, male and female, and is told to be fruitful and to rule over the other living things (Genesis 1:27–28). God sees that everything he has made is "very good" (Genesis 1:31). On the seventh day he rests, and he blesses that day and makes it holy (Genesis 2:1–3).

From its fourth verse the second chapter tells how the first man and woman were made. God forms the man from the dust of the ground and breathes life into him (Genesis 2:7), plants a garden in Eden and puts him there to cultivate and keep it (Genesis 2:8–15). The man may eat from every tree except the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; on the day he eats from that one he will die (Genesis 2:16–17). He names the animals, but none of them is a partner for him, so God makes a woman from his rib and brings her to him (Genesis 2:18–23). The narrator adds that this is why a man leaves his parents and joins his wife, and the two become "one flesh" (Genesis 2:24).

Later Scripture returns to these chapters often. The Sabbath commandment rests on the six days and the seventh (Exodus 20:8–11). A psalm says that the heavens were made by the Lord's word (Psalm 33:6–9). Jesus quotes both chapters when he is asked about divorce (Matthew 19:3–6). John's Gospel opens with the words "In the beginning" and says that all things were made through the Word (John 1:1–3), and the letter to the Colossians, which bears Paul's name, says that all things were created through Christ and for him (Colossians 1:15–17).

Christians have read the six days in more than one way since antiquity. Basil of Caesarea, preaching on Genesis in the fourth century, took the first day as a day and a night of twenty-four hours (Basil, Hexaemeron 2.8). Augustine of Hippo, early in the fifth century, wrote that what kind of days these were is very hard, perhaps impossible, to conceive (Augustine, City of God 11.6). The creed of 381, used in both East and West, opens with what these chapters teach: it confesses God as "maker of heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed article 1).

How this is dated

Undated. Narrated by the source with no datable setting.

Genesis gives the creation no date, and no source outside the Bible bears on it. The genealogies that follow give each ancestor's age at the birth of his son (Genesis 5:3–32) (Genesis 11:10–26), and readers since antiquity have added these up to count the years from Adam. Josephus does so in the first century AD (Josephus, Antiquities 1.82–88).

The totals depend on the text used. In the Hebrew text Adam is 130 years old when Seth is born (Genesis 5:3); in the Greek Septuagint he is 230, and the two differ in the same way for most of the names that follow (Septuagint Genesis 5:3–21). Christians also differ on whether the days and the genealogies are meant to yield a chronology at all. The timeline places the event first and assigns no year.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 1:1; Genesis 1:2; Genesis 1:3–27; Genesis 1:27–28; Genesis 1:31; Genesis 2:1–3; Genesis 2:7; Genesis 2:8–15; Genesis 2:16–17; Genesis 2:18–23; Genesis 2:24; Exodus 20:8–11; Psalm 33:6–9; Matthew 19:3–6; John 1:1–3; Colossians 1:15–17; Genesis 5:3–32; Genesis 11:10–26; Genesis 5:3

Hexaemeron Basil of Caesarea · c. AD 364–378
2.8

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
11.6

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
article 1

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
1.82–88

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Genesis 5:3–21

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Who Adam, Eve

In context

LEADS TO

The Fall Undated 12

→ The Fall Later · Undated

PRIMEVAL HISTORY

The Fall

Undated · Undated

In Genesis the first man and woman eat from the tree God had forbidden and are sent out of the garden of Eden. Paul later reads the story as the entry of sin and death into the world, which Christ's obedience reverses.

In Genesis 3 a serpent, craftier than any other animal, questions the woman about God's command. It tells her that she will not die if she eats from the forbidden tree: her eyes will be opened and she will be like God, knowing good and evil (Genesis 3:1–5). The woman takes the fruit and eats, and gives some to her husband, who eats too. Their eyes are opened, they know that they are naked, and they sew fig leaves together to cover themselves (Genesis 3:6–7).

When they hear God in the garden they hide. Questioned, the man blames the woman and the woman blames the serpent (Genesis 3:8–13). God then speaks to each in turn. The serpent is cursed, and there will be hostility between its offspring and the woman's: "He will bruise your head, and you will bruise his heel" (Genesis 3:14–15). The woman will bear children in pain (Genesis 3:16). The ground is cursed because of the man, who will eat from it by hard labour until he returns to the dust from which he was taken (Genesis 3:17–19). The man names his wife Eve, God clothes them both in skins, and they are sent out of Eden. Cherubim and a flaming sword guard the way to the tree of life (Genesis 3:20–24).

The chapter does not use the word "sin", which first appears in the story of Cain (Genesis 4:7). It is Paul who states the meaning that became central for Christians. Sin came into the world through one man, he writes, and death through sin; and as one man's disobedience made many sinners, the obedience of one, Jesus Christ, will make many righteous (Romans 5:12–19). "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ all will be made alive" (1 Corinthians 15:22). Revelation calls the devil "the old serpent" (Revelation 12:9) and ends with the tree of life restored and the curse gone (Revelation 22:1–3). Irenaeus, about AD 180, read the words to the serpent as the first announcement of one born of a woman who would tread on its head (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.21.1).

The churches describe what passed from Adam to his descendants in different terms. The Council of Trent teaches that his sin is handed on to all "by propagation, not by imitation" and is in each person as his own (Council of Trent Session 5, canons 2–3). The Lutheran Augsburg Confession says that since Adam's fall all who are born in the natural way are born with sin (Augsburg Confession article 2). The Orthodox Confession of Dositheus also speaks of hereditary sin, and explains that the burden everyone bears and its fruits are toil, sickness, pain in childbirth and death, not personal acts of sin (Confession of Dositheus decree 6).

How this is dated

Undated. Narrated by the source with no datable setting.

Genesis gives no date and does not say how much time passed between the making of the man and the woman and their expulsion from the garden. Nothing outside the Bible bears on the event. Christians differ on how the chapter is to be read; the narrative here follows the text, and the timeline assigns no year.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 3:1–5; Genesis 3:6–7; Genesis 3:8–13; Genesis 3:14–15; Genesis 3:16; Genesis 3:17–19; Genesis 3:20–24; Genesis 4:7; Romans 5:12–19; 1 Corinthians 15:22; Revelation 12:9; Revelation 22:1–3

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
5.21.1

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 5, canons 2–3

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
article 2

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
decree 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Who Adam, Eve

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Creation Undated 9

LEADS TO

The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Undated 15

← The Creation Earlier · Undated
→ The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Later · Undated

PRIMEVAL HISTORY

The Flood and the Covenant with Noah

Undated · Undated

Genesis tells how God sends a flood on a violent world and saves Noah, his family and the animals in an ark. Afterwards God makes a covenant with every living creature, with the rainbow as its sign.

In Genesis, human wickedness has become great and the earth is filled with violence, and God resolves to make an end of all flesh (Genesis 6:5–13). Noah, a righteous man, finds favour (Genesis 6:8–9). God tells him to build an ark of wood sealed with pitch, three hundred cubits long and three decks high, and to take into it his wife, his three sons and their wives, a pair of every kind of animal, and food for all (Genesis 6:14–21). Of the clean animals he is to take seven pairs (Genesis 7:2–3).

In Noah's six hundredth year, the account continues, the fountains of the deep burst open, the windows of the sky open, and rain falls for forty days and nights (Genesis 7:11–12). The waters cover the mountains. Everything that breathes on dry land dies, and only those in the ark are left (Genesis 7:19–23). After a hundred and fifty days the waters go down and the ark comes to rest on the mountains of Ararat (Genesis 8:3–4). Noah sends out a raven, and then a dove three times. The second time it brings back a fresh olive leaf, and the third time it does not return (Genesis 8:6–12). When the ground is dry, more than a year after the rain began, they all leave the ark (Genesis 8:13–19).

Noah builds an altar and offers burnt offerings, and God resolves never again to strike down every living thing (Genesis 8:20–22). He blesses Noah and his sons, allows them meat but not blood, and requires a reckoning for human life, "for God made man in his own image" (Genesis 9:1–6). Then he makes a covenant with Noah, his descendants and every living creature: no flood will again destroy the earth. The rainbow is its sign (Genesis 9:8–17). This is the first covenant the Bible names (Genesis 6:18).

The book of Isaiah takes the oath about "the waters of Noah" as a pledge of God's lasting kindness (Isaiah 54:9–10). Jesus compares the days of Noah with the coming of the Son of Man (Matthew 24:37–39), and 1 Peter sees in the eight people saved through water a figure of baptism (1 Peter 3:20–21).

Mesopotamian literature also tells of a great flood. In the eleventh tablet of the Epic of Gilgamesh the gods decide to send a flood, and the god Ea warns one man. He builds a boat, takes his family and animals aboard, comes to rest on a mountain, sends out a dove, a swallow and a raven, and offers a sacrifice whose smell pleases the gods. In that poem the gods are many, and the survivor and his wife are made immortal (Epic of Gilgamesh tablet XI, lines 8–205). Josephus, in the first century AD, names Berossus the Chaldean and other non-Jewish writers as witnesses to the flood and places the landing on a mountain in Armenia (Josephus, Antiquities 1.89–95).

How this is dated

Undated. Narrated by the source with no datable setting.

Genesis dates the flood only by Noah's age: it begins in his six hundredth year (Genesis 7:11). Added together, the ages in the Hebrew text of the genealogy put it 1,656 years after the making of Adam (Genesis 5:3–29); Josephus, who makes the same kind of count in the first century AD, gives for most of the ancestors the higher ages of the Greek text (Septuagint Genesis 5:3–28) and reaches a larger total (Josephus, Antiquities 1.82–88). Neither count can be tied to a calendar year.

Nothing outside the Bible dates the event. A Mesopotamian flood story (Epic of Gilgamesh tablet XI, lines 8–205) survives on a tablet copied in the seventh century BC (Epic of Gilgamesh tablet K.3375); how it is related to Genesis, and whether Genesis describes a flood over the whole globe or over the world its first hearers knew, is debated among scholars and among Christians. The timeline assigns no year.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 6:5–13; Genesis 6:8–9; Genesis 6:14–21; Genesis 7:2–3; Genesis 7:11–12; Genesis 7:19–23; Genesis 8:3–4; Genesis 8:6–12; Genesis 8:13–19; Genesis 8:20–22; Genesis 9:1–6; Genesis 9:8–17; Genesis 6:18; Isaiah 54:9–10; Matthew 24:37–39; 1 Peter 3:20–21; Genesis 7:11; Genesis 5:3–29

The Epic of Gilgamesh, Tablet XI (the Flood Tablet) 7th century BC (this copy)
tablet XI, lines 8–205; tablet K.3375

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
1.89–95; 1.82–88

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Genesis 5:3–28

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mountains of Ararat
Who Noah
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fall Undated 12

LEADS TO

The Tower of Babel Undated 19

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Call of Abraham

After · c. 2091 BC

24

← The Fall Earlier · Undated

→ The Tower of Babel Later · Undated

PRIMEVAL HISTORY

The Tower of Babel

Undated · Undated

Genesis tells how people with one language set out to build a city and a tower reaching the sky in the land of Shinar. God confuses their speech and scatters them over the earth, and the city is named Babel.

Genesis 11 says that the whole earth once had one language. People on the move came to a plain in the land of Shinar and settled there. They baked bricks, using brick in place of stone and tar in place of mortar (Genesis 11:1–3). Then they resolved to build a city and "a tower whose top reaches to the sky", to make a name for themselves and to keep from being scattered over the earth (Genesis 11:4).

The Lord, the story continues, came down to see the city and the tower. He said that as one people with one language nothing they planned would be out of their reach, and he confused their language so that they could not understand one another (Genesis 11:5–7). They were scattered over the earth and stopped building. The city was called Babel, "because there Yahweh confused the language of all the earth" (Genesis 11:8–9). Josephus, in the first century AD, explains the name in the same way: Babel, he says, means confusion in Hebrew, and the place is the one now called Babylon, in the plain of Shinar (Josephus, Antiquities 1.113–119).

Genesis has already named Babel, in the land of Shinar, as the first centre of Nimrod's kingdom (Genesis 10:8–10). The story itself names no leader. Josephus makes Nimrod the one who urged the people to build (Josephus, Antiquities 1.113–119), and Augustine of Hippo likewise calls Nimrod the city's founder (Augustine, City of God 16.4). The building materials fit the place. Herodotus, describing Babylon in the fifth century BC, reports walls of baked brick set in hot bitumen and, in the sanctuary of the city's god, a tower of eight stages rising one on another (Herodotus, Histories 1.179–181). He does not mention the story told in Genesis.

In Genesis the story explains why the nations listed in the previous chapter are divided by language and land (Genesis 10:31–32). The narrative then narrows to one family, that of Abram, through whom "all the families of the earth" are to be blessed (Genesis 11:27–12:3). Christian writers have set Pentecost beside Babel. In Acts, people from many nations hear the apostles speaking in their own languages (Acts 2:5–11), and Cyril of Jerusalem, in the fourth century, calls this a second confusion of tongues that repaired the first one at Babylon (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical Lectures 17.17).

How this is dated

Undated. Narrated by the source with no datable setting.

Genesis gives no date. The story stands between the list of the nations descended from Noah and the genealogy that runs from Shem to Abram (Genesis 10:32) (Genesis 11:10), and one line of that list says that the earth was divided in the days of Peleg (Genesis 10:25). Nothing in the text fixes a year, and no Mesopotamian record of the event is known.

The place is identified because Babel is the Hebrew name of Babylon, as Josephus already notes (Josephus, Antiquities 1.113–119). The temple tower of that city, which Herodotus describes (Herodotus, Histories 1.179–181), is often compared with the story; whether and how the two are connected is a matter of scholarly discussion. The timeline assigns no year.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 11:1–3; Genesis 11:4; Genesis 11:5–7; Genesis 11:8–9; Genesis 10:8–10; Genesis 10:31–32; Genesis 11:27–12:3; Acts 2:5–11; Genesis 10:32; Genesis 11:10; Genesis 10:25

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
1.113–119

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
16.4

Histories Herodotus · c. 430–420 BC
1.179–181

Catechetical Lectures Cyril of Jerusalem · c. AD 350
17.17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Babylon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Undated 15

LEADS TO

The Call of Abraham c. 2091 BC 24

← The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Earlier · Undated
→ The Call of Abraham Later · c. 2091 BC
TIMELINE

The Patriarchs

c. 2100–1800 BC (traditional)

Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph: one family receives a promise of land, descendants and blessing for all nations.

Genesis 12–50 follows four generations from Mesopotamia to Canaan and finally to Egypt. The dates are traditional: they are worked out from the Bible's own figures, and no inscription names the patriarchs. The promises made here, above all the covenant with Abraham, are the root from which Israel, and later the church, understood itself.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Haran, Ur

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Call of Abraham c. 2091 BC 24
Melchizedek Blesses Abram c. 2085 BC 28
God's Covenant with Abraham c. 2080–2067 BC 32

The Binding of Isaac c. 2050 BC 35

Jacob Becomes Israel c. 1929–1909 BC 39

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt c. 1898–1876 BC 42

THE PATRIARCHS

The Call of Abraham

c. 2091 BC · Traditional date

Genesis tells how God calls Abram to leave his country and his father's house for a land he will be shown, promising to make him a great nation through whom all the families of the earth will be blessed. Abram leaves Haran for Canaan.

Genesis traces Abram's family from Noah's son Shem down to Terah, who had three sons: Abram, Nahor and Haran. Haran, the father of Lot, died in the family's homeland, Ur of the Chaldees. Abram's wife Sarai had no child (Genesis 11:10–30). Terah set out from Ur for Canaan with Abram, Sarai and Lot, but they settled on the way at Haran, and there Terah died (Genesis 11:31–32). Joshua later recalls that Terah's family "served other gods" in their old home beyond the River (Joshua 24:2–3).

Then, Genesis says, the Lord spoke to Abram: "Leave your country, and your relatives, and your father's house, and go to the land that I will show you." He promised to make of him a great nation, to bless him and make his name great, and added: "All the families of the earth will be blessed through you" (Genesis 12:1–3). Abram went. He was seventy-five years old, and he took with him Sarai, Lot, their possessions and their household (Genesis 12:4–5).

In Canaan he travelled as far as Shechem, to the oak of Moreh. There the Lord appeared to him and said, "I will give this land to your offspring", and Abram built an altar. He built another in the hills east of Bethel and then moved on by stages toward the south (Genesis 12:6–9).

Stephen's speech in Acts puts the call earlier, in Mesopotamia, before the family lived in Haran (Acts 7:2–4). Genesis itself later has God say that he brought Abram out of Ur (Genesis 15:7).

The promise of land, descendants and blessing for all nations runs through the rest of Genesis and is repeated to Isaac and to Jacob (Genesis 26:3–4) (Genesis 28:13–14). Paul quotes it as the gospel announced beforehand to Abraham (Galatians 3:8), and Hebrews makes Abraham's departure a model of faith: "He went out, not knowing where he went" (Hebrews 11:8).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

No inscription or record from his own time names Abraham, so the date rests on the Bible's own figures, counted back from a later anchor. Solomon began the temple in the fourth year of his reign, 480 years after the exodus (1 Kings 6:1). Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), dates the division of the kingdom after Solomon's death to 931/930 BC. Solomon reigned forty years (1 Kings 11:42), so his fourth year falls about 966 BC, and counting back 480 years from it gives 1446 BC for the exodus. Israel had lived in Egypt for 430 years (Exodus 12:40–41); Jacob was 130 when he arrived there (Genesis 47:9); Isaac was 60 when Jacob was born (Genesis 25:26); Abraham was 100 when Isaac was born (Genesis 21:5) and 75 when he left Haran (Genesis 12:4). The sum is 2091 BC.

Each link can be questioned. A date for the exodus in the thirteenth century BC, argued for example by Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament (2003), lowers every date in this era by nearly two centuries if the other figures are kept. The Greek Septuagint makes the 430 years cover the time in Canaan as well as in Egypt (Septuagint Exodus 12:40); Josephus counts in the same way and allows 215 years for Egypt (Josephus, Antiquities 2.318), and Paul sets the law 430 years after the promise (Galatians 3:17). On that count Abraham left Haran about 1876 BC.

Historians also disagree on whether the stories can be dated at all. Kitchen argues that they fit the early second millennium BC; Thomas L. Thompson, The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives (1974), and John Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (1975), argue that they were composed in the first millennium BC and cannot be tied to any earlier period. The timeline follows the Hebrew figures and marks the result as traditional.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 11:10–30; Genesis 11:31–32; Joshua 24:2–3; Genesis 12:1–3; Genesis 12:4–5; Genesis 12:6–9; Acts 7:2–4; Genesis 15:7; Genesis 26:3–4; Genesis 28:13–14; Galatians 3:8; Hebrews 11:8; 1 Kings 6:1; 1 Kings 11:42; Exodus 12:40–41; Genesis 47:9; Genesis 25:26; Genesis 21:5; Genesis 12:4; Galatians 3:17

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Exodus 12:40

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
2.318

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Haran, Shechem, Ur
Who Abraham, Sarah
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Tower of Babel Undated 19

LEADS TO

Melchizedek Blesses Abram c. 2085 BC 28

God's Covenant with Abraham c. 2080–2067 BC 32

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Flood and the Covenant with Noah Before · Undated 15

Melchizedek Blesses Abram After · c. 2085 BC 28

← The Tower of Babel Earlier · Undated
→ Melchizedek Blesses Abram Later · c. 2085 BC

THE PATRIARCHS

Melchizedek Blesses Abram

c. 2085 BC · Traditional date

Genesis tells how Melchizedek, king of Salem and priest of God Most High, meets Abram with bread and wine after a battle, blesses him and receives a tenth of everything. Psalm 110 names a priesthood after him, and Hebrews applies it to Jesus.

Genesis 14 tells of a war. Four allied kings, among them Chedorlaomer of Elam, defeated the kings of Sodom and four neighbouring cities and carried off Lot, the nephew of Abram. Abram led out 318 trained men born in his household, pursued the victors as far as Dan, attacked by night and chased them to Hobah, north of Damascus. He brought back Lot, the other captives and the goods (Genesis 14:1–16).

On his return the king of Sodom came out to meet him in the valley of Shaveh, the King's Valley (Genesis 14:17). Genesis continues: "Melchizedek king of Salem brought out bread and wine: and he was priest of God Most High" (Genesis 14:18).

Melchizedek pronounced a blessing on Abram, and blessed God Most High for delivering Abram's enemies into his hand. Abram gave him a tenth of everything (Genesis 14:19–20). The king of Sodom asked for the people and offered Abram the goods. Abram refused them, saying that he had sworn to "Yahweh, God Most High" to take nothing that was the king's (Genesis 14:21–24).

Genesis does not say where Salem lay. Psalm 76 names Salem in parallel with Zion (Psalm 76:2). Josephus, retelling the story in the first century AD, adds that Salem was afterwards called Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiquities 1.180–181). In the Jewish War he says that the city's founder was a Canaanite ruler called "the Righteous King", the meaning he gives in the Antiquities to the name Melchizedek, and that this man was the first to build a temple there and gave Salem the name Jerusalem (Josephus, Jewish War 6.438) (Josephus, Antiquities 1.180–181). The identification rests on such later texts.

Psalm 110 addresses one who is told to sit at God's right hand and to rule from Zion, and adds an oath: "You are a priest forever in the order of Melchizedek" (Psalm 110:1–4). A Hebrew scroll found in fragments in Cave 11 at Qumran focuses on him. As the Israel Antiquities Authority describes it, the text portrays Melchizedek as a heavenly saviour who will rescue the righteous at the final judgment (11QMelchizedek the Israel Antiquities Authority's description).

The letter to the Hebrews applies the psalm's oath to Jesus (Hebrews 5:5–10). It reads the name Melchizedek as "king of righteousness" and king of Salem as "king of peace", and notes that he appears "without father, without mother, without genealogy" (Hebrews 7:1–3). Because Abraham paid him a tithe and received his blessing, Hebrews argues, his priesthood ranks above that of Abraham's descendant Levi (Hebrews 7:4–10). Jesus, the letter goes on, came from the tribe of Judah and not from Levi; he is a priest of this other order and, because he lives for ever, holds his priesthood permanently (Hebrews 7:11–17, 23–25).

Later readers differ over the bread and wine. The Catholic Church sees in Melchizedek's gesture a prefiguring of its own offering in the Eucharist (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1333). In the sixteenth century John Calvin rejected that reading: Melchizedek gave the bread and wine to refresh Abram and his men, he wrote, and Hebrews rests its argument on the blessing (Calvin, Institutes 4.18.2).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Genesis gives no year for the meeting. The story stands between Abram's arrival in Canaan at the age of seventy-five (Genesis 12:4–5) and the birth of Ishmael when he was eighty-six (Genesis 16:16). On the Hebrew figures set out under the call of Abraham, those limits are about 2091 and 2080 BC, and the timeline places the meeting between them. The reservations stated there apply here too: the year rests on adding up the Bible's own numbers, and historians disagree on whether the stories of Abraham can be dated at all.

The place is as uncertain as the year. Genesis does not say where Salem was. The timeline puts the meeting at Jerusalem because a psalm sets Salem beside Zion (Psalm 76:2) and because Josephus, in the first century AD, says that Salem was afterwards called Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiquities 1.180–181). That identification is a tradition later than Genesis, not a statement of the text.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 14:1–16; Genesis 14:17; Genesis 14:18; Genesis 14:19–20; Genesis 14:21–24; Psalm 76:2; Psalm 110:1–4; Hebrews 5:5–10; Hebrews 7:1–3; Hebrews 7:4–10; Hebrews 7:11–17, 23–25; Genesis 12:4–5; Genesis 16:16

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
1.180–181

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
6.438

11QMelchizedek (11Q13) Copy of the Hasmonean period (2nd–1st century BC)
the Israel Antiquities Authority's description

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
1333

Institutes of the Christian Religion John Calvin · First edition 1536; final Latin edition 1559
4.18.2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Abraham, Melchizedek
Threads Covenant and Promise, Temple and Worship, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Call of Abraham c. 2091 BC 24

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Call of Abraham Before · c. 2091 BC 24

God's Covenant with Abraham After · c. 2080–2067 BC 32

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Binding of Isaac After · c. 2050 BC 35

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Ruth and Boaz After · c. 1100 BC 88

← The Call of Abraham Earlier · c. 2091 BC
→ God's Covenant with Abraham Later · c. 2080–2067 BC

THE PATRIARCHS

God's Covenant with Abraham

c. 2080–2067 BC · Traditional date

In Genesis God binds himself by covenant to give Abraham descendants and the land of Canaan. Abraham believes, and it is counted to him as righteousness. Years later God renames him and gives circumcision as the sign of the covenant.

Abram had settled by the oaks of Mamre at Hebron (Genesis 13:18). He was still childless. Genesis tells of a vision in which the Lord promised him that a son of his own would be his heir, led him outside and told him to count the stars: "So will your offspring be" (Genesis 15:1–5). Genesis adds: "He believed in Yahweh, who credited it to him for righteousness" (Genesis 15:6).

Abram asked how he could know that he would possess the land. At God's direction he cut a heifer, a goat and a ram in two and laid the halves opposite each other. At sunset a deep sleep fell on him, and he was told that his descendants would be foreigners and slaves in another land for four hundred years and would then come out with great wealth. When it was dark, a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch passed between the pieces. "In that day Yahweh made a covenant with Abram", giving his offspring the land from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates (Genesis 15:7–21).

Abram then had a son, Ishmael, by Sarai's servant Hagar (Genesis 16:1–4) (Genesis 16:15–16). When he was ninety-nine, Genesis says, God appeared to him again, renamed him Abraham, "the father of a multitude of nations", and promised an everlasting covenant with him and his descendants: he would be their God and give them Canaan (Genesis 17:1–8). Its sign was to be the circumcision of every male, at eight days old (Genesis 17:9–14). Sarai was renamed Sarah and promised a son, Isaac, with whom the covenant would continue; Ishmael too would be blessed and become a great nation (Genesis 17:15–21). That same day Abraham was circumcised with Ishmael and all the men of his household (Genesis 17:23–27).

The rest of the Bible keeps returning to this covenant. When Israel is enslaved in Egypt, God "remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob" (Exodus 2:24); the Psalms recall it (Psalm 105:8–11), and so does the father of John the Baptist in the song Luke gives him (Luke 1:72–73). Paul rests his teaching on Abram's faith: he was counted righteous before he was circumcised, and so is the father of all who believe (Romans 4:3) (Romans 4:9–12). The promise, Paul says, came 430 years before the law and is not cancelled by it (Galatians 3:16–18). James quotes the same verse to show that Abraham's faith was completed by what he did (James 2:21–24).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Genesis does not date the covenant scene of chapter 15. The narrative sets it after Abram's arrival in Canaan at seventy-five and before the birth of Ishmael, when he was eighty-six (Genesis 12:4) (Genesis 16:16). The covenant of circumcision is dated to his ninety-ninth year (Genesis 17:1) (Genesis 17:24).

On the chronology explained at the Call of Abraham, which adds up the Bible's own figures and puts Abraham's birth about 2166 BC, the first scene falls between about 2091 and 2080 BC and the second in 2067 BC. Nothing outside the Bible dates either, and the other reckonings described there would move both by the same amount.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 13:18; Genesis 15:1–5; Genesis 15:6; Genesis 15:7–21; Genesis 16:1–4; Genesis 16:15–16; Genesis 17:1–8; Genesis 17:9–14; Genesis 17:15–21; Genesis 17:23–27; Exodus 2:24; Psalm 105:8–11; Luke 1:72–73; Romans 4:3; Romans 4:9–12; Galatians 3:16–18; James 2:21–24; Genesis 12:4; Genesis 16:16; Genesis 17:1; Genesis 17:24

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Hebron
Who Abraham, Sarah
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Call of Abraham c. 2091 BC 24

LEADS TO

The Binding of Isaac c. 2050 BC 35
The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56
God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Melchizedek Blesses Abram Before · c. 2085 BC 28
The Binding of Isaac After · c. 2050 BC 35

← Melchizedek Blesses Abram Earlier · c. 2085 BC
→ The Binding of Isaac Later · c. 2050 BC

THE PATRIARCHS

The Binding of Isaac

c. 2050 BC · Traditional date

In Genesis God tests Abraham by telling him to offer his son Isaac as a burnt offering in the land of Moriah. Abraham obeys, an angel stops his hand, and a ram is offered in the boy's place. The promise is confirmed with an oath.

Isaac had been born to Abraham and Sarah in their old age, and Abraham was living at Beersheba in the south (Genesis 21:1–5) (Genesis 21:33–34). Then, Genesis says, "God tested Abraham". He was to take "your son, your only son, whom you love, even Isaac", go to the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt offering on a mountain that God would show him (Genesis 22:1–2).

Abraham rose early, split wood, and set out with Isaac and two servants. On the third day he saw the place and left the servants behind. Isaac carried the wood; Abraham carried the fire and the knife (Genesis 22:3–6). Isaac asked where the lamb for the offering was. Abraham answered, "God will provide himself the lamb for a burnt offering, my son" (Genesis 22:7–8). At the place he built an altar, bound Isaac, laid him on the wood and took the knife (Genesis 22:9–10).

The angel of the Lord called to him from heaven: "Don't lay your hand on the boy or do anything to him. For now I know that you fear God" (Genesis 22:11–12). Abraham saw a ram caught by its horns in a thicket and offered it instead of his son (Genesis 22:13–14). The angel called a second time. Because Abraham had not withheld his son, God swore by himself to bless him, to make his offspring as many as the stars and the sand, and through his offspring to bless all the nations of the earth (Genesis 22:15–18). Abraham returned to Beersheba (Genesis 22:19).

Genesis does not say where in Moriah the mountain was. Chronicles states that Solomon built the temple "at Jerusalem on Mount Moriah" (2 Chronicles 3:1), and Josephus, in the first century AD, says outright that the mountain of the sacrifice was the one on which the temple later stood (Josephus, Antiquities 1.226–227).

Hebrews says that Abraham offered Isaac by faith, reckoning that God could raise the dead, and that in a figure he did receive him back from death (Hebrews 11:17–19). James cites the act as the work that completed Abraham's faith (James 2:21–22). Christian writers from the second century read the story as a foreshadowing of the cross. Irenaeus, about AD 180, compares Isaac carrying the wood with the taking up of the cross, and writes that Abraham gave up his only and beloved son so that God might be pleased to offer his own beloved Son for all Abraham's offspring (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.5.4).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Genesis gives no date and does not state Isaac's age. It calls him a boy, old enough to carry the wood and to question his father (Genesis 22:5–7). The event falls between his birth, when Abraham was 100 (Genesis 21:5), and the death of Sarah at 127, when Isaac was 37 (Genesis 17:17) (Genesis 23:1).

On the chronology explained at the Call of Abraham, which adds up the Bible's own figures and has no outside anchor, those limits are about 2066 and 2029 BC. Josephus says that Isaac was twenty-five (Josephus, Antiquities 1.226–227), which would be about 2041 BC. The year shown, about 2050 BC, is a round figure inside that range and no more exact than that.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 21:1–5; Genesis 21:33–34; Genesis 22:1–2; Genesis 22:3–6; Genesis 22:7–8; Genesis 22:9–10; Genesis 22:11–12; Genesis 22:13–14; Genesis 22:15–18; Genesis 22:19; 2 Chronicles 3:1; Hebrews 11:17–19; James 2:21–22; Genesis 22:5–7; Genesis 21:5; Genesis 17:17; Genesis 23:1

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
1.226–227

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
4.5.4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Beersheba, Jerusalem
Who Abraham, Isaac
Threads Covenant and Promise, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

God's Covenant with Abraham c. 2080–2067 BC 32

LEADS TO

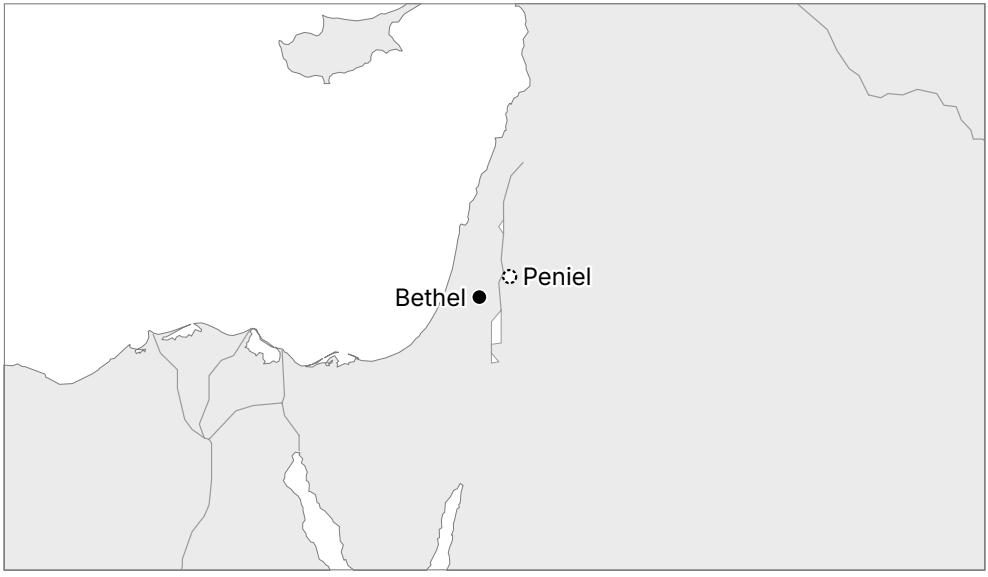
Jacob Becomes Israel c. 1929–1909 BC 39
The Crucifixion AD 30 or 33 359

COVENANT AND PROMISE

God's Covenant with Abraham Before · c. 2080–2067 BC 32
Jacob Becomes Israel After · c. 1929–1909 BC 39

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Melchizedek Blesses Abram Before · c. 2085 BC 28
The Exodus from Egypt After · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52



← God's Covenant with Abraham Earlier · c. 2080–2067 BC
→ Jacob Becomes Israel Later · c. 1929–1909 BC

THE PATRIARCHS

Jacob Becomes Israel

c. 1929–1909 BC · Traditional date

Jacob, fleeing his brother Esau, receives the promise of Abraham in a dream at Bethel. Twenty years later he wrestles through the night at the Jabbok and is given the name Israel, which his descendants will bear.

Jacob and Esau were the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah. Before their birth Rebekah was told that "the elder will serve the younger" (Genesis 25:21–26). Esau, the firstborn, sold Jacob his birthright for a meal (Genesis 25:29–34), and Jacob, with his mother's help, obtained by deceit the blessing that Isaac meant for Esau (Genesis 27:5–29). Esau planned to kill him, and Jacob was sent away to his uncle Laban in Haran (Genesis 27:41–45).

On the road, Genesis says, he slept in the open with a stone under his head. He dreamed of a stairway set between earth and heaven, with the angels of God going up and down on it. The Lord stood above it and gave him the promise made to Abraham and Isaac: the land, descendants like the dust of the earth, and blessing for all the families of the earth (Genesis 28:10–15). Jacob set up the stone as a pillar, named the place Bethel, "God's house", and vowed that if God brought him home in peace the Lord would be his God (Genesis 28:16–22).

He served Laban for twenty years, married Leah and Rachel, and became the father of eleven sons and a daughter (Genesis 29:15–30) (Genesis 29:31–30:24) (Genesis 31:38–41). On his way home he heard that Esau was coming to meet him with four hundred men. He sent gifts ahead and sent his family across the ford of the Jabbok (Genesis 32:3–23). Left alone, he "wrestled with a man there until the breaking of the day". The man struck Jacob's hip and injured it, but Jacob would not let him go without a blessing. The man said: "Your name will no longer be called Jacob, but Israel; for you have fought with God and with men, and have prevailed" (Genesis 32:24–28). Jacob called the place Peniel, saying, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Genesis 32:30). He went on limping, and Esau ran to meet him and embraced him (Genesis 32:31–33:4).

Back in Canaan, Jacob returned to Bethel and built an altar. There, Genesis says, God appeared to him again, confirmed the name Israel and repeated the promise of the land (Genesis 35:6–15). Benjamin, his twelfth son, was born soon afterwards (Genesis 35:16–18). The twelve sons are the ancestors from whom the tribes of Israel take their names (Genesis 49:28).

Hosea recalls that Jacob "struggled with the angel, and prevailed" and met God at Bethel (Hosea 12:3–4). In John's Gospel Jesus takes up the dream and speaks of "the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (John 1:51).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Genesis gives Jacob's age at neither scene, but it can be worked out from figures elsewhere in the book. Jacob was 130 when he came to Egypt, in the second year of the famine (Genesis 47:9) (Genesis 45:6). Joseph was then about 39: he had entered Pharaoh's service at 30, and seven years of plenty had followed (Genesis 41:46–47) (Genesis 41:53–54). So Jacob was about 91 when Joseph was born, at the end of his first fourteen years with Laban (Genesis 30:25–26) (Genesis 31:41). That makes him about 77 at Bethel on the way out and about 97 at Peniel on the way back, twenty years later (Genesis 31:38).

On the chronology explained at the Call of Abraham, in which Jacob is born about 2006 BC, the dream at Bethel falls about 1929 BC and the night at Peniel about 1909 BC. These are the Bible's own figures added together. Nothing outside the Bible dates the events, and the other reckonings described there would move both dates by the same amount.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 25:21–26; Genesis 25:29–34; Genesis 27:5–29; Genesis 27:41–45; Genesis 28:10–15; Genesis 28:16–22; Genesis 29:15–30; Genesis 29:31–30:24; Genesis 31:38–41; Genesis 32:3–23; Genesis 32:24–28; Genesis 32:30; Genesis 32:31–33:4; Genesis 35:6–15; Genesis 35:16–18; Genesis 49:28; Hosea 12:3–4; John 1:51; Genesis 47:9; Genesis 45:6; Genesis 41:46–47; Genesis 41:53–54; Genesis 30:25–26; Genesis 31:41; Genesis 31:38

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethel, Peniel
Who Jacob, Esau
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Binding of Isaac c. 2050 BC 35

LEADS TO

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt c. 1898–1876 BC 42

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Binding of Isaac Before · c. 2050 BC 35

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt After · c. 1898–1876 BC 42

← The Binding of Isaac Earlier · c. 2050 BC
→ Joseph and the Descent into Egypt Later · c. 1898–1876 BC

THE PATRIARCHS

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt

c. 1898–1876 BC · Traditional date

Joseph, sold by his brothers as a slave, rises to govern Egypt and stores grain against a seven-year famine. He is reconciled with his brothers, and Jacob's whole family settles in the land of Goshen.

Joseph, a son of Jacob's old age, was his father's favourite, and Jacob gave him a special coat. He dreamed that his brothers' sheaves, and then the sun, moon and eleven stars, bowed down to him, and his brothers hated him (Genesis 37:3–11). When he was sent to find them with the flocks, they threw him into a pit and then sold him for twenty pieces of silver to traders on their way to Egypt. They let their father believe that a wild animal had killed him (Genesis 37:12–35).

In Egypt Joseph was bought by Potiphar, the captain of Pharaoh's guard. Potiphar's wife accused him falsely and he was put in prison (Genesis 39:1–20). There he interpreted the dreams of two of Pharaoh's officials (Genesis 40:1–22). Two years later he was brought out to interpret Pharaoh's own dreams of seven fat cows eaten by seven thin ones: seven years of plenty would be followed by seven years of famine (Genesis 41:1–32). Pharaoh set him over all Egypt. He was thirty years old, and he stored grain in the cities through the good years (Genesis 41:39–49).

The famine reached Canaan, and Jacob sent ten of his sons to buy grain. Joseph knew them, but they did not know him (Genesis 42:1–8). He tested them, kept Simeon as a hostage and demanded to see Benjamin, the youngest (Genesis 42:18–24). On their second visit he had his silver cup hidden in Benjamin's sack, and Judah offered to stay as a slave in the boy's place (Genesis 44). Then Joseph made himself known: "God sent me before you to preserve life" (Genesis 45:1–8).

Jacob came down to Egypt with his whole family, seventy people in all, and they settled as herdsmen in Goshen (Genesis 46:5–7) (Genesis 46:26–34) (Genesis 47:1–12). He lived there seventeen years and was carried back to Canaan for burial (Genesis 47:28) (Genesis 50:12–13). Joseph told his frightened brothers, "You meant evil against me, but God meant it for good" (Genesis 50:15–21). Before he died he made the Israelites swear to carry his bones out of Egypt when God brought them back to the land promised to Abraham (Genesis 50:22–26).

Exodus begins from this point: Israel multiplies in Egypt until a new king arises "who didn't know Joseph" (Exodus 1:6–8), and Moses takes Joseph's bones with him at the exodus (Exodus 13:19). Psalm 105 and Stephen's speech both retell the story as part of God's dealings with Israel (Psalm 105:16–23) (Acts 7:9–16).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The fixed point is Jacob's arrival in Egypt. The chronology explained at the Call of Abraham puts it in 1876 BC, 430 years before an exodus in 1446 BC (Exodus 12:40–41) (1 Kings 6:1). Joseph was then about 39: he had entered Pharaoh's service at 30, and seven years of plenty and two of famine had passed (Genesis 41:46) (Genesis 41:53–54) (Genesis 45:6). He was sold at 17 (Genesis 37:2), about 1898 BC, and died at 110 (Genesis 50:26), about 1805 BC. The timeline shows the span from his sale to his father's arrival.

No Egyptian text names Joseph or records these events, and Genesis does not name the Pharaoh, so there is no outside anchor. If the exodus is dated to the thirteenth century BC, or if the 430 years include the patriarchs' time in Canaan, as in the Septuagint and Josephus (Septuagint Exodus 12:40) (Josephus, Antiquities 2.318), the dates come down by about two centuries, and by about four if both are accepted.

Primary sources

Scripture

Genesis 37:3–11; Genesis 37:12–35; Genesis 39:1–20; Genesis 40:1–22; Genesis 41:1–32; Genesis 41:39–49; Genesis 42:1–8; Genesis 42:18–24; Genesis 44; Genesis 45:1–8; Genesis 46:5–7; Genesis 46:26–34; Genesis 47:1–12; Genesis 47:28; Genesis 50:12–13; Genesis 50:15–21; Genesis 50:22–26; Exodus 1:6–8; Exodus 13:19; Psalm 105:16–23; Acts 7:9–16; Exodus 12:40–41; 1 Kings 6:1; Genesis 41:46; Genesis 41:53–54; Genesis 45:6; Genesis 37:2; Genesis 50:26

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Exodus 12:40

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
2.318

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Goshen
Who Joseph, Jacob
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jacob Becomes Israel c. 1929–1909 BC 39

LEADS TO

The Call of Moses c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48

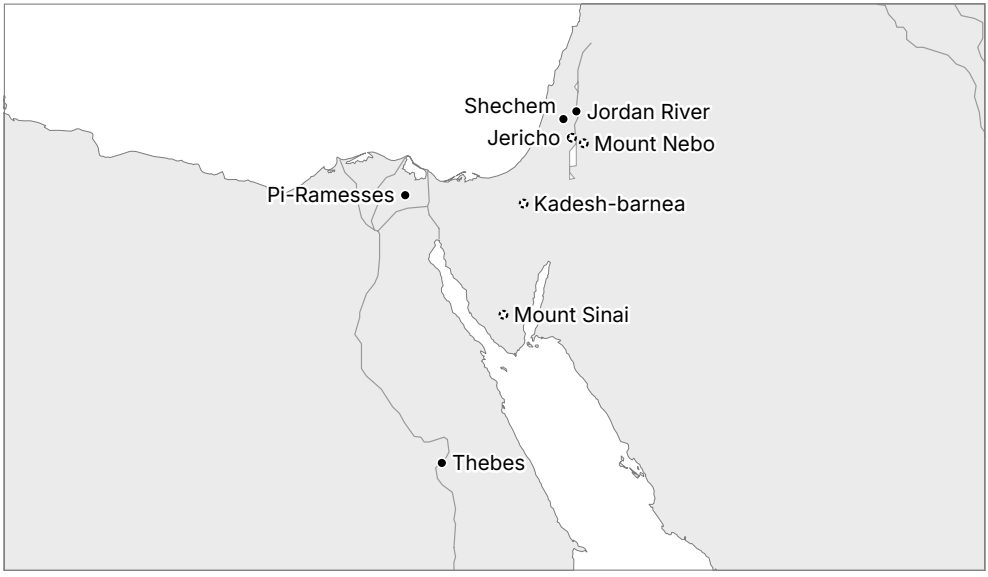
COVENANT AND PROMISE

Jacob Becomes Israel Before · c. 1929–1909 BC 39

The Call of Moses After · c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48

← Jacob Becomes Israel Earlier · c. 1929–1909 BC
→ The Call of Moses Later · c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC

TIMELINE



Exodus and Conquest

c. 1500–1200 BC

Israel leaves Egypt under Moses, receives the law at Sinai and enters Canaan under Joshua. The earliest mention of Israel outside the Bible falls at the end of this era.

The exodus is the founding event of Israel's faith and the pattern the New Testament uses for redemption. Scholars who accept a historical exodus place it either about 1446 BC, from the figure in 1 Kings 6:1, or in the thirteenth century BC, from archaeology and Egyptian records. Around 1208 BC the Merneptah Stele names a people called Israel in Canaan.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Call of Moses c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48
The Exodus from Egypt c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52
The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56
The Tabernacle and the Priesthood c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60

Forty Years in the Wilderness c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC 63
The Farewell and Death of Moses c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67
Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 71
Covenant Renewal at Shechem c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75
Israel Named on the Merneptah Stele c. 1208 BC 79

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

The Call of Moses

c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC · Traditional date

In Exodus Moses, born under Pharaoh's order to kill Hebrew boys and raised by Pharaoh's daughter, flees to Midian. At Horeb a voice from a burning bush reveals the divine name and sends him back to bring Israel out of Egypt.

Exodus opens with the descendants of Jacob grown numerous in Egypt (Exodus 1:1–7). A new king, "who didn't know Joseph", put them to forced labour on his store cities, Pithom and Raamses (Exodus 1:8–14), and then ordered that every Hebrew boy be thrown into the river (Exodus 1:22).

Moses was born to parents of the tribe of Levi. His mother hid him for three months and then set him among the reeds in a basket, where Pharaoh's daughter found him. She paid the child's own mother to nurse him and brought him up as her son (Exodus 2:1–10). As a grown man he killed an Egyptian whom he saw beating a Hebrew. When the deed became known he fled to Midian, where he married Zipporah, a daughter of the priest of Midian (Exodus 2:11–22).

Leading his father-in-law's flock through the wilderness, he came to "God's mountain, to Horeb". There, Exodus says, the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire from a bush that burned without being consumed (Exodus 3:1–3). The voice from the bush named itself as the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, said that it had seen the suffering of the people in Egypt, and sent Moses to Pharaoh to bring them out (Exodus 3:4–10). Asked for a name, God answered "I AM WHO I AM" and gave the name Yahweh, which most English Bibles print as "the LORD": "This is my name forever" (Exodus 3:13–15).

Moses objected that the people would not believe him, and was given three signs to perform (Exodus 4:1–9). He pleaded that he was slow of speech and asked that someone else be sent. His brother Aaron was appointed to speak for him (Exodus 4:10–17). The two met at the mountain and went together to the elders of Israel, who believed them (Exodus 4:27–31).

The story ties the rescue from Egypt to the promise made to the patriarchs: God, it says, "remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob" (Exodus 2:23–25). The mountain of the call is the one to which Moses is told he will bring the people (Exodus 3:12), and it becomes the scene of the Covenant at Sinai. In the Gospels Jesus quotes the words spoken at the bush in his argument for the resurrection of the dead (Mark 12:26–27).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Exodus gives no regnal year and names no pharaoh. It says only that Moses was eighty years old when he and Aaron spoke to Pharaoh (Exodus 7:7), so the call belongs shortly before the departure from Egypt. Stephen's speech in Acts divides his earlier life into forty years in Egypt and forty in Midian (Acts 7:23) (Acts 7:30).

The calendar year therefore depends on the date of the exodus, which is disputed: about 1446 BC if the 480 years of (1 Kings 6:1) are counted literally, or about 1260 BC if the store city Raamses (Exodus 1:11) is the residence built by Ramesses II. For the first see Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48 (2005), pp. 475–489; for the second, James K. Hoffmeier, "What Is the Biblical Date for the Exodus? A Response to Bryant Wood", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 50 (2007), pp. 225–247. No Egyptian record mentions Moses or the exodus, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. The timeline places the call one year before the exodus, at the earlier of the two dates, and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Exodus 1:1–7; Exodus 1:8–14; Exodus 1:22; Exodus 2:1–10; Exodus 2:11–22; Exodus 3:1–3; Exodus 3:4–10; Exodus 3:13–15; Exodus 4:1–9; Exodus 4:10–17; Exodus 4:27–31; Exodus 2:23–25; Exodus 3:12; Mark 12:26–27; Exodus 7:7; Acts 7:23; Acts 7:30; 1 Kings 6:1; Exodus 1:11

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Sinai
Who Moses, Aaron
Threads Covenant and Promise, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt c. 1898–1876 BC 42

LEADS TO

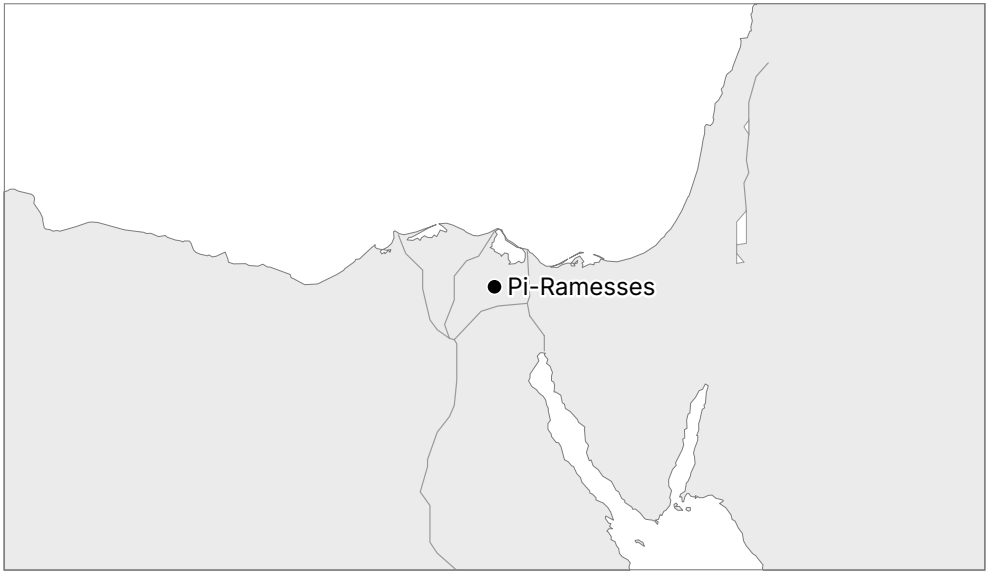
The Exodus from Egypt c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Joseph and the Descent into Egypt Before · c. 1898–1876 BC 42
The Exodus from Egypt After · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark After · c. 1070 BC 91



← Joseph and the Descent into Egypt Earlier · c. 1898–1876 BC
→ The Exodus from Egypt Later · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

The Exodus from Egypt

c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC · Traditional date

Exodus tells how, after a series of plagues and the first Passover, Israel leaves Egypt under Moses and crosses the sea, in which Pharaoh's pursuing army is drowned. The rest of the Bible looks back to this event constantly.

Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh with the demand that Israel be allowed to go into the wilderness to hold a feast to its God. Pharaoh refused and made the labour heavier: the brick-makers were now to find their own straw and deliver the same number of bricks (Exodus 5:1–9).

Exodus then tells of nine blows on Egypt: the river turned to blood, frogs, lice, flies, a disease of livestock, boils, hail, locusts and three days of darkness (Exodus 7:14–10:29). The land of Goshen, where the Israelites lived, is said to have been spared (Exodus 8:22) (Exodus 9:26). After each blow, the text says, Pharaoh's heart was hardened and he would not let the people go (Exodus 7:22; 8:15, 19, 32; 9:7, 12, 35; 10:20, 27).

Before the tenth blow every Israelite household was told to kill a lamb on the fourteenth day of the first month, to mark its doorposts and lintel with the blood, and to eat the meat roasted, with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, dressed for a journey (Exodus 12:1–11). At midnight, Exodus says, the firstborn of Egypt died, and the marked houses were passed over (Exodus 12:12–13) (Exodus 12:29–30). Pharaoh sent the people away that same night (Exodus 12:31–33). The meal was to be repeated every year as a memorial, the Passover (Exodus 12:14) (Exodus 12:24–27).

The Israelites set out from Rameses, generally identified with Pi-Ramesses in the eastern Delta. Exodus counts about six hundred thousand men on foot, besides children and a "mixed multitude" (Exodus 12:37–38). Pharaoh changed his mind and pursued them with his chariots to the edge of the sea (Exodus 14:5–9). There, the account says, Moses stretched out his hand, a strong east wind drove the sea back all night, and Israel crossed on dry ground; when the Egyptians followed, the water returned and covered them (Exodus 14:21–29). Moses and the people sang a song of victory, and Miriam the prophetess, Aaron's sister, led the women with tambourines and dancing (Exodus 15:1–21).

The rest of the Bible returns to this event constantly. The Ten Commandments begin with it: "I am Yahweh your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (Exodus 20:2). Luke presents the Last Supper as a Passover meal (Luke 22:14–20), and Paul writes that "Christ, our Passover, has been sacrificed" (1 Corinthians 5:7).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

No Egyptian text or monument that mentions the exodus is known. The only account is the biblical one, and both the date of the event and how far it can be treated as history are disputed. Those who hold to a historical exodus defend one of two dates.

The first takes the figure in Kings literally: Solomon began the temple in his fourth year, "in the four hundred and eightieth year" after Israel came out of Egypt (1 Kings 6:1). With Solomon's fourth year at about 966 BC this gives about 1446 BC, and Jephthah's "three hundred years" of Israelite settlement east of the Jordan is cited in support (Judges 11:26). See Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48 (2005), pp. 475–489.

The second starts from the store city Raamses (Exodus 1:11) and identifies it with Pi-Ramesses, the residence that Ramesses II (reigned about 1279–1213 BC) built in the eastern Delta and that excavation has located at Qantir. It reads the 480 years as twelve generations reckoned at forty years each, and puts the exodus about 1270–1260 BC. See Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament (2003), and James K. Hoffmeier, "What Is the Biblical Date for the Exodus? A Response to Bryant Wood", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 50 (2007), pp. 225–247. Advocates of the earlier date answer that the name Raamses in Exodus is a later updating of an older place name.

Either date must leave Israel in or near Canaan by about 1208 BC, when the stele of Merneptah lists it beside Ashkelon, Gezer and Yanoam (Merneptah Stele lines 26–28). Many historians and archaeologists doubt that an exodus on the scale the text describes took place. They hold that the narrative cannot be confirmed for either century and that Israel took shape largely within Canaan: see Israel Finkelstein and Neil Asher Silberman, The Bible Unearthed (2001), and William G. Dever, Who Were the Early Israelites and Where Did They Come From? (2003). The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Exodus 5:1–9; Exodus 7:14–10:29; Exodus 8:22; Exodus 9:26; Exodus 7:22; 8:15, 19, 32; 9:7, 12, 35; 10:20, 27; Exodus 12:1–11; Exodus 12:12–13; Exodus 12:29–30; Exodus 12:31–33; Exodus 12:14; Exodus 12:24–27; Exodus 12:37–38; Exodus 14:5–9; Exodus 14:21–29; Exodus 15:1–21; Exodus 20:2; Luke 22:14–20; 1 Corinthians 5:7; 1 Kings 6:1; Judges 11:26; Exodus 1:11

The Merneptah Stele (Israel Stela) Issued in the name of Merneptah · c. 1208 BC (year 5 of Merneptah)
lines 26–28

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Pi-Ramesses
Who Moses, Aaron, Miriam
Threads Covenant and Promise, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Call of Moses c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48

LEADS TO

The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

The Last Supper AD 30 or 33 346

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Call of Moses Before · c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48

The Covenant at Sinai After · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Binding of Isaac Before · c. 2050 BC 35

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood After · c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60

← The Call of Moses Earlier · c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC
→ The Covenant at Sinai Later · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

The Covenant at Sinai

c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC · Traditional date

In Exodus Israel hears the Ten Commandments at Mount Sinai and accepts a covenant sealed with blood. While Moses is on the mountain the people make a golden calf; after his intercession the tablets of the law are written again.

In the third month after leaving Egypt the Israelites camped in the wilderness in front of Mount Sinai (Exodus 19:1–2). Through Moses, Exodus says, God offered them a covenant: if they kept it, they would be his own possession among all peoples, "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation". The people answered that they would do all that the Lord had spoken (Exodus 19:3–8).

On the third day, the account goes on, there was thunder and lightning, a thick cloud and the sound of a trumpet, and the mountain smoked and shook (Exodus 19:16–19). God then spoke the Ten Commandments, which begin by naming him as the one who brought Israel out of Egypt (Exodus 20:1–17). The people were afraid and asked Moses to speak to them in God's place (Exodus 20:18–21). Moses wrote down the words, built an altar, read "the book of the covenant" aloud and sprinkled the blood of the sacrifices on the altar and on the people as "the blood of the covenant" (Exodus 24:3–8). He then went up into the cloud on the mountain for forty days and forty nights (Exodus 24:15–18) and was given two stone tablets "written with God's finger" (Exodus 31:18).

While he was away the people asked Aaron for gods to go before them. Aaron made a calf from their gold earrings and built an altar in front of it (Exodus 32:1–6). Moses pleaded for the people on the mountain (Exodus 32:11–14), came down, broke the tablets at the sight of the calf and destroyed it (Exodus 32:19–20). About three thousand men were killed by the Levites (Exodus 32:26–28). Moses offered to be blotted out himself if the people could not be forgiven (Exodus 32:30–32). He cut two new tablets and went up again, and there, the text says, the Lord passed before him and proclaimed himself "a merciful and gracious God, slow to anger" (Exodus 34:1–7). After another forty days the words of the covenant, "the ten commandments", were written on the new tablets (Exodus 34:27–28).

Deuteronomy repeats the commandments. It has Moses tell the next generation that the covenant at Horeb, its name for the mountain, was made "with us, even us, who are all of us here alive today" (Deuteronomy 5:1–22). The churches number the ten differently: the Catholic Catechism notes that Catholics and Lutherans follow Augustine's division, and the Orthodox and Reformed that of the Greek Fathers (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2066).

Jeremiah promised a new covenant, unlike the one made when Israel was led out of Egypt (Jeremiah 31:31–34). The New Testament takes up both the promise and the words of Moses: at the Last Supper Jesus calls the cup "my blood of the new covenant" (Matthew 26:27–28), and the letter to the Hebrews contrasts the fire and trumpet of Sinai with Mount Zion and "Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant" (Hebrews 12:18–24).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Exodus sets the arrival at Sinai in the third month after the departure from Egypt (Exodus 19:1), so these events fall in the year of the Exodus from Egypt and share its uncertainty. That year is about 1446 BC if the 480 years of (1 Kings 6:1) are counted literally (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or about 1260 BC if the store city Raamses (Exodus 1:11) was built for Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). There is no evidence from outside the Bible for the events at Sinai. No Egyptian record of the exodus is known, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Exodus 19:1–2; Exodus 19:3–8; Exodus 19:16–19; Exodus 20:1–17; Exodus 20:18–21; Exodus 24:3–8; Exodus 24:15–18; Exodus 31:18; Exodus 32:1–6; Exodus 32:11–14; Exodus 32:19–20; Exodus 32:26–28; Exodus 32:30–32; Exodus 34:1–7; Exodus 34:27–28; Deuteronomy 5:1–22; Jeremiah 31:31–34; Matthew 26:27–28; Hebrews 12:18–24; Exodus 19:1; 1 Kings 6:1; Exodus 1:11

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
2066

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Sinai
Who Moses, Aaron
Threads Covenant and Promise, Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Exodus from Egypt c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52
God's Covenant with Abraham c. 2080–2067 BC 32

LEADS TO

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60
Forty Years in the Wilderness c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC 63

Covenant Renewal at Shechem c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176

The Sermon on the Mount c. AD 28–29 315

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Exodus from Egypt Before · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52

The Farewell and Death of Moses After · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Farewell and Death of Moses After · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67

← The Exodus from Egypt Earlier · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC
→ The Tabernacle and the Priesthood Later · c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood

c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC · Traditional date

Following instructions given on Sinai, Israel builds a portable sanctuary to house the ark of the covenant. Aaron and his sons are ordained as its priests, and the yearly Day of Atonement is laid down.

During the forty days on Mount Sinai, Exodus says, Moses was told to collect gold, silver, bronze, fine cloth, skins and acacia wood from all who were willing to give. "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them", after the pattern shown to him (Exodus 25:1–9). At its centre was to be the ark, a chest of acacia wood overlaid with gold, holding the tablets of the covenant. On it lay a cover of pure gold with two cherubim, and from above that cover God would speak with Moses (Exodus 25:10–22).

After the affair of the golden calf the work was carried out. The people brought more than was needed and had to be told to stop (Exodus 36:3–7). Bezalel of the tribe of Judah and Oholiab of the tribe of Dan directed the craftsmen (Exodus 35:30–35), who made the tent, the ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars and the priests' vestments as Moses had been instructed (Exodus 39:32–43).

On the first day of the first month of the second year the tabernacle was set up. Moses put the tablets in the ark and the ark behind the veil (Exodus 40:17–21). The book of Exodus ends with the cloud covering the tent: "Yahweh's glory filled the tabernacle", and Moses could not go in. From then on the lifting of the cloud was the signal to break camp (Exodus 40:34–38).

Aaron and his four sons had been named as priests (Exodus 28:1). Moses washed them, clothed Aaron in the high priest's vestments and anointed him, and they remained at the entrance of the tent for seven days (Leviticus 8:1–13) (Leviticus 8:33–36). On the eighth day Aaron offered his first sacrifices and blessed the people, and, Leviticus says, fire came out from before the Lord and consumed the offering on the altar (Leviticus 9:1–7, 22–24). Two of his sons, Nadab and Abihu, died for offering "strange fire" (Leviticus 10:1–3). Leviticus then lays down that the high priest may pass behind the veil only once a year, on the tenth day of the seventh month. On that day he brings blood to make atonement for the sanctuary and the people, and a second goat is sent into the wilderness carrying their sins (Leviticus 16:1–22) (Leviticus 16:29–34).

The tent and its ark went with Israel through the wilderness and were finally brought into Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:4–11). The letter to the Hebrews describes the tabernacle and the Day of Atonement and reads them as a figure of Christ, who "entered in once for all into the Holy Place" (Hebrews 9:1–12).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Exodus dates the setting up of the tabernacle to the first day of the first month of the second year after the departure from Egypt (Exodus 40:17), and Numbers has the camp leave Sinai seven weeks later (Numbers 10:11–12). The calendar year is counted from the Exodus from Egypt and is as uncertain as that date: about 1445 BC if the exodus is put at about 1446 BC on the strength of (1 Kings 6:1) (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or the year after an exodus of about 1260 BC under Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). The biblical books are the only source for the tabernacle, and no remains of it are known. No Egyptian record of the exodus is known, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Exodus 25:1–9; Exodus 25:10–22; Exodus 36:3–7; Exodus 35:30–35; Exodus 39:32–43; Exodus 40:17–21; Exodus 40:34–38; Exodus 28:1; Leviticus 8:1–13; Leviticus 8:33–36; Leviticus 9:1–7, 22–24; Leviticus 10:1–3; Leviticus 16:1–22; Leviticus 16:29–34; 1 Kings 8:4–11; Hebrews 9:1–12; Exodus 40:17; Numbers 10:11–12; 1 Kings 6:1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Sinai
Who Moses, Aaron
Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

LEADS TO

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark c. 1070 BC 91
Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Exodus from Egypt Before · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52
Samuel and the Loss of the Ark After · c. 1070 BC 91

← The Covenant at Sinai Earlier · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC
→ Forty Years in the Wilderness Later · c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

Forty Years in the Wilderness

c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC · Traditional date

At Kadesh-barnea the Israelites refuse to enter Canaan after their scouts report on it, and are sentenced to wander until that generation has died. Forty years after leaving Egypt their children camp opposite Jericho.

In the second year after leaving Egypt, Numbers says, the Israelites broke camp at Sinai and moved on towards the wilderness of Paran, with the ark carried ahead of them (Numbers 10:11–12) (Numbers 10:33–36). On the way Miriam and Aaron challenged the standing of Moses; Miriam was struck with leprosy and kept outside the camp for seven days (Numbers 12:1–15).

From the wilderness of Paran Moses sent twelve men, one from each tribe, to scout the land of Canaan (Numbers 13:1–3) (Numbers 13:17–20). After forty days they came back to the camp at Kadesh with a cluster of grapes that two men carried between them on a pole. The land was rich, they said, but its people were strong and its cities fortified (Numbers 13:23–29). Caleb urged an immediate advance. The others said it could not be done (Numbers 13:30–33).

The people wept and talked of choosing a leader to take them back to Egypt. Caleb and Joshua pleaded with them and were nearly stoned (Numbers 14:1–10). Moses interceded, and the people were spared. But the sentence was that everyone counted in the census, from twenty years old upward, would die in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua. Their children would wander for forty years, a year for each day of the scouting (Numbers 14:11–35). An attempt to invade without Moses or the ark was beaten back (Numbers 14:39–45). Deuteronomy names the place of the refusal as Kadesh-barnea (Deuteronomy 1:19–40).

Numbers tells little of the years that followed. It records the revolt of Korah, Dathan and Abiram against Moses and Aaron (Numbers 16:1–3) (Numbers 16:31–35), and then finds the people at Kadesh again, where Miriam died (Numbers 20:1). When water ran short there, Moses struck the rock with his staff. He and Aaron were told that they too would not enter the land (Numbers 20:2–13). Edom refused them passage (Numbers 20:14–21), and Aaron died on Mount Hor, leaving the priesthood to his son Eleazar (Numbers 20:22–29). When snakes killed many in the camp, Moses set a bronze serpent on a pole for the bitten to look at (Numbers 21:4–9). East of the Jordan the Israelites defeated the kings Sihon and Og (Numbers 21:21–35) and camped in the plains of Moab opposite Jericho (Numbers 22:1). By then, a second census found, no one counted at Sinai was left but Caleb and Joshua (Numbers 26:63–65).

Later Scripture treats these years as a warning. Psalm 95 recalls the generation that did not enter God's rest (Psalm 95:7–11), and Hebrews and Paul apply the lesson to Christians (Hebrews 3:7–19) (1 Corinthians 10:1–6). John's Gospel compares the lifting up of the serpent to the lifting up of the Son of Man (John 3:14–15).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The limits come from the Bible's own count. Israel leaves Sinai on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after the exodus (Numbers 10:11–12). Aaron dies on the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year (Numbers 33:38), and Moses begins his last address on the first day of the eleventh month of that year (Deuteronomy 1:3). Deuteronomy counts thirty-eight years from Kadesh-barnea to the crossing of the brook Zered (Deuteronomy 2:14).

The calendar years depend on the date of the Exodus from Egypt: about 1445–1406 BC if it is put at about 1446 BC from (1 Kings 6:1) (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or about 1259–1220 BC if it is put about 1260 BC under Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). No Egyptian record of the exodus is known, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. Excavation at the oasis usually identified as Kadesh-barnea has uncovered fortresses of the tenth to sixth centuries BC and only slight earlier remains, whose date is debated: see Kadesh-barnea. Forty is a frequent round number in the Old Testament, and some scholars read it as a conventional figure for a generation and not an exact count; the question is reviewed by James K. Hoffmeier, "What Is the Biblical Date for the Exodus? A Response to Bryant Wood", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 50 (2007), pp. 236–237. The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Numbers 10:11–12; Numbers 10:33–36; Numbers 12:1–15; Numbers 13:1–3; Numbers 13:17–20; Numbers 13:23–29; Numbers 13:30–33; Numbers 14:1–10; Numbers 14:11–35; Numbers 14:39–45; Deuteronomy 1:19–40; Numbers 16:1–3; Numbers 16:31–35; Numbers 20:1; Numbers 20:2–13; Numbers 20:14–21; Numbers 20:22–29; Numbers 21:4–9; Numbers 21:21–35; Numbers 22:1; Numbers 26:63–65; Psalm 95:7–11; Hebrews 3:7–19; 1 Corinthians 10:1–6; John 3:14–15; Numbers 33:38; Deuteronomy 1:3; Deuteronomy 2:14; 1 Kings 6:1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Kadesh-barnea
Who Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Joshua, Caleb

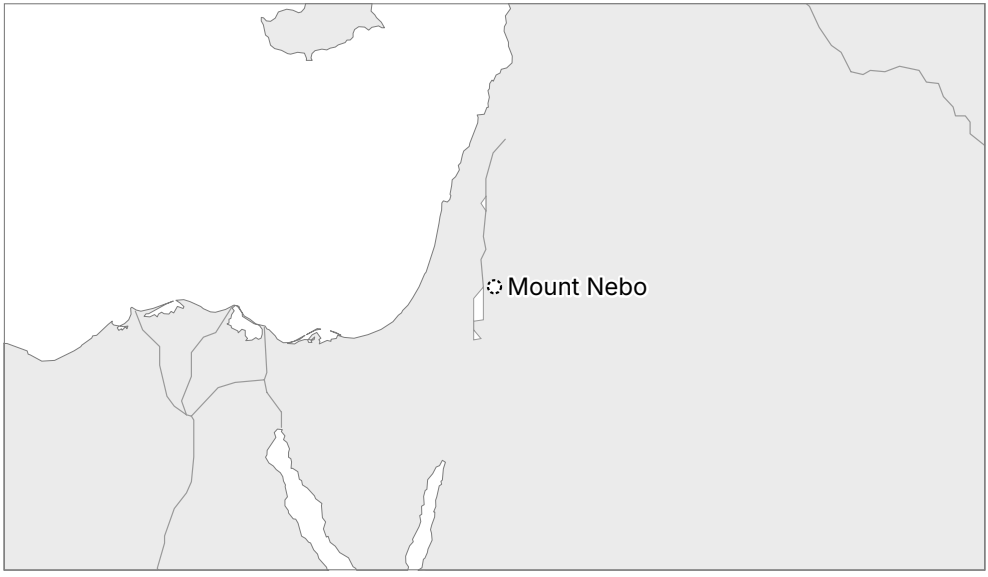
In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

LEADS TO

The Farewell and Death of Moses c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67



← The Tabernacle and the Priesthood Earlier · c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC
→ The Farewell and Death of Moses Later · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

The Farewell and Death of Moses

c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC · Traditional date

In the plains of Moab Moses renews the covenant with the generation born in the wilderness, writes down the law and hands the leadership to Joshua. He sees the promised land from Mount Nebo and dies there without entering it.

In the fortieth year after the exodus, with Israel camped east of the Jordan in the land of Moab, Moses addressed the people for the last time (Deuteronomy 1:1–5). The book of Deuteronomy is presented as these speeches. In them he restates the law and makes a covenant in Moab “in addition to the covenant which he made with them in Horeb” (Deuteronomy 29:1). It binds everyone present, from the leaders to the woodcutters and water-carriers, and also “those who are not here with us today” (Deuteronomy 29:10–15). He sets before them life and death, blessing and curse, and urges them to choose life (Deuteronomy 30:15–20).

Moses, now a hundred and twenty years old, told the people that he would not cross the Jordan, and charged Joshua in the sight of all Israel to be strong and courageous (Deuteronomy 31:1–8). He had earlier laid his hands on Joshua before the priest Eleazar and the whole community (Numbers 27:18–23). Deuteronomy says that Moses wrote "this law" and gave it to the priests and elders, to be read aloud to all Israel every seventh year at the feast of tents, and that the book was placed beside the ark as a witness (Deuteronomy 31:9–13) (Deuteronomy 31:24–26). He taught the people a song and pronounced a last blessing on Israel (Deuteronomy 31:22, 30) (Deuteronomy 33:1).

He had asked to be allowed to cross and had been refused (Deuteronomy 3:23–28); the reason given in the command to go up the mountain is his failure at the waters of Meribah (Deuteronomy 32:48–52). He went up from the plains of Moab to Mount Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, opposite Jericho, and was shown the whole land, from Gilead and Dan to the western sea and south to Zoar. "I have caused you to see it with your eyes, but you shall not go over there" (Deuteronomy 34:1–4). Moses died there in the land of Moab and was buried in a valley opposite Beth-peor, "but no man knows where his tomb is to this day". Israel wept for him thirty days (Deuteronomy 34:5–8).

The book closes with the judgment that no prophet has since arisen in Israel like Moses, "whom Yahweh knew face to face" (Deuteronomy 34:10–12). Earlier in the book Moses promises a prophet like himself (Deuteronomy 18:15–18), and in Acts Peter applies that promise to Jesus (Acts 3:12, 22). In the Gospels Moses appears with Elijah at the transfiguration (Luke 9:28–31). The New Testament names the first part of the Scriptures after him, "the law of Moses" (Luke 24:44).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Deuteronomy dates the farewell speeches to the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the exodus (Deuteronomy 1:3). Moses is mourned for thirty days (Deuteronomy 34:8), and Joshua crosses the Jordan on the tenth day of the first month (Joshua 4:19), so the death falls near the end of the fortieth year.

The calendar year is forty years after the Exodus from Egypt and shares its uncertainty: about 1406 BC if the exodus is put at about 1446 BC from (1 Kings 6:1) (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or about 1220 BC if it is put about 1260 BC under Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). No Egyptian record mentions Moses or the exodus, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Deuteronomy 1:1–5; Deuteronomy 29:1; Deuteronomy 29:10–15; Deuteronomy 30:15–20; Deuteronomy 31:1–8; Numbers 27:18–23; Deuteronomy 31:9–13; Deuteronomy 31:24–26; Deuteronomy 31:22, 30; Deuteronomy 33:1; Deuteronomy 3:23–28; Deuteronomy 32:48–52; Deuteronomy 34:1–4; Deuteronomy 34:5–8; Deuteronomy 34:10–12; Deuteronomy 18:15–18; Acts 3:12, 22; Luke 9:28–31; Luke 24:44; Deuteronomy 1:3; Deuteronomy 34:8; Joshua 4:19; 1 Kings 6:1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Nebo
Who Moses, Joshua Threads Covenant and Promise, Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Forty Years in the Wilderness c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC 63

LEADS TO

Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 71

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Covenant at Sinai Before · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56
Covenant Renewal at Shechem After · c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Covenant at Sinai Before · c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law

After · 622 BC

← Forty Years in the Wilderness Earlier · c. 1445–1406 or c. 1259–1220 BC
→ Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho Later · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho

c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC · Traditional date

The book of Joshua tells how Israel crosses the Jordan on dry ground, camps at Gilgal and keeps its first Passover in Canaan. Jericho's wall falls after a seven-day procession around the city, and Rahab, who had sheltered Joshua's spies, is spared.

After the death of Moses, the book of Joshua says, the Lord told Joshua to lead the people across the Jordan and promised to be with him as he had been with Moses (Joshua 1:1–9). From the camp at Shittim Joshua sent two men to look at Jericho. They lodged in the house of Rahab, a prostitute, who hid them under stalks of flax on her roof when the king's men came for them. She told them that the city had heard what the Lord had done at the Red Sea and was afraid. In return for her help she asked for the lives of her family. The spies swore to it and told her to tie a scarlet cord in her window, and she let them down by a rope from her house on the city wall (Joshua 2:1–21).

The Jordan was in flood at harvest time. When the priests carrying the ark stepped into it, the book says, the water coming down from upstream stood in a heap far off at the town of Adam, and the people crossed opposite Jericho on dry ground (Joshua 3:14–17). They camped at Gilgal on the tenth day of the first month and set up twelve stones taken from the riverbed (Joshua 4:19–24). There the men born in the wilderness were circumcised and the Passover was kept. The day after they first ate the produce of the land, the manna ceased (Joshua 5:2–12).

Jericho was shut against them. For six days the armed men, seven priests blowing rams' horns and the ark went around the city once a day, and on the seventh day seven times. At the last trumpet blast the people shouted, "the wall fell down flat", and they took the city (Joshua 6:1–20). Everything living in it was put to the sword, and the city was burned; its silver, gold, bronze and iron went into the treasury of the Lord. Rahab and her family were brought out alive, and she lived in Israel from then on (Joshua 6:21–25). Joshua laid a curse on anyone who should rebuild Jericho (Joshua 6:26).

The New Testament remembers both the city and the woman. Hebrews counts the fall of Jericho's walls and Rahab's welcome of the spies among the acts of faith (Hebrews 11:30–31), James cites her as one "justified by works" (James 2:25), and Matthew names a Rahab among the ancestors of Jesus (Matthew 1:5).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The book of Joshua dates the crossing to the tenth day of the first month (Joshua 4:19) at the end of the forty years in the wilderness (Joshua 5:6). The calendar year is therefore forty years after the Exodus from Egypt: about 1406 BC if the exodus is put at about 1446 BC from (1 Kings 6:1) (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or about 1220 BC if it is put about 1260 BC under Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). No Egyptian record of the exodus is known, and no source from the time outside the Bible mentions the entry into Canaan. Many scholars doubt that an exodus or a conquest on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question.

The mound of ancient Jericho, Tell es-Sultan, has been excavated several times, and the date of the destruction of its last walled Bronze Age city is disputed. John Garstang, who dug there in 1930–1936, put it in the Late Bronze Age and connected it with Joshua (John Garstang and J. B. E. Garstang, The Story of Jericho, 1940). Kathleen Kenyon, who excavated there in 1952–1958, assigned it to the end of the Middle Bronze Age, in the sixteenth century BC (Digging Up Jericho, 1957). Bryant G. Wood has argued again for about 1400 BC ("Did the Israelites Conquer Jericho? A New Look at the Archaeological Evidence", Biblical Archaeology Review 16:2, 1990). Radiocarbon dating of charred grain from the destruction layer gave the late seventeenth or the sixteenth century BC, and its authors concluded that the city was not destroyed about 1400 BC (H. J. Bruins and J. van der Plicht, Radiocarbon 37, 1995, pp. 213–220). No town of the late thirteenth century BC has been found on the mound, as Wood notes against the later date (p. 476 of his 2005 article cited above). The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Joshua 1:1–9; Joshua 2:1–21; Joshua 3:14–17; Joshua 4:19–24; Joshua 5:2–12; Joshua 6:1–20; Joshua 6:21–25; Joshua 6:26; Hebrews 11:30–31; James 2:25; Matthew 1:5; Joshua 4:19; Joshua 5:6; 1 Kings 6:1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jericho, Gilgal, Jordan River
Who Joshua, Rahab

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Farewell and Death of Moses c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67

LEADS TO

Covenant Renewal at Shechem c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75

← The Farewell and Death of Moses Earlier · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC → Covenant Renewal at Shechem Later · c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

Covenant Renewal at Shechem

c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC · Traditional date

Near the end of his life Joshua gathers the tribes at Shechem, recounts their history from Abraham to the conquest and calls on them to choose whom they will serve. The people pledge themselves, and he sets up a stone as witness.

When the wars were over and the land had been divided among the tribes (Joshua 11:23), Joshua, by now an old man, called Israel together twice (Joshua 23:1–2). The second assembly was at Shechem, with the elders, heads, judges and officers of all the tribes (Joshua 24:1). The place had a history. Abraham had built his first altar in Canaan there when the land was promised to him (Genesis 12:6–7), and Joshua himself had earlier read out the law to the whole people between the nearby mountains Ebal and Gerizim (Joshua 8:30–35).

Joshua spoke in the name of the Lord and went through the story from the beginning. Their ancestors “beyond the River” had served other gods. Abraham was brought to Canaan; Jacob and his children went down to Egypt; Moses and Aaron were sent, and Egypt was struck. Then came the sea, the wilderness, the victories east of the Jordan, the crossing and Jericho. They now lived in cities they had not built and ate from vineyards they had not planted (Joshua 24:2–13).

Then he put the choice. They were to put away the gods their ancestors had served and serve the Lord. If they were unwilling, they should choose that day whom they would serve; "but as for me and my house, we will serve Yahweh" (Joshua 24:14–15). The people answered that they too would serve the Lord, who had brought them out of Egypt. Joshua warned them that this God was holy and jealous and would not overlook unfaithfulness. They repeated their promise, and he declared them witnesses against themselves (Joshua 24:16–24).

So Joshua "made a covenant with the people that day", gave them statutes, wrote the words "in the book of the law of God", and set up a large stone under the oak by the sanctuary as a witness (Joshua 24:25–27). He died at the age of 110 and was buried on his own land in the hill country of Ephraim. The bones of Joseph, brought up from Egypt, were buried at Shechem in the plot that Jacob had bought (Joshua 24:29–32).

The scene closes the story that began at Sinai: the generation that had entered the land takes on the covenant for itself. Judges opens by saying that Israel kept faith while Joshua and the elders who outlived him were alive, and that the generation after them did not (Judges 2:7–11). That is the starting point of the Age of the Judges.

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The book of Joshua does not date the assembly. It places it "after many days", when Joshua was old (Joshua 23:1), and before his death at the age of 110 (Joshua 24:29). Caleb's ages show that the main campaigns were over about seven years after the crossing of the Jordan (Joshua 14:7–10) (Deuteronomy 2:14). The Bible does not say how long Joshua lived after that. Josephus, writing in the first century AD, well over a thousand years later, says that he led Israel for twenty-five years after the death of Moses (Josephus, Antiquities 5.117). The year shown here follows that figure, which is Josephus's own and not evidence from the time.

It is counted from the Exodus from Egypt and shares its uncertainty: about 1380 BC if the exodus is put at about 1446 BC from (1 Kings 6:1) (Bryant G. Wood, "The Rise and Fall of the 13th-Century Exodus-Conquest Theory", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48, 2005), or about 1195 BC if it is put about 1260 BC under Ramesses II (Kenneth A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament, 2003). No Egyptian record of the exodus is known, no source from the time outside the Bible mentions Joshua, and many scholars doubt that an exodus on the scale the Bible describes took place; the note on the Exodus from Egypt sets out the question. The timeline places the event at the earlier date and shows both.

Primary sources

Scripture

Joshua 11:23; Joshua 23:1–2; Joshua 24:1; Genesis 12:6–7; Joshua 8:30–35; Joshua 24:2–13; Joshua 24:14–15; Joshua 24:16–24; Joshua 24:25–27; Joshua 24:29–32; Judges 2:7–11; Joshua 23:1; Joshua 24:29; Joshua 14:7–10; Deuteronomy 2:14; 1 Kings 6:1

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
5.117

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Shechem
Who Joshua
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 71
The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

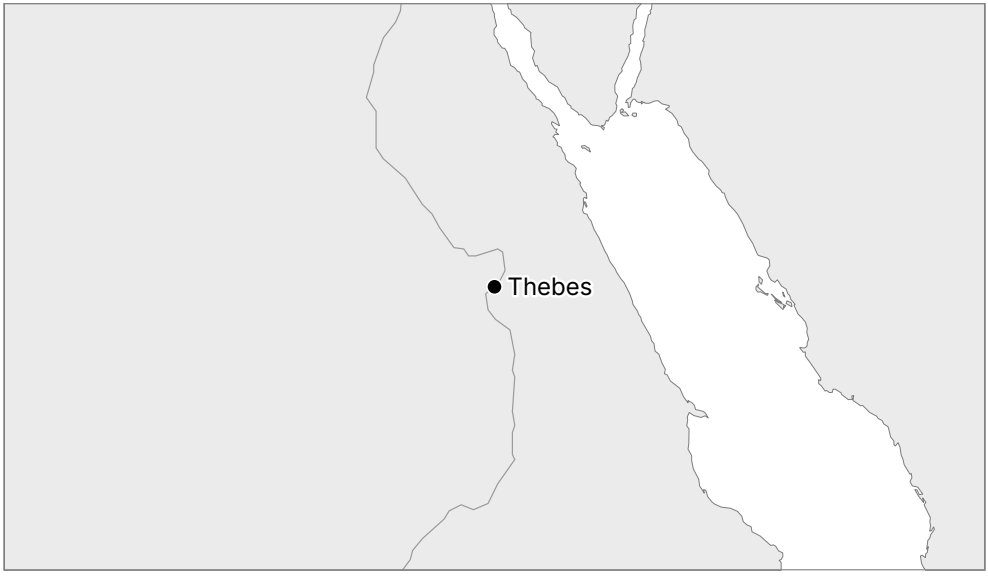
LEADS TO

The Age of the Judges c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Farewell and Death of Moses Before · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67

The Age of the Judges After · c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84



← Crossing the Jordan and the Fall of Jericho Earlier · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC
→ Israel Named on the Merneptah Stele Later · c. 1208 BC

EXODUS AND CONQUEST

Israel Named on the Merneptah Stele

c. 1208 BC · Estimated date

A granite stele set up at Thebes for Pharaoh Merneptah celebrates his victory over Libya. Its closing lines name Israel, beside Ashkelon, Gezer and Yanoam, among the defeated. It is the earliest known mention of Israel outside the Bible.

Merneptah, the son and successor of Ramesses II (Merneptah Stele museum record JE 31408), faced an invasion of Egypt from Libya in the fifth year of his reign and turned it back. A hymn celebrating the victory (Merneptah Stele lines 1–26) was carved on a granite stele (Merneptah Stele museum record JE 31408) more than three metres high (Petrie, Six Temples at Thebes p. 10). The stone was an old one. It had been made for Amenhotep III, and Merneptah's text was cut on its back (Merneptah Stele museum record JE 31408). It stood in the first court of Merneptah's mortuary temple on the west bank at Thebes, where Flinders Petrie found it fallen on its face in 1896 (Petrie, Six Temples at Thebes p. 13).

Almost all of the twenty-eight lines are about Libya (Merneptah Stele lines 1–26). The closing lines turn to the rest of Egypt's neighbours. No one among the foreign peoples lifts his head: Libya is wasted and the Hittite land is at peace; Canaan is plundered, Ashkelon carried off and Gezer seized (Merneptah Stele lines 26–28). Yanoam is "made as a thing not existing", and then comes the line that gives the stele its modern name: "Israel is desolated, his seed is not" (Merneptah Stele line 27).

The statement is short, and it is a boast. What it shows is limited but firm. A group called Israel existed in Merneptah's fifth year. It was in or near Canaan, since it is listed there with Ashkelon, Gezer and Yanoam. And, as the museum's record notes, the name refers to a people and not to a state (Merneptah Stele museum record JE 31408); Wilhelm Spiegelberg, who first published the text, rendered it "the people of Israel" (Petrie, Six Temples at Thebes p. 28). The stele says nothing of where this people came from. It does not mention Moses, a stay in Egypt or an exodus.

No undisputed older mention of Israel outside the Bible is known. For the dispute about the date of the Exodus from Egypt the stele is the one fixed point: on any reckoning Israel has to be in or near Canaan by about 1208 BC. Beyond that it has been read in several ways from the start. Petrie, publishing the find, set out five different views of how these Israelites might relate to those of the Bible (Petrie, Six Temples at Thebes p. 30).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The stele dates itself to the third day of the third month of the third season in the fifth year of Merneptah (Merneptah Stele line 1). Turning that into a calendar year depends on the reconstruction of Egyptian chronology. On the one now most used, Ramesses II reigned for 66 years, about 1279–1213 BC, and Merneptah about 1213–1203 BC, so that year 5 falls about 1209 or 1208 BC. The reign dates are those given by James K. Hoffmeier, "What Is the Biblical Date for the Exodus? A Response to Bryant Wood", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 50 (2007), p. 232, who puts the campaign about 1208 BC (p. 243). Other reconstructions move the reign by some years; the older "high" chronology put Ramesses II at 1304–1237 BC (Hoffmeier, p. 239). The stele dates the Libyan victory, not the fighting in Canaan, which is mentioned only in passing.

The writing of the name, which marks Israel as a people and not as a city or a land, is studied by Michael G. Hasel, "Israel in the Merneptah Stela", Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 296 (1994), pp. 45–61. J. H. Breasted showed that "his seed is not" is a set phrase used of other defeated enemies (Ancient Records of Egypt, vol. 3, 1906, §§ 603–605). A reading of "Israel" on an older inscribed block in Berlin, proposed by Manfred Görg, is disputed; Hoffmeier rejects it (pp. 241–242).

Primary sources

The Merneptah Stele (Israel Stela) Issued in the name of Merneptah · c. 1208 BC (year 5 of Merneptah)
museum record JE 31408; lines 1–26; lines 26–28; line 27; line 1

Six Temples at Thebes, 1896 W. M. Flinders Petrie · 1897
p. 10; p. 13; p. 28; p. 30

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Thebes
Who Merneptah

← Covenant Renewal at Shechem Earlier · c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC
→ The Age of the Judges Later · c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC
TIMELINE

Judges and the United Monarchy

c. 1200–930 BC

From tribal leaders to kings: Samuel, Saul, David and Solomon, the capture of Jerusalem and the building of the first temple.

After a period of local leaders called judges, Israel asks for a king. When that period began depends on the date of the exodus: about 1375 BC on the early date, about 1200 BC on the late one. David makes Jerusalem his capital and receives the promise of a lasting dynasty; Solomon builds the temple. Dates rest on the Bible's regnal figures, counted back from later reigns that Assyrian records fix.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Age of the Judges c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84

Ruth and Boaz c. 1100 BC 88

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark c. 1070 BC 91

Saul Becomes Israel's First King c. 1050 BC 95

David and Goliath c. 1025 BC 99
David Becomes King c. 1010–1003 BC 102
David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark c. 1003 BC 106
God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110
David, Bathsheba and Nathan c. 995 BC 114
Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

The Age of the Judges

c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC · Traditional date

After Joshua, Israel lives in its tribes without a king. The book of Judges tells of a repeated turn to other gods, foreign oppression, and rescue by leaders called judges, among them Deborah, Gideon and Samson.

The book of Judges begins after the death of Joshua. A new generation arose, it says, that did not know the Lord or what he had done for Israel. The people served the Baals and were handed over to their enemies; when they groaned under oppression the Lord raised up judges who rescued them; and when each judge died they turned back to other gods (Judges 2:8–19). The stories that follow are set inside this pattern.

Deborah, a prophetess who sat as judge in the hill country of Ephraim, summoned Barak to gather ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun on Mount Tabor. They faced Sisera, the commander of the Canaanite king Jabin of Hazor, who had nine hundred iron chariots (Judges 4:2–10). Barak went down from the mountain and Sisera's army was destroyed. Sisera fled on foot and was killed in her tent by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite (Judges 4:14–22). The Song of Deborah tells of the same victory in verse and names the tribes that fought and those that stayed at home (Judges 5:12–23).

Gideon of Manasseh was called while he threshed wheat in a winepress to hide it from Midianite raiders (Judges 6:11–16). He pulled down his father's altar of Baal by night (Judges 6:25–32). On the Lord's instruction he cut his force to three hundred men, and with trumpets, jars and torches threw the Midianite camp into panic in the dark (Judges 7:2–8, 16–22). When the Israelites asked him and his sons to rule them he refused: "Yahweh shall rule over you" (Judges 8:22–23). But the ephod he made from the plunder became an object of worship in his town (Judges 8:24–27).

Samson, of the tribe of Dan, was dedicated as a Nazirite before his birth, in years when the Philistines ruled Israel (Judges 13:1–5). Alone, he killed a thousand of them at Lehi with the jawbone of a donkey (Judges 15:14–16). Delilah learned that his strength lay in his uncut hair and betrayed him. The Philistines blinded him and set him to grind grain in the prison at Gaza, and he died pulling down the house in which their rulers were celebrating a sacrifice to their god Dagon (Judges 16:15–30).

The last chapters tell of a private shrine with a carved image that the tribe of Dan carried off (Judges 17:1–6; 18:27–31) and of a war of the other tribes against Benjamin (Judges 20:8–14, 43–48). The book closes with the line, "In those days there was no king in Israel. Everyone did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges 21:25). The books of Samuel carry the story on to Israel's demand for a king (Saul Becomes Israel's First King). The letter to the Hebrews names Gideon, Barak, Samson and Jephthah among those who acted through faith (Hebrews 11:32–34).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Judges gives no date that can be tied to an outside record. It counts years of oppression and of peace, several of them round forties (Judges 3:11; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1). Added end to end, its figures come to 410 years (Judges 3:8, 11, 14, 30; 4:3; 5:31; 6:1; 8:28; 9:22; 10:2–3, 8; 12:7–14; 13:1; 15:20). Kings counts 480 years from the exodus to Solomon's fourth year (1 Kings 6:1), and Jephthah speaks of 300 years since Israel settled east of the Jordan (Judges 11:26).

Two chronologies are in use. Taking the 480 years as an exact figure puts the exodus about 1446 BC and the first judges in the fourteenth century BC, from about 1375 BC; so Andrew E. Steinmann, "The Mysterious Numbers of the Book of Judges", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 48 (2005), pp. 491–500, and From Abraham to Paul: A Biblical Chronology (2011). Steinmann notes that even then the 410 years do not fit between the conquest and David, and he has some of the later judges overlap. Many historians instead take the 480 years as a round or schematic number and the judges as regional leaders whose terms overlapped, and place the period between about 1200 and 1050 BC, after the Egyptian inscription of about 1208 BC that names Israel in Canaan (Israel Named on the Merneptah Stele); so K. A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament (2003), who puts the exodus in the thirteenth century BC.

The timeline shows the shorter range. That differs from the entries before this one: the Exodus from Egypt and Covenant Renewal at Shechem are placed at the earlier of their two dates, about 1446 and about 1380 BC, and on that reckoning the judges begin about 175 years before the first year shown here. The period ends with the accession of Saul, which is itself only approximately dated (Saul Becomes Israel's First King). No inscription from the period can be securely connected with any of the judges.

Primary sources

Scripture

Judges 2:8–19; Judges 4:2–10; Judges 4:14–22; Judges 5:12–23; Judges 6:11–16; Judges 6:25–32; Judges 7:2–8, 16–22; Judges 8:22–23; Judges 8:24–27; Judges 13:1–5; Judges 15:14–16; Judges 16:15–30; Judges 17:1–6; 18:27–31; Judges 20:8–14, 43–48; Judges 21:25; Hebrews 11:32–34; Judges 3:11; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1; Judges 3:8, 11, 14, 30; 4:3; 5:31; 6:1; 8:28; 9:22; 10:2–3, 8; 12:7–14; 13:1; 15:20; 1 Kings 6:1; Judges 11:26

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Tabor

Who Deborah, Gideon, Samson
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Covenant Renewal at Shechem c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75

LEADS TO

Ruth and Boaz c. 1100 BC 88

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark c. 1070 BC 91

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Covenant Renewal at Shechem Before · c. 1380 or c. 1195 BC 75

God's Covenant with David After · c. 1000 BC 110

← Israel Named on the Merneptah Stele Earlier · c. 1208 BC
→ Ruth and Boaz Later · c. 1100 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

Ruth and Boaz

c. 1100 BC · Traditional date

A Moabite widow follows her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehem, gleans in the fields of Boaz and marries him. Their son Obed is the grandfather of David, and Matthew names Ruth in the genealogy of Jesus.

The book of Ruth is set "in the days when the judges judged". A famine drove Elimelech of Bethlehem to Moab with his wife Naomi and their two sons. Elimelech died there. The sons married Moabite women, Orpah and Ruth, and after about ten years both sons died as well (Ruth 1:1–5).

Naomi set out for home and told her daughters-in-law to go back to their own families. Orpah went. Ruth refused: "where you go, I will go; and where you stay, I will stay. Your people will be my people, and your God my God" (Ruth 1:6–17). The two women reached Bethlehem at the beginning of the barley harvest (Ruth 1:22).

Ruth went to glean behind the reapers, a right the law gave to the poor and the foreigner (Leviticus 19:9–10). She came by chance to the field of Boaz, a wealthy relative of Elimelech. He had heard what she had done for Naomi, and he told his men to leave grain for her (Ruth 2:1–16). Later Naomi sent Ruth by night to the threshing floor where Boaz was winnowing barley. There she asked him to act as the family's near kinsman, the relative who had the right to redeem its land (Ruth 3:1–13) (Leviticus 25:25).

At the town gate, before ten elders, Boaz offered that right to a closer relative. The man gave it up when he heard that Ruth, the dead man's widow, came with the land, "to raise up the name of the dead on his inheritance". Boaz then bought Elimelech's land and took Ruth as his wife (Ruth 4:1–10). She bore a son, Obed, and the women of the town said, "A son is born to Naomi" (Ruth 4:13–17).

The book ends with a genealogy: Obed was the father of Jesse, and Jesse the father of David (Ruth 4:17–22). Deuteronomy shuts Moabites out of the assembly of Israel (Deuteronomy 23:3); this book makes a Moabite woman the great-grandmother of King David. Matthew's genealogy of Jesus names her, "Boaz became the father of Obed by Ruth" (Matthew 1:5), and Luke's runs through Boaz, Obed and Jesse as well (Luke 3:32).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The book dates its story only to "the days when the judges judged" (Ruth 1:1). Its closing genealogy makes Boaz the great-grandfather of David (Ruth 4:21–22), who became king about 1010 BC (David Becomes King). Three generations before David points to the late twelfth or early eleventh century BC. The year shown is a round figure, not a date given by any source.

When the book itself was written is debated. It explains the handing over of a sandal as a custom of "former time" (Ruth 4:7), so it looks back on the events from some distance. Robert L. Hubbard, The Book of Ruth (1988), argues for the early monarchy; Frederic W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (1996), argues from its language for the years around the exile.

Primary sources

Scripture

Ruth 1:1–5; Ruth 1:6–17; Ruth 1:22; Leviticus 19:9–10; Ruth 2:1–16; Ruth 3:1–13; Leviticus 25:25; Ruth 4:1–10; Ruth 4:13–17; Ruth 4:17–22; Deuteronomy 23:3; Matthew 1:5; Luke 3:32; Ruth 1:1; Ruth 4:21–22; Ruth 4:7

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethlehem
Who Ruth, Boaz, Naomi
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Age of the Judges c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Melchizedek Blesses Abram Before · c. 2085 BC 28

Saul Becomes Israel's First King After · c. 1050 BC 95

← The Age of the Judges Earlier · c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC
→ Samuel and the Loss of the Ark Later · c. 1070 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark

c. 1070 BC · Traditional date

Samuel is called as a boy at the shrine of Shiloh. The Philistines defeat Israel, capture the ark of the covenant and kill the sons of the priest Eli, then send the ark back after seven months. Samuel leads Israel as prophet and judge.

At Shiloh, where the tent of meeting had been set up after the conquest (Joshua 18:1), the priest Eli served with his sons Hophni and Phinehas. Hannah, who was childless, vowed there that if she bore a son she would give him to the Lord. She named the boy Samuel and, once he was weaned, brought him to Eli to serve at the shrine (1 Samuel 1:2–3, 9–11, 20–28).

Eli's sons took the worshippers' sacrifices for themselves by force, and a man of God told Eli that his house would be cut off and both sons would die on one day (1 Samuel 2:12–17, 27–34). One night the boy Samuel, sleeping near the ark, heard a voice call him and three times went to Eli. Eli told him to answer, "Speak, Yahweh; for your servant hears." The message he received confirmed the judgment on Eli's house (1 Samuel 3:1–14). As he grew up, all Israel "from Dan even to Beersheba" came to know him as a prophet (1 Samuel 3:19–21).

The Philistines then defeated Israel near Ebenezer. The elders had the ark brought from Shiloh into the camp, but Israel was beaten again, the ark was captured, and Hophni and Phinehas were killed (1 Samuel 4:1–11). Eli, ninety-eight years old and blind, fell backward from his seat at the news and died (1 Samuel 4:15–18). His daughter-in-law named her newborn son Ichabod, saying, "The glory has departed from Israel" (1 Samuel 4:19–22).

The Philistines set the ark in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, where the god's image was found fallen and broken before it. Tumours broke out in Ashdod, then in Gath and Ekron as the ark was moved (1 Samuel 5). After seven months they sent it back on a cart drawn by two cows, with gold offerings, to Beth-shemesh (1 Samuel 6:1–15). From there it was taken to a house in Kiriath-jearim (1 Samuel 6:21–7:2).

Samuel called Israel to put away foreign gods. At Mizpah the Philistines were routed, and he set up a stone named Ebenezer (1 Samuel 7:3–12). He judged Israel for the rest of his life, on a yearly circuit from his home at Ramah (1 Samuel 7:15–17). The books of Samuel do not say that the ark ever returned to Shiloh. It was at Kiriath-jearim when David went to bring it to Jerusalem (1 Chronicles 13:5–6) (David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark). In Acts, Peter counts the prophets "from Samuel" onward (Acts 3:24).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Samuel ties these events to no outside record. It says that Eli judged Israel for forty years (1 Samuel 4:18), that twenty years passed with the ark at Kiriath-jearim before the assembly at Mizpah (1 Samuel 7:2), and that Samuel was old when Israel asked for a king (1 Samuel 8:1–5). Counted back from Saul's accession about 1050 BC, itself an approximate date (Saul Becomes Israel's First King), this puts the capture of the ark in the first half of the eleventh century BC. The year shown is a round figure.

The narrative does not say what became of Shiloh. Later texts speak of it as a place that God abandoned and made an example (Psalm 78:60–61) (Jeremiah 7:12–14). The excavators of Khirbet Seilun found that the settlement of this period ended in a fire, which they dated to the middle of the eleventh century BC (I. Finkelstein, S. Bunimovitz and Z. Lederman, Shiloh: The Archaeology of a Biblical Site, 1993); that date is itself debated.

Primary sources

Scripture

Joshua 18:1; 1 Samuel 1:2–3, 9–11, 20–28; 1 Samuel 2:12–17, 27–34; 1 Samuel 3:1–14; 1 Samuel 3:19–21; 1 Samuel 4:1–11; 1 Samuel 4:15–18; 1 Samuel 4:19–22; 1 Samuel 5; 1 Samuel 6:1–15; 1 Samuel 6:21–7:2; 1 Samuel 7:3–12; 1 Samuel 7:15–17; 1 Chronicles 13:5–6; Acts 3:24; 1 Samuel 4:18; 1 Samuel 7:2; 1 Samuel 8:1–5; Psalm 78:60–61; Jeremiah 7:12–14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Shiloh
Who Samuel, Eli Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60

The Age of the Judges c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84

LEADS TO

Saul Becomes Israel's First King c. 1050 BC 95

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark c. 1003 BC 106

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Call of Moses Before · c. 1447 or c. 1261 BC 48

David, Bathsheba and Nathan After · c. 995 BC 114

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood Before · c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark After · c. 1003 BC 106

← Ruth and Boaz Earlier · c. 1100 BC

→ Saul Becomes Israel's First King Later · c. 1050 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

Saul Becomes Israel's First King

c. 1050 BC · Traditional date

Israel's elders ask the aged Samuel for a king "like all the nations". Samuel warns them, then anoints Saul of Benjamin, who is chosen by lot at Mizpah and made king at Gilgal. Saul is later rejected for disobedience.

When Samuel was old and his sons took bribes as judges, the elders of Israel came to him at Ramah and asked for "a king to judge us like all the nations". Samuel was displeased. The Lord, the account says, told him to grant the request, since the people had rejected not Samuel but the Lord as their king, and to warn them first. Samuel told them what a king would take: their sons for his chariots and army, their daughters, their best fields, a tenth of their grain and flocks. The people insisted (1 Samuel 8).

Saul, son of Kish, a Benjaminite who stood a head taller than anyone else, came to Samuel while looking for his father's lost donkeys. Samuel had been told the day before to anoint him as prince over Israel, and next morning he poured oil on Saul's head in private (1 Samuel 9:1–3, 15–17, 26–27; 10:1). Samuel then called the people to Mizpah, where Saul was chosen by lot and found hiding among the baggage. The people shouted, "Long live the king!", though some refused to accept him (1 Samuel 10:17–27).

When Nahash the Ammonite besieged Jabesh-gilead, Saul summoned the tribes and broke the siege (1 Samuel 11:1–11). Samuel then led the people to Gilgal, and "there they made Saul king before Yahweh" (1 Samuel 11:14–15). In a farewell speech Samuel told them that king and people alike would stand or fall by their obedience to the Lord (1 Samuel 12:13–15, 24–25).

Saul fought the Philistines throughout his reign, and Moab, Ammon, Edom and Amalek as well (1 Samuel 14:47–52). But at Gilgal he offered the sacrifice himself instead of waiting for Samuel, and Samuel told him that his kingdom would not last (1 Samuel 13:8–14). After he spared the Amalekite king Agag and the best of the livestock against the command he had been given, Samuel said, "to obey is better than sacrifice", and declared that the Lord had rejected him as king (1 Samuel 15:3, 7–9, 22–28).

The account holds two judgments of kingship side by side. Asking for a king is called a rejection of the Lord's own rule (1 Samuel 8:7; 12:17–19), and yet the king is the Lord's choice and his "anointed" (1 Samuel 10:24; 12:3). Deuteronomy's law of the king allows for a ruler whom God chooses and whom the law binds (Deuteronomy 17:14–20). The king whom Samuel anoints next is David (David and Goliath).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

No record outside the Bible mentions Saul, and the sources do not agree on how long he reigned. The Hebrew text of (1 Samuel 13:1) is generally thought to have lost its figures: as it stands it makes him one year old at his accession and gives him a reign of two years. Translations deal with the gap in different ways. Some leave it open; the World English Bible, from which this wiki quotes, prints thirty years for his age and forty-two for his reign. Paul's speech in Acts gives him forty years (Acts 13:21). Josephus, about AD 93, gives eighteen years in Samuel's lifetime and twenty-two after it, where the translator brackets “and twenty” as doubtful (Josephus, Antiquities 6.378); in another place he gives twenty years in all (Josephus, Antiquities 10.143).

David’s accession is put at about 1010 BC by counting back, through the regnal figures of Kings, from later reigns that Assyrian records fix; the count starts from the chronology of Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), and is set out under David Becomes King. Forty years before that gives the traditional date of about 1050 BC shown here. Josephus’s twenty years would give about 1030 BC. On any reckoning the year is an estimate from the Bible’s own figures and from later tradition.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Samuel 8; 1 Samuel 9:1–3, 15–17, 26–27; 10:1; 1 Samuel 10:17–27; 1 Samuel 11:1–11; 1 Samuel 11:14–15; 1 Samuel 12:13–15, 24–25; 1 Samuel 14:47–52; 1 Samuel 13:8–14; 1 Samuel 15:3, 7–9, 22–28; 1 Samuel 8:7; 12:17–19; 1 Samuel 10:24; 12:3; Deuteronomy 17:14–20; 1 Samuel 13:1; Acts 13:21

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
6.378; 10.143

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Gilgal
Who Saul, Samuel
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark c. 1070 BC 91

LEADS TO

David and Goliath c. 1025 BC 99

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Ruth and Boaz Before · c. 1100 BC 88

David and Goliath After · c. 1025 BC

← Samuel and the Loss of the Ark Earlier · c. 1070 BC
→ David and Goliath Later · c. 1025 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

David and Goliath

c. 1025 BC · Traditional date

Samuel anoints David, the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem. In the valley of Elah the young shepherd kills the Philistine champion Goliath with a sling and a stone, and his fame turns King Saul against him.

After the rejection of Saul, the account says, the Lord sent Samuel to Jesse at Bethlehem to anoint one of his sons. Seven sons passed before Samuel and were refused, with the words, "man looks at the outward appearance, but Yahweh looks at the heart". The youngest, David, was fetched from the sheep and anointed among his brothers (1 Samuel 16:1–13). David then entered Saul's service as a harp player and armour-bearer (1 Samuel 16:14–23).

The Philistines gathered at Socoh in Judah, and Saul's army faced them across the Valley of Elah (1 Samuel 17:1–3). A Philistine champion, Goliath of Gath, came out every day for forty days and challenged Israel to settle the war by single combat. The Hebrew text makes him six cubits and a span tall, with bronze armour and an iron spearhead of six hundred shekels (1 Samuel 17:4–11, 16). The Greek Septuagint gives his height as four cubits and a span (Septuagint 1 Samuel (1 Kingdoms) 17:4), and so does Josephus (Josephus, Antiquities 6.171).

David, sent by his father with food for his brothers in the camp, heard the challenge and offered to fight (1 Samuel 17:17–32). He put aside the armour Saul gave him and took his staff, his sling and five smooth stones from the brook (1 Samuel 17:38–40). To Goliath he said, "You come to me with a sword, with a spear, and with a javelin; but I come to you in the name of Yahweh of Armies" (1 Samuel 17:45). His stone struck the Philistine in the forehead. David cut off his head with Goliath's own sword, and the Philistines fled (1 Samuel 17:48–52).

Saul kept David at court, and Saul's son Jonathan made a covenant of friendship with him (1 Samuel 18:1–4). But when the women sang, "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands", the king grew angry and afraid, and twice threw his spear at him (1 Samuel 18:6–12).

The account sets David's anointing beside his victory. The Spirit of the Lord comes on David and departs from Saul (1 Samuel 16:13–14), and David tells Goliath that the fight will show "that Yahweh doesn't save with sword and spear" (1 Samuel 17:47). From here the books of Samuel follow David's rise and Saul's decline until Saul's death (David Becomes King).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Samuel gives no year for these events. David was thirty when he became king (2 Samuel 5:4), about 1010 BC on the usual reckoning back from later reigns that Assyrian records fix (David Becomes King), and Saul calls him a youth at the time of the fight (1 Samuel 17:33). That places it roughly around 1025 BC. The date rests wholly on the Bible's own figures.

The story has come down in more than one form. In its oldest manuscripts the Greek version is much shorter than the Hebrew: it lacks 1 Samuel 17:12–31 and 17:55–18:5, the parts in which David arrives from Bethlehem and Saul asks who he is. Whether the Greek shortened the story or the Hebrew joined two accounts is debated (D. Barthélemy, D. W. Gooding, J. Lust and E. Tov, The Story of David and Goliath: Textual and Literary Criticism, 1986). A separate notice says, in the Hebrew text, that Elhanan of Bethlehem killed "Goliath the Gittite" (2 Samuel 21:19). Chronicles says that Elhanan killed Lahmi, Goliath's brother (1 Chronicles 20:5). Some translations follow Chronicles in Samuel as well; the World English Bible, from which this wiki quotes, reads "Goliath the Gittite's brother" there.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Samuel 16:1–13; 1 Samuel 16:14–23; 1 Samuel 17:1–3; 1 Samuel 17:4–11, 16; 1 Samuel 17:17–32; 1 Samuel 17:38–40; 1 Samuel 17:45; 1 Samuel 17:48–52; 1 Samuel 18:1–4; 1 Samuel 18:6–12; 1 Samuel 16:13–14; 1 Samuel 17:47; 2 Samuel 5:4; 1 Samuel 17:33; 2 Samuel 21:19; 1 Chronicles 20:5

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
1 Samuel (1 Kingdoms) 17:4

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
6.171

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Valley of Elah, Bethlehem
Who David, Saul, Goliath, Samuel
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Saul Becomes Israel's First King c. 1050 BC 95

LEADS TO

David Becomes King c. 1010–1003 BC 102

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Saul Becomes Israel's First King Before · c. 1050 BC 95

David Becomes King After · c. 1010–1003 BC 102

← Saul Becomes Israel's First King Earlier · c. 1050 BC
→ David Becomes King Later · c. 1010–1003 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

David Becomes King

c. 1010–1003 BC · Estimated date

After Saul dies in battle on Mount Gilboa, the men of Judah anoint David king at Hebron. Seven and a half years later, when the war with Saul's house is over, the elders of all Israel anoint him king over the whole nation.

Saul died fighting the Philistines on Mount Gilboa. Three of his sons were killed, among them Jonathan, and the king, hard pressed by archers, fell on his own sword (1 Samuel 31:1–6). David was at Ziklag when the news came. He mourned and fasted, and made a lament for Saul and Jonathan with the refrain, "How the mighty have fallen!" (2 Samuel 1:1–4, 11–12, 17–27).

David asked the Lord where he should go and was sent to Hebron. There the men of Judah anointed him king over the house of Judah (2 Samuel 2:1–4). Abner, the commander of Saul's army, made Saul's son Ish-bosheth king over the other tribes at Mahanaim (2 Samuel 2:8–10). A long war followed, in which David's house grew stronger and Saul's weaker (2 Samuel 3:1).

Abner quarrelled with Ish-bosheth and offered to bring all Israel over to David. At Hebron he was killed by Joab, David's commander, in revenge for a brother. David mourned him in public, and the people understood that the king had not ordered the killing (2 Samuel 3:6–12, 26–37). Two of Ish-bosheth's own captains then murdered him in his bed and brought his head to David, who had them put to death (2 Samuel 4:2, 5–12).

All the tribes of Israel then came to Hebron and said, "we are your bone and your flesh". David made a covenant with the elders before the Lord, and they anointed him king over Israel (2 Samuel 5:1–3). He was thirty years old when he began to reign. He reigned forty years: seven and a half at Hebron over Judah, and thirty-three at Jerusalem over all Israel and Judah (2 Samuel 5:4–5). Chronicles passes over the years of civil war and tells only of the anointing by all Israel (1 Chronicles 11:1–3).

In this account David does not seize the throne from Saul's family. He executes the man who claims to have killed Saul (2 Samuel 1:13–16), as he does the murderers of Ish-bosheth, and he is made king first by the men of Judah and then by the elders of Israel. The first thing Samuel tells of him as king of the whole nation is the taking of Jerusalem (David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark). The New Testament opens by calling Jesus "the son of David" (Matthew 1:1).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Samuel and Kings give lengths of reigns, not calendar years. David reigned forty years, seven and a half at Hebron and thirty-three at Jerusalem (2 Samuel 5:4–5) (1 Kings 2:11), and Solomon reigned forty (1 Kings 11:42). Calendar years are found by counting backwards from later reigns. Assyrian records fix two points: King Ahab fought Shalmaneser III at Qarqar in 853 BC (Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar), and Jehu paid him tribute in 841 BC (Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria). Working back from these through the regnal figures in Kings, Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), put Solomon's death and the division of the kingdom in 931/930 BC (The Kingdom Divides). Forty years for Solomon and forty for David then place David's accession at Hebron about 1010 BC and his anointing over all Israel about 1003 BC. K. A. Kitchen, On the Reliability of the Old Testament (2003), gives much the same dates.

The margin is wider than these figures suggest. Forty years is a figure that the Bible uses often, and it may be a round number: it is given for David, for Solomon and for several of the judges (Judges 3:11; 5:31; 8:28). If either reign was in fact shorter or longer, the dates move with it.

No inscription from David's lifetime names him. The earliest widely accepted mention outside the Bible is the phrase "House of David" on an Aramaic stele of the ninth century BC (The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan).

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Samuel 31:1–6; 2 Samuel 1:1–4, 11–12, 17–27; 2 Samuel 2:1–4; 2 Samuel 2:8–10; 2 Samuel 3:1; 2 Samuel 3:6–12, 26–37; 2 Samuel 4:2, 5–12; 2 Samuel 5:1–3; 2 Samuel 5:4–5; 1 Chronicles 11:1–3; 2 Samuel 1:13–16; Matthew 1:1; 1 Kings 2:11; 1 Kings 11:42; Judges 3:11; 5:31; 8:28

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Hebron
Who David, Saul
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

David and Goliath c. 1025 BC 99

LEADS TO

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark c. 1003 BC 106

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

David and Goliath Before · c. 1025 BC 99

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark After · c. 1003 BC 106

← David and Goliath Earlier · c. 1025 BC
→ David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark Later · c. 1003 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark

c. 1003 BC · Estimated date

David captures the Jebusite stronghold of Zion, makes it his capital and brings the ark of the covenant there with music and dancing. Jerusalem becomes both the royal city and a centre of Israel's worship.

Joshua and Judges say that neither Judah nor Benjamin drove the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, and that they still lived there (Joshua 15:63) (Judges 1:21). Once he was king of all Israel, David marched against the city. The Jebusites said that even the blind and the lame could keep him out. "Nevertheless David took the stronghold of Zion. This is David's city" (2 Samuel 5:6–7). Samuel mentions a watercourse in connection with the attack (2 Samuel 5:8); Chronicles says that Joab went up first and was made commander for it (1 Chronicles 11:4–6).

David lived in the stronghold and built around it, and Hiram, king of Tyre, sent cedar, carpenters and masons to build him a house (2 Samuel 5:9–11). The Philistines came up against him twice in the valley of Rephaim and were beaten back (2 Samuel 5:17–25).

David then went with thirty thousand men to fetch the ark of God from the house of Abinadab at Kiriath-jearim, where it had been taken after the Philistines returned it (Samuel and the Loss of the Ark). It was carried on a new cart. When the oxen stumbled, Uzzah put out his hand to steady the ark and died beside it. David was afraid and left the ark for three months in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite (2 Samuel 6:1–11) (1 Chronicles 13:5–6).

Hearing that Obed-edom's house had been blessed, David brought the ark up to Jerusalem with sacrifices, shouting and trumpets. Wearing a linen ephod, he "danced before Yahweh with all his might". The ark was set in a tent he had pitched for it; he offered sacrifices, blessed the people and gave food to everyone (2 Samuel 6:12–19). Michal, Saul's daughter, despised him for dancing; David answered that he had danced before the Lord, who had chosen him over her father (2 Samuel 6:16, 20–23). Chronicles adds that this time Levites carried the ark on poles, as the law of Moses required, and that David appointed Levites to sing and play before it (1 Chronicles 15:2, 13–16; 16:4–7).

A city that the Jebusites had held until then became the king's own, and with the ark it became a place of worship as well. Psalm 132 remembers David's vow to find a dwelling for the Lord and says, "Yahweh has chosen Zion" (Psalm 132:1–5, 13–14). David's wish to build a house for the ark leads to the promise of God's Covenant with David and to Solomon Builds the Temple.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

David reigned seven and a half years at Hebron before he reigned in Jerusalem (2 Samuel 5:5). With his accession about 1010 BC, the capture of the city falls about 1003 BC. That year is reckoned backwards from later reigns that Assyrian records fix, through the regnal figures of Kings, on the chronology of Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983). It depends on forty-year reigns for David and Solomon, which may be round numbers; David Becomes King sets out the reckoning. Samuel does not say how long afterwards the ark was brought up. Chronicles tells of the first attempt soon after its account of the capture (1 Chronicles 13:1–6).

What Jerusalem was like in the tenth century BC is disputed among archaeologists. Eilat Mazar, The Palace of King David (2009), attributes a large stone building she excavated in the City of David to this period. Israel Finkelstein and Neil Asher Silberman, David and Solomon (2006), argue that Jerusalem was then a small hill town and that the biblical picture was drawn later.

Primary sources

Scripture

Joshua 15:63; Judges 1:21; 2 Samuel 5:6–7; 2 Samuel 5:8; 1 Chronicles 11:4–6; 2 Samuel 5:9–11; 2 Samuel 5:17–25; 2 Samuel 6:1–11; 1 Chronicles 13:5–6; 2 Samuel 6:12–19; 2 Samuel 6:16, 20–23; 1 Chronicles 15:2, 13–16; 16:4–7; Psalm 132:1–5, 13–14; 2 Samuel 5:5; 1 Chronicles 13:1–6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who David
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

David Becomes King c. 1010–1003 BC 102
Samuel and the Loss of the Ark c. 1070 BC 91

LEADS TO

God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

David Becomes King Before · c. 1010–1003 BC 102
God's Covenant with David After · c. 1000 BC 110

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark Before · c. 1070 BC 91
Solomon Builds the Temple After · c. 966–959 BC 118

← David Becomes King Earlier · c. 1010–1003 BC
→ God’s Covenant with David Later · c. 1000 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

God's Covenant with David

c. 1000 BC · Traditional date

David proposes to build a temple for the ark. Through the prophet Nathan he is told instead that God will build him a house, a dynasty whose throne will stand for ever. The promise becomes the root of the hope for a Messiah.

When David was settled in his palace at Jerusalem, he said to the prophet Nathan that he lived in a house of cedar while the ark of God stayed in a tent. Nathan told him to do what he had in mind (2 Samuel 7:1–3). That night, the account says, the word of the Lord came to Nathan with a different answer. The Lord had moved about in a tent since the exodus and had never asked any leader of Israel for a house of cedar (2 Samuel 7:4–7).

The oracle then turns on the word "house". The Lord had taken David from following the sheep to be prince over Israel, and now "Yahweh will make you a house". After David's death a son of his will succeed him and will build a house for the Lord's name. "I will be his father, and he will be my son." If he does wrong he will be punished, but the Lord's favour will not be taken from him as it was from Saul. "Your house and your kingdom will be made sure forever before you. Your throne will be established forever" (2 Samuel 7:8–16).

The chapter does not use the word covenant. David's last words do: "he has made with me an everlasting covenant" (2 Samuel 23:5). In Psalm 89 the Lord says, "I have made a covenant with my chosen one, I have sworn to David, my servant" (Psalm 89:3–4). The texts differ on whether the promise has conditions. Samuel and Psalm 89 say that the sins of David's sons will be punished but the promise will stand (Psalm 89:30–37). Psalm 132 and the prayer of Solomon in Kings make the throne depend on their obedience (Psalm 132:11–12) (1 Kings 8:25). Chronicles repeats the oracle without the clause about punishment (1 Chronicles 17:11–14).

Kings explains by this promise why David's family kept part of the kingdom when it was torn from Solomon's son (1 Kings 11:11–13). Psalm 89 laments a time when the king's crown lay in the dust, and asks where the Lord's sworn faithfulness to David has gone (Psalm 89:38–49). Prophets spoke of a king still to come from David's family: a child on David's throne, a shoot from the stock of Jesse, a righteous Branch (Isaiah 9:6–7) (Isaiah 11:1–2) (Jeremiah 23:5–6).

The New Testament applies the promise to Jesus. In Luke the angel tells Mary that God will give her son "the throne of his father, David", and that his kingdom will have no end (Luke 1:32–33). Peter says at Pentecost that David knew of God's oath and spoke of the resurrection of the Christ (Acts 2:29–32). Paul calls Jesus a descendant of David "according to the flesh" (Romans 1:3), and Hebrews quotes "I will be to him a Father" as said of the Son (Hebrews 1:5). Augustine, in the early fifth century, argued that the promise was not fulfilled in Solomon and pointed to Christ (Augustine, City of God 17.8).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Samuel sets the oracle after David had moved into his house of cedar in Jerusalem and had been given "rest from all his enemies" (2 Samuel 7:1–2). That puts it after the capture of the city about 1003 BC (David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark) and before David's death about 970 BC, dates reckoned back from later reigns that Assyrian records fix (David Becomes King). No year is given, and the books of Samuel are not arranged strictly in order of time. The year shown, about 1000 BC, is a conventional placing early in the Jerusalem years.

A date late in the reign is also possible. The cedar house was built by craftsmen sent by Hiram of Tyre (2 Samuel 5:11). Josephus says that the temple was begun in Hiram's eleventh year (Josephus, Antiquities 8.62) or, where he cites Tyrian records, his twelfth (Josephus, Against Apion 1.126); Kings puts it in Solomon's fourth year (1 Kings 6:1). If those figures are right, Hiram came to the throne only seven or eight years before Solomon did, and the house and the oracle belong to David's last decade.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Samuel 7:1–3; 2 Samuel 7:4–7; 2 Samuel 7:8–16; 2 Samuel 23:5; Psalm 89:3–4; Psalm 89:30–37; Psalm 132:11–12; 1 Kings 8:25; 1 Chronicles 17:11–14; 1 Kings 11:11–13; Psalm 89:38–49; Isaiah 9:6–7; Isaiah 11:1–2; Jeremiah 23:5–6; Luke 1:32–33; Acts 2:29–32; Romans 1:3; Hebrews 1:5; 2 Samuel 7:1–2; 2 Samuel 5:11; 1 Kings 6:1

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
17.8

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
8.62

Against Apion Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
1.126

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who David, Nathan Threads Covenant and Promise, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark c. 1003 BC 106

God's Covenant with Abraham c. 2080–2067 BC 32

LEADS TO

David, Bathsheba and Nathan c. 995 BC 114

Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan c. 840 BC 150

The Call of Isaiah c. 740 BC 160

The Birth of Jesus c. 6–4 BC 286

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Age of the Judges Before · c. 1375 or c. 1200 – c. 1050 BC 84

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel After · c. 755 BC 157

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark Before · c. 1003 BC 106

David, Bathsheba and Nathan After · c. 995 BC 114

← David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark Earlier · c. 1003 BC
→ David, Bathsheba and Nathan Later · c. 995 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

David, Bathsheba and Nathan

c. 995 BC · Traditional date

Samuel tells how David takes Bathsheba, the wife of one of his warriors, and when she is pregnant has her husband Uriah killed in battle. The prophet Nathan confronts him. The child dies; a second son, Solomon, is born.

The story opens during the war with Ammon. In the spring David sent Joab and the army to ravage Ammon and besiege Rabbah, and stayed in Jerusalem (2 Samuel 11:1). One evening, from the roof of his house, he saw a woman bathing. He was told that she was Bathsheba, daughter of Eliam and wife of Uriah the Hittite. He sent for her and lay with her, and she sent him word that she was pregnant (2 Samuel 11:2–5).

David recalled Uriah from the siege and told him to go down to his house. Uriah would not eat, drink and lie with his wife while the ark and the army were camped in the field. He slept at the door of the king's house, and again did not go home when David made him drunk (2 Samuel 11:6–13). David sent him back with a letter for Joab: Uriah was to be put where the fighting was fiercest and left to be struck down. He was killed under the wall of Rabbah with others of David's men (2 Samuel 11:14–17, 24). When Bathsheba had mourned her husband, David brought her to his house. She became his wife and bore a son. The chapter ends: "the thing that David had done displeased Yahweh" (2 Samuel 11:26–27).

Samuel says that the Lord sent Nathan to David. The prophet told him of a rich man with many flocks who took a poor man's one ewe lamb to feed a guest. David said that the man deserved to die. Nathan answered, "You are the man." Because David had killed Uriah and taken his wife, the sword would never leave his house, and what he had done in secret would be done to his own wives in the sight of all Israel (2 Samuel 12:1–12). David said, "I have sinned against Yahweh." Nathan replied that the Lord had put away his sin and that he would not die, but that the child would (2 Samuel 12:13–14). The child fell ill, and David fasted and lay on the ground; on the seventh day it died (2 Samuel 12:15–18). Bathsheba bore David another son, Solomon (2 Samuel 12:24–25).

Later in the book David's son Absalom drives him out of Jerusalem and takes his father's concubines in a tent on the palace roof, "in the sight of all Israel" (2 Samuel 15:13–14) (2 Samuel 16:21–22).

The biblical writers treat the episode differently. Kings judges that David did what was right all his life "except only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite" (1 Kings 15:5). Chronicles tells of the siege of Rabbah, with David remaining in Jerusalem, and passes straight to the city's capture (1 Chronicles 20:1–3). The heading of Psalm 51 assigns that prayer of repentance to David "when Nathan the prophet came to him" (Psalm 51:1–4). Matthew's genealogy of Jesus names Solomon's mother only as the woman who had been Uriah's wife (Matthew 1:6).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Samuel gives no year. The story is set in David's years at Jerusalem, during the war with Ammon (2 Samuel 10:1–7) (2 Samuel 11:1); those years run from about 1003 to about 970 BC, reckoned as David becomes king explains.

The next generation narrows the span. Solomon was born to Bathsheba after the first child had died (2 Samuel 12:24). He reigned forty years (1 Kings 11:42), and his son Rehoboam was forty-one at his own accession (1 Kings 14:21), so on these figures Rehoboam was born about a year before Solomon became king. Solomon was therefore already a father when he became king about 970 BC, which puts his own birth in the 980s BC at the latest, and the events told here come before it. The year shown, about 995 BC, is a placing within that span and is not given by any source; it is a conventional placing, marked as traditional like the date of the covenant with David. If the forty-year reigns are round numbers, as the note on David's accession allows, the margin is wider.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Samuel 11:1; 2 Samuel 11:2–5; 2 Samuel 11:6–13; 2 Samuel 11:14–17, 24; 2 Samuel 11:26–27; 2 Samuel 12:1–12; 2 Samuel 12:13–14; 2 Samuel 12:15–18; 2 Samuel 12:24–25; 2 Samuel 15:13–14; 2 Samuel 16:21–22; 1 Kings 15:5; 1 Chronicles 20:1–3; Psalm 51:1–4; Matthew 1:6; 2 Samuel 10:1–7; 2 Samuel 12:24; 1 Kings 11:42; 1 Kings 14:21

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who David, Bathsheba, Nathan, Uriah the Hittite Threads Kingship and Messiah, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

LEADS TO

Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

God's Covenant with David Before · c. 1000 BC 110

Solomon Builds the Temple After · c. 966–959 BC 118

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Samuel and the Loss of the Ark Before · c. 1070 BC 91

Elijah on Mount Carmel After · c. 860 BC 132

← God's Covenant with David Earlier · c. 1000 BC
→ Solomon Builds the Temple Later · c. 966–959 BC

JUDGES AND THE UNITED MONARCHY

Solomon Builds the Temple

c. 966–959 BC · Estimated date

In the fourth year of his reign Solomon begins a temple for the Lord in Jerusalem, with cedar and craftsmen from Hiram of Tyre. Seven years later the ark is carried into its inner room and the house is dedicated.

David had wished to build a house for the ark and was told that his son would build it (God's Covenant with David). Kings gives David's wars as the reason; Chronicles says that he had shed too much blood (1 Kings 5:3) (1 Chronicles 22:7–10). His son Solomon wrote to Hiram of Tyre, who had been David's ally. Hiram sent cedar and cypress from Lebanon by sea, and Solomon paid him each year in wheat and oil. Solomon also raised a levy of thirty thousand Israelites to work in Lebanon by turns (1 Kings 5:1–14).

Building began in the second month of Solomon's fourth year (1 Kings 6:1). Chronicles places the temple on Mount Moriah, on the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, which David had bought for an altar (2 Chronicles 3:1) (2 Samuel 24:18–25). The house was sixty cubits long, twenty wide and thirty high. Its stone was dressed at the quarry, it was lined with cedar and overlaid with gold, and at the back was an inner sanctuary of twenty cubits each way, where two cherubim of olive wood stood with their wings touching (1 Kings 6:2–7, 15–28). A bronze-worker from Tyre, also named Hiram, cast the two pillars at the porch (1 Kings 7:13–22). The work was finished in the eighth month of the eleventh year, after seven years (1 Kings 6:37–38).

At the feast of the seventh month the priests carried the ark from the city of David into the inner sanctuary. Kings notes that it held only the two stone tablets of Moses. A cloud filled the house, so that the priests could not stand to minister (1 Kings 8:1–11). Solomon prayed before the altar: "heaven and the heaven of heavens can't contain you; how much less this house that I have built!" He asked that prayers made toward this place be heard, those of Israel and those of the foreigner from a far country (1 Kings 8:22–30, 41–43). Chronicles adds that fire came down from heaven on the sacrifices (2 Chronicles 7:1–3). Afterwards, Kings says, the Lord appeared to Solomon with a promise and a warning: if Israel turned to other gods, this house would be cast off (1 Kings 9:1–9).

Josephus, near the end of the first century AD, says that the public records of Tyre mentioned the building of the temple. He quotes two earlier authors, Dius and Menander of Ephesus, on the dealings of King Hirom with Solomon, and dates the temple to Hirom's twelfth year (Josephus, Against Apion 1.106–127). The works of both writers are lost.

The temple stood for nearly four centuries, until the Babylonians burned it (2 Kings 25:8–9) (The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple). In Acts, Stephen recalls that Solomon built the house and adds that "the Most High doesn't dwell in temples made with hands" (Acts 7:47–48). John says that Jesus, speaking of a temple destroyed and raised in three days, "spoke of the temple of his body" (John 2:19–21).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings dates the start of building to the second month of Solomon's fourth year and its completion to the eighth month of his eleventh (1 Kings 6:1, 37–38). Solomon reigned forty years (1 Kings 11:42), and the year of his death is reckoned back from later reigns that Assyrian records fix; David Becomes King sets out the method. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), put his death in 931/930 BC, which makes the start of building the spring of 966 BC. Rodger C. Young, "When Did Solomon Die?", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 46 (2003), pp. 589–603, argues that Solomon died some months earlier than Thiele held, which moves the start to the spring of 967 BC. Completion, in the autumn of the eleventh year, then falls between 961 and 959 BC, depending on the starting year and on whether the regnal year began in autumn or in spring.

A second line of reckoning comes from Tyre. Josephus cites Tyrian records that put the temple 143 years and eight months before the founding of Carthage (Josephus, Against Apion 1.106–127), which ancient writers placed in either 825 or 814 BC. Taking 825 BC, F. M. Cross, "An Interpretation of the Nora Stone", Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 208 (1972), p. 17, dated the start of building to 968 BC, and William H. Barnes, Studies in the Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel (1991), follows him. That is within two years of the figure from the Hebrew kings. Both lines rest on totals handed down in later texts, and Solomon's forty years may be a round number.

The 480 years of (1 Kings 6:1) bear on the date of the exodus, not of the temple (The Exodus from Egypt). No inscription from Solomon's time names him or the temple.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Kings 5:3; 1 Chronicles 22:7–10; 1 Kings 5:1–14; 1 Kings 6:1; 2 Chronicles 3:1; 2 Samuel 24:18–25; 1 Kings 6:2–7, 15–28; 1 Kings 7:13–22; 1 Kings 6:37–38; 1 Kings 8:1–11; 1 Kings 8:22–30, 41–43; 2 Chronicles 7:1–3; 1 Kings 9:1–9; 2 Kings 25:8–9; Acts 7:47–48; John 2:19–21; 1 Kings 6:1, 37–38; 1 Kings 11:42

Against Apion Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
1.106–127

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem

Who Solomon, Hiram of Tyre
Threads Temple and Worship, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

The Tabernacle and the Priesthood c. 1445 or c. 1259 BC 60

David, Bathsheba and Nathan c. 995 BC 114

LEADS TO

The Kingdom Divides c. 930 BC 124

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

David Takes Jerusalem and Brings the Ark Before · c. 1003 BC 106

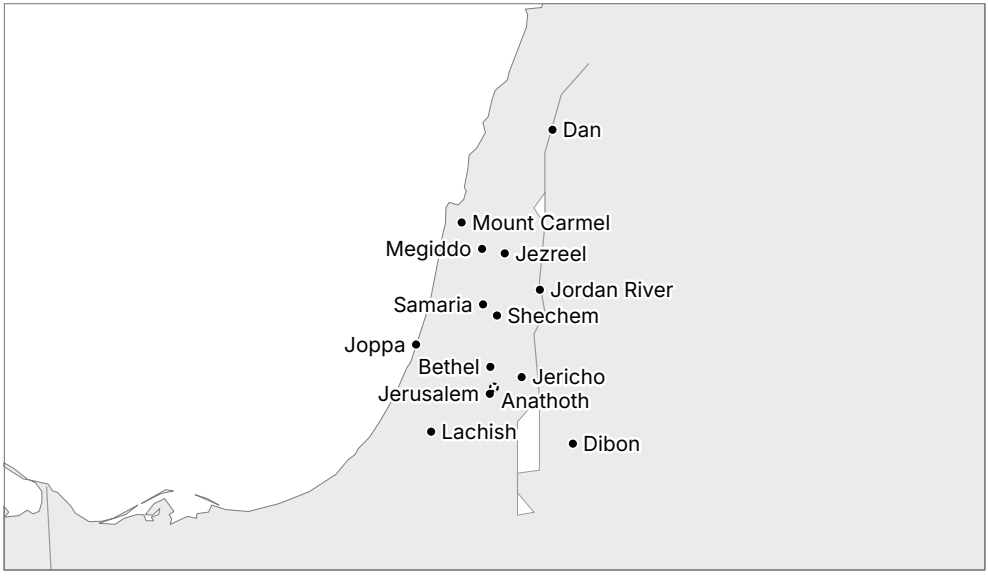
The Kingdom Divides After · c. 930 BC 124

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

David, Bathsheba and Nathan Before · c. 995 BC 114

The Kingdom Divides After · c. 930 BC 124

← David, Bathsheba and Nathan Earlier · c. 995 BC
→ The Kingdom Divides Later · c. 930 BC
TIMELINE



The Divided Kingdom and the Prophets

c. 930–597 BC

The kingdom splits into Israel and Judah. Prophets confront kings, Assyria destroys the north, and for the first time inscriptions name the Bible's rulers.

From this era on, Assyrian and Babylonian records give fixed dates: Ahab at Qarqar in 853 BC, Jehu's tribute in 841 BC, the fall of Samaria in 722 BC, Sennacherib's campaign in 701 BC. The great prophets, Elijah, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Jeremiah, speak into these crises, and their words become Scripture.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Thebes, Mount Sinai, Qarqar, Kalhu, Nineveh, Carchemish

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Kingdom Divides c. 930 BC 124

Shishak Invades Judah c. 925 BC 128

Elijah on Mount Carmel c. 860 BC 132
Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar 853 BC 135
Elisha Succeeds Elijah c. 850 BC 139
Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria 841 BC 142
Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele c. 840 BC 146
The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan c. 840 BC 150
Jonah Sent to Nineveh c. 760 BC 154
Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel c. 755 BC 157
The Call of Isaiah c. 740 BC 160
The Fall of Samaria 722/721 BC 164
Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib 701 BC 168
The Call of Jeremiah 627 BC 172
Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176
Josiah Falls at Megiddo 609 BC 180
Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish 605 BC 184

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

The Kingdom Divides

c. 930 BC · Estimated date

After Solomon's death the northern tribes reject his son Rehoboam at Shechem and make Jeroboam their king. Israel in the north and Judah in the south become separate kingdoms, and Jeroboam sets up his own sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan.

Kings traces the division back to the reign of Solomon. Jeroboam I, an Ephraimite whom Solomon had put in charge of the forced labour of the house of Joseph, was met on the road by the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh. Ahijah tore a new cloak into twelve pieces and gave him ten: ten tribes would be taken from Solomon's son, and one left to the house of David for the sake of David and of Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:26–36). Solomon tried to kill Jeroboam, who fled to Shishak, king of Egypt (1 Kings 11:40).

When Solomon died, his son Rehoboam went to Shechem, where all Israel had gathered to make him king. The assembly, with Jeroboam back from Egypt, asked him to lighten the heavy yoke his father had laid on them. The older counsellors advised him to agree. He took the advice of the young men he had grown up with and answered: "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions" (1 Kings 12:1–14).

The northern tribes replied, "What portion have we in David?", and went home. Rehoboam's officer over the forced labour was stoned to death and the king fled to Jerusalem. Israel made Jeroboam king; only Judah, with Benjamin, stayed with the house of David. Rehoboam raised an army to win back the north, but the prophet Shemaiah forbade the war and the men went home (1 Kings 12:16–24). Kings says the outcome came from the Lord, to fulfil Ahijah's word (1 Kings 12:15). Chronicles tells the story in the same terms (2 Chronicles 10:1–11:4).

Jeroboam made Shechem his residence. So that his people would not go up to sacrifice in Jerusalem, he set up two golden calves, one at Bethel and one at Dan, appointed priests who were not Levites and fixed a festival of his own in the eighth month (1 Kings 12:25–33). Chronicles adds that priests and Levites from the north moved to Judah (2 Chronicles 11:13–17). Kings calls the calves the sin of Jeroboam and measures later kings of Israel by it (1 Kings 12:30; 16:26; 2 Kings 10:29; 15:9).

From here the Old Testament follows two kingdoms. Israel, the larger, lasted until the Fall of Samaria; Judah, ruled by David's line, lasted until the Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple. Ahijah's oracle says that David's descendants would be humbled, "but not forever" (1 Kings 11:39). Ezekiel later looks for a day when they will no longer be "divided into two kingdoms" and David will be king over them all (Ezekiel 37:22–24).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings gives no calendar date. The year is reached by counting back from two points that Assyrian records fix for the northern kingdom: Ahab fought at Qarqar in 853 BC (Kurkh Monolith ii 91–92) and Jehu paid tribute in 841 BC (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 12, lines 21–30). Kings gives the lengths of the two reigns between those kings (1 Kings 22:51; 2 Kings 3:1) and of the reigns from Jeroboam to Ahab (1 Kings 14:20; 15:25, 33; 16:8, 23, 29).

How those totals convert to years depends on whether a king's first, partial year was counted. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), puts the division in 931/930 BC. W. F. Albright, "The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel", Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 100 (1945), put it in 922 BC. The timeline uses about 930 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Kings 11:26–36; 1 Kings 11:40; 1 Kings 12:1–14; 1 Kings 12:16–24; 1 Kings 12:15; 2 Chronicles 10:1–11:4; 1 Kings 12:25–33; 2 Chronicles 11:13–17; 1 Kings 12:30; 16:26; 2 Kings 10:29; 15:9; 1 Kings 11:39; Ezekiel 37:22–24; 1 Kings 22:51; 2 Kings 3:1; 1 Kings 14:20; 15:25, 33; 16:8, 23, 29

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC

ii 91–92

Annals of Shalmaneser III (Other Copies) Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 858–824 BC

RIAo 12, lines 21–30

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Shechem, Bethel, Dan
Who Rehoboam, Jeroboam I
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

LEADS TO

Shishak Invades Judah c. 925 BC 128

Elijah on Mount Carmel c. 860 BC 132

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel c. 755 BC 157

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Solomon Builds the Temple Before · c. 966–959 BC 118

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria After · 841 BC 142

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Solomon Builds the Temple Before · c. 966–959 BC 118

Shishak Invades Judah After · c. 925 BC 128

← Solomon Builds the Temple Earlier · c. 966–959 BC

→ Shishak Invades Judah Later · c. 925 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Shishak Invades Judah

c. 925 BC · Estimated date

In Rehoboam's fifth year the Egyptian king Shishak marches on Jerusalem and carries off the treasures of the temple and the palace. Shoshenq I's relief at Karnak lists towns he claimed in Judah, Israel and the Negev.

Shishak first appears in Kings as the king of Egypt who sheltered Jeroboam I when he fled from Solomon (1 Kings 11:40). He is generally identified with the pharaoh whom Egyptian inscriptions call Shoshenq I, the founder of Egypt's Twenty-second Dynasty.

In the fifth year of Rehoboam, Kings says, Shishak came up against Jerusalem and took away the treasures of the temple and of the palace, including the gold shields that Solomon had made. Rehoboam replaced them with shields of bronze (1 Kings 14:25–28). Chronicles tells more. Shishak came with 1,200 chariots, 60,000 horsemen and a host of Libyans, Sukkiim and Cushites, and took the fortified cities of Judah. The prophet Shemaiah told the king and his officers that they had abandoned the Lord and were now abandoned to Shishak. They humbled themselves, and Jerusalem was not destroyed, but it lost its treasures and became subject to Egypt (2 Chronicles 12:1–12). Neither book says that the city was stormed.

Shoshenq left his own record on a wall of the temple of Amun at Karnak, in Thebes. The god hands him rows of bound figures, each labelled with the name of a town (Bubastite Portal relief the scene (Breasted §718)). Those that have been read include Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Beth-shean and Rehob in the north, Mahanaim east of the Jordan, Gibeon, Beth-horon and Aijalon in the hills north-west of Jerusalem (Bubastite Portal relief town list, nos. 14–27 (Breasted §712)), and Arad in the south (Bubastite Portal relief town list, nos. 108 and 110 (Breasted §716)). The speech of Amun beside the scene praises the king's victories over the Asiatics in general terms and tells no story of the campaign (Bubastite Portal relief speech of Amun (Breasted §§720–722)). A stone fragment with Shoshenq's name, published as part of a stela, was found at Megiddo itself (Megiddo stela fragment of Shoshenq I Fisher, pp. 12–13 and 60–61).

The two records overlap without matching. Kings and Chronicles speak only of Judah and Jerusalem. The relief lists many towns in the northern kingdom (Bubastite Portal relief town list, nos. 14–27 (Breasted §712)), where his former guest Jeroboam now ruled, and Jerusalem is not among the names that survive (Bubastite Portal relief town list, nos. 108 and 110 (Breasted §716)), though two of the ten rows are almost wholly destroyed and other names are lost (Bubastite Portal relief the scene (Breasted §718)). The relief does not mention Rehoboam, Jeroboam, tribute or the temple of Jerusalem (Bubastite Portal relief speech of Amun (Breasted §§720–722)).

This is the first event in the books of Kings that can be set beside a foreign king's own monument. For Judah it meant the loss of Solomon's gold within five years of the division. Chronicles draws the lesson that the kingdom survived because its king humbled himself (2 Chronicles 12:12).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings and Chronicles date the invasion to the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:25; 2 Chronicles 12:2). The Karnak relief carries no date (Bubastite Portal relief speech of Amun (Breasted §§720–722)). The Egyptian text that gives a date is the quarry stela of Shoshenq's twenty-first year, which orders the stone for the court where the relief stands (Silsila quarry stela of Shoshenq I Breasted §§706–707). The campaign was therefore over before the end of his reign, but no Egyptian record says in which of his years it fell.

The calendar year depends on the chronology of the kings of Judah. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (1951), puts Rehoboam's fifth year in 926/925 BC; W. F. Albright, "The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel", Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 100 (1945), puts it about 918 BC. George R. Hughes, in the preface to the Epigraphic Survey's Reliefs and Inscriptions at Karnak III: The Bubastite Portal (1954), pp. vii–viii, notes that the dates of Shoshenq's own dynasty are too uncertain to settle the matter from the Egyptian side.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Kings 11:40; 1 Kings 14:25–28; 2 Chronicles 12:1–12; 2 Chronicles 12:12; 1 Kings 14:25; 2 Chronicles 12:2

The Bubastite Portal at Karnak (Triumphal Relief of Shoshenq I) Carved for Shoshenq I · c. 925 BC, in or soon after year 21 of Shoshenq I the scene (Breasted §718); town list, nos. 14–27 (Breasted §712); town list, nos. 108 and 110 (Breasted §716); speech of Amun (Breasted §§720–722)

Stela Fragment of Shoshenq I from Megiddo Set up for Shoshenq I · c. 925 BC

Fisher, pp. 12–13 and 60–61

Quarry Stela of Shoshenq I at Gebel es-Silsila (No. 100) Set up by Haremsaf, chief of works of Shoshenq I · Year 21 of Shoshenq I, c. 925 BC

Breasted §§706–707

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Thebes
Who Shoshenq I, Rehoboam

Threads Temple and Worship

In context

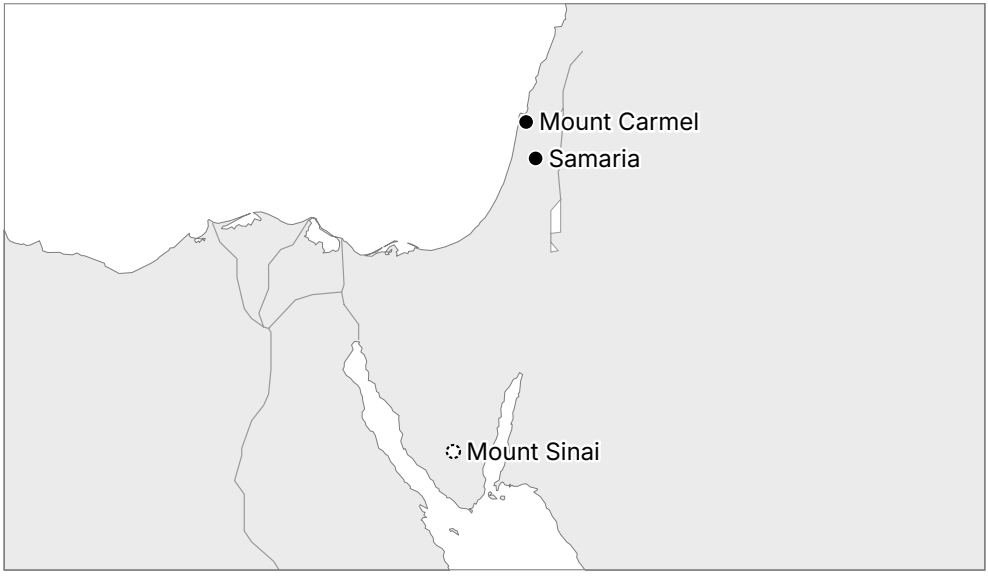
GROWS OUT OF

The Kingdom Divides c. 930 BC 124

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Kingdom Divides Before · c. 930 BC 124

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law After · 622 BC 176



← The Kingdom Divides Earlier · c. 930 BC
→ Elijah on Mount Carmel Later · c. 860 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Elijah on Mount Carmel

c. 860 BC · Traditional date

During a long drought the prophet Elijah challenges the prophets of Baal, whom King Ahab and Queen Jezebel support, to a contest on Mount Carmel. Kings tells of fire from heaven, the people's return to the Lord, and Elijah's flight to Horeb.

Ahab, son of Omri, ruled Israel from Samaria. He married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians, and built a temple and altar for Baal in his capital (1 Kings 16:29–33). Jezebel had prophets of the Lord put to death, and an official of the court hid a hundred of them in caves (1 Kings 18:3–4).

Elijah the Tishbite, from Gilead, told Ahab that there would be neither dew nor rain except at his word. He hid by the brook Cherith and then lodged with a widow at Zarephath, in Sidonian territory, where Kings says that her jar of meal and jug of oil did not run out and that he restored her dead son to life (1 Kings 17).

In the third year he showed himself to Ahab and asked him to summon Israel and the 450 prophets of Baal to Mount Carmel. There he put the choice to the people: "If Yahweh is God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him." Each side was to lay a bull on the wood without lighting it, and the god who answered by fire would be God. The prophets of Baal called from morning until evening and nothing happened. Elijah rebuilt the Lord's altar with twelve stones, had the offering drenched with water three times, and prayed. Kings says that fire fell and consumed the offering, the wood, the stones and the water, and that the people fell on their faces and cried, "Yahweh, he is God!" Elijah had the prophets of Baal killed at the brook Kishon, and the rain came (1 Kings 18:1–2, 17–45).

Jezebel swore to kill him. He fled south to Beersheba and on to Horeb, the mountain of God. There, the account says, the Lord passed by. He was not in the wind, the earthquake or the fire; after the fire came "a still small voice", and Elijah was sent back to anoint Hazael as king of Aram, Jehu as king of Israel and Elisha as prophet in his place. Seven thousand in Israel, he was told, had not bowed to Baal (1 Kings 19:1–18).

Later Scripture returns to Elijah often. The book of Malachi ends with the promise that he will return before the day of the Lord (Malachi 4:5–6). The Gospels apply that promise to John the Baptist (Matthew 11:13–14; Luke 1:17) and place Elijah beside Moses at the transfiguration of Jesus (Matthew 17:1–3). Paul cites the seven thousand as a sign that God had not rejected his people (Romans 11:2–4).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Kings sets the contest in the reign of Ahab, at the end of a drought that broke "in the third year" (1 Kings 18:1), and gives no regnal year. The New Testament speaks of three years and six months (Luke 4:25; James 5:17). Ahab reigned twenty-two years (1 Kings 16:29) and was still king in 853 BC, when Shalmaneser III names him at Qarqar (Kurkh Monolith ii 91–92); Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), dates his reign 874–853 BC. About 860 BC is a placement within that reign, not a year that any source gives.

Josephus, writing some nine centuries later, quotes an earlier historian, Menander, for a drought of one year under Ethbaal, king of Tyre, and identifies it with the drought under Ahab (Josephus, Antiquities 8.324). For the events themselves Kings is the only source.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Kings 16:29–33; 1 Kings 18:3–4; 1 Kings 17; 1 Kings 18:1–2, 17–45; 1 Kings 19:1–18; Malachi 4:5–6; Matthew 11:13–14; Luke 1:17; Matthew 17:1–3; Romans 11:2–4; 1 Kings 18:1; Luke 4:25; James 5:17; 1 Kings 16:29

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC
ii 91–92

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
8.324

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Carmel, Samaria, Mount Sinai
Who Elijah, Ahab, Jezebel
Threads Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Kingdom Divides c. 930 BC 124

LEADS TO

Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar 853 BC 135
Elisha Succeeds Elijah c. 850 BC 139

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

David, Bathsheba and Nathan Before · c. 995 BC 114
Elisha Succeeds Elijah After · c. 850 BC 139

← Shishak Invades Judah Earlier · c. 925 BC
→ Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar Later · 853 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar

853 BC · Firm date

Shalmaneser III of Assyria meets a coalition of Syrian and Palestinian kings at Qarqar on the Orontes. His stela lists Ahab the Israelite among them. The Bible does not mention the battle, which gives the first fixed date in the history of Israel's kings.

No book of the Bible mentions this battle. It is known from the inscriptions of Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria, and above all from the stela found at Kurkh on the upper Tigris, whose text ends with this campaign (Kurkh Monolith ii 89–102).

In his sixth year (Black Obelisk lines 54–66) Shalmaneser left Nineveh, crossed the Euphrates in flood and received the tribute of the kings on its western side. He sacrificed at Aleppo and then moved into the territory of Irhuleni, king of Hamath, taking three of his towns (Kurkh Monolith ii 78–89).

At Qarqar, which he says he destroyed and burned, an alliance of twelve kings met him. The stela lists their forces. Hadad-ezer of Damascus brought 1,200 chariots, 1,200 cavalry and 20,000 soldiers; Irhuleni of Hamath 700 chariots, 700 cavalry and 10,000 soldiers; and "Ahab the Israelite" 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers. Others came from Byblos, Egypt, Irqanatu, Arwad, Usanatu, Siannu and Ammon, with a thousand camels from Gindibu the Arab (Kurkh Monolith ii 89–102). The text speaks of twelve kings and lists eleven contingents. The chariot force given for Ahab is the largest in the list. The stela's text has scribal slips, some of them in this passage: the edition supplies a sign missing from the name of Byblos and a verb left out of the account of the slaughter (Kurkh Monolith ii 89–102). Its figures should be read with that in mind.

Shalmaneser claims a complete victory: 14,000 enemy dead, the plain too small for the corpses, the Orontes dammed with bodies (Kurkh Monolith ii 89–102). Later inscriptions give higher figures. The Black Obelisk has 20,500 dead in this battle (Black Obelisk lines 54–66), and a statue from Assur credits the king with 29,000 in his defeat of Hadad-ezer and his twelve allies on the Orontes, without giving a year (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 40, i 14–24). He does not claim to have taken Hamath or Damascus, and he fought Hadad-ezer and twelve kings again in his eleventh year, and twelve kings in his fourteenth (Black Obelisk lines 87–92), which suggests that the coalition was not broken in 853.

Kings presents Ahab as the enemy of the king of Aram: he defeats Ben-hadad twice, makes a treaty with him, and after three years without war dies fighting Aram at Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 20:1–34; 22:1–37). It never mentions Assyria in his reign. The stela shows Israel and Damascus standing together against Assyria, and credits Israel with one of the largest forces in the field. Since Ahab was alive in 853 BC, the battle also supplies a fixed point from which the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah are reckoned.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Kurkh Monolith dates the campaign by the eponym of the year, Dayan-Ashur, and has the king leave Nineveh on the fourteenth day of Ayyaru, the second month (Kurkh Monolith ii 78–89). The Black Obelisk counts the same campaign as his sixth regnal year (Black Obelisk lines 54–66). In the Eponym Chronicle the year of Dayan-Ashur stands ninety places before the year of Bur-Saggile, in which an eclipse of the sun is recorded. That eclipse is the one of 15 June 763 BC, which makes Dayan-Ashur's year 853 BC (Assyrian Eponym Chronicle entries for 853/852 and 763/762 BC). The battle therefore fell in 853 BC, probably in the summer.

Primary sources

Scripture
1 Kings 20:1–34; 22:1–37

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC
ii 89–102; ii 78–89

The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · c. 825 BC
lines 54–66; lines 87–92

Annals of Shalmaneser III (Other Copies) Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 858–824 BC
RIAo 40, i 14–24

The Assyrian Eponym Chronicle Covers 858–699 BC
entries for 853/852 and 763/762 BC

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Qarqar
Who Ahab, Shalmaneser III

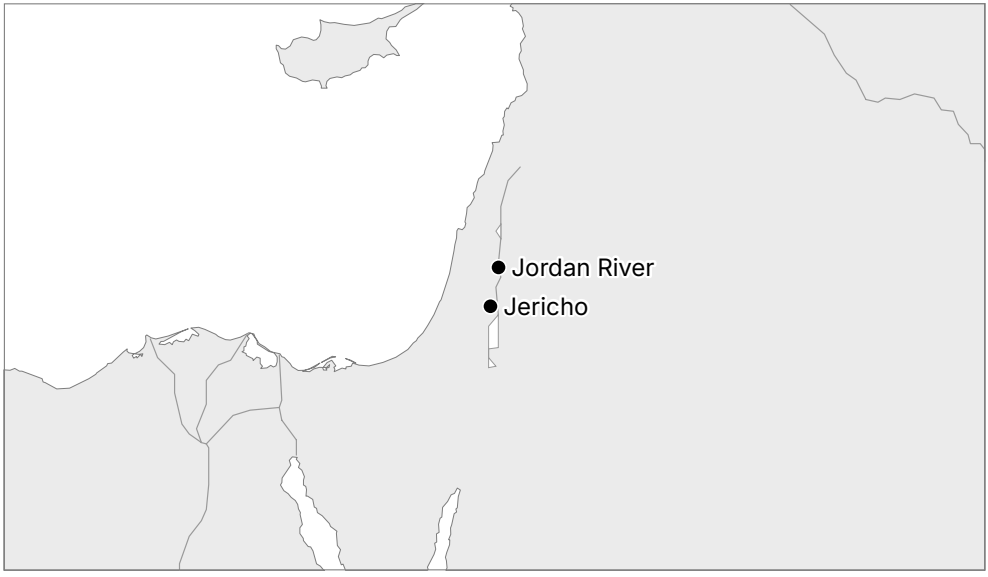
In context

GROWS OUT OF

Elijah on Mount Carmel c. 860 BC 132

LEADS TO

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria 841 BC 142
Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele c. 840 BC 146



← Elijah on Mount Carmel Earlier · c. 860 BC
→ Elisha Succeeds Elijah Later · c. 850 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Elisha Succeeds Elijah

c. 850 BC · Traditional date

Elijah and his disciple Elisha cross the Jordan near Jericho. Kings says that Elijah is carried up to heaven in a whirlwind and that Elisha, taking up his master's cloak, returns as the prophet in his place.

Kings introduces Elisha son of Shaphat at the end of the Horeb story. Elijah found him ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen and threw his cloak over him. Elisha slaughtered his oxen, fed the people with the meat, and followed Elijah as his servant (1 Kings 19:19–21).

The account of their parting begins at Gilgal. Elijah three times asked Elisha to stay behind, as he was sent on to Bethel, to Jericho and to the Jordan, and each time Elisha refused to leave him. At Bethel and Jericho the companies of prophets told Elisha that his master would be taken from him that day. Fifty of them watched from a distance as the two reached the Jordan River. Elijah rolled up his cloak and struck the water, which parted, and they crossed on dry ground (2 Kings 2:1–8).

On the far side Elijah asked what he could do for him. Elisha asked for "a double portion" of his spirit, the share that the law gives to an eldest son (2 Kings 2:9; Deuteronomy 21:17). Elijah answered that it would be granted if Elisha saw him taken. As they walked on, Kings says, "a chariot of fire and horses of fire separated them, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Elisha cried out, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and its horsemen!" and tore his clothes in two (2 Kings 2:9–12).

He picked up the cloak that had fallen from Elijah, struck the river with it and crossed back. The prophets of Jericho said, "The spirit of Elijah rests on Elisha." Against his advice they sent fifty men to search for Elijah. After three days they had found nothing (2 Kings 2:13–18).

Elisha's work fills the following chapters. Kings credits him with healing the spring at Jericho, raising a dead child and curing Naaman the Syrian of leprosy (2 Kings 2:19–22; 4:32–37; 5:9–14), and gives him a hand in the rise of Hazael in Damascus and of Jehu in Israel (2 Kings 8:7–15; 9:1–3). Kings records no death for Elijah. Malachi promises that he will be sent again (Malachi 4:5–6), and the Gospels place him with Moses beside Jesus at the transfiguration (Matthew 17:1–3).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Kings gives no year. It places the story after the death of Ahab's son Ahaziah (2 Kings 1:17) and before the campaign against Moab in the reign of Joram, in which Elisha already acts alone (2 Kings 3:11). Ahab was alive in 853 BC (Kurkh Monolith ii 91–92) and Ahaziah reigned two years (1 Kings 22:51), which points to about 852–850 BC.

Chronicles has a letter from Elijah reach Jehoram of Judah after he had killed his brothers (2 Chronicles 21:12–13), and Jehoram became king only in the fifth year of Joram of Israel (2 Kings 8:16). The two notices are hard to fit into one sequence. The date is therefore a placement, not a year that a source gives.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Kings 19:19–21; 2 Kings 2:1–8; 2 Kings 2:9; Deuteronomy 21:17; 2 Kings 2:9–12; 2 Kings 2:13–18; 2 Kings 2:19–22; 4:32–37; 5:9–14; 2 Kings 8:7–15; 9:1–3; Malachi 4:5–6; Matthew 17:1–3; 2 Kings 1:17; 2 Kings 3:11; 1 Kings 22:51; 2 Chronicles 21:12–13; 2 Kings 8:16

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC
ii 91–92

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jordan River, Jericho
Who Elijah, Elisha
Threads Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Elijah on Mount Carmel c. 860 BC 132

LEADS TO

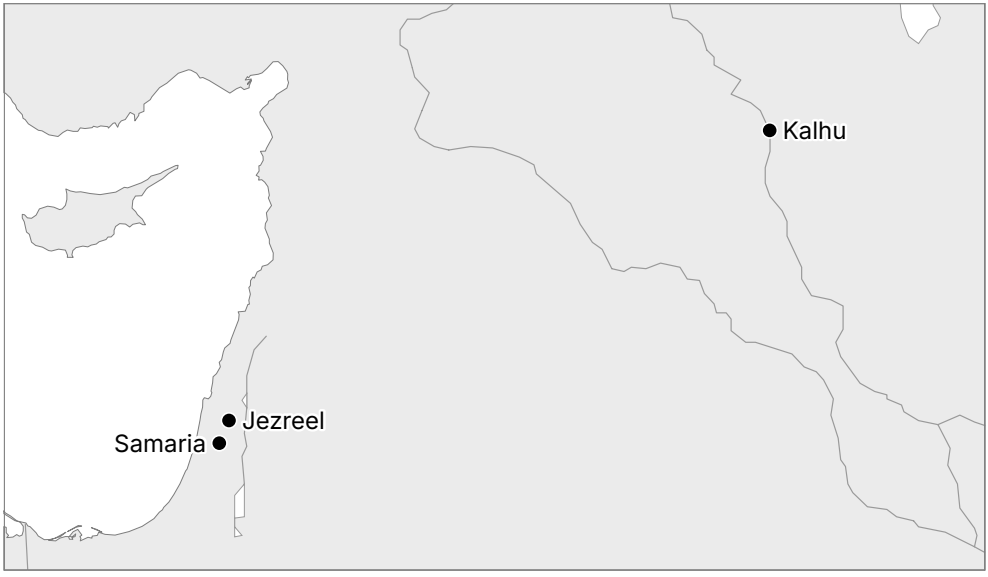
Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria 841 BC 142

Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele c. 840 BC 146

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Elijah on Mount Carmel Before · c. 860 BC 132

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria After · 841 BC 142



← Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar Earlier · 853 BC
→ Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria Later · 841 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria

841 BC · Firm date

The army commander Jehu, anointed at Elisha's word, kills the kings of Israel and Judah, Jezebel and the house of Ahab, and destroys the temple of Baal in Samaria. In the same year Assyrian records show him paying tribute to Shalmaneser III.

Joram, son of Ahab, had been wounded fighting Hazael of Aram at Ramoth-gilead and lay recovering at Jezreel, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, came to visit him (2 Kings 8:28–29). Elisha sent one of the prophets to the army at Ramoth-gilead to anoint Jehu, one of its commanders, as king, with the charge to destroy the house of Ahab. His fellow officers spread their cloaks under him and proclaimed him king (2 Kings 9:1–13).

Jehu drove to Jezreel. He shot Joram with an arrow and had the body thrown onto the field that had been Naboth's. Ahaziah was wounded as he fled and died at Megiddo (2 Kings 9:16–28); Chronicles has him caught in hiding in Samaria

(2 Chronicles 22:9). Jezebel was thrown from a window (2 Kings 9:30–37). The guardians of Ahab's seventy sons in Samaria sent Jehu their heads; relatives of Ahaziah were killed on the road; and in Samaria Jehu gathered the worshippers of Baal into their temple, had them killed and turned the building into a latrine (2 Kings 10:1–28).

Kings gives a divided verdict. Jehu did what the Lord intended to Ahab's house, and his sons would rule to the fourth generation; but he kept the golden calves of Bethel and Dan, and in his days Hazael took all Israel's land east of the Jordan (2 Kings 10:29–33). The prophet Hosea, about a century later, speaks of the blood of Jezreel as a debt still owed by Jehu's house (Hosea 1:4).

The Assyrian record adds something Kings leaves out. In his eighteenth year Shalmaneser III crossed the Euphrates, defeated Hazael, shut him up in Damascus and marched on to a headland on the coast. At that time, the annals say, he received the tribute of Tyre, Sidon and Jehu of Israel (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 12, lines 21–30). The Black Obelisk, set up at Kalhu near the end of the reign, shows the scene. A figure bows to the ground before the king, and the caption lists what Jehu sent: silver, gold, gold vessels, tin, staffs and spears (Black Obelisk caption 2 (RIAo 88)). The Assyrian scribes call him "son of Omri", that is, ruler of the land they named after Omri, and say nothing of how he came to the throne.

The revolt ended the dynasty of Omri and the royal cult of Baal, and it founded a dynasty that held the throne for four more generations (2 Kings 15:12). The tribute is the earliest recorded payment by a king of Israel to Assyria. A third account of these deaths, in the name of an Aramean king, survives on the House of David Inscription from Tel Dan.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Shalmaneser's annals place his defeat of Hazael in his eighteenth regnal year (Black Obelisk lines 54–66 and 97–99), and the fuller versions add that he then received the tribute of Jehu (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 12, lines 21–30). His sixth year is the eponymy of Dayan-Ashur, 853 BC, so the eighteenth is 841 BC (Assyrian Eponym Chronicle entries for 853/852 and 841/840 BC). The caption on the Black Obelisk has no date of its own (Black Obelisk caption 2 (RIAo 88)).

Kings does not tie Jehu's revolt to any outside event. Jehu was king by 841, and Ahab, who was alive in 853 (Kurkh Monolith ii 91–92), was followed by two sons whose reigns Kings gives as two and twelve years (1 Kings 22:51; 2 Kings 3:1). Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), argues that Israel then counted both the first and the last part-year of a reign as full years. On that reckoning the two reigns fill the twelve years between the Assyrian dates, and the revolt falls in 841 BC, shortly before the tribute.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 8:28–29; 2 Kings 9:1–13; 2 Kings 9:16–28; 2 Chronicles 22:9; 2 Kings 9:30–37; 2 Kings 10:1–28; 2 Kings 10:29–33; Hosea 1:4; 2 Kings 15:12; 1 Kings 22:51; 2 Kings 3:1

Annals of Shalmaneser III (Other Copies) Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 858–824 BC
RIAo 12, lines 21–30

The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · c. 825 BC
caption 2 (RIAo 88); lines 54–66 and 97–99

The Assyrian Eponym Chronicle Covers 858–699 BC
entries for 853/852 and 841/840 BC

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC
ii 91–92

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jezreel, Samaria, Kalhu
Who Jehu, Shalmaneser III, Elisha, Jezebel
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Elisha Succeeds Elijah c. 850 BC

Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar 853 BC 135

LEADS TO

The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan c. 840 BC 150

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Kingdom Divides Before · c. 930 BC 124

The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan After · c. 840 BC 150

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Elisha Succeeds Elijah Before · c. 850 BC 139

Jonah Sent to Nineveh After · c. 760 BC 154

← Elisha Succeeds Elijah Earlier · c. 850 BC
→ Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele Later · c. 840 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele

c. 840 BC · Estimated date

Mesha, king of Moab, throws off the rule of Israel after Ahab's death. Kings tells of the campaign sent against him; Mesha's own stele, found at Dibon, tells of the towns he took from Israel in the name of his god Chemosh.

Kings says that Mesha, king of Moab, was a sheep breeder who paid the king of Israel a heavy tribute in lambs and wool, and that he rebelled when Ahab died (2 Kings 3:4–5). Joram of Israel marched against him with Jehoshaphat of Judah and the king of Edom, by the desert road through Edom. When the army ran out of water, the prophet Elisha promised both water and victory. The allies laid Moab waste and shut Mesha up in Kir-hareseth. There he sacrificed his eldest son on the city wall. Kings then says, "There was great wrath against Israel", and the allies went home (2 Kings 3:6–27).

Mesha's own account was found in 1868 at Dhiban, ancient Dibon (Mesha Stele Compston, introduction, p. 6), on a basalt stele now in the Louvre (Mesha Stele Louvre AO 5066). He says that Omri, king of Israel, oppressed Moab for many years because Chemosh, Moab's god, was angry with his land, and that Omri's son meant to do the same. But he, Mesha, has seen the downfall of that son and of his house, and Israel, he says, has perished for ever (Mesha Stele lines 4–9).

He then lists his gains. He took Ataroth, where the men of Gad had lived "from of old", and killed its people (Mesha Stele lines 10–13); Numbers also counts Ataroth among the towns of Gad (Numbers 32:34). At the god's command he marched by night against Nebo, took it by noon, killed seven thousand people because he had devoted the town to Ashtar-Chemosh, and dragged the vessels of Yahweh before Chemosh (Mesha Stele lines 14–18). Chemosh, he says, drove the king of Israel from Jahaz (Mesha Stele lines 18–21), and he himself rebuilt towns, cisterns and a road by the Arnon, some of it with Israelite prisoners (Mesha Stele lines 22–30).

The two accounts agree that the house of Omri ruled Moab, that Mesha ended that rule, and that Israel did not win it back. They do not describe the same fighting. Kings tells of an invasion by way of Edom that broke off at Kir-hareseth. The stele tells of towns taken on the plateau around Medeba and Dibon (Joshua 13:9) and names no king of Israel but Omri. Each credits its victories to its own god, and Mesha's devoting of a whole town to his god is the practice that the book of Joshua describes at Jericho (Joshua 6:17–21).

The stele names Yahweh, the god of Israel, in the words of one of Israel's enemies (Mesha Stele lines 14–18). A broken passage near its foot (Mesha Stele lines 31–32) has been read as naming the "House of David"; that reading is contested and is discussed in the note on dating.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The stele gives no year. Kings dates Moab's revolt to the death of Ahab (2 Kings 1:1; 3:5), and Ahab was alive in 853 BC (Kurkh Monolith ii 91–92). Mesha says that Israel held the land of Medeba through Omri's days and half the days of his son, forty years in all, and that he has seen the ruin of Omri's house (Mesha Stele lines 4–9). That may look back on the fall of the dynasty in 841 BC. The Louvre's record says that it was carved shortly after 842 BC and dates it to the time of Mesha, about 830–805 BC (Mesha Stele Louvre AO 5066). The revolt began after 853 BC, and the stele is placed here about 840 BC; it may be a decade or more later.

The reading of line 31 is disputed. André Lemaire, "'House of David' Restored in Moabite Inscription", Biblical Archaeology Review 20/3 (1994), restored the damaged letters as bt[d]wd, "House of David". Israel Finkelstein, Nadav Na'aman and Thomas Römer, "Restoring Line 31 in the Mesha Stele: The 'House of David' or Biblical Balak?", Tel Aviv 46 (2019), pp. 3–11, read a king's name instead, perhaps Balak. Michael Langlois, "The Kings, the City and the House of David on the Mesha Stele in Light of New Imaging Techniques", Semitica 61 (2019), pp. 23–47, defends Lemaire's reading. Matthieu Richelle, "A Re-examination of the Reading BT DWD ('House of David') on the Mesha Stele", Eretz-Israel 34 (2021), pp. 152–159, judges that it remains unproven.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 3:4–5; 2 Kings 3:6–27; Numbers 32:34; Joshua 13:9; Joshua 6:17–21; 2 Kings 1:1; 3:5

The Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone) Set up by Mesha, king of Moab · Second half of the ninth century BC

Compston, introduction, p. 6; Louvre AO 5066; lines 4–9; lines 10–13; lines 14–18; lines 18–21; lines 22–30; lines 31–32

The Kurkh Monolith of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 853 or 852 BC

ii 91–92

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Dibon
Who Mesha, Elisha

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Ahab at the Battle of Qarqar 853 BC 135

Elisha Succeeds Elijah c. 850 BC 139

← Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria Earlier · 841 BC
→ The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan Later · c. 840 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan

c. 840 BC · Estimated date

A king of Aram sets up a victory stele at Dan in which he claims to have killed a king of Israel and a king of the “House of David”. Found in 1993 and 1994, it is the earliest clear mention of David’s dynasty outside the Bible.

In July 1993 excavators at Tel Dan, the site of ancient Dan, found a broken piece of basalt with Aramaic writing built into a wall (Tel Dan Stele account of the find by Gila Cook, architect of the excavation). Two smaller pieces turned up the following June; the excavators’ reports are named in the note on dating. Together the pieces preserve parts of thirteen lines (Tel Dan Stele lines 1–13) of a royal victory stele, which is now in the Israel Museum (Tel Dan Stele Israel Museum record).

The speaker is a king whose name is lost. He says that the king of Israel had earlier entered his father’s land, that his father died, that the god Hadad made him king and went before him, and that he killed kings who had thousands of chariots and horsemen (Tel Dan Stele lines 2–7). Then come two names, both damaged. One ends in "-ram son of" and is followed, after a gap, by "king of Israel". The other ends in "-iahu son of" and is followed, after a gap, by "of the House of David" (Tel Dan Stele lines 7–9).

On the usual arrangement of the fragments, the king of Israel can only be Joram son of Ahab, the one king of Israel whose name ends in this way. The king of Judah who died with him was Ahaziah son of Jehoram, and the second name is restored accordingly. Kings says that the two were together at Ramoth-gilead fighting Hazael of Damascus when Joram was wounded (2 Kings 8:28–29), and that Hazael afterwards took Israel's land east of the Jordan (2 Kings 10:32–33). Hazael is therefore the likely author. One difficulty is that the speaker writes of "my father" as his predecessor, while an Assyrian inscription calls Hazael "son of a nobody" (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 40, i 25–ii 6) and Kings makes him a court official who took the throne (2 Kings 8:7–15).

The stele and Kings disagree about the deaths. In Kings it is Jehu who shoots Joram and orders Ahaziah struck down (2 Kings 9:24–27); on the stele, as it is usually restored, the Aramean king claims both (Tel Dan Stele lines 7–9). The word "killed" survives before the second name; its subject, and the whole verb before the first name, are restored. Taken literally, the two accounts conflict. Kings itself links the two men, since Elijah is told to anoint both Hazael and Jehu as agents of the same judgment (1 Kings 19:15–17).

The words "House of David", written on the stone as a single word, bytdwd, are what made the find famous. On the usual reading, a neighbouring king, about a century and a half after David, could name the kingdom of Judah after him, as Assyrian scribes named Israel after Omri. The inscription says nothing about David himself. It shows that his dynasty was known by his name, the "house" that Nathan's oracle promises to him (2 Samuel 7:11–16). A similar reading has been proposed for a broken line of the Mesha Stele (Mesha Stele line 31), where it is far less certain; see Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The inscription carries no date and its beginning is lost. If lines 7–9 are rightly restored, it looks back on the deaths of Joram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah, which fall in 841 BC, the year in which Joram's successor Jehu paid tribute to Assyria (Shalmaneser III, Annals RIAo 12, lines 21–30). The stele was therefore set up after 841. Hazael was still king of Damascus three years later (Black Obelisk lines 102–104), and Kings has him oppress Israel through the reigns of Jehu and his son (2 Kings 10:32–33; 13:22), so any year in the following decades is possible. The timeline places it about 840 BC.

The excavator Avraham Biran and the epigrapher Joseph Naveh published the first fragment in "An Aramaic Stele Fragment from Tel Dan", Israel Exploration Journal 43 (1993), pp. 81–98, and the two found in June 1994 in "The Tel Dan Inscription: A New Fragment", Israel Exploration Journal 45 (1995), pp. 1–18. There they joined the pieces and restored the two royal names; the line numbers used here follow their arrangement. The stele has generally been assigned to Hazael. George Athas, The Tel Dan Inscription: A Reappraisal and a New Interpretation (2003), arranges the fragments differently, dates the stele about 796 BC, assigns it to Hazael's son Bar-hadad and takes bytdwd as a name for Jerusalem. Most scholars follow Biran and Naveh.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 8:28–29; 2 Kings 10:32–33; 2 Kings 8:7–15; 2 Kings 9:24–27; 1 Kings 19:15–17; 2 Samuel 7:11–16; 2 Kings 10:32–33; 13:22

The Tel Dan Stele ("House of David" Inscription) Set up by a king of Aram-Damascus, probably Hazael · Second half of the ninth century BC account of the find by Gila Cook, architect of the excavation; lines 1–13; Israel Museum record; lines 2–7; lines 7–9

Annals of Shalmaneser III (Other Copies) Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · 858–824 BC

RIAo 40, i 25–ii 6; RIAo 12, lines 21–30

The Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone) Set up by Mesha, king of Moab · Second half of the ninth century BC

line 31

The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III Issued in the name of Shalmaneser III · c. 825 BC

lines 102–104

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Dan
Who Hazael
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

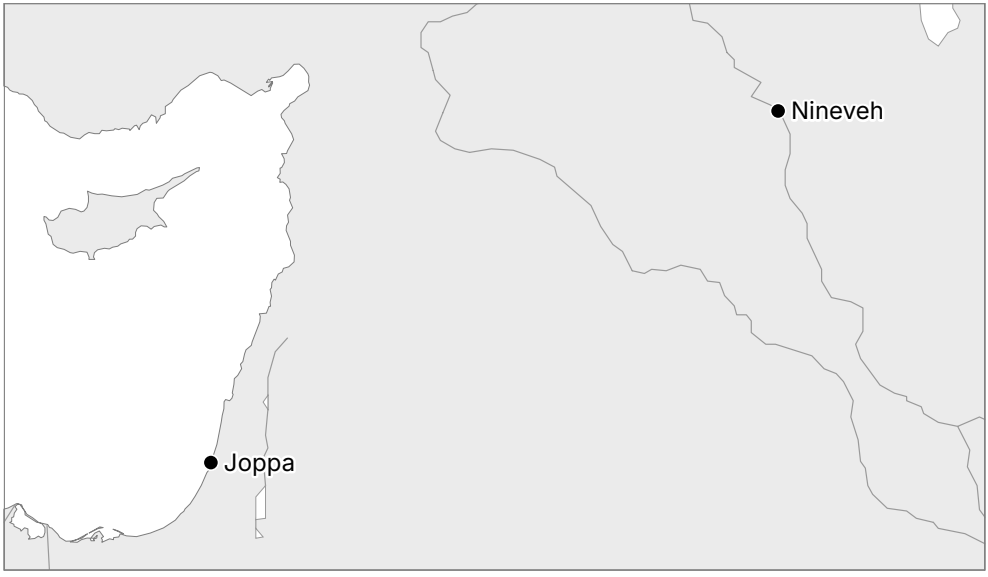
God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria 841 BC 142

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria Before · 841 BC 142

The Call of Isaiah After · c. 740 BC 160



← Moab's Revolt and the Mesha Stele Earlier · c. 840 BC
→ Jonah Sent to Nineveh Later · c. 760 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Jonah Sent to Nineveh

c. 760 BC · Traditional date

The book of Jonah tells of a prophet of Israel who is sent to preach against Nineveh, flees by sea, is swallowed by a great fish and then sees the Assyrian city repent and be spared. Jesus later speaks of “the sign of Jonah”.

Kings names a prophet Jonah son of Amittai, from Gath-hepher, a town in the territory of Zebulun in the north, who foretold that Jeroboam II would restore Israel’s borders (2 Kings 14:25) (Joshua 19:10–13). The book that bears his name tells a single story about him.

The word of the Lord, it says, sent Jonah to Nineveh, the great city of Assyria, to preach against its wickedness. He went the other way, down to the port of Joppa, and boarded a ship for Tarshish (Jonah 1:1–3). A storm came up. The sailors cast lots to find who was to blame, the lot fell on Jonah, and at his own word they threw him into the sea, which grew calm (Jonah 1:4–16). A great fish swallowed him, and he was inside it three days and three nights. He prayed from its belly, and it vomited him out on dry land (Jonah 1:17–2:10).

Sent a second time, Jonah went to Nineveh and cried out that in forty days the city would be overthrown. The people believed God. The king left his throne, sat in ashes and ordered a fast in sackcloth for people and animals alike. God saw, the book says, that they turned from their evil way, and did not bring the disaster (Jonah 3).

Jonah was angry. He had fled, he says, because he knew God to be "a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger" (Jonah 4:1–2). He sat down east of the city under a plant that God made grow in a night and wither the next morning. The book ends with God asking Jonah whether he should not care about Nineveh, a city of more than 120,000 people and many animals (Jonah 4:5–11).

The book shows Israel's God sending a prophet to a foreign city and sparing it when it repents. In the Gospels Jesus refuses his generation any sign but "the sign of Jonah". Matthew explains the sign by Jonah's three days and nights in the fish, set beside the Son of Man's three days in the earth, and both Matthew and Luke add that the people of Nineveh, who repented at Jonah's preaching, will condemn a generation that did not (Matthew 12:39–41) (Luke 11:29–32).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The book of Jonah carries no date. The only anchor is the notice in Kings that Jonah son of Amittai prophesied about Jeroboam II, who reigned forty-one years over Israel in the first half of the eighth century BC (2 Kings 14:23–25). Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), puts that reign at 793–753 BC, and the timeline places the story about 760 BC on that basis.

When the book was written, and what kind of book it is, are debated. It speaks of Nineveh's greatness in the past tense (Jonah 3:3) and does not name the Assyrian king. Jack M. Sasson, Jonah (Anchor Bible, 1990), places its final form after the exile, and Hans Walter Wolff, Obadiah and Jonah (English translation 1986), reads it as a didactic story. Others argue that it presents itself as an account of real events: T. Desmond Alexander, "Jonah and Genre", Tyndale Bulletin 36 (1985), pp. 35–59, and Douglas Stuart, Hosea–Jonah (Word Biblical Commentary, 1987). The narrative below follows the book as it stands.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 14:25; Joshua 19:10–13; Jonah 1:1–3; Jonah 1:4–16; Jonah 1:17–2:10; Jonah 3; Jonah 4:1–2; Jonah 4:5–11; Matthew 12:39–41; Luke 11:29–32; 2 Kings 14:23–25; Jonah 3:3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nineveh, Joppa
Who Jonah, Jeroboam II
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Mission and Expansion

In context

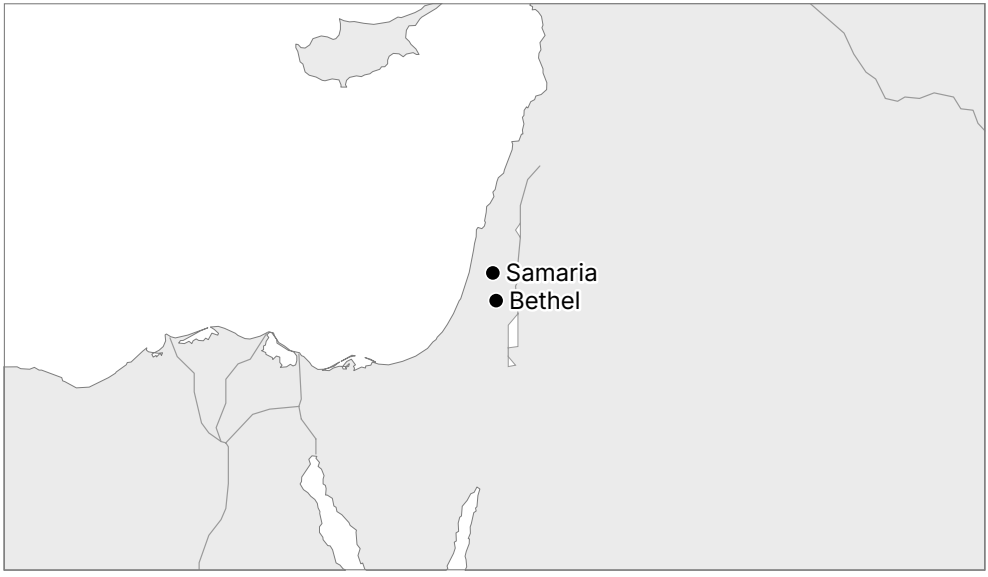
PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Jehu's Revolt and Tribute to Assyria Before · 841 BC 142

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel After · c. 755 BC 157

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Jesus Appoints the Twelve After · c. AD 28–29 311



← The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan Earlier · c. 840 BC
→ Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel Later · c. 755 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel

c. 755 BC · Estimated date

In the prosperous years of Jeroboam II, Amos, a herdsman from Judah, denounces injustice and worship without righteousness at Bethel. Hosea makes his own marriage a picture of Israel's unfaithfulness and of a love that will not give it up.

Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom recovered its old borders (2 Kings 14:25–28). The book of Amos describes its leading people as rich and at ease, lying on beds of ivory, and as zealous in their festivals and offerings (Amos 6:1–6) (Amos 5:21–23).

Amos kept flocks and tended sycamore figs at Tekoa in Judah (Amos 1:1) (Amos 7:12–14). He went north and announced judgment on Israel for selling the needy, denying justice to the poor and crushing the weak (Amos 2:6–8) (Amos 4:1–3). Being chosen, he said, made Israel more answerable, not safer (Amos 3:1–2). In the Lord's name he rejected the worship of the sanctuaries (Amos 5:21–24):

> But let justice roll on like rivers, and righteousness like a mighty stream.

At Bethel, the king's sanctuary, the priest Amaziah accused him of conspiracy and told him to go home and prophesy in Judah. Amos answered that he was no prophet by trade; the Lord had taken him from following the flock. He repeated that Israel would go into exile (Amos 7:10–17).

Hosea began under the same king (Hosea 1:1). His book says he was told to marry a woman of prostitution. He married Gomer, and their three children were given names of judgment: Jezreel, Lo-Ruhamah and Lo-Ammi, "not my people" (Hosea 1:2–9). A second account has him buy an adulterous woman and keep her apart for many days (Hosea 3). The marriage stands for the covenant. Israel has gone after the Baals, and the Lord will win her back and betroth her to himself for ever (Hosea 2:14–20). Hosea names the coming master, Assyria, and sets against the judgment the Lord's own reluctance: "How can I give you up, Ephraim?" (Hosea 11:1–9).

Within a generation Assyria ended the northern kingdom (The Fall of Samaria). The New Testament draws on both prophets. Matthew applies "Out of Egypt I called my son" to Jesus and has Jesus quote "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice" (Matthew 2:15) (Matthew 9:13). Paul applies "not my people" to the calling of the gentiles (Romans 9:24–26). At the council in Jerusalem, James cites Amos's promise that David's fallen tent will be rebuilt (Amos 9:11–12) (Acts 15:13–18).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Amos dates his words to the reigns of Uzziah of Judah and Jeroboam son of Joash of Israel, "two years before the earthquake" (Amos 1:1). The earthquake was still remembered centuries later (Zechariah 14:5), but no source gives its year. Hosea's heading runs from Uzziah to Hezekiah (Hosea 1:1). His first oracle looks ahead to the end of Jehu's dynasty, which came with the murder of Jeroboam's son (Hosea 1:4) (2 Kings 15:8–12), so he too began while Jeroboam was alive.

In the chronology of Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), Jeroboam II died in 753 BC. Amos is usually placed about 760 BC. Steven A. Austin, Gordon W. Franz and Eric G. Frost, "Amos's Earthquake: An Extraordinary Middle East Seismic Event of 750 B.C.", International Geology Review 42 (2000), pp. 657–671, argue from earthquake damage at excavated sites for a date about 750 BC. Hosea's preaching went on for decades after this.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 14:25–28; Amos 6:1–6; Amos 5:21–23; Amos 1:1; Amos 7:12–14; Amos 2:6–8; Amos 4:1–3; Amos 3:1–2; Amos 5:21–24; Amos 7:10–17; Hosea 1:1; Hosea 1:2–9; Hosea 3; Hosea 2:14–20; Hosea 11:1–9; Matthew 2:15; Matthew 9:13; Romans 9:24–26; Amos 9:11–12; Acts 15:13–18; Zechariah 14:5; Hosea 1:4; 2 Kings 15:8–12

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethel, Samaria
Who Amos, Hosea, Jeroboam II
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Kingdom Divides c. 930 BC 124

LEADS TO

The Fall of Samaria 722/721 BC 164

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Jonah Sent to Nineveh Before · c. 760 BC 154

The Call of Isaiah After · c. 740 BC 160

COVENANT AND PROMISE

God's Covenant with David Before · c. 1000 BC 110

The Fall of Samaria After · 722/721 BC 164

← Jonah Sent to Nineveh Earlier · c. 760 BC
→ The Call of Isaiah Later · c. 740 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

The Call of Isaiah

c. 740 BC · Estimated date

In the year King Uzziah dies, Isaiah sees the Lord enthroned in the temple and is sent as a prophet to Judah. When Syria and Israel attack, he tells King Ahaz to trust God, gives the sign of Immanuel and speaks of a coming king from David's line.

In the year that King Uzziah died, Isaiah son of Amoz saw the Lord seated on a high throne, the hem of his robe filling the temple. Six-winged seraphim called to one another, "Holy, holy, holy, is Yahweh of Armies! The whole earth is full of his glory!" The thresholds shook and the house filled with smoke (Isaiah 6:1–4). Isaiah cried out that he was undone, a man of unclean lips who had seen the King. A seraph touched his mouth with a coal from the altar and told him that his sin was forgiven. Then he heard the Lord ask whom he should send, and answered, "Here I am. Send me!" (Isaiah 6:5–8). He was sent to a people who would hear and not understand, until the land lay waste and only a stump was left (Isaiah 6:9–13).

Some years later, in the reign of Uzziah's grandson Ahaz, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel marched on Jerusalem to put a king of their own on its throne (Isaiah 7:1–6) (2 Kings 16:5). Isaiah met Ahaz by the upper pool and told him to keep calm, because the plan would fail: "If you will not believe, surely you shall not be established" (Isaiah 7:3–9). Ahaz declined to ask for a sign. Isaiah gave one. A woman would conceive and bear a son and name him Immanuel, and before the child could tell good from evil the lands of the two kings would be deserted (Isaiah 7:10–16). The Hebrew word for her is almah. The ancient Greek translation renders it "a virgin" (Septuagint Isaiah 7:14). Irenaeus, about AD 180, reports that the Jewish translators Theodotion and Aquila wrote "a young woman", and argues against them (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.21.1). Translations still differ.

Ahaz turned to Assyria. He sent the silver and gold of the temple and the palace to Tiglath-pileser and called himself his servant and son, and the Assyrian king took Damascus and killed Rezin (2 Kings 16:7–9). Tiglath-pileser's own list of tributaries includes Jehoahaz of Judah (Tiglath-pileser III, Summary Inscription 7 rev. 11′). Isaiah warned that the Assyrian flood would sweep on into Judah itself (Isaiah 8:5–8).

The same chapters speak of a child born to sit on David's throne, named "Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace" (Isaiah 9:6–7), and of a shoot from the stock of Jesse on whom the Spirit of the Lord rests, who judges the poor with righteousness and in whose reign the wolf lives with the lamb (Isaiah 11:1–9).

In Isaiah the Immanuel sign is tied to the crisis of Ahaz's own day (Isaiah 7:16). Matthew, quoting it in the Greek form, says it was fulfilled in the birth of Jesus, and applies the light dawning on Galilee to the start of his ministry (Matthew 1:22–23) (Matthew 4:13–16). John says that Isaiah "saw his glory, and spoke of him" (John 12:39–41), Paul cites the root of Jesse (Romans 15:12), and the seraphim's cry returns in the worship of heaven in Revelation (Revelation 4:8).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Isaiah dates the vision to the year King Uzziah died (Isaiah 6:1). No outside source fixes that year. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), puts it at 740/739 BC; W. F. Albright, "The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel", Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 100 (1945), pp. 16–22, at 742 BC. Because the vision stands in chapter 6 and not at the head of the book, it is also debated whether it was Isaiah's first call or a later commission.

The meeting with Ahaz came some years afterwards. The attack by Rezin and Pekah is usually dated to 734–732 BC (Mordechai Cogan and Hayim Tadmor, II Kings, Anchor Bible, 1988). A summary inscription of Tiglath-pileser III written about 729 BC already counts Ahaz, under the name Jehoahaz, among the kings who had paid him tribute (Tiglath-pileser III, Summary Inscription 7 rev. 11′).

Primary sources

Scripture
Isaiah 6:1–4; Isaiah 6:5–8; Isaiah 6:9–13; Isaiah 7:1–6; 2 Kings 16:5; Isaiah 7:3–9; Isaiah 7:10–16; 2 Kings 16:7–9; Isaiah 8:5–8; Isaiah 9:6–7; Isaiah 11:1–9; Isaiah 7:16; Matthew 1:22–23; Matthew 4:13–16; John 12:39–41; Romans 15:12; Revelation 4:8; Isaiah 6:1

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Isaiah 7:14

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.21.1

Summary Inscription 7 of Tiglath-pileser III (Nimrud Tablet K 3751) Issued in the name of Tiglath-pileser III · c. 729 BC
rev. 11′

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Isaiah, Uzziah, Ahaz
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110

LEADS TO

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib 701 BC 168

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant c. 550–539 BC 204

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel Before · c. 755 BC 157

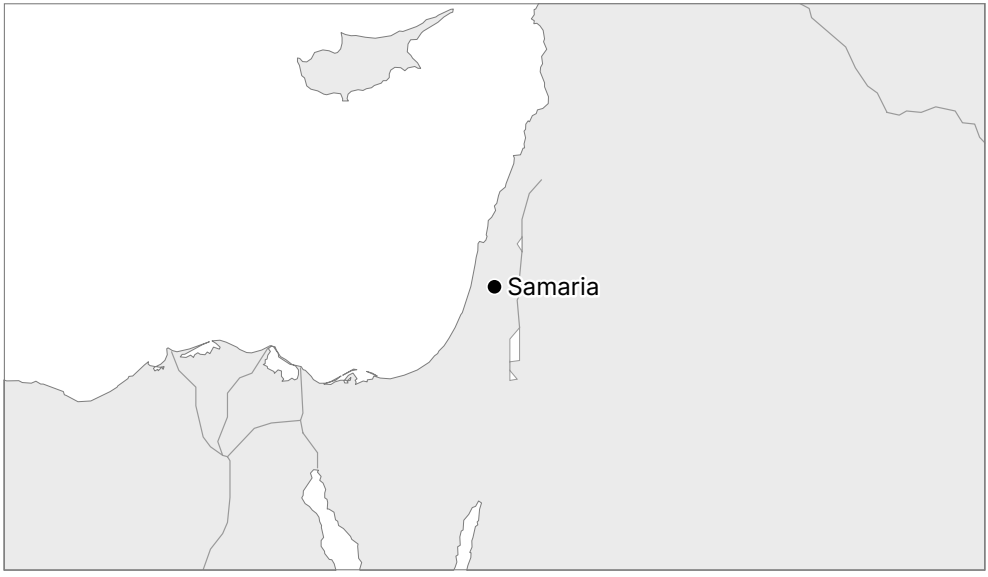
Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib After · 701 BC 168

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The House of David Inscription from Tel Dan Before · c. 840 BC 150

The Fall of Samaria After · 722/721 BC 164

← Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel Earlier · c. 755 BC



→ The Fall of Samaria Later · 722/721 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

The Fall of Samaria

722/721 BC · Estimated date

After a siege of three years the Assyrians take Samaria, deport its people and settle others in their place. The northern kingdom of Israel comes to an end. Kings, a Babylonian chronicle and the inscriptions of Sargon II all record it.

Hoshea of Israel took the throne of Israel by killing Pekah, in the years when Tiglath-pileser of Assyria annexed Galilee and Gilead and deported their people (2 Kings 15:29–30). When Shalmaneser V marched against him, Hoshea became his vassal and paid tribute. Later he sent messengers to So, king of Egypt, and stopped the payments. The king of Assyria put him in prison, overran the land and besieged Samaria for three years (2 Kings 17:1–5).

In Hoshea's ninth year the city was taken. The Israelites were deported to Halah, to the Habor, the river of Gozan, and to the cities of the Medes (2 Kings 17:6) (2 Kings 18:9–11). The king of Assyria brought people from Babylon, Cuthah, Avva, Hamath and Sepharvaim to live in the towns of Samaria. They learned to fear the Lord, Kings says, and went on serving their own gods as well (2 Kings 17:24–33).

Mesopotamian records tell the same story from the other side. The Babylonian chronicle says of Shalmaneser only that he "ravaged Samaria" (Babylonian Chronicle 1 i.27–28), and that he died in the tenth month of his fifth year, when Sargon took the throne (Babylonian Chronicle 1 i.29–31). Sargon II claims the conquest for himself. In the inscription of his palace he says that he besieged and took Samaria, carried off 27,290 of its inhabitants, added fifty chariots to his army and imposed tribute on the rest (Sargon II, Display Inscription lines 23–25). A prism from Nimrud adds that he resettled the city with people from other lands he had conquered and set a governor over it (Sargon II, Nimrud Prism iv 25–41).

All three accounts agree that Samaria fell to Assyria. Kings and Sargon's inscriptions agree that its people were deported and that others were settled there; the chronicle mentions neither. The accounts differ on the conqueror. Kings names Shalmaneser as the king who came up and besieged the city, and says of its capture only that "the king of Assyria" took it (2 Kings 17:3–6) (2 Kings 18:9–10). The Babylonian chronicle credits Shalmaneser, and Sargon's scribes credit Sargon. Kings gives no number for the deported.

Kings reads the fall as the result of Israel's breach of the covenant, as the prophets had warned, and notes that Judah alone was left (2 Kings 17:7–18). It traces the later people of Samaria to the settlers (2 Kings 17:29–41). The distance between Jews and Samaritans is still taken for granted in the Gospels (John 4:9).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings dates the fall to the ninth year of Hoshea and the sixth of Hezekiah, after a siege of three years (2 Kings 17:5–6) (2 Kings 18:9–10). The Babylonian chronicle puts Shalmaneser's attack on Samaria within his five-year reign without naming the year, and dates his death and Sargon's accession to the month Tebetu of his fifth year, the winter of 722/721 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 1 i.27–28) (Babylonian Chronicle 1 i.29–31). Sargon counts the conquest among the deeds of his own reign (Sargon II, Display Inscription lines 23–25), and names Samaria again among the cities that a usurper in Hamath, Iau-bi'di, stirred to revolt against him (Sargon II, Display Inscription lines 33–36).

How these fit together is disputed. Hayim Tadmor, "The Campaigns of Sargon II of Assur: A Chronological-Historical Study", Journal of Cuneiform Studies 12 (1958), pp. 22–40 and 77–100, argued for two conquests: Shalmaneser took the city in 722 BC, and Sargon retook it in 720 BC and carried out the deportation. Nadav Na'aman, "The Historical Background to the Conquest of Samaria (720 BC)", Biblica 71 (1990), pp. 206–225, argues for a single conquest by Sargon in 720 BC. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), dates the fall to 723 BC. The timeline keeps the conventional 722/721 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 15:29–30; 2 Kings 17:1–5; 2 Kings 17:6; 2 Kings 18:9–11; 2 Kings 17:24–33; 2 Kings 17:3–6; 2 Kings 18:9–10; 2 Kings 17:7–18; 2 Kings 17:29–41; John 4:9; 2 Kings 17:5–6

Babylonian Chronicle 1 (from Nabonassar to Shamash-shuma-ukin) Copy dated 500/499 BC; covers 747–668 BC

i.27–28; i.29–31

The Great Display Inscription of Sargon II Issued in the name of Sargon II · 707–706 BC

lines 23–25; lines 33–36

The Nimrud Prism of Sargon II Issued in the name of Sargon II · c. 706 BC

iv 25–41

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Samaria
Who Hoshea of Israel, Shalmaneser V, Sargon II
Threads Covenant and Promise, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel c. 755 BC 157

LEADS TO

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib 701 BC 168

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Amos and Hosea Prophesy to Israel Before · c. 755 BC 157

The Call of Jeremiah After · 627 BC 172

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Call of Isaiah Before · c. 740 BC 160

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib After · 701 BC 168

← The Call of Isaiah Earlier · c. 740 BC
→ Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib Later · 701 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib

701 BC · Firm date

Sennacherib of Assyria overruns Judah, takes Lachish and shuts Hezekiah up in Jerusalem. Hezekiah pays tribute, Isaiah promises that the city will not fall, and it is not taken. Assyrian annals and reliefs record the campaign from the other side.

Hezekiah of Judah removed the high places, broke up the bronze serpent to which incense was being burned, and rebelled against the king of Assyria (2 Kings 18:4–7). He made Jerusalem ready for a siege. He repaired the walls, stopped the springs outside the city and brought the water of Gihon inside by a conduit (2 Chronicles 32:2–5) (2 Chronicles 32:30) (2 Kings 20:20). A Hebrew inscription cut in the wall of the tunnel that is generally identified with this conduit tells how two gangs of diggers, working towards each other, met; it names no king (Siloam inscription lines 1–6).

In Hezekiah's fourteenth year Sennacherib invaded and took the fortified towns of Judah. Hezekiah sent word to him at Lachish that he would bear whatever was imposed, and paid three hundred talents of silver and thirty of gold, stripping the temple doors to do it (2 Kings 18:13–16). Sennacherib still sent officers with an army to Jerusalem. Their spokesman called out in Hebrew, so that the people on the wall could follow, that no god had saved any nation from Assyria and that the Lord would not save Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:17–35).

Hezekiah went to the temple and sent to Isaiah. The prophet answered that the king of Assyria would not enter the city or shoot an arrow there, and would go back the way he came (2 Kings 19:1–7) (2 Kings 19:32–34). That night, Kings says, the angel of the Lord struck down 185,000 in the Assyrian camp. Sennacherib went home to Nineveh, where two of his sons later killed him (2 Kings 19:35–37) (Isaiah 37:38). Isaiah and Chronicles tell the same story (Isaiah 37:33–38) (2 Chronicles 32:20–22).

Sennacherib's annals give his version. He took forty-six walled towns of Hezekiah the Judean, counted 200,150 people as spoil and shut Hezekiah up in Jerusalem like a caged bird. Hezekiah then sent after him to Nineveh thirty talents of gold, eight hundred of silver, other treasure and his own daughters (Sennacherib, Annals (Taylor Prism) iii 18–49). Reliefs from his palace show the siege of Lachish, with a caption naming the city (Lachish reliefs caption, lines 1–4).

The two accounts agree on the invasion, the loss of Judah's fortified towns, a tribute that included thirty talents of gold, and the outcome for Jerusalem: Sennacherib does not claim to have taken it. They differ on the silver and on the ending. The annals close with the tribute and report no loss. Kings puts the tribute first and ends with the destruction of the army. The Babylonian chronicle confirms that Sennacherib was killed by a son, in 681 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 1 iii.34–38). Herodotus, some 270 years after the campaign, tells an Egyptian story in which field mice gnawed the weapons of Sennacherib's army in a single night on the border of Egypt (Herodotus, Histories 2.141).

Later generations in Judah remembered the deliverance. Sirach praises Hezekiah for fortifying the city and bringing in water, and recalls the angel who destroyed the Assyrian camp (Sirach 48:17–21).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Sennacherib's inscriptions count the invasion of Judah as his third campaign (Sennacherib, Annals (Taylor Prism) ii 37–iii 49). The earliest copy of the account, the Rassam Cylinder, was written at the beginning of the year named after the official Mitunu, 700 BC, which puts the campaign in 701 BC (A. Kirk Grayson and Jamie Novotny, The Royal Inscriptions of Sennacherib, King of Assyria (704–681 BC), Part 1, 2012, text no. 4).

Kings dates the invasion to Hezekiah's fourteenth year (2 Kings 18:13), which would put his accession about 715 BC, yet it also sets his accession in the third year of Hoshea of Israel, more than a decade earlier (2 Kings 18:1) (2 Kings 18:9–10). How the two are to be reconciled is disputed; Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983), keeps the later date, 716/715 BC.

Kings mentions Tirhakah, king of Cush, marching out against Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:9). Tirhakah became king only about 690 BC, and John Bright, A History of Israel (3rd ed., 1981), argued that the biblical account joins this campaign to a later one. Mordechai Cogan and Hayim Tadmor, II Kings (Anchor Bible, 1988), hold with most historians that there was one campaign and that Tirhakah is given his later title. No Assyrian inscription records a second campaign against Judah.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 18:4–7; 2 Chronicles 32:2–5; 2 Chronicles 32:30; 2 Kings 20:20; 2 Kings 18:13–16; 2 Kings 18:17–35; 2 Kings 19:1–7; 2 Kings 19:32–34; 2 Kings 19:35–37; Isaiah 37:38; Isaiah 37:33–38; 2 Chronicles 32:20–22; Sirach 48:17–21; 2 Kings 18:13; 2 Kings 18:1; 2 Kings 18:9–10; 2 Kings 19:9

The Siloam Inscription c. 700 BC
lines 1–6

The Annals of Sennacherib (Taylor Prism) Issued in the name of Sennacherib · 691 BC
iii 18–49; ii 37–iii 49

The Lachish Reliefs c. 700–692 BC caption, lines 1–4

Babylonian Chronicle 1 (from Nabonassar to Shamash-shuma-ukin) Copy dated 500/499 BC; covers 747–668 BC
iii.34–38

Histories Herodotus · c. 430–420 BC
2.141

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Lachish
Who Hezekiah, Sennacherib, Isaiah
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fall of Samaria 722/721 BC 164
The Call of Isaiah c. 740 BC 160

LEADS TO

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Fall of Samaria Before · 722/721 BC 164
Josiah Falls at Megiddo After · 609 BC 180

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Call of Isaiah Before · c. 740 BC 160
The Call of Jeremiah After · 627 BC 172

← The Fall of Samaria Earlier · 722/721 BC
→ The Call of Jeremiah Later · 627 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

The Call of Jeremiah

627 BC · Estimated date

In the thirteenth year of King Josiah, Jeremiah, of a priestly family at Anathoth, is called to be a prophet to the nations. For some forty years he warns Judah of disaster from the north, and he promises a new covenant written on the heart.

Jeremiah son of Hilkiah belonged to a family of priests at Anathoth in the land of Benjamin, a short distance north-east of Jerusalem. The word of the Lord came to him in the thirteenth year of King Josiah (Jeremiah 1:1–2).

He tells it in the first person. The Lord said that he had known him before forming him in the womb and had appointed him “a prophet to the nations”. Jeremiah answered that he did not know how to speak, for he was only a child. He was told not to be afraid. The Lord touched his mouth, said, “Behold, I have put my words in your mouth”, and set him over nations and kingdoms “to uproot and to tear down, to destroy and to overthrow, to build and to plant" (Jeremiah 1:4–10).

Two visions followed. An almond branch meant that the Lord was watching over his word to carry it out. A boiling pot tilting from the north meant that disaster would break out from the north on everyone living in the land (Jeremiah 1:11–16). Jeremiah was to stand against the kings, officials, priests and people of Judah like a fortified city. They would fight him and not prevail (Jeremiah 1:17–19).

His work lasted through the reigns of Josiah's sons to the fall of Jerusalem (Jeremiah 1:3). Standing in the gate of the temple, he warned the worshippers not to trust in the cry "Yahweh's temple, Yahweh's temple". If they did not do justice, the Lord would do to this house what he had done to his sanctuary at Shiloh (Jeremiah 7:1–15). A second account of the sermon dates it to the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign and says that priests and prophets demanded his death for it (Jeremiah 26:1–11).

He also promised a new covenant, unlike the one broken since the exodus: "I will put my law in their inward parts, and I will write it in their heart" (Jeremiah 31:31–34).

Both sayings are taken up in the New Testament. Jesus uses the temple sermon's phrase "a den of robbers" when he drives the traders from the temple (Jeremiah 7:11) (Matthew 21:13). The letter to the Hebrews quotes the promise of the new covenant in full (Hebrews 8:6–13), and in Luke and Paul the cup of the Last Supper is called "the new covenant in my blood" (Luke 22:20) (1 Corinthians 11:25).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Jeremiah dates his call to the thirteenth year of Josiah (Jeremiah 1:2). He later counts twenty-three years from that year to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which he equates with the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (Jeremiah 25:1–3). Nebuchadnezzar took the throne in 605 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 9–11). Josiah reigned thirty-one years (2 Kings 22:1) and was killed when Pharaoh Necho marched to the Euphrates (2 Kings 23:29), a march the Babylonian chronicle places in 609 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17). Both counts put the thirteenth year at 627/626 BC.

William L. Holladay, Jeremiah 1 (Hermeneia, 1986), noting how few of Jeremiah's sayings can be placed in Josiah's reign, takes 627 BC as the year of his birth and begins his preaching later. Most commentators keep the plain sense of the heading.

Primary sources

Scripture

Jeremiah 1:1–2; Jeremiah 1:4–10; Jeremiah 1:11–16; Jeremiah 1:17–19; Jeremiah 1:3; Jeremiah 7:1–15; Jeremiah 26:1–11; Jeremiah 31:31–34; Jeremiah 7:11; Matthew 21:13; Hebrews 8:6–13; Luke 22:20; 1 Corinthians 11:25; Jeremiah 1:2; Jeremiah 25:1–3; 2 Kings 22:1; 2 Kings 23:29

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC

obv. 9–11

Babylonian Chronicle 3 (the Fall of Nineveh Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 616–609 BC

year 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Anathoth, Jerusalem
Who Jeremiah, Josiah
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Covenant and Promise

In context

LEADS TO

The First Deportation to Babylon 16 March 597 BC 193

The Last Supper AD 30 or 33 346

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib Before · 701 BC 168

Josiah Falls at Megiddo After · 609 BC 180

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Fall of Samaria Before · 722/721 BC 164

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law After · 622 BC

← Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib Earlier · 701 BC
→ Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law Later · 622 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law

622 BC · Estimated date

During repairs to the temple in Josiah's eighteenth year the high priest Hilkiah finds a book of the law. The king consults the prophetess Huldah, renews the covenant, destroys the shrines of other gods throughout the land and keeps a great Passover.

Josiah became king of Judah at the age of eight (2 Kings 22:1). His grandfather Manasseh had rebuilt the high places and set up altars to the host of heaven in the courts of the temple (2 Kings 21:3–5).

In his eighteenth year Josiah sent his secretary Shaphan to the temple to arrange payment for the workmen repairing it. The high priest Hilkiah told Shaphan, "I have found the book of the law in Yahweh's house." Shaphan read it, and then read it to the king (2 Kings 22:3–10).

When Josiah heard it he tore his clothes, because his people's ancestors had not done what the book required. He sent Hilkiah and four officials to inquire of the Lord. They went to the prophetess Huldah, who lived in the second quarter of Jerusalem. She answered that the disaster written in the book would come on the city for its worship of other gods, but that Josiah, who had humbled himself, would be buried in peace before it came (2 Kings 22:11–20).

The king gathered the elders and the people at the temple, read the book aloud and made a covenant before the Lord to keep its commands, and the people joined in it (2 Kings 23:1–3). He had the vessels made for Baal, Asherah and the host of heaven taken out of the temple and burned. He defiled the high places of Judah from Geba to Beersheba and the place of child sacrifice in the valley of Hinnom, and desecrated the shrines Solomon had built for foreign gods (2 Kings 23:4–14). At Bethel he destroyed the altar set up by Jeroboam I, and he did the same in the towns of Samaria (2 Kings 23:15–20). Then he ordered a Passover kept as the book prescribed. Kings says there had been none like it since the days of the judges (2 Kings 23:21–23).

Chronicles orders the events differently. There Josiah begins to seek God in his eighth year and to purge the land in his twelfth, and the book is found in the eighteenth, when the purge is already done (2 Chronicles 34:3–8) (2 Chronicles 34:14–19). The Passover is described at length (2 Chronicles 35:1–19).

The account shows a written book of the law read in public, accepted as binding and made the measure of king and people. Thirteen years later Josiah was killed at Megiddo. Kings says of the two sons who followed him that they did evil as their fathers had done (2 Kings 23:29–37).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings and Chronicles both date the finding of the book and the Passover to Josiah's eighteenth year (2 Kings 22:3) (2 Kings 23:23) (2 Chronicles 34:8) (2 Chronicles 35:19). Josiah reigned thirty-one years (2 Kings 22:1) and was killed when Pharaoh Necho marched to the Euphrates (2 Kings 23:29), a march that the Babylonian chronicle places in 609 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17). His eighteenth year is therefore 622/621 BC.

Kings does not say which book was found. Because the king's measures match the laws of Deuteronomy on a single sanctuary and on the Passover (Deuteronomy 12:2–7) (Deuteronomy 16:5–6), most scholars since W. M. L. de Wette, Dissertatio critico-exegetica (1805), have identified it with Deuteronomy or an early form of it. Whether the book was old and rediscovered, as Kings presents it, or written not long before it was found, is disputed.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 22:1; 2 Kings 21:3–5; 2 Kings 22:3–10; 2 Kings 22:11–20; 2 Kings 23:1–3; 2 Kings 23:4–14; 2 Kings 23:15–20; 2 Kings 23:21–23; 2 Chronicles 34:3–8; 2 Chronicles 34:14–19; 2 Chronicles 35:1–19; 2 Kings 23:29–37; 2 Kings 22:3; 2 Kings 23:23; 2 Chronicles 34:8; 2 Chronicles 35:19; 2 Kings 23:29; Deuteronomy 12:2–7; Deuteronomy 16:5–6

Babylonian Chronicle 3 (the Fall of Nineveh Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 616–609 BC

year 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Bethel
Who Josiah, Hilkiah, Huldah
Threads Covenant and Promise, Scripture and Canon, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib 701 BC 168

The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

LEADS TO

Josiah Falls at Megiddo 609 BC 180

Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish 605 BC 184

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem 458 BC 222

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Call of Jeremiah Before · 627 BC 172

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple After · 587/586 BC 200

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Farewell and Death of Moses Before · c. 1406 or c. 1220 BC 67

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem After · 458 BC 222

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Shishak Invades Judah Before · c. 925 BC 128

The First Deportation to Babylon After · 16 March 597 BC 193

← The Call of Jeremiah Earlier · 627 BC
→ Josiah Falls at Megiddo Later · 609 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Josiah Falls at Megiddo

609 BC · Firm date

Pharaoh Necho marches north to the Euphrates in support of Assyria. King Josiah of Judah goes out against him at Megiddo and is killed. Three months later Necho deposes Josiah's son Jehoahaz and makes Jehoiakim king as Egypt's vassal.

The Babylonian chronicle for 610 BC says that the Babylonians and Medes marched on Harran against Ashur-uballit, who had taken the throne of Assyria, and that he and an Egyptian army that had come to his aid abandoned the city and crossed the Euphrates (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 16). In the month Du'uzu of the following year Ashur-uballit came back over the river with a large army from Egypt. They besieged Harran until the month Ululu and achieved nothing (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17).

Kings tells in two verses what this march meant for Judah. Pharaoh Necho II went up to the Euphrates, King Josiah went to meet him, and Necho killed him at Megiddo. His servants brought the body in a chariot to Jerusalem and buried him in his own tomb (2 Kings 23:29–30). The translations differ on Necho's purpose: the World English Bible has him go up "against the king of Assyria", the New Revised Standard Version "to the king of Assyria". The chronicle has the Egyptians fighting beside the Assyrians (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17).

Chronicles gives a longer account that differs in several points. Necho was marching to Carchemish on the Euphrates to fight. He sent envoys to tell Josiah that he had no quarrel with him and that God had ordered him to hurry. Josiah would not turn back. He disguised himself and joined battle in the plain of Megiddo, where archers shot him. His servants moved him to a second chariot and brought him to Jerusalem, and Chronicles places his death there. The Chronicler says that Josiah did not listen to the words of Necho "from the mouth of God" (2 Chronicles 35:20–24). All Judah mourned, and Jeremiah made a lament for the king (2 Chronicles 35:24–25).

The people of the land anointed Josiah's son Jehoahaz, who reigned three months (2 Kings 23:30–31). Necho put him in chains at Riblah in the land of Hamath, laid on Judah a tribute of a hundred talents of silver and one of gold, and made another son, Eliakim, king under the name Jehoiakim. Jehoahaz was taken to Egypt and died there (2 Kings 23:33–34). Chronicles says that the king of Egypt deposed him in Jerusalem (2 Chronicles 36:1–4). Jeremiah, who calls him Shallum, told the people to weep for the king who had gone away and would never see his country again (Jeremiah 22:10–12).

Kings says that no king before or after Josiah turned to the Lord as he did (2 Kings 23:25). After his death Judah paid tribute to Egypt (2 Kings 23:35). Four years later Necho's army was beaten at Carchemish (Jeremiah 46:2), and Jehoiakim became the servant of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24:1, 7). Of the kings who followed, Necho appointed Jehoiakim and Nebuchadnezzar appointed Zedekiah (2 Kings 23:34) (2 Kings 24:17).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Kings and Chronicles give no year, only that Josiah reigned thirty-one years (2 Kings 22:1) and died when Necho marched to the Euphrates (2 Kings 23:29). The Babylonian chronicle supplies the year. In the month Du'uzu of Nabopolassar's seventeenth year, which fell in the summer of 609 BC, the Assyrian king crossed the Euphrates with a large Egyptian army to attack Harran, and the siege went on until the month Ululu (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17). The chronicle names neither the pharaoh nor Judah. The link between the two accounts is that both describe an Egyptian march to the Euphrates in the last years of the Assyrian kingdom; in the chronicle the Egyptians march with the Assyrian king.

A second line of evidence gives the same year. Jeremiah dates the battle of Carchemish to the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jeremiah 46:2), and the Babylonian chronicle puts that battle in 605 BC (see the battle of Carchemish). Jehoiakim's reign therefore began in 609 or 608 BC, and Kings has it begin three months after Josiah's death (2 Kings 23:31–34).

On this reckoning Josiah fell as the Egyptian army went north, before it crossed the Euphrates in Du'uzu. Abraham Malamat, "Josiah's Bid for Armageddon: The Background of the Judean-Egyptian Encounter in 609 B.C.", Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society 5 (1973), pp. 267–279, places the clash at Megiddo in the summer of 609 BC, about half a year after the Egyptian retreat from Harran in November 610.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chronicles 35:20–24; 2 Chronicles 35:24–25; 2 Kings 23:30–31; 2 Kings 23:33–34; 2 Chronicles 36:1–4; Jeremiah 22:10–12; 2 Kings 23:25; 2 Kings 23:35; Jeremiah 46:2; 2 Kings 24:1, 7; 2 Kings 23:34; 2 Kings 24:17; 2 Kings 22:1; 2 Kings 23:29; 2 Kings 23:31–34

Babylonian Chronicle 3 (the Fall of Nineveh Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 616–609 BC

year 16; year 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Megiddo, Jerusalem
Who Josiah, Necho II, Jehoiakim
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176

LEADS TO

Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish 605 BC 184

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

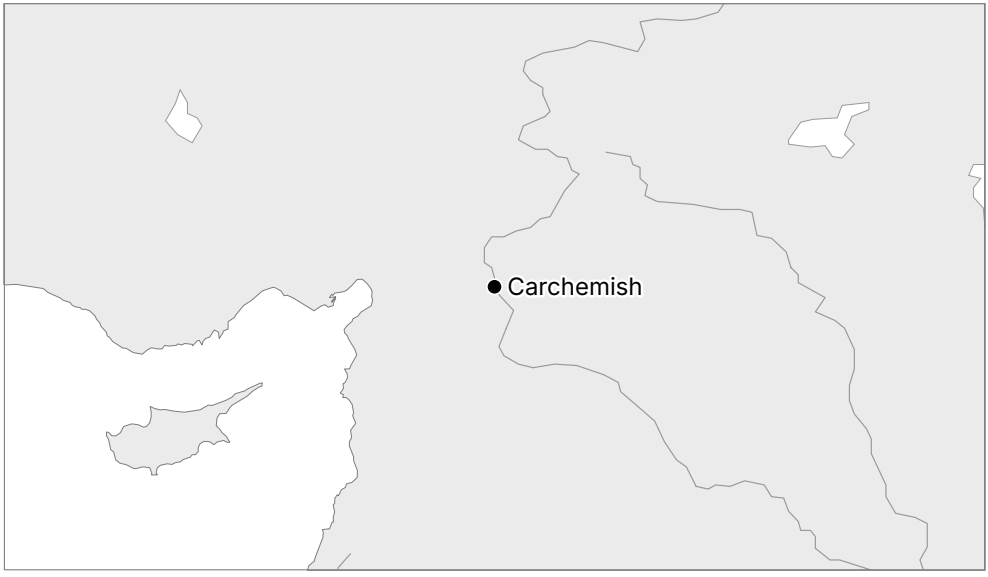
Hezekiah Withstands Sennacherib Before · 701 BC 168

Daniel at the Babylonian Court After · c. 605–536 BC 189

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Call of Jeremiah Before · 627 BC 172

Daniel at the Babylonian Court After · c. 605–536 BC 189



← Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law Earlier · 622 BC
→ Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish Later · 605 BC

THE DIVIDED KINGDOM AND THE PROPHETS

Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish

605 BC · Firm date

The Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar destroys the Egyptian army at Carchemish on the Euphrates and, within months, becomes king. Egypt loses Syria and Palestine, and Judah passes from Egyptian to Babylonian rule.

In 609 BC Pharaoh Necho II marched north to the Euphrates. King Josiah of Judah went out against him at Megiddo and was killed (2 Kings 23:29–30). The Babylonian chronicle for that year records a large Egyptian army crossing the Euphrates with the last king of Assyria to attack Harran, without success (Babylonian Chronicle 3 year 17). Necho then removed Josiah's son Jehoahaz after a reign of three months and took him to Egypt. He put another son, Eliakim, on the throne under the name Jehoiakim, and laid on Judah a tribute of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold (2 Kings 23:31–35).

Four years later the Egyptian army was at Carchemish on the Euphrates. The Babylonian chronicle tells what happened in a few lines. In the twenty-first year of Nabopolassar the king stayed at home, and his eldest son, the crown prince Nebuchadnezzar II, led the army to Carchemish, crossed the river and attacked. The Egyptians gave way and were beaten. Those who got away were overtaken in the district of Hamath, and the chronicle says that not one man escaped to his own country. Nebuchadnezzar then conquered the whole region of Hamath (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 1–8).

Jeremiah dates the same battle to the fourth year of Jehoiakim and names the pharaoh: it was the army of Necho that Nebuchadnezzar struck at Carchemish. His poem on the defeat says of the Egyptian warriors, "In the north by the river Euphrates they have stumbled and fallen" (Jeremiah 46:2–6).

Nabopolassar died that summer. Nebuchadnezzar returned to Babylon and took the throne (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 9–11). In the rest of that year and the next he marched unopposed through what the chronicle calls the Hatti-land, that is, Syria and Palestine, and its kings came before him with tribute (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 12–17). Kings sums up the outcome: the king of Egypt did not come out of his land again, because the king of Babylon had taken everything that had been his from the Brook of Egypt to the Euphrates (2 Kings 24:7).

For Judah the battle meant a change of master. Jehoiakim served Nebuchadnezzar for three years and then rebelled (2 Kings 24:1), which led to the First Deportation to Babylon. In that same fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah announced that Judah and the nations around it would serve the king of Babylon for seventy years (Jeremiah 25:1) (Jeremiah 25:8–11).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Babylonian chronicle puts the battle in the twenty-first year of Nabopolassar, before his death on the eighth of the month Abu, and dates Nebuchadnezzar's accession to the first of Ululu (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 1–8) (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 9–11). By the conversion tables of R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956), those days are 15 August and 7 September 605 BC, so the battle was fought in the spring or summer of that year.

Jeremiah dates it to the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jeremiah 46:2). Daniel puts Nebuchadnezzar's first move against Jerusalem in Jehoiakim's third year (Daniel 1:1); the difference is usually explained by a count that leaves out the accession year. The chronicle speaks only of "the Egyptian army". The pharaoh's name comes from Jeremiah.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Kings 23:31–35; Jeremiah 46:2–6; 2 Kings 24:7; 2 Kings 24:1; Jeremiah 25:1; Jeremiah 25:8–11; Jeremiah 46:2; Daniel 1:1

Babylonian Chronicle 3 (the Fall of Nineveh Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 616–609 BC

year 17

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC

obv. 1–8; obv. 9–11; obv. 12–17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Carchemish
Who Nebuchadnezzar II, Necho II, Jehoiakim

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176

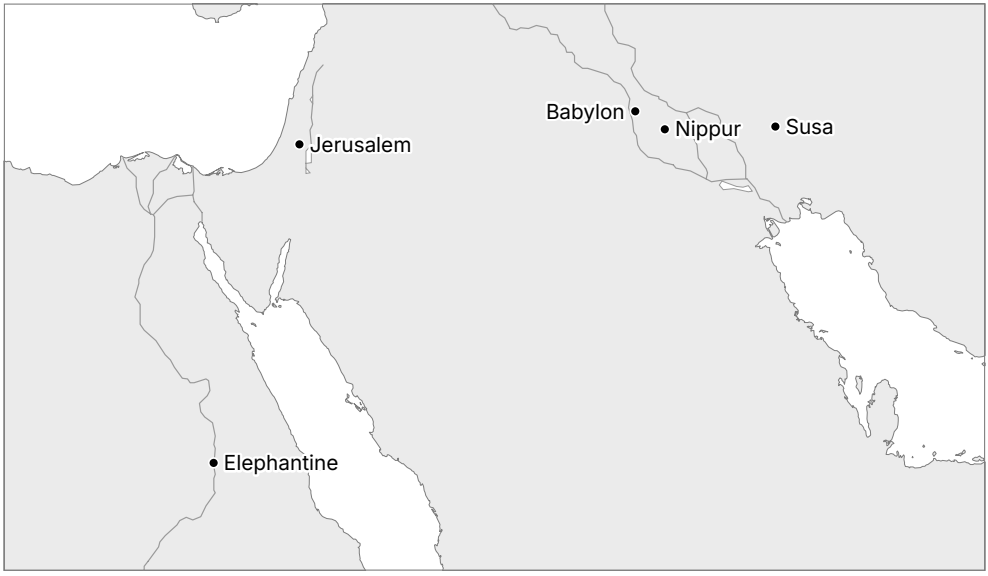
Josiah Falls at Megiddo 609 BC 180

LEADS TO

Daniel at the Babylonian Court c. 605–536 BC 189

The First Deportation to Babylon 16 March 597 BC 193

← Josiah Falls at Megiddo Earlier · 609 BC
→ Daniel at the Babylonian Court Later · c. 605–536 BC
TIMELINE



Exile and Return

597–c. 400 BC

Babylon deports Judah's elite and burns the temple. Persia lets the exiles return, the temple is rebuilt, and Ezra and Nehemiah reshape the community around the law.

The exile is the great break in the Old Testament story. It is also one of the best documented periods: Babylonian chronicles, ration tablets and the Cyrus Cylinder stand beside Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Ezra. Out of the loss of king and temple came a faith centred on Scripture and a sharpened hope for restoration.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

Daniel at the Babylonian Court c. 605–536 BC 189
The First Deportation to Babylon 16 March 597 BC 193
Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles 593–571 BC 196
The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant c. 550–539 BC 204
Cyrus Takes Babylon 12 October 539 BC 208
The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return 538 BC 211
The Second Temple Is Completed March 515 BC 214
Esther and the Origin of Purim 483–473 BC 218
Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem 458 BC 222
Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem 445 BC 226
Malachi and the Close of the Prophets c. 435 BC 230
The Judean Temple at Elephantine 410–407 BC 234

EXILE AND RETURN

Daniel at the Babylonian Court

c. 605–536 BC · Traditional date

The book of Daniel tells of a young Judean taken to Babylon who serves its kings and stays loyal to his God through the furnace and the lions' den, and who sees "one like a son of man" receive an everlasting kingdom.

The book of Daniel opens in the third year of King Jehoiakim, when it says Nebuchadnezzar II besieged Jerusalem and carried off some of the temple vessels. Young men of the royal and noble families were taken to Babylon to be trained for the king's service, among them Daniel and his companions Hananiah, Mishael and Azariah. They were given Babylonian names and taught the language and learning of the Chaldeans. So as not to defile themselves, they asked for vegetables and water in place of the king's food and wine (Daniel 1:1–16).

Five stories follow. Daniel tells the king his dream of a statue of gold, silver, bronze, iron and clay, shattered by a stone "cut out without hands". He explains it as a series of kingdoms followed by one that God will set up and that will never be destroyed (Daniel 2:31–45). His three companions refuse to bow to a golden image, are thrown into a furnace and come out unharmed (Daniel 3). Nebuchadnezzar, in a proclamation in his own name, tells how he was driven from human company until "seven times" had passed and he acknowledged the Most High (Daniel 4:1–3, 28–37). At a feast of King Belshazzar, where the vessels from Jerusalem are used for drinking, a hand writes on the wall. Daniel reads the words as the end of the kingdom, and Belshazzar is killed that night (Daniel 5). Under "Darius the Mede", Daniel goes on praying towards Jerusalem in spite of a royal ban, is thrown to the lions and is found alive in the morning (Daniel 6).

In chapter 7 Daniel has a vision of his own. Four beasts rise from the sea. Then the "ancient of days" takes his seat in judgment, and "one like a son of man" comes with the clouds and is given a dominion that will not pass away (Daniel 7:1–14).

The stories show Jews serving a foreign king while refusing his gods, and they were read as encouragement under persecution. In 1 Maccabees the dying Mattathias reminds his sons of the three who were saved from the flame and of Daniel among the lions (1 Maccabees 2:49–60), and Hebrews alludes to both (Hebrews 11:33–34). In the Gospels Jesus speaks of "Daniel the prophet" (Matthew 24:15) and answers the high priest in the language of the vision, of the Son of Man coming with the clouds (Mark 14:61–62).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The dates are those of the book's own setting. It begins in the third year of King Jehoiakim, when it says Daniel was taken to Babylon (Daniel 1:1–6), and its last date is the third year of Cyrus (Daniel 10:1): about 605 to 536 BC. The Babylonian chronicle for 605 BC reports that Nebuchadnezzar overran Syria after the battle of Carchemish and returned with heavy tribute. It does not mention Jerusalem (Babylonian Chronicle 5 obv. 8–13).

When the book was written is disputed. Jewish and Christian tradition took it as Daniel's own work of the sixth century BC: Josephus, about AD 93, says that Daniel wrote of Antiochus Epiphanes many years before the event (Josephus, Antiquities 10.266–276). That date is defended today by, for example, Joyce

G. Baldwin, Daniel (1978), and Stephen R. Miller, Daniel (1994). Most critical scholars hold that the stories of chapters 1–6 are older tales and that the visions of chapters 7–12 were written during the persecution under Antiochus IV, about 167–164 BC, because they follow events closely up to that point: see John J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia, 1993). The argument is an old one. Jerome reports that the philosopher Porphyry made it in the third century AD (Jerome, Commentary on Daniel Prologue).

Three details bear on the question. No source independent of the book knows a "Darius the Mede" who received the kingdom between Belshazzar and Cyrus (Daniel 5:30–31). An Aramaic fragment from Qumran tells of a Babylonian king afflicted for seven years and helped by a Jewish exorcist; the king is not Nebuchadnezzar, as in Daniel 4, but Nabonidus (Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242) lines 1–8). And Belshazzar, whom the book calls king, is a figure of history: an inscription of Nabonidus names him as that king's eldest son (Nabonidus Cylinder from Ur col. ii, closing prayer).

Primary sources

Scripture

Daniel 1:1–16; Daniel 2:31–45; Daniel 3; Daniel 4:1–3, 28–37; Daniel 5; Daniel 6; Daniel 7:1–14; 1 Maccabees 2:49–60; Hebrews 11:33–34; Matthew 24:15; Mark 14:61–62; Daniel 1:1–6; Daniel 10:1; Daniel 5:30–31

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC
obv. 8–13

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
10.266–276

Commentary on Daniel Jerome · c. AD 407
Prologue

The Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242) Copy of the 1st century BC
lines 1–8

The Nabonidus Cylinder from Ur Issued in the name of Nabonidus · Reign of Nabonidus, 556–539 BC
col. ii, closing prayer

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Babylon
Who Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar II, Belshazzar
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Persecution and Martyrdom, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish 605 BC 184

LEADS TO

John's Revelation on Patmos c. AD 95 474

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Josiah Falls at Megiddo Before · 609 BC 180

Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles After · 593–571 BC 196

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Esther and the Origin of Purim After · 483–473 BC 218

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Josiah Falls at Megiddo Before · 609 BC 180

The First Deportation to Babylon After · 16 March 597 BC 193

← Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish Earlier · 605 BC
→ The First Deportation to Babylon Later · 16 March 597 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The First Deportation to Babylon

16 March 597 BC · Firm date

Nebuchadnezzar takes Jerusalem, deports the young king Jehoiachin with thousands of Judah's leading people, and puts Zedekiah on the throne. Babylon's own chronicle dates the capture to the day.

After his victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar II made Judah a vassal of Babylon. King Jehoiakim rebelled, and Kings records his death before it describes the siege (2 Kings 24:1–6, 10). His son Jehoiachin, eighteen years old, reigned for three months, and in that time Jerusalem was besieged (2 Kings 24:8–11).

Jehoiachin surrendered with his mother, his officials and his court. Nebuchadnezzar carried off the treasures of the temple and the palace and deported the king, the leading families, the soldiers and the craftsmen to Babylon. He made Jehoiachin's uncle Mattaniah king and renamed him Zedekiah (2 Kings 24:12–17). Kings speaks of ten thousand captives; a list preserved in Jeremiah counts 3,023 (Jeremiah 52:28).

Babylon's court chronicle records the same event from the other side. In his seventh year, it says, the king marched west, besieged "the city of Judah", took it on the second day of Addaru, captured its king, appointed a king of his own choosing and carried heavy tribute back to Babylon (Babylonian Chronicle 5 rev. 11–13).

Among the deported was the priest Ezekiel, who dates his visions from the year of Jehoiachin's exile (Ezekiel 1:1–3). Jehoiachin himself appears in administrative tablets excavated at Babylon, which list oil rations issued to the king of Judah and his retinue (Ration tablet from Babylon VAT 16378). The books of Kings end with his release from prison thirty-seven years later (2 Kings 25:27–30).

The deportation removed Judah's king and much of its leadership a decade before the city itself was destroyed. Jeremiah wrote to the exiles, telling them to build houses, raise families and seek the welfare of the city where they now lived (Jeremiah 29:1–14).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Babylonian chronicle gives the day: the second of the month Addaru in Nebuchadnezzar's seventh regnal year (Babylonian Chronicle 5 rev. 11–13). In the Julian calendar that is 16 March 597 BC, by the standard conversion tables of R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956).

Jeremiah also counts the deportation in the seventh year (Jeremiah 52:28), while Kings puts it in the eighth (2 Kings 24:12). The difference is usually explained either by a count that includes the king's accession year or by the deportation itself following a few weeks after the surrender, once the new year had begun (2 Chronicles 36:10).

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 24:1–6, 10; 2 Kings 24:8–11; 2 Kings 24:12–17; Jeremiah 52:28; Ezekiel 1:1–3; 2 Kings 25:27–30; Jeremiah 29:1–14; 2 Kings 24:12; 2 Chronicles 36:10

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC
rev. 11–13

Jehoiachin's Ration Tablets c. 595–570 BC
VAT 16378

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Babylon
Who Jehoiachin, Nebuchadnezzar II, Zedekiah, Ezekiel Threads Kingship and Messiah, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Babylon Defeats Egypt at Carchemish 605 BC 184
The Call of Jeremiah 627 BC 172

LEADS TO

Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles 593–571 BC 196
The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Daniel at the Babylonian Court Before · c. 605–536 BC 189
The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple After · 587/586 BC 200

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law Before · 622 BC 176
Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles After · 593–571 BC 196

← Daniel at the Babylonian Court Earlier · c. 605–536 BC
→ Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles Later · 593–571 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles

593–571 BC · Estimated date

Among the deported Judeans in Babylonia the priest Ezekiel sees the glory of God, announces the fall of Jerusalem and then its restoration, in the visions of the dry bones and of a new temple.

Ezekiel, a priest, was among the Judeans deported to Babylonia with King Jehoiachin in the first deportation of 597 BC (Ezekiel 1:1–3). In the fifth year of that exile, by the river Chebar, he saw a storm cloud coming from the north, four living creatures with four faces and four wings each, wheels with rims full of eyes beside them and, above them, a throne with a figure like a man on it. He calls it "the appearance of the likeness of Yahweh's glory" (Ezekiel 1). A voice sent him as a prophet to a "rebellious house" and gave him a scroll of lamentation to eat; he then sat stunned for seven days among the exiles at Tel-abib (Ezekiel 2:1–3:15).

The exiles lived together in settlements in Babylonia, several of which are named (Ezekiel 3:15; Ezra 2:59). A canal called Kabaru appears in a business tablet from the archive of the Murashû family, which was excavated at Nippur and written about a century and a half after Ezekiel (Murashû archive BE 9, no. 4, lines 8–9). Its first editor identified the canal with the Chebar (Murashû archive BE 9, p. 28).

Until Jerusalem fell, Ezekiel's message to the exiles was that the city was doomed. He acted out its siege with a clay tile (Ezekiel 4:1–3). In the sixth year he was carried in a vision to the temple, saw idols and sun worship in its courts, and watched the glory of God leave the building and come to rest on the mountain east of the city (Ezekiel 8) (Ezekiel 10:18–19; 11:22–23). He wrote down the day the siege began (Ezekiel 24:1–2). When his wife died he was told not to mourn, as a sign of what was coming (Ezekiel 24:15–24). In the twelfth year a fugitive arrived with the news that the city had been taken (Ezekiel 33:21–22).

After that the oracles turn to restoration. God will gather the scattered people like a shepherd (Ezekiel 34:11–16), cleanse them and give them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezekiel 36:24–28). In a valley of dry bones Ezekiel sees the bones joined, clothed with flesh and brought to life, and is told that they are the whole house of Israel (Ezekiel 37:1–14). In the twenty-fifth year a man with a measuring reed leads him through a new temple. The glory returns to it by the east gate, a river flows out from under its threshold, and the city is named "Yahweh is there" (Ezekiel 40:1–4) (Ezekiel 43:1–7) (Ezekiel 47:1–12) (Ezekiel 48:35).

Ezekiel told a people without a temple that God would be "a sanctuary for a little while" to them where they were (Ezekiel 11:16). His images lived on: the book of Revelation takes up the four living creatures and the river lined with healing trees (Revelation 4:6–8) (Revelation 22:1–2).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The book dates its oracles from the deportation of King Jehoiachin, which the Babylonian chronicle fixes in the spring of 597 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 5 rev. 11–13). The first vision falls in the fourth month of the fifth year (Ezekiel 1:1–2), the summer of 593 BC, and the latest dated oracle on the first day of the twenty-seventh year (Ezekiel 29:17), the spring of 571 BC. The conversions follow R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956).

Each date can shift by a year, depending on whether the years of exile were counted from the deportation itself or from the next new year. The book does not explain what the “thirtieth year” of its opening verse is counted from.

Primary sources

Scripture

Ezekiel 1:1–3; Ezekiel 1; Ezekiel 2:1–3:15; Ezekiel 3:15; Ezra 2:59; Ezekiel 4:1–3; Ezekiel 8; Ezekiel 10:18–19; 11:22–23; Ezekiel 24:1–2; Ezekiel 24:15–24; Ezekiel 33:21–22; Ezekiel 34:11–16; Ezekiel 36:24–28; Ezekiel 37:1–14; Ezekiel 40:1–4; Ezekiel 43:1–7; Ezekiel 47:1–12; Ezekiel 48:35; Ezekiel 11:16; Revelation 4:6–8; Revelation 22:1–2; Ezekiel 1:1–2; Ezekiel 29:17

The Murashû Archive from Nippur Dated by the reigns of Artaxerxes I and Darius II (465–404 BC)

BE 9, no. 4, lines 8–9; BE 9, p. 28

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC

rev. 11–13

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nippur
Who Ezekiel
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Deportation to Babylon 16 March 597 BC 193

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Daniel at the Babylonian Court Before · c. 605–536 BC 189

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant After · c. 550–539 BC 204

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The First Deportation to Babylon Before · 16 March 597 BC 193

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple After · 587/586 BC 200

← The First Deportation to Babylon Earlier · 16 March 597 BC
→ The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple Later · 587/586 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple

587/586 BC · Estimated date

After a long siege the Babylonian army breaches Jerusalem, burns Solomon's temple and the city, and deports most of the remaining people. The kingdom of Judah comes to an end.

Zedekiah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made king, rebelled against Babylon (2 Kings 24:20). In the ninth year of his reign, on the tenth day of the tenth month, Nebuchadnezzar II and his army encamped against Jerusalem and built siege works around it (2 Kings 25:1–2). The prophet Jeremiah, who urged the king to surrender, was arrested as a deserter and held under guard for the rest of the siege (Jeremiah 37:11–21) (Jeremiah 38:17–18, 28).

By the fourth month of Zedekiah's eleventh year the famine was severe and the wall was breached. The king fled by night toward the Jordan valley, was overtaken near Jericho and brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. His sons were killed in front of him; he was blinded and taken in chains to Babylon (2 Kings 25:2–7).

A month later Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard, burned the temple, the palace and the houses of the city and tore down its walls. The bronze pillars and furnishings of the temple were broken up and carried off, leading priests and officials were executed, and most of the remaining people were deported. Some of the poorest were left to work the vineyards and fields (2 Kings 25:8–21). Jeremiah 52 tells the same story with its own figures and counts 832 people deported from Jerusalem that year (Jeremiah 52:12–30).

Babylon appointed a Judean, Gedaliah, as governor at Mizpah. He was soon assassinated, and many of the survivors fled to Egypt, taking Jeremiah with them (2 Kings 25:22–26) (Jeremiah 43:4–7).

The loss of temple, king and land is a turning point in the Old Testament story. Lamentations mourns the ruined city (Lamentations 1:1–5), Psalm 137 remembers it from exile (Psalm 137), and Chronicles reads it as the outcome of the nation's long refusal to listen to its prophets (2 Chronicles 36:15–21). For these events the biblical books are the only narrative sources.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Kings and Jeremiah date the fall by regnal years: the eleventh year of Zedekiah, and the nineteenth (2 Kings 25:2–8) or eighteenth (Jeremiah 52:29) year of Nebuchadnezzar. The surviving Babylonian chronicle stops in 594/593 BC (Babylonian Chronicle 5 rev. 25), so no outside record fixes the year.

Turning the regnal years into a calendar year depends on whether Judah's years began in spring or in autumn and on whether accession years were counted. The result is the summer of either 587 or 586 BC, and scholars remain divided. For 586 see Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3rd ed., 1983); for 587 see Rodger C. Young, "When Did Jerusalem Fall?", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 47 (2004), pp. 21–38. The timeline places the event at 586 and shows both years.

The two accounts also differ on the day the temple was burned: the seventh of the fifth month (2 Kings 25:8) or the tenth (Jeremiah 52:12).

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 24:20; 2 Kings 25:1–2; Jeremiah 37:11–21; Jeremiah 38:17–18, 28; 2 Kings 25:2–7; 2 Kings 25:8–21; Jeremiah 52:12–30; 2 Kings 25:22–26; Jeremiah 43:4–7; Lamentations 1:1–5; Psalm 137; 2 Chronicles 36:15–21; 2 Kings 25:2–8; Jeremiah 52:29; 2 Kings 25:8; Jeremiah 52:12

Babylonian Chronicle 5 (the Jerusalem Chronicle) Copied c. 550–400 BC; covers 605–594 BC

rev. 25

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Babylon
Who Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar II, Jeremiah
Threads Temple and Worship, Kingship and Messiah, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Deportation to Babylon 16 March 597 BC 193
Solomon Builds the Temple c. 966–959 BC 118

LEADS TO

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant c. 550–539 BC 204
Cyrus Takes Babylon 12 October 539 BC 208
The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles Before · 593–571 BC 196
The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return After · 538 BC 211

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The First Deportation to Babylon Before · 16 March 597 BC 193
The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant After · c. 550–539 BC 204

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law Before · 622 BC 176

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem After · 458 BC 222

← Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles Earlier · 593–571 BC

→ The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant Later · c. 550–539 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant

c. 550–539 BC · Estimated date

Isaiah 40–55 tells the exiles that their punishment is over, names Cyrus as the Lord's anointed who will send them home, and speaks of a servant who suffers for the sins of many.

Chapter 40 of Isaiah opens on a new scene. The chapters before it end with Isaiah warning King Hezekiah that his treasures and his descendants will one day be carried off to Babylon (Isaiah 39:5–8). The next words are spoken to a people for whom that has already happened: "Comfort, comfort my people". The punishment of Jerusalem is over, a road is to be made through the desert, and God is coming back to Zion, carrying his flock like a shepherd (Isaiah 40:1–11).

The chapters that follow speak to exiles. Their God made the heavens and counts the nations as "a drop in a bucket"; the gods of Babylon are carved wood, loaded on to animals (Isaiah 40:12–26) (Isaiah 44:9–20) (Isaiah 46:1–2). Babylon will sit in the dust (Isaiah 47:1–5). The one who will bring this about is named. Cyrus the Great is called the Lord's shepherd and his anointed, who will subdue nations and see Jerusalem and its temple rebuilt, though he does not know the God who calls him (Isaiah 44:24–45:7). The exiles are told to leave Babylon, and their journey is pictured as a second exodus through sea and wilderness (Isaiah 48:20) (Isaiah 43:16–21; 51:9–11).

Through these chapters runs the figure of the Lord's servant. Often the servant is Israel by name (Isaiah 41:8–9) (Isaiah 49:3). In other passages he has a mission to Israel and to the nations, as "a light to the nations", and is beaten without resisting (Isaiah 42:1–7) (Isaiah 49:5–6) (Isaiah 50:4–9). In the longest passage he is despised, "pierced for our transgressions", led like a lamb to the slaughter and buried, and afterwards is vindicated, having borne the sin of many (Isaiah 52:13–53:12).

The servant has been read in more than one way. The New Testament applies these passages to Jesus. In Acts, Philip begins from the lamb led to the slaughter and tells an Ethiopian official "about Jesus", and Matthew, Luke and 1 Peter quote the same chapters (Acts 8:27–35) (Matthew 8:17; 12:17–21) (Luke 22:37) (1 Peter 2:22–25). Origen, in the third century, records that Jewish teachers with whom he debated took the servant to be the whole people of Israel, suffering in its dispersion (Origen, Against Celsus 1.55).

All four Gospels use the opening of chapter 40, the voice crying in the wilderness, for John the Baptist (Matthew 3:3) (Mark 1:2–4) (Luke 3:4–6) (John 1:23).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

These chapters carry no date. They speak to people in Babylon (Isaiah 48:20), name Cyrus as a conqueror who has yet to free the exiles (Isaiah 45:1–4, 13), and look ahead to Babylon's fall (Isaiah 47:1–5). That situation lies between Cyrus's capture of Astyages and Ecbatana in 550 BC and his capture of Babylon in 539 BC (Nabonidus Chronicle ii.1–4; iii.12–18), and the timeline places the entry there.

Who wrote the chapters, and when, is disputed. The book opens with a heading that names Isaiah son of Amoz, who lived in the eighth century BC (Isaiah 1:1), and chapters 40–55 have no heading of their own. Ben Sira, about 180 BC, credits Isaiah with comforting the mourners in Zion (Sirach 48:22–25). The oldest complete manuscript, copied about 125 BC, has all sixty-six chapters as one book (Great Isaiah Scroll). Josephus says that Cyrus read his own name in what Isaiah had written long before (Josephus, Antiquities 11.5–6). On this view the chapters are prediction, written about 700 BC: see J. Alec Motyer, The Prophecy of Isaiah (1993), and John N. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 40–66 (1998).

Since the late eighteenth century most scholars have held that chapters 40–55 are the work of an unnamed prophet among the exiles, often called Second Isaiah, who wrote about 550–539 BC: see Joseph Blenkinsopp, Isaiah 40–55 (Anchor Bible, 2002). The date given here marks the situation the chapters address. It does not decide between the two views.

Primary sources

Scripture

Isaiah 39:5–8; Isaiah 40:1–11; Isaiah 40:12–26; Isaiah 44:9–20; Isaiah 46:1–2; Isaiah 47:1–5; Isaiah 44:24–45:7; Isaiah 48:20; Isaiah 43:16–21; 51:9–11; Isaiah 41:8–9; Isaiah 49:3; Isaiah 42:1–7; Isaiah 49:5–6; Isaiah 50:4–9; Isaiah 52:13–53:12; Acts 8:27–35; Matthew 8:17; 12:17–21; Luke 22:37; 1 Peter 2:22–25; Matthew 3:3; Mark 1:2–4; Luke 3:4–6; John 1:23; Isaiah 45:1–4, 13; Isaiah 1:1; Sirach 48:22–25

Against Celsus Origen · c. AD 248
1.55

The Nabonidus Chronicle (Babylonian Chronicle 7) Copy of the 3rd–2nd century BC; covers 556–539 BC
ii.1–4; iii.12–18

The Great Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa[a]) c. 125 BC
imj.org.il

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
11.5–6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Babylon, Jerusalem
Who Isaiah, Cyrus the Great
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

The Call of Isaiah c. 740 BC 160

LEADS TO

The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return 538 BC 211

The Crucifixion AD 30 or 33 359

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Ezekiel's Visions among the Exiles Before · 593–571 BC 196

The Second Temple Is Completed After · March 515 BC 214

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple Before · 587/586 BC 200

Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans After · 142 BC 263

← The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple Earlier · 587/586 BC
→ Cyrus Takes Babylon Later · 12 October 539 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Cyrus Takes Babylon

12 October 539 BC · Firm date

The army of Cyrus of Persia enters Babylon without a battle in October 539 BC, and the Babylonian empire passes to Persia. The Judean exiles come under a king who lets displaced peoples go home.

Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, spent much of his reign at the oasis of Tayma in Arabia. The Babylonian chronicle notes year after year that the king was in Tayma while the crown prince and the army were in Babylonia, and that the New Year festival was not held. It also records that Astyages marched against Cyrus the Great, king of Anshan, that his army mutinied and handed him over, and that Cyrus carried the treasure of Ecbatana, the royal city, home (Nabonidus Chronicle ii.1–25). The crown prince was Belshazzar, whom Nabonidus names in an inscription as his eldest son (Nabonidus Cylinder from Ur col. ii, closing prayer).

In the autumn of Nabonidus's seventeenth year Cyrus defeated the Babylonian army at Opis on the Tigris. Sippar was taken without a battle and Nabonidus fled. Two days later Ugbaru, governor of Gutium, led the army of Cyrus into Babylon, again without a battle, and Nabonidus was afterwards captured in the city. The temple rites went on without interruption. Cyrus entered Babylon seventeen days after his army. The chronicle says that there was peace in the city, and that his governor appointed officials there (Nabonidus Chronicle iii.12–20).

Cyrus's own inscription tells it as the will of Marduk, the god of Babylon, who chose Cyrus, walked beside him, brought him into the city without fighting and handed Nabonidus over to him (Cyrus Cylinder lines 12–17).

Greek writers tell a different story. Herodotus, about a century later, says that the Babylonians were beaten in the field and shut themselves in, and that Cyrus lowered the Euphrates by a canal so that his men could wade in along the riverbed while the city was keeping a festival (Herodotus, Histories 1.190–191). Xenophon adds that the king was killed in his palace that night (Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7.5.15–33). The Babylonian historian Berossus, as quoted by Josephus, says that Nabonidus was besieged in Borsippa, gave himself up and was sent to live in Carmania (Josephus, Against Apion 1.150–153).

The book of Daniel sets a feast of King Belshazzar on the city's last night: a hand writes on the wall, Daniel reads it as the end of the kingdom, and "in that night Belshazzar the Chaldean King was slain" (Daniel 5:1–30). Isaiah 40–55 names Cyrus as the Lord's anointed, before whom doors are opened (Isaiah 45:1). The exiles from Judah now lived under Persian rule. Ezra dates the decree that let them go home to Cyrus's first year (Ezra 1:1); see the Edict of Cyrus and the First Return.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Nabonidus Chronicle dates the events by day. In the king's seventeenth year Sippar fell on the fourteenth day and the army of Cyrus entered Babylon on the sixteenth day of the month that falls between Ululu and Arahsamna, which is Tašrîtu; Cyrus himself entered on the third of Arahsamna (Nabonidus Chronicle iii.5–18). By the tables of R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956), these are 10, 12 and 29 October 539 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture
Daniel 5:1–30; Isaiah 45:1; Ezra 1:1

The Nabonidus Chronicle (Babylonian Chronicle 7) Copy of the 3rd–2nd century BC; covers 556–539 BC
ii.1–25; iii.12–20; iii.5–18

The Nabonidus Cylinder from Ur Issued in the name of Nabonidus · Reign of Nabonidus, 556–539 BC
col. ii, closing prayer

The Cyrus Cylinder Issued in the name of Cyrus II · Shortly after 539 BC
lines 12–17

Histories Herodotus · c. 430–420 BC
1.190–191

Cyropaedia (The Education of Cyrus) Xenophon · c. 370–360 BC
7.5.15–33

Against Apion Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
1.150–153

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Babylon
Who Cyrus the Great, Nabonidus, Belshazzar

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

LEADS TO

The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return 538 BC 211

← The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant Earlier · c. 550–539 BC
→ The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return Later · 538 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return

538 BC · Estimated date

Cyrus of Persia, having taken Babylon, allows the Judean exiles to go home and rebuild the temple in Jerusalem, and hands back the temple vessels. A first group returns.

When Cyrus the Great took Babylon in 539 BC, the exiles from Judah passed from Babylonian to Persian rule.

The book of Ezra opens with a proclamation issued in Cyrus's first year. The God of heaven, it says, has charged him to build a house in Jerusalem; any of that God's people may go up to build it, and their neighbours are to support them with silver, gold, goods and animals (Ezra 1:1–4). Ezra gives a second version in Aramaic, a memorandum said to have been found in the royal archives at Ecbatana, which sets the dimensions of the building, charges the cost to the royal treasury and orders the return of the gold and silver vessels that Nebuchadnezzar had taken (Ezra 6:1–5). The books of Chronicles end with the same decree (2 Chronicles 36:22–23).

The temple vessels were counted out to Sheshbazzar, called the prince of Judah, who brought them to Jerusalem and, according to a later report, laid the temple's foundations (Ezra 1:7–11) (Ezra 5:14–16). The list of those who returned is headed by Zerubbabel, a grandson of King Jehoiachin (1 Chronicles 3:17–19), and by the priest Jeshua the High Priest; it totals 42,360 people (Ezra 2:1–2, 64). They rebuilt the altar and began the temple, and then the work stalled for years (Ezra 3:1–4:5).

The Cyrus Cylinder, written in Babylon shortly after the conquest, records measures of the same kind. In it Cyrus says that he sent the images of gods back to their sanctuaries in a list of cities beyond the Tigris, and that he gathered their people and returned them to their settlements (Cyrus Cylinder lines 30–34). The cylinder does not mention Judah or Jerusalem. What it shows is that Cyrus claimed credit for sending displaced gods and their peoples home elsewhere in his realm, which is the kind of act Ezra describes.

Isaiah 40–55 names Cyrus as the Lord's shepherd and anointed, through whom Jerusalem and its temple would be rebuilt (Isaiah 44:28–45:4). Ezra presents the decree as the fulfilment of Jeremiah's word that the exile would end (Ezra 1:1; Jeremiah 29:10).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Ezra dates the decree to the first year of Cyrus (Ezra 1:1). Cyrus's army entered Babylon in October 539 BC (Nabonidus Chronicle iii.15–18). By Babylonian reckoning his first full regnal year as king of Babylon began in the spring of 538 BC, which is the year usually given for the decree. The text does not say when the first group set out, and the return may have been spread over several years.

Primary sources

Scripture

Ezra 1:1–4; Ezra 6:1–5; 2 Chronicles 36:22–23; Ezra 1:7–11; Ezra 5:14–16; 1 Chronicles 3:17–19; Ezra 2:1–2, 64; Ezra 3:1–4:5; Isaiah 44:28–45:4; Ezra 1:1; Jeremiah 29:10; Ezra 1:1

The Cyrus Cylinder Issued in the name of Cyrus II · Shortly after 539 BC
lines 30–34

The Nabonidus Chronicle (Babylonian Chronicle 7) Copy of the 3rd–2nd century BC; covers 556–539 BC
iii.15–18

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Babylon, Jerusalem
Who Cyrus the Great, Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel, Jeshua the High Priest
Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Cyrus Takes Babylon 12 October 539 BC 208

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant c. 550–539 BC 204

LEADS TO

The Second Temple Is Completed March 515 BC 214

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple Before · 587/586 BC 200

The Second Temple Is Completed After · March 515 BC 214

← Cyrus Takes Babylon Earlier · 12 October 539 BC
→ The Second Temple Is Completed Later · March 515 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The Second Temple Is Completed

March 515 BC · Estimated date

After years of delay the returned exiles, urged on by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah and backed by a decree of Darius, finish rebuilding the temple in Jerusalem. It is dedicated in the spring of 515 BC.

The exiles who returned under Zerubbabel and the priest Jeshua the High Priest set up the altar in Jerusalem and began to offer sacrifices. In the second year they laid the foundation of the temple. The people shouted for joy, and old men who had seen the first house wept aloud (Ezra 3).

Then the work stopped. People already settled in the land, who said they had worshipped Israel's God since Assyrian times, asked to share in the building and were refused. They opposed it for the rest of the reign of Cyrus, and nothing more was built until the second year of Darius I (Ezra 4:1–5, 24).

In that year two prophets spoke. Haggai asked the people why they lived in panelled houses while the house of God lay in ruins, and blamed their poor harvests on the neglect. Twenty-three days later Zerubbabel, Jeshua and the people were at work on the temple (Haggai 1). Zechariah began to prophesy two months after Haggai. In his visions the Lord returns to Jerusalem and the high priest is clothed in clean garments, and Zerubbabel, who laid the foundation, is promised that he will finish the house, "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit" (Zechariah 1:1, 16) (Zechariah 3:1–5) (Zechariah 4:6–10).

The Persian governor of the province Beyond the River, Tattenai, came to ask who had authorised the building and wrote to the king. A search of the archives turned up a memorandum of Cyrus's decree at Ecbatana. Darius ordered Tattenai to leave the work alone and to pay its costs, and the cost of the daily sacrifices, out of the royal revenue of the province (Ezra 5:3–6:12).

The house was finished on the third day of the month Adar in the sixth year of Darius. It was dedicated with sacrifices, the priests and Levites were set in their divisions, and the returned exiles kept the Passover the following month (Ezra 6:15–22).

Haggai admitted that the new building looked like nothing beside the old one and promised that its later glory would be greater (Haggai 2:3–9). This second temple was the centre of Jewish worship for nearly six centuries. It is the temple that Herod later rebuilt on a larger scale, in whose courts the Gospels set much of the teaching of Jesus (Luke 19:47; John 18:20), and that the Romans destroyed in AD 70.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Ezra dates the completion to the third day of Adar in the sixth year of Darius (Ezra 6:15). Darius became king in the autumn of 522 BC, as his own inscription records (Behistun Inscription i.13). By Babylonian reckoning his first full year began in the spring of 521 BC, so the sixth year ran from spring 516 to spring 515 BC, and Adar, its last month, began in March 515. The tables of R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956), give 12 March 515 BC. Some works give 516 BC, the year in which that regnal year began.

Two later accounts differ in detail. The Greek book of 1 Esdras has the twenty-third of Adar (1 Esdras 7:5), and Josephus puts the dedication in the ninth year of Darius (Josephus, Antiquities 11.106–107). The resumption of the work is dated to the day by Haggai, in the sixth month of Darius's second year, 520 BC (Haggai 1:1, 14–15).

Ezra 4:6–23 looks ahead to complaints made under the later kings Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes before the narrative returns, at 4:24, to the reign of Darius.

Primary sources

Scripture

Ezra 3; Ezra 4:1–5, 24; Haggai 1; Zechariah 1:1, 16; Zechariah 3:1–5; Zechariah 4:6–10; Ezra 5:3–6:12; Ezra 6:15–22; Haggai 2:3–9; Luke 19:47; John 18:20; Ezra 6:15; 1 Esdras 7:5; Haggai 1:1, 14–15

The Behistun Inscription Issued in the name of Darius I · c. 520–518 BC
i.13

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
11.106–107

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Zerubbabel, Jeshua the High Priest, Haggai, Zechariah, Darius I Threads Temple and Worship, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return 538 BC 211

LEADS TO

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem 458 BC 222
The Judean Temple at Elephantine 410–407 BC 234
Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple 167 BC 248

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return Before · 538 BC 211

The Judean Temple at Elephantine After · 410–407 BC 234

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant Before · c. 550–539 BC 204

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets After · c. 435 BC 230

← The Edict of Cyrus and the First Return Earlier · 538 BC
→ Esther and the Origin of Purim Later · 483–473 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Esther and the Origin of Purim

483–473 BC · Traditional date

The book of Esther tells how a Jewish queen of Persia and her cousin Mordecai turned back a decree to destroy the Jews of the empire. The feast of Purim keeps the memory of that deliverance.

The story is set in the citadel of Susa, under King Ahasuerus, "who reigned from India even to Ethiopia"; he is usually identified with Xerxes I. In his third year the king gave a great banquet and deposed his queen, Vashti, when she refused to appear before his guests (Esther 1:1–4, 10–21). In the seventh year he made Esther queen. She was a Jewish orphan brought up by her cousin Mordecai, and on his advice she had told no one what people she came from (Esther 2:5–10, 16–17).

The king then raised Haman the Agagite above all his officials. Mordecai would not bow to him. Haman resolved to destroy every Jew in the empire, cast lots, called pur, to fix the day, and obtained a royal decree for the thirteenth of the month Adar (Esther 3:1–13).

Mordecai sent word to Esther to plead with the king: "Who knows if you haven't come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" To approach the king unsummoned was punishable by death. She asked the Jews of Susa to fast for three days and went in (Esther 4:8–16). The king received her. At the second of two banquets she named Haman as the enemy of her people, and he was hanged on the gallows he had built for Mordecai (Esther 5:1–8) (Esther 7).

By the book's account a royal decree could not be revoked, so a second decree allowed the Jews to defend themselves. On the thirteenth of Adar they killed their enemies, and they rested and feasted on the fourteenth, in Susa on the fifteenth. Mordecai and Esther wrote to the Jews of every province to keep the two days each year with feasting, gifts of food to one another and gifts to the poor. The days were called Purim, after the lot (Esther 8:8–12) (Esther 9:1–2, 16–32).

The Hebrew book never names God. The ancient Greek translation adds prayers of Mordecai and Esther (Septuagint Esther 4:17, with the passages not in the Hebrew), and a note at its end says that Lysimachus, a man of Jerusalem, translated it and that it was delivered in the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra (Septuagint Esther 10:3, closing note). Josephus, about AD 93, retells the story and says that Jews throughout the world still kept the days and called them Purim (Josephus, Antiquities 11.292–295).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The dates are the book's own. The banquet falls in the third year of Ahasuerus, Esther becomes queen in the seventh, and the decree and its reversal belong to the twelfth (Esther 1:3; 2:16; 3:7). Ahasuerus is the Hebrew form of the Persian name that Greek writers give as Xerxes, and Ezra places him between Darius and Artaxerxes (Ezra 4:5–7). Xerxes I reigned from 486 to 465 BC, which gives 483, 479 and 474–473 BC. The Greek version of Esther and Josephus name the king Artaxerxes (Septuagint Esther 10:3, closing note) (Josephus, Antiquities 11.184).

Whether the story records events is disputed. No Persian or Greek narrative mentions Esther, Mordecai, Haman or the decrees, and Herodotus, the fullest narrative source for the reign, calls the wife of Xerxes Amestris (Herodotus, Histories 9.108–112). Many scholars therefore read the book as a story and not as a record of events: see Michael V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (1991), and Adele Berlin, Esther (JPS Bible Commentary, 2001). Others hold that it rests on real events. They point to its knowledge of the Persian court, to the extent of the empire, which matches Xerxes's own list of his lands (Xerxes, Daiva Inscription (XPh) §3), and to the gap between the third and seventh years, when Xerxes was away on his Greek campaign: see William H. Shea, "Esther and History", Andrews University Seminary Studies 14 (1976), pp. 227–246, and Edwin M. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (1990).

Outside the book, 2 Maccabees mentions the feast as "the day of Mordecai" (2 Maccabees 15:36).

Primary sources

Scripture

Esther 1:1–4, 10–21; Esther 2:5–10, 16–17; Esther 3:1–13; Esther 4:8–16; Esther 5:1–8; Esther 7; Esther 8:8–12; Esther 9:1–2, 16–32; Esther 1:3; 2:16; 3:7; Ezra 4:5–7; 2 Maccabees 15:36

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Esther 4:17, with the passages not in the Hebrew; Esther 10:3, closing note

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
11.292–295; 11.184

Histories Herodotus · c. 430–420 BC
9.108–112

The Daiva Inscription of Xerxes (XPh) Issued in the name of Xerxes I · Reign of Xerxes I, 486–465 BC
§3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Susa
Who Esther, Mordecai, Xerxes I
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Daniel at the Babylonian Court Before · c. 605–536 BC 189

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple After · 167 BC 248

← The Second Temple Is Completed Earlier · March 515 BC
→ Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem Later · 458 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem

458 BC · Estimated date

The priest and scribe Ezra comes from Babylon with a commission from the Persian king, confronts marriages with foreign wives, and reads the law of Moses aloud to the assembled people, who bind themselves to keep it.

Ezra was a priest of the line of Aaron and "a skilled scribe in the law of Moses". In the seventh year of King Artaxerxes I he went up from Babylon to Jerusalem with a company of priests, Levites and laypeople (Ezra 7:1–10). He carried a letter from the king, which the book quotes in Aramaic. It allowed any Israelite in the realm to go with him, sent silver and gold for the temple, freed the temple staff from tax, and charged Ezra to inquire into Judah and Jerusalem according to the law of his God and to appoint judges for those who lived by that law in the province Beyond the River (Ezra 7:11–26).

The party gathered at the river Ahava. Ezra had told the king that God protects those who seek him and was ashamed to ask for an escort, so they fasted, set out, and arrived safely four months after leaving Babylon. The treasure was weighed into the temple (Ezra 7:9; 8:15–34).

After this the leaders reported that many of the people, priests and Levites among them, had married women from the neighbouring peoples. Ezra tore his clothes and prayed a long confession (Ezra 9). An assembly was called in Jerusalem in the ninth month, in heavy rain. It agreed that each case should be examined, and within three months the cases had been heard. The men named pledged to send their foreign wives away (Ezra 10:1–19, 44).

The book of Nehemiah adds the scene for which Ezra is best remembered. On the first day of the seventh month the people gathered in the square by the Water Gate and asked him to bring the book of the law of Moses. He read from it from early morning until midday, standing on a wooden platform, while Levites explained what was read "so that they understood the reading". The people wept, were told to rejoice, and kept the feast of booths as they found it written (Nehemiah 8). Three weeks later they fasted, confessed their sins and put their names to a written agreement to keep the law: not to intermarry, to keep the Sabbath, and to support the temple with a yearly tax, firstfruits and tithes (Nehemiah 9:1–3, 38) (Nehemiah 10:28–39).

Josiah had read a book of the covenant to the people once, at a time of crisis (2 Kings 23:1–3). Here the law is read and explained to everyone, and the community defines itself by it. By the first century Moses was "read in the synagogues every Sabbath" (Acts 15:21), and a later Jewish book pictures Ezra dictating ninety-four sacred books by inspiration (2 Esdras 14:37–48).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Ezra left Babylon on the first day of the first month and reached Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month, in the seventh year of King Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:7–9). The text does not say which Artaxerxes. If it is Artaxerxes I (465–424 BC), the year is 458 BC and Ezra came thirteen years before Nehemiah, which is the order of the biblical books and the date given here. This is defended by H. G. M. Williamson, Ezra, Nehemiah (Word Biblical Commentary, 1985).

If it is Artaxerxes II (404–358 BC), the year is 398 BC and Ezra came after Nehemiah. This was proposed by Albin van Hoonacker, "Néhémie et Esdras", Le Muséon 9 (1890), and argued again by J. A. Emerton, "Did Ezra Go to Jerusalem in 428 B.C.?", Journal of Theological Studies 17 (1966), pp. 1–19. Its main supports are two. Ezra gives thanks for "a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem" (Ezra 9:9). And he stays in the room of Jehohanan son of Eliashib (Ezra 10:6), while Eliashib was high priest when Nehemiah built the wall (Nehemiah 3:1) and a Johanan was high priest in 407 BC (Elephantine petition to Bagohi verso, line 1). A third proposal emends "seventh" to "thirty-seventh" and gives 428 BC: John Bright, A History of Israel (3rd ed., 1981).

Against a late date, the book of Nehemiah names the two men together at the reading of the law and at the dedication of the wall (Nehemiah 8:9; 12:26, 36). The reading of the law has no year of its own; its place in the book sets it in the autumn after the wall was finished, 445 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture

Ezra 7:1–10; Ezra 7:11–26; Ezra 7:9; 8:15–34; Ezra 9; Ezra 10:1–19, 44; Nehemiah 8; Nehemiah 9:1–3, 38; Nehemiah 10:28–39; 2 Kings 23:1–3; Acts 15:21; 2 Esdras 14:37–48; Ezra 7:7–9; Ezra 9:9; Ezra 10:6; Nehemiah 3:1; Nehemiah 8:9; 12:26, 36

The Elephantine Petition to Bagohi (TAD A4.7) Jedaniah and the priests of the Jewish garrison at Elephantine · 25 November 407 BC

verso, line 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Babylon
Who Ezra, Artaxerxes I
Threads Scripture and Canon, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Temple Is Completed March 515 BC 214

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law 622 BC 176

LEADS TO

Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem 445 BC 226

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek c. 250 BC 244

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Josiah's Reform and the Book of the Law Before · 622 BC 176

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek After · c. 250 BC 244

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple Before · 587/586 BC 200

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets After · c. 435 BC 230

← Esther and the Origin of Purim Earlier · 483–473 BC
→ Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem Later · 445 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem

445 BC · Estimated date

Nehemiah, cupbearer to the Persian king, is sent to Judah as governor and rebuilds the ruined walls of Jerusalem in fifty-two days against the opposition of Sanballat of Samaria. He then reforms the city's debts, Sabbath and temple.

Nehemiah was cupbearer to King Artaxerxes I at Susa. In the king's twentieth year his brother Hanani brought word from Judah that the wall of Jerusalem was broken down and its gates burned. Some months later the king noticed his sadness, heard his request and sent him to rebuild the city, with letters to the governors west of the Euphrates, an order for timber and a mounted escort (Nehemiah 1:1–3, 11) (Nehemiah 2:1–9).

Three days after he arrived Nehemiah rode round the ruined walls by night. Then he put his plan to the leaders, and they agreed to build (Nehemiah 2:11–18). The high priest Eliashib and the priests began at the Sheep Gate, and the work was shared out section by section (Nehemiah 3:1–5). Sanballat the Horonite, Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arab mocked the builders and then planned an attack. From then on half of Nehemiah's men stood guard while the others worked, and the builders wore their swords (Nehemiah 2:19) (Nehemiah 4:1–18). Sanballat tried four times to draw Nehemiah out to a meeting and then sent an open letter accusing him of planning to make himself king (Nehemiah 6:1–9). The wall was finished in fifty-two days and dedicated with music and sacrifices (Nehemiah 6:15) (Nehemiah 12:27–30, 43).

Nehemiah was governor for twelve years. When the poor complained that they were losing their fields and children to creditors, he made the nobles give back the land and stop charging interest, and he himself did not draw the governor's food allowance (Nehemiah 5:1–18). After a visit to the king in the thirty-second year he returned to find a storeroom of the temple given over to Tobiah, the Levites unpaid, trade going on in Jerusalem on the Sabbath, and Jews married to women of Ashdod, Ammon and Moab. He dealt with each, and drove out a grandson of the high priest who had married Sanballat's daughter (Nehemiah 13:4–31).

Most of this is told in the first person, in what reads as Nehemiah's own report. A papyrus from Egypt names two of the people in it. In 407 BC the Jewish garrison at Elephantine wrote to the governor of Judah for help in rebuilding its temple. The letter mentions Johanan the high priest in Jerusalem and says that the writers had also appealed to the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 1; verso 1, 12–13).

About 180 BC Ben Sira praised Nehemiah as the one "who raised up for us the walls that were fallen" (Sirach 49:13). Jerusalem was again a walled city with a governor of its own, and the book sets the public reading of the law in the month after the wall was finished (Nehemiah 8:1–2).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Nehemiah dates his journey to the twentieth year of King Artaxerxes and his term as governor from the twentieth year to the thirty-second (Nehemiah 2:1; 5:14; 13:6). Three Persian kings bore that name. A letter written from Elephantine in Egypt in the seventeenth year of Darius II, 407 BC, shows which is meant. By then the Jews of Elephantine were writing to the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, and the high priest in Jerusalem was Johanan (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 1; verso 1, 12–13), whom the book of Nehemiah lists after Eliashib, the high priest of Nehemiah's own day, and Eliashib's son Joiada (Nehemiah 3:1; 12:10–11, 22). Nehemiah therefore served Artaxerxes I (465–424 BC), whose twentieth year ran from the spring of 445 BC. The wall was finished on the twenty-fifth of Elul (Nehemiah 6:15), early October 445 BC by the tables of R. A. Parker and W. H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 B.C.–A.D. 75 (1956).

One detail is unsettled. The book puts the month Chislev of the twentieth year before Nisan of the same year (Nehemiah 1:1; 2:1), which fits a year counted from the autumn but not the Persian year that began in spring. The news from Jerusalem may therefore have reached Nehemiah late in 446 or late in 445 BC, and the building may belong to 444; see H. G. M. Williamson, Ezra, Nehemiah (Word Biblical Commentary, 1985). Josephus, writing five centuries later, places Nehemiah under Xerxes and says that the wall took two years and four months (Josephus, Antiquities 11.159, 168, 179).

Primary sources

Scripture

Nehemiah 1:1–3, 11; Nehemiah 2:1–9; Nehemiah 2:11–18; Nehemiah 3:1–5; Nehemiah 2:19; Nehemiah 4:1–18; Nehemiah 6:1–9; Nehemiah 6:15; Nehemiah 12:27–30, 43; Nehemiah 5:1–18; Nehemiah 13:4–31; Sirach 49:13; Nehemiah 8:1–2; Nehemiah 2:1; 5:14; 13:6; Nehemiah 3:1; 12:10–11, 22; Nehemiah 1:1; 2:1

The Elephantine Petition to Bagohi (TAD A4.7) Jedaniah and the priests of the Jewish garrison at Elephantine · 25 November 407 BC
recto 1; verso 1, 12–13

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
11.159, 168, 179

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Susa
Who Nehemiah, Artaxerxes I, Sanballat

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem 458 BC 222

LEADS TO

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets c. 435 BC 230

← Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem Earlier · 458 BC
→ Malachi and the Close of the Prophets Later · c. 435 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets

c. 435 BC · Estimated date

The last book of the Twelve Prophets rebukes the priests and people of rebuilt Jerusalem and promises a messenger who will prepare the Lord's way, and the return of Elijah. The Gospels apply both to John the Baptist.

The book of Malachi is set in Jerusalem some time after the temple had been rebuilt. Its heading names the prophet only as Malachi, a word that means "my messenger"; the ancient Greek translation renders it "by the hand of his messenger" (Malachi 1:1) (Septuagint Malachi 1:1). The book is built as a series of disputes. God makes a charge, the hearers answer back, "How have we…?", and the charge is pressed home.

The priests are accused of despising the altar by offering blind, lame and sick animals, which they would not dare to present to their governor (Malachi 1:6–14). The men of Judah are accused of breaking faith with the wives of their youth and marrying "the daughter of a foreign god" (Malachi 2:10–16). The whole people is said to be robbing God by holding back tithes and offerings (Malachi 3:8–10). Some are saying that it is useless to serve God, since evildoers prosper (Malachi 2:17) (Malachi 3:13–15).

The answer is a promise and a warning. "Behold, I send my messenger, and he will prepare the way before me; and the Lord, whom you seek, will suddenly come to his temple." He will come like a refiner's fire, to purify the priesthood and to judge (Malachi 3:1–5). Those who fear the Lord are written in a book of memory, and for them "the sun of righteousness" will rise (Malachi 3:16–4:3). The book ends with a command to remember the law of Moses and a promise that Elijah the prophet will be sent before the day of the Lord, to turn the hearts of fathers and children to one another (Malachi 4:4–6).

Malachi stands last among the Twelve Prophets, which Ben Sira already knew as a collection (Sirach 49:10). Later Jewish writers looked back on this period as the end of prophecy. 1 Maccabees speaks of the time since prophets ceased to appear (1 Maccabees 9:27), and Josephus says that the history written after the reign of Artaxerxes was held in less esteem because the succession of prophets had failed (Josephus, Against Apion 1.40–41).

The Gospels take up both promises. Mark opens with the messenger who prepares the way (Mark 1:2–4). In Matthew Jesus applies the same verse to John the Baptist and adds, "this is Elijah, who is to come" (Matthew 11:10–14), and in Luke the angel says that John will go before the Lord "in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke 1:17). In John's Gospel the Baptist, asked whether he is Elijah, says that he is not (John 1:21).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The book names no king and gives no date. It assumes a temple in use and a governor in place of a king, and it uses for him the title that Haggai and Nehemiah give to the governors of Persian Judah (Malachi 1:8, 10) (Haggai 1:1) (Nehemiah 5:14). That puts it after the temple was finished in 515 BC. The abuses it attacks, marriages with foreign women, unpaid tithes and careless priests, are those that Nehemiah met on his second visit, after 433 BC (Nehemiah 13:10–12, 23–29).

Scholars therefore place it within a few decades of Nehemiah, with no agreement on the exact point. Pieter A. Verhoef, The Books of Haggai and Malachi (1987), sets it between Nehemiah's two terms, shortly after 433 BC. Andrew E. Hill, Malachi (Anchor Bible, 1998), argues from the language of the book for a date near 500 BC. The date shown follows the first view and could be several decades too late.

Primary sources

Scripture

Malachi 1:1; Malachi 1:6–14; Malachi 2:10–16; Malachi 3:8–10; Malachi 2:17; Malachi 3:13–15; Malachi 3:1–5; Malachi 3:16–4:3; Malachi 4:4–6; Sirach 49:10; 1 Maccabees 9:27; Mark 1:2–4; Matthew 11:10–14; Luke 1:17; John 1:21; Malachi 1:8, 10; Haggai 1:1; Nehemiah 5:14; Nehemiah 13:10–12, 23–29

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Malachi 1:1

Against Apion Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
1.40–41

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Malachi
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem 445 BC 226

LEADS TO

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan c. AD 28–29 299

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Second Temple Is Completed Before · March 515 BC 214

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan After · c. AD 28–29 299

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem Before · 458 BC 222

The Birth of Jesus After · c. 6–4 BC 286

← Nehemiah Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem Earlier · 445 BC
→ The Judean Temple at Elephantine Later · 410–407 BC

EXILE AND RETURN

The Judean Temple at Elephantine

410–407 BC · Firm date

Papyri from an island on Egypt's southern border show a garrison of Judeans with a temple of their own. Egyptian priests and the local commander destroy it in 410 BC, and in 407 BC the community asks the governor of Judah to back its rebuilding.

On the island of Elephantine in the Nile stood a fortress, and in it, under Persian rule, lived a community of Judeans. They had a temple there for their God, whose name the papyri write YHW. In a letter of 407 BC they say that their fathers built it in the days of the kings of Egypt, and that Cambyses found it standing when he entered the country (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 1–6, 13–14).

An earlier papyrus is a letter of instructions to the community. In the fifth year of Darius II, 419/418 BC, one Hananiah wrote to Jedaniah and his colleagues, "the Jewish garrison", that word had been sent from the king to Arsames. The surviving lines speak of the days from the fifteenth to the twenty-first of Nisan, of purity, and of leaven. The papyrus is broken; the word "Passover", which editors supply, is not preserved (Elephantine Passover letter recto 1–verso 4).

In Tammuz of Darius's fourteenth year, when Arsames had gone to the king, the priests of the god Khnum came to an agreement with Vidranga, the chief official there. Vidranga wrote to his son Naphaina, the garrison commander at Syene, who led Egyptians and other troops against the temple. They razed it, smashed its stone pillars and five gateways of hewn stone, burned the doors and the cedar roof, and took the gold and silver basins (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 4–13).

The community put on sackcloth and fasted. It wrote to Bagohi, the governor of Judah, to Jehohanan the high priest and the priests in Jerusalem, and to the nobles of the Jews, and got no reply (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 15–verso 2). Three years later Jedaniah and his fellow priests wrote to Bagohi again. Since the attack, they said, no meal-offering, incense or burnt offering had been made in the temple. They asked for a letter supporting its rebuilding, and added that they had sent the same appeal to Delaiah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 1, verso 2–13).

A memorandum records what Bagohi and Delaiah said: the "altar-house of the God of Heaven" at Elephantine was to be rebuilt on its site, and meal-offering and incense offered on its altar as before. It does not name burnt offering (Elephantine memorandum lines 1–11). In a draft on another papyrus five men, headed by a Jedaniah son of Gemariah, offer their lord a payment if the temple is rebuilt and no sheep, ox or goat is made a burnt offering there, only incense and meal-offering (Elephantine offer of payment lines 1–14).

These papyri, found on the island itself, show Judeans in Egypt with an altar of their own, seeking support in both Judah and Samaria. Deuteronomy restricts burnt offerings to the one place that the Lord chooses (Deuteronomy 12:13–14). Nehemiah names a Sanballat as his opponent, and the book lists a Johanan among the priests (Nehemiah 2:10) (Nehemiah 12:22–23); see Nehemiah rebuilds the walls.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The petition dates the attack to the month of Tammuz in the fourteenth year of King Darius and is itself dated the twentieth of Marheshvan in his seventeenth year (Elephantine petition to Bagohi recto 4, verso 13). The Berlin museum's record of the papyrus identifies the king as Darius II and converts the date of the letter to 25 November 407 BC. Tammuz of the fourteenth year, three years earlier, falls in the summer of 410 BC. A. Cowley's edition, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923), gives 408 BC for the petition, a year earlier than the conversion now used.

The memorandum of the reply and the offer of payment carry no date; the museum's database places them in or soon after 407 BC. The papyri cited here do not say whether the temple was rebuilt.

Primary sources

Scripture

Deuteronomy 12:13–14; Nehemiah 2:10; Nehemiah 12:22–23

The Elephantine Petition to Bagohi (TAD A4.7) Jedaniah and the priests of the Jewish garrison at Elephantine · 25 November 407 BC

recto 1–6, 13–14; recto 4–13; recto 15–verso 2; recto 1, verso 2–13; recto 4, verso 13

The Elephantine "Passover Letter" (TAD A4.1) Hananiah · 419/418 BC

recto 1–verso 4

The Elephantine Memorandum of Bagohi and Delaiah (TAD A4.9) Shortly after 407 BC

lines 1–11

The Elephantine Offer of Payment for the Temple (TAD A4.10) Jedaniah son of Gemariah and four others · c. 407 BC

lines 1–14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Elephantine
Who Jedaniah
Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

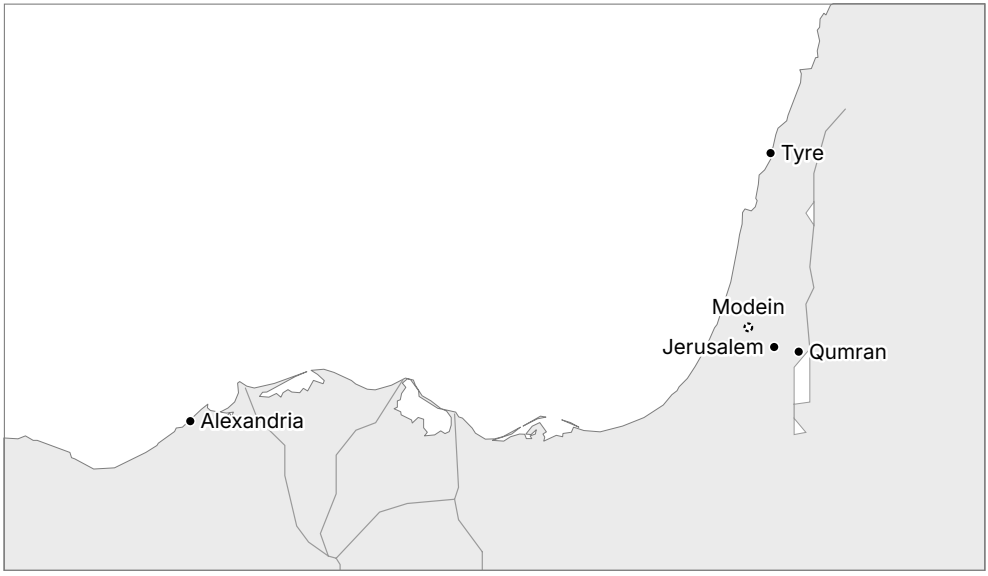
The Second Temple Is Completed March 515 BC 214

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Second Temple Is Completed Before · March 515 BC 214

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple After · 167 BC 248

← Malachi and the Close of the Prophets Earlier · c. 435 BC
→ Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East Later · 332 BC
TIMELINE



The Second Temple Period

c. 400–4 BC

Between the Testaments: Greek rule, the Maccabean revolt, the Hasmonean kingdom, Roman conquest and Herod. The Scriptures are translated into Greek.

The world of the New Testament takes shape here. Alexander brings the Greek language, the Septuagint gives Scripture to the Greek-speaking world, and the Maccabean crisis leaves a lasting mark on Jewish hope. Pharisees, Sadducees and the community of the Dead Sea Scrolls emerge, and Rome becomes the ruling power.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Rome

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East 332 BC 240

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek c. 250 BC 244

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple 167 BC 248
The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple 167–164 BC 253
The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls c. 150 BC – AD 68 258
Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans 142 BC 263
Pompey Takes Jerusalem 63 BC 268
Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea 40–37 BC 272
Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor 27 BC 276
Herod Rebuilds the Temple 20/19 BC 280

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East

332 BC · Firm date

Alexander of Macedon defeats the Persian king, takes Tyre and Gaza by siege and founds Alexandria in Egypt. Judea passes from Persian to Greek rule. Josephus, centuries later, tells of a visit to Jerusalem.

In the autumn of 333 BC Alexander the Great, king of Macedon, defeated the army of the Persian king Darius III at Issus in Cilicia. Darius fled, and his mother, wife and children were taken in his camp (Arrian, Anabasis 2.7–11). Persia had ruled Judah for two centuries, since Cyrus took Babylon (see Cyrus Takes Babylon).

Alexander marched down the Phoenician coast. Byblos and Sidon surrendered (Arrian, Anabasis 2.15–16). Tyre, a walled city on an island (Arrian, Anabasis 2.18), offered to obey him but would not let him enter to sacrifice to its god, whom Arrian calls the Tyrian Heracles (Arrian, Anabasis 2.15–16). Alexander built a mole from the mainland out to the island (Arrian, Anabasis 2.18). The city fell in the summer of 332 BC. Arrian counts about 8,000 Tyrians killed and some 30,000 people sold into slavery (Arrian, Anabasis 2.24). Gaza also resisted and was stormed; its men died fighting and its women and children were sold (Arrian, Anabasis 2.25–27). Josephus gives the length of the two sieges as seven months and two (Josephus, Antiquities 11.325).

The Persian governor of Egypt gave up the country without a battle. Alexander sacrificed at Memphis, sailed down the Nile, and on the coast beside Lake Mareotis marked out the walls, market and temples of a new city, Alexandria (Arrian, Anabasis 3.1).

Of Palestine Arrian says at this point that all of it except Gaza had already submitted (Arrian, Anabasis 2.25–27). Josephus, writing more than four centuries later, tells a story that Arrian does not have. During the siege of Tyre, he says, the high priest refused Alexander's demand for troops and supplies, because he had given Darius his oath not to bear arms against him (Josephus, Antiquities 11.317–319). After Gaza, the story goes on, the king marched on Jerusalem. The high priest, whom Josephus names Jaddua, was instructed in a dream and went out to meet him with the priests in their vestments and the people in white. Alexander bowed before the divine name on the high priest's headdress and said that he had seen such a figure in a dream in Macedonia. He sacrificed in the temple, was shown the book of Daniel, and granted the Jews the right to live by their ancestral laws and to pay no tribute in the seventh year (Josephus, Antiquities 11.325–339).

In 331 BC Alexander defeated Darius for the last time near Arbela (Arrian, Anabasis 3.15), and in 323 BC he died at Babylon (Arrian, Anabasis 7.23–26) (Arrian, Anabasis 7.28). 1 Maccabees opens with his conquests and says that his officers took crowns after him (1 Maccabees 1:1–9), and Daniel pictures a great horn broken and replaced by four (Daniel 8:5–8, 20–22). Judea fell first to the Ptolemies of Egypt (Josephus, Antiquities 12.1–9) and later to the Seleucid kings of Syria (Josephus, Antiquities 12.129–133). Greek kings ruled it for the next 190 years, until the Hasmoneans won its independence (see Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans). Under them the law of Moses was translated into Greek in Egypt (see the Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek), and the adoption of Greek ways in Jerusalem itself opened the crisis under Antiochus IV (1 Maccabees 1:10–15).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Arrian dates the fall of Tyre to the Athenian month Hecatombaion in the archonship of Anicetus (Arrian, Anabasis 2.24), which is July or August of 332 BC, and the battle of Issus to the month Maimacterion of the archon-year before, about November 333 BC (Arrian, Anabasis 2.11). For the conversion of these two dates see A. B. Bosworth, A Historical Commentary on Arrian's History of Alexander, vol. 1 (1980), which covers books 1–3. Arrian puts Alexander's death in the 114th Olympiad, in the archonship of Hegesias, which is 323 BC (Arrian, Anabasis 7.28). He wrote in the second century AD, but he worked from the histories of Ptolemy and Aristobulus, who served in the campaign (Arrian, Anabasis preface).

The visit to Jerusalem is another matter. Josephus tells it about AD 93, more than four hundred years after the event (Josephus, Antiquities 11.325–339). Arrian does not mention the Jews, and he has Alexander march from Gaza straight to Egypt, reaching Pelusium on the seventh day (Arrian, Anabasis 3.1). The story also has Alexander shown the book of Daniel, which many scholars date to the second century BC (see Daniel at the Babylonian Court). Most historians treat the visit as a later legend: see Shaye J. D. Cohen, "Alexander the Great and Jaddus the High Priest According to Josephus", AJS Review 7–8 (1982–83), pp. 41–68. That Judea came under Alexander in 332 BC with the rest of the region is not in doubt (Arrian, Anabasis 2.25–27).

1 Maccabees, cited here for Alexander's successors, is counted as canonical Scripture by the Catholic Church, as defined at Trent (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and by the Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem of 1672 (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). Protestant churches do not count it as canonical Scripture; the Church of England lists it among the books that are read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not used to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6).

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Maccabees 1:1–9; Daniel 8:5–8, 20–22; 1 Maccabees 1:10–15

The Anabasis of Alexander Arrian · 2nd century AD
2.7–11; 2.15–16; 2.18; 2.24; 2.25–27; 3.1; 3.15; 7.23–26; 7.28; 2.11; preface

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
11.325; 11.317–319; 11.325–339; 12.1–9; 12.129–133

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Tyre, Alexandria, Jerusalem
Who Alexander the Great

In context

LEADS TO

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek c. 250 BC 244

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple 167 BC 248

← The Judean Temple at Elephantine Earlier · 410–407 BC
→ The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek Later · c. 250 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek

c. 250 BC · Estimated date

Jews in Egypt translate the law of Moses into Greek, by tradition at Alexandria under Ptolemy II, and the other books follow. This version, the Septuagint, is the form in which most early Christians read the Old Testament.

After Alexander the Great, Egypt was ruled from Alexandria by Greek kings, the Ptolemies. The Letter of Aristeas says that the first of them, Ptolemy son of Lagus, brought a hundred thousand Jews into Egypt as captives and soldiers (Letter of Aristeas 12–14).

The same Letter tells how the law of Moses came to be translated. Its author presents himself as an official of Ptolemy II. Demetrius of Phalerum, in charge of the royal library, tells the king that the laws of the Jews deserve a place in it but must first be translated (Letter of Aristeas 9–11). The king writes to the high priest Eleazar in Jerusalem, who sends seventy-two elders, six from each tribe, with a copy of the law (Letter of Aristeas 35–50). The king receives them at Alexandria and bows before the scrolls (Letter of Aristeas 172–180). They are taken to a quiet house on the island of Pharos, where they work each day, compare their drafts and agree on a text. The work is finished in seventy-two days (Letter of Aristeas 301–307). The translation is read to the Jewish community, which approves it and lays a curse on anyone who alters it (Letter of Aristeas 308–311).

Later writers repeat the story and add to it. Josephus retells the Letter at length and speaks of "the seventy elders" (Josephus, Antiquities 12.11–118). From that round number the translation takes its name, the Septuagint, "the Seventy". Philo of Alexandria, in the first century AD, says that the translators wrote as if inspired, each using the same words, and that Jews and others still kept a yearly festival on Pharos in memory of the work (Philo, Life of Moses 2.37–44 (Yonge, book 2, chapter VII, pp. 82–83)). About AD 180 the Christian bishop Irenaeus tells of seventy elders whom the king kept apart from one another and who all produced the same translation, word for word. He applies the story to all the Scriptures, where the Letter speaks only of the law (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.21.1–2).

The other books followed. The grandson of Ben Sira, who translated his grandfather's book in Egypt late in the second century BC, could already speak of the law, the prophets and the rest of the books as read in Greek, and he remarks that they differ not a little from the original (Septuagint Sirach, prologue).

The New Testament was written in Greek, and its writers often quote the Old Testament in the wording of the Septuagint. Hebrews cites a psalm in the form "you prepared a body for me" (Hebrews 10:5), which is the reading of the Greek Psalter (Septuagint Psalm 39:7 (Psalm 40:6 in English Bibles)); the Hebrew has "You have opened my ears" (Psalm 40:6). Irenaeus defends the Septuagint's "virgin" at Isaiah 7:14 against newer Greek versions that read "young woman" (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.21.1–2), the verse Matthew quotes of the birth of Jesus (Matthew 1:22–23).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No contemporary record of the translation survives. The Letter of Aristeas places it under the son of Ptolemy son of Lagus (Letter of Aristeas 12–14), that is Ptolemy II Philadelphus, who reigned from 285 to 246 BC. The Letter is written as if by a Greek courtier of that king, but scholars agree that its author was an Alexandrian Jew of the second century BC, a century or more after the reign he describes: see Benjamin G. Wright III, The Letter of Aristeas (2015). Its story is therefore tradition, not a report.

That the five books of Moses were put into Greek in Egypt in the third century BC is nevertheless the general view. The Greek of the translation matches that of Egyptian papyri of that century: see John A. L. Lee, A Lexical Study of the Septuagint Version of the Pentateuch (1983), and Jennifer M. Dines, The Septuagint (2004). The date of about 250 BC stands for that judgment.

Two fixed points come later. The translator of Sirach says that he came to Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of King Euergetes and that the law, the prophets and the other books could by then be compared in Greek and Hebrew (Septuagint Sirach, prologue). Only Ptolemy VIII Euergetes reigned so long, and his thirty-eighth year is 132 BC. And fragments of a Greek Deuteronomy copied in Egypt in the second century BC survive (Papyrus Rylands 458). The remaining books were translated over the following two centuries (see Dines).

Primary sources

Scripture

Hebrews 10:5; Psalm 40:6; Matthew 1:22–23

The Letter of Aristeas 2nd century BC
12–14; 9–11; 35–50; 172–180; 301–307; 308–311

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
12.11–118

On the Life of Moses Philo of Alexandria · first half of the 1st century AD
2.37–44 (Yonge, book 2, chapter VII, pp. 82–83)

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.21.1–2

The Septuagint 3rd–2nd century BC
Sirach, prologue; Psalm 39:7 (Psalm 40:6 in English Bibles)

Papyrus Rylands 458 2nd century BC
digitalcollections.manchester.ac.uk

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Alexandria
Who Ptolemy II
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East 332 BC 240

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem 458 BC 222

LEADS TO

Origen and the School of Alexandria c. AD 203–254 536

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Ezra Brings the Law to Jerusalem Before · 458 BC 222

The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls After · c. 150 BC – AD 68 258

← Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East Earlier · 332 BC
→ Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple Later · 167 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple

167 BC · Estimated date

The Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes plunders the temple in Jerusalem, forbids the practice of the Jewish law on pain of death and has a pagan altar set up on the altar of burnt offering.

Antiochus IV, called Epiphanes, became king of the Seleucid empire, which then ruled Judea (1 Maccabees 1:10). Jason, brother of the high priest Onias, bought the high priesthood from him and paid for leave to build a gymnasium in Jerusalem and to enrol its people as citizens of Antioch. Three years later a rival, Menelaus, outbid him (2 Maccabees 4:7–10, 23–26) (1 Maccabees 1:11–15).

Antiochus invaded Egypt, and on his way back he entered the sanctuary and carried off the golden altar, the lampstand, the table and the hidden treasures (1 Maccabees 1:16–24). When he invaded Egypt again, the Roman envoy Popilius Laenas met him with the senate's order to end the war, drew a circle round him and told him to answer before he stepped out of it. Antiochus gave way (Polybius, Histories 29.27). Daniel speaks of "ships of Kittim" that come against the king, who then turns in rage against the holy covenant (Daniel 11:29–30). According to 2 Maccabees, Jason attacked Jerusalem on a false report that the king was dead. Antiochus took it for a revolt, stormed the city and entered the temple with Menelaus as his guide (2 Maccabees 5:5–16). Two years after the plundering, 1 Maccabees says, a royal officer fell on the city, pulled down its walls and made the city of David a citadel, whose garrison threatened the sanctuary (1 Maccabees 1:29–36).

Then the king forbade the practice of the Jewish law. Burnt offerings, sabbaths, festivals and circumcision were banned on pain of death, and the towns of Judah were ordered to sacrifice at new altars, one by one (1 Maccabees 1:41–51). On the fifteenth of Chislev "an abomination of desolation" was built on the altar of burnt offering, and on the twenty-fifth sacrifice was offered on it. Scrolls of the law were torn up and burned, and women who had circumcised their sons were put to death with their babies (1 Maccabees 1:54–61). 2 Maccabees says that the temple was renamed for Olympian Zeus (2 Maccabees 6:1–5). Josephus, writing some 260 years later, follows 1 Maccabees and adds that the king had pigs sacrificed on the altar (Josephus, Antiquities 12.248–256).

2 Maccabees tells of the aged scribe Eleazar, and of seven brothers and their mother, who died under torture rather than eat pork. One of the brothers says that the King of the world will raise them to everlasting life (2 Maccabees 6:18–31) (2 Maccabees 7:1–9, 39–41). Hebrews, in its list of the faithful, speaks of those who "were tortured, not accepting their deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection" (Hebrews 11:35), words usually taken to refer to these martyrs.

Daniel describes forces that profane the sanctuary, take away the daily offering and "set up the abomination that makes desolate" (Daniel 11:31). The phrase returns in the Gospels, where Jesus uses it of a desolation still to come (Mark 13:14). The persecution set off the revolt of the Maccabees; see the Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

1 Maccabees dates by the Seleucid era, "the kingdom of the Greeks", which was counted from 312/311 BC. It puts the king's accession in year 137, his plundering of the temple in year 143, and the altar on the fifteenth of Chislev in year 145 (1 Maccabees 1:10, 20, 54). Chislev falls in November and December. If the year is counted from the spring of 311 BC, as the book is generally thought to count for Jewish events, the desecration falls in December 167 BC: so Elias Bickerman, The God of the Maccabees (1937; English translation 1979), and Jonathan A. Goldstein, I Maccabees (Anchor Bible, 1976). If the Jewish dates are counted from the spring of 312 BC, the date is a year earlier, December 168 BC: so Lester L. Grabbe, "Maccabean Chronology: 167–164 or 168–165 BCE", Journal of Biblical Literature 110 (1991), pp. 59–74.

The two books of Maccabees are the main sources. They are counted as canonical Scripture by the Catholic Church, as defined at Trent (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and by the Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem of 1672 (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). Protestant churches do not count them as canonical Scripture; the Church of England lists them among the books that are read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not used to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6). 1 Maccabees carries its story down to John Hyrcanus (1 Maccabees 16:23–24). 2 Maccabees says that it abridges a five-volume history by Jason of Cyrene (2 Maccabees 2:23). The two differ on the order of events: 1 Maccabees puts the plundering of the temple after the king's first Egyptian campaign, 2 Maccabees after his second (2 Maccabees 5:1, 11–16).

Daniel 11 follows these events closely. Many scholars conclude that it was written during the persecution; others read it as prophecy from the sixth century BC. See Daniel at the Babylonian Court.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Maccabees 1:10; 2 Maccabees 4:7–10, 23–26; 1 Maccabees 1:11–15; 1 Maccabees 1:16–24; Daniel 11:29–30; 2 Maccabees 5:5–16; 1 Maccabees 1:29–36; 1 Maccabees 1:41–51; 1 Maccabees 1:54–61; 2 Maccabees 6:1–5; 2 Maccabees 6:18–31; 2 Maccabees 7:1–9, 39–41; Hebrews 11:35; Daniel 11:31; Mark 13:14; 1 Maccabees 1:10, 20, 54; 1 Maccabees 16:23–24; 2 Maccabees 2:23; 2 Maccabees 5:1, 11–16

The Histories Polybius · c. 150–118 BC
29.27

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
12.248–256

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Antiochus IV
Threads Temple and Worship, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Temple Is Completed March 515 BC 214

Alexander the Great Conquers the Near East 332 BC 240

LEADS TO

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple 167–164 BC 253

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Judean Temple at Elephantine Before · 410–407 BC 234

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple After · 167–164 BC 253

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Esther and the Origin of Purim Before · 483–473 BC 218

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple After · 167–164 BC 253

← The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek Earlier · c. 250 BC
→ The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple Later · 167–164 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple

167–164 BC · Estimated date

The priest Mattathias and his sons take up arms against the decrees of Antiochus IV. Judas Maccabeus defeats the king's generals, cleanses the temple and rededicates the altar, an event kept each year as the feast of Dedication, Hanukkah.

When the king's officers came to the village of Modein to enforce the pagan sacrifice, they called first on Mattathias, a priest of the family of Joarib, from Jerusalem, who lived there with his five sons, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar and Jonathan. He refused. When another Jew stepped forward to sacrifice, Mattathias killed him on the altar, killed the king's officer and pulled the altar down. He cried out, "Whosoever is zealous for the law, and maintains the covenant, let him come forth after me", and fled to the hills with his sons (1 Maccabees 2:1–5, 15– 28). Josephus traces his descent from an ancestor named Asamoneus (Josephus, Antiquities 12.265), the origin of the family's later name, the Hasmoneans.

About a thousand people who had hidden in the wilderness were attacked on a sabbath, would not fight on that day, and were killed. Mattathias and his companions resolved that they would defend themselves if attacked on the sabbath (1 Maccabees 2:29–41). Joined by a group called the Hasideans, they pulled down altars and circumcised boys by force (1 Maccabees 2:42–48). Mattathias died in the following year, naming Simon as the brothers' counsellor and Judas as their commander (1 Maccabees 2:65–70).

Judas Maccabeus fought by surprise and at night (2 Maccabees 8:1–7). He defeated the forces of Apollonius and of Seron (1 Maccabees 3:10–24). Antiochus, short of money, marched east and left the regent Lysias to deal with Judea. Judas routed the army Lysias sent to Emmaus, and the next year fought Lysias himself at Bethzur, after which Lysias withdrew to Antioch (1 Maccabees 3:27–40) (1 Maccabees 4:1–35).

Judas and his men then went up to Mount Zion. They found the sanctuary deserted, the altar profaned, the gates burned and bushes growing in the courts. Priests cleansed the holy place. The defiled altar was taken apart and its stones were stored "until there should come a prophet" to say what to do with them, and a new altar was built of uncut stones. On the twenty-fifth of Chislev, the anniversary of the first pagan sacrifice, the lamps were lit and sacrifice was offered. The people kept the dedication for eight days, and it was decreed that the days should be kept every year (1 Maccabees 4:36–59). 2 Maccabees adds that they celebrated in the manner of the feast of Booths, carrying branches and palms (2 Maccabees 10:1–8). Josephus says that in his day the festival was called "Lights" (Josephus, Antiquities 12.319–325).

The feast is Hanukkah, the Hebrew word for dedication. The Gospel of John places Jesus in the temple at "the Feast of the Dedication", in winter (John 10:22–23). The war itself went on. The Seleucid garrison still held the citadel in Jerusalem (1 Maccabees 6:18–20), and Judas was killed in battle a few years later (1 Maccabees 9:3, 18). His brothers Jonathan and Simon carried the struggle on to independence; see Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

1 Maccabees dates by the Seleucid era, counted from 312/311 BC. The altar was profaned in Chislev of year 145, Mattathias died in year 146, and the new altar was dedicated on the twenty-fifth of Chislev in year 148 (1 Maccabees 1:54) (1 Maccabees 2:70) (1 Maccabees 4:52). On the usual reckoning, which counts the years of Jewish events from the spring of 311 BC, that is December 167 to December 164 BC: so Jonathan A. Goldstein, I Maccabees (Anchor Bible, 1976). Counting the Jewish dates from the spring of 312 BC puts everything a year earlier, December 168 to December 165 BC: so Lester L. Grabbe, "Maccabean Chronology: 167–164 or 168–165 BCE", Journal of Biblical Literature 110 (1991), pp. 59–74.

The sources differ on how long the temple lay desecrated. 1 Maccabees and Josephus's Antiquities make it three years to the day (1 Maccabees 4:52–54) (Josephus, Antiquities 12.319–325), 2 Maccabees two years (2 Maccabees 10:3), and Josephus's earlier Jewish War three years and six months (Josephus, Jewish War 1.32). They also differ on whether Antiochus died before the rededication (2 Maccabees 9:28–10:5) or after it (1 Maccabees 6:5–16).

The two books of Maccabees are the main sources. 1 Maccabees is usually dated about two generations after the revolt (Goldstein puts it in the reign of Alexander Jannaeus, 103–76 BC), and 2 Maccabees says that it abridges an earlier history by Jason of Cyrene (2 Maccabees 2:23). They are counted as canonical Scripture by the Catholic Church, as defined at Trent (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and by the Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem of 1672 (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). Protestant churches do not count them as canonical Scripture; the Church of England lists them among the books that are read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not used to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6). Josephus, who retells 1 Maccabees, wrote some 260 years after the revolt.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Maccabees 2:1–5, 15–28; 1 Maccabees 2:29–41; 1 Maccabees 2:42–48; 1 Maccabees 2:65–70; 2 Maccabees 8:1–7; 1 Maccabees 3:10–24; 1 Maccabees 3:27–40; 1 Maccabees 4:1–35; 1 Maccabees 4:36–59; 2 Maccabees 10:1–8; John 10:22–23; 1 Maccabees 6:18–20; 1 Maccabees 9:3, 18; 1 Maccabees 1:54; 1 Maccabees 2:70; 1 Maccabees 4:52; 1 Maccabees 4:52–54; 2 Maccabees 10:3; 2 Maccabees 9:28–10:5; 1 Maccabees 6:5–16; 2 Maccabees 2:23

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
12.265; 12.319–325

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
1.32

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Modein, Jerusalem
Who Mattathias, Judas Maccabeus
Threads Temple and Worship, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple 167 BC 248

LEADS TO

The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls c. 150 BC – AD 68 258
Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans 142 BC 263

Herod Rebuilds the Temple 20/19 BC 280

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple Before · 167 BC 248

Pompey Takes Jerusalem After · 63 BC 268

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple Before · 167 BC 248

The Execution of John the Baptist After · c. AD 28–32 319

← Antiochus IV Desecrates the Temple Earlier · 167 BC
→ The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls Later · c. 150 BC – AD 68

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls

c. 150 BC – AD 68 · Estimated date

Caves at Qumran, by the Dead Sea, preserve biblical scrolls and the writings of a Jewish movement that lived under a strict common rule. Most scholars identify it with the Essenes described by Josephus and Pliny; some dispute this.

Between 1947 and 1956 the remains of hundreds of manuscripts were found in eleven caves in the cliffs near Qumran, on the north-west shore of the Dead Sea (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Discovery Sites). They date from the third century BC to the first century AD. Some are copies of the books of the Hebrew Bible. Others are Jewish religious writings of the period, and about a quarter of these seem to be the work of one community: its rules, its commentaries on Scripture and its hopes for the end of the age (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Introduction).

The Community Rule is that group's own handbook. It lays down how members were admitted, how they ate together and how offences were punished. It teaches that humanity is divided between the righteous and the wicked and that all things are predestined (Community Rule 1QS, Israel Museum description) (Community Rule 4Q258, description). One passage, in its rules for the community's instructor, speaks of a time for "clearing the way" in the wilderness, which the translator takes to mean the study of the law (Community Rule 4Q258, translated by E. Qimron (compare 1QS 9.19–20)). The words echo Isaiah's call to prepare the way of the Lord in the wilderness (Isaiah 40:3), the verse the Gospels apply to John the Baptist (Mark 1:2–4).

The Damascus Document tells how the movement began. In the "end of the wrath", it says, 390 years after Nebuchadnezzar, God caused a root to grow from Israel and Aaron. For twenty years they groped like blind men, until God raised up for them "a teacher of righteousness" (Damascus Document CD 1.5–11). It speaks of those who went out from the land of Judah and entered "the New Covenant in the land of Damascus" (Damascus Document CD 6.5, 19), and it makes rules for members who live in camps, marry and have children (Damascus Document CD 7.6–7).

Greek and Roman readers knew of such a group as the Essenes. Josephus, who names them beside the Pharisees and Sadducees, describes men who held their property in common, bathed before a common meal, kept the sabbath with great strictness and admitted new members only after three years of testing. Most did not marry, and they lived in many towns (Josephus, Jewish War 2.119–161). He counts about four thousand of them (Josephus, Antiquities 18.18–22). Pliny the Elder, writing in the AD 70s, places a settlement of Essenes west of the Dead Sea, with En-gedi "below" them (Pliny, Natural History 5.73 (5.15 in Bostock and Riley)). That the people of the scrolls were Essenes is an inference from these descriptions, widely but not universally accepted (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Introduction); see the dating note.

The scrolls contain copies of the books of the Hebrew Bible more than a thousand years older than those known before (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Introduction), among them an almost complete Isaiah of about 125 BC (Great Isaiah Scroll Israel Museum description). And they show, from its own writings, a Jewish movement that was still active in the lifetime of Jesus and that spoke, as the New Testament does, of preparing the way in the wilderness and of a new covenant (Jeremiah 31:31) (Luke 22:20). No Christian writing was found among the scrolls (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Historical Background).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

None of the community's own writings gives a date. The Damascus Document places its beginnings 390 years after Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, followed by twenty years before the Teacher of Righteousness appeared (Damascus Document CD 1.5–11). Counted literally that leads to the early second century BC, but the figure repeats Ezekiel's 390 years (Ezekiel 4:5) and is often read as symbolic. The earliest setting in which Josephus mentions the Essenes is his account of the 140s BC (Josephus, Antiquities 13.171–173). The Cave 1 copy of the Community Rule was written about 100–75 BC (Community Rule 1QS, Israel Museum description), and the scrolls as a whole range from the third century BC to the first century AD (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Introduction).

The dates of the settlement at Qumran come from excavation. Roland de Vaux, who dug the site in 1951–1956, put the arrival of the community in the later second century BC and its end in AD 68: Archaeology and the Dead Sea Scrolls (1973). Jodi Magness, The Archaeology of Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls (2002), brings the beginning down to about 100–50 BC. The end is tied to the Roman campaign of AD 68, when Josephus has Vespasian at Jericho and on the shore of the Dead Sea (Josephus, Jewish War 4.449–451, 477).

That the people of the scrolls were Essenes is the majority view, argued for example by James C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (2nd ed., 2010). Lawrence H. Schiffman, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls (1994), stresses the Sadducean character of their law, and Norman Golb, Who Wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls? (1995), holds that the scrolls came from libraries in Jerusalem and had no link with the site.

Primary sources

Scripture

Isaiah 40:3; Mark 1:2–4; Jeremiah 31:31; Luke 22:20; Ezekiel 4:5

The Dead Sea Scrolls from the Qumran Caves 3rd century BC – 1st century AD
Leon Levy Digital Library, Discovery Sites; Leon Levy Digital Library, Introduction; Leon Levy Digital Library, Historical Background

The Community Rule (1QS) Copy of c. 100–75 BC
1QS, Israel Museum description; 4Q258, description; 4Q258, translated by E. Qimron (compare 1QS 9.19–20)

The Damascus Document 2nd–1st century BC; oldest copy 1st century BC
CD 1.5–11; CD 6.5, 19; CD 7.6–7

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.119–161; 4.449–451, 477

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.18–22; 13.171–173

Natural History Pliny the Elder · AD 77
5.73 (5.15 in Bostock and Riley)

The Great Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa[a]) c. 125 BC
Israel Museum description

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Qumran
Threads Scripture and Canon, Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple 167–164 BC 253

LEADS TO

The Dead Sea Scrolls Are Discovered 1947 1394

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek Before · c. 250 BC 244

The Letters of Paul After · c. AD 50–60 424

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Antony Withdraws to the Desert After · c. AD 270–285

549

← The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple Earlier · 167–164 BC

→ Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans Later · 142 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans

142 BC · Firm date

Simon, the last of the Maccabee brothers, wins freedom from Seleucid tribute and is made high priest and ruler by a national assembly. His son John Hyrcanus enlarges the state by conquest. Judea is ruled by its own priest-princes for some eighty years.

Judas Maccabeus died in battle, and his brother Jonathan took his place (1 Maccabees 9:18, 28–31). One of two rivals for the Seleucid throne appointed him high priest, and he first officiated at the feast of Booths in the 160th year, 152 BC (1 Maccabees 10:1–2, 15–21). He was later seized by treachery and killed by the usurper Tryphon (1 Maccabees 12:46–48) (1 Maccabees 13:23). The people then acclaimed the last of the brothers, Simon Thassi, as their leader (1 Maccabees 13:1–9).

Simon took the side of King Demetrius II against Tryphon, and Demetrius in return cancelled the tribute owed by the Jews. In the 170th year, says 1

Maccabees, "was the yoke of the heathen taken away from Israel", and the people began to date their contracts by the years of Simon, "the great high priest and captain and leader of the Jews" (1 Maccabees 13:34–42). The next year the Seleucid garrison that had held the citadel in Jerusalem since the days of Antiochus IV was starved out. Simon entered it with palm branches, harps and hymns (1 Maccabees 13:49–52).

In the third year a great assembly of priests, people and elders recorded its decision on bronze tablets set up on Mount Zion. Simon was to be their leader and high priest "forever, until there should arise a faithful prophet", to command the army and to wear purple and gold (1 Maccabees 14:27–47). Rome renewed the friendship it had made with his brothers (1 Maccabees 14:16–19).

Simon was murdered at a banquet near Jericho by his son-in-law, and his son John Hyrcanus succeeded him as high priest (1 Maccabees 16:11–24). There 1 Maccabees ends, and Josephus becomes the only narrative. He reports that Antiochus VII besieged Jerusalem and that Hyrcanus bought peace (Josephus, Antiquities 13.236–248). After that king died, Hyrcanus took Shechem and Mount Gerizim, where the Samaritan temple stood, and conquered the Idumeans to the south, who might stay if they accepted circumcision and the Jewish law (Josephus, Antiquities 13.254–258). Josephus also tells how Hyrcanus, once a disciple of the Pharisees, broke with them at the urging of a Sadducee friend (Josephus, Antiquities 13.288–298). On his death, Josephus says, his son Aristobulus was the first of the family to put on a crown (Josephus, Antiquities 13.299–301).

The Hasmoneans thus joined the high priesthood to political rule and then to kingship, though they were a priestly family and not of David's line (1 Maccabees 2:1). A psalm written in Jerusalem after the Roman conquest accuses rulers who "laid waste the throne of David" and prays for a king who is David's son (Psalms of Solomon 17). The Pharisees and Sadducees whom the Gospels show disputing with Jesus appear as rival parties in Josephus's account of these years (Josephus, Antiquities 13.288–298) (Matthew 22:23, 34). And the Idumeans whom Hyrcanus brought into the Jewish people were the nation of Antipater, the father of Herod (Josephus, Antiquities 14.8–9). Independence ended when Rome stepped into a quarrel between two brothers of the family; see Pompey Takes Jerusalem.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

1 Maccabees says that "the yoke of the heathen" was taken from Israel in the 170th year of the Seleucid era and that documents were then dated by the first year of Simon (1 Maccabees 13:41–42). The era was counted from 312/311 BC, so the 170th year is 143/142 BC, and the grant of freedom from tribute is placed in 142 BC. Josephus gives the same figure of 170 years (Josephus, Antiquities 13.213–214). The citadel fell in the second month of year 171, the spring of 141 BC, and the assembly that confirmed Simon met in year 172, 140 BC (1 Maccabees 13:51) (1 Maccabees 14:27). Simon was killed in the eleventh month of year 177, about February of 134 BC (1 Maccabees 16:14).

For Simon the source is 1 Maccabees, which is favourable to the family and is generally dated to the time of his son John Hyrcanus or soon after; Jonathan A. Goldstein, I Maccabees (Anchor Bible, 1976), puts it under Hyrcanus's son Alexander Jannaeus. The book is counted as canonical Scripture by the Catholic Church, as defined at Trent (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and by the Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem of 1672 (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). Protestant churches do not count it as canonical Scripture; the Church of England lists it among the books that are read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not used to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6). For John Hyrcanus the only narrative is that of Josephus, who wrote more than two hundred years later and drew on earlier historians such as Nicolaus of Damascus, whom he names (Josephus, Antiquities 13.249–251). In the psalm quoted at the end, the rulers who usurped David's throne are not named; that they are the Hasmoneans is the usual reading (Kenneth Atkinson, I Cried to the Lord, 2004). Josephus gives Hyrcanus thirty-one years (Josephus, Antiquities 13.299–301), which puts his death in 104 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Maccabees 9:18, 28–31; 1 Maccabees 10:1–2, 15–21; 1 Maccabees 12:46–48; 1 Maccabees 13:23; 1 Maccabees 13:1–9; 1 Maccabees 13:34–42; 1 Maccabees 13:49–52; 1 Maccabees 14:27–47; 1 Maccabees 14:16–19; 1 Maccabees 16:11–24; 1 Maccabees 2:1; Matthew 22:23, 34; 1 Maccabees 13:41–42; 1 Maccabees 13:51; 1 Maccabees 14:27; 1 Maccabees 16:14

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
13.236–248; 13.254–258; 13.288–298; 13.299–301; 14.8–9; 13.213–214; 13.249–251

The Psalms of Solomon c. 63–40 BC
17

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Simon Thassi, John Hyrcanus
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple 167–164 BC 253

LEADS TO

Pompey Takes Jerusalem 63 BC 268

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant Before · c. 550–539 BC 204

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea After · 40–37 BC 272

← The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls Earlier · c. 150 BC – AD 68

→ Pompey Takes Jerusalem Later · 63 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Pompey Takes Jerusalem

63 BC · Firm date

Called in by two Hasmonean brothers who are fighting for the throne, the Roman general Pompey storms the temple mount and enters the sanctuary. Judea loses its independence and becomes tributary to Rome.

After the death of the Hasmonean queen Alexandra her two sons fought for power. The elder, Hyrcanus II, was high priest. The younger, Aristobulus II, defeated him and took the kingship. Antipater, an Idumean and the father of the future king Herod, persuaded Hyrcanus to call in the Arab king Aretas, who besieged Aristobulus in the temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiquities 14.4–21). A Roman officer in Syria took Aristobulus's money and ordered Aretas off (Josephus, Antiquities 14.29–33).

In the spring of 63 BC Pompey, Rome's commander in the East, heard both brothers at Damascus, and with them a delegation of the nation that wanted neither and asked to be governed by priests, not kings. He put off his decision, and Aristobulus left to prepare for war (Josephus, Antiquities 14.38–52). Pompey marched on Jerusalem. When Aristobulus's soldiers refused to hand over the city, he arrested Aristobulus (Josephus, Antiquities 14.54–57).

Hyrcanus's supporters opened the gates. Those of Aristobulus held the temple mount and cut its bridge to the city. The Romans filled the ravine on the north side and raised a ramp, working on sabbaths, when the defenders would not go out to stop them. In the third month a tower fell and they broke in. Josephus says that the priests went on with the sacrifices and were cut down at the altar, and that twelve thousand Jews died (Josephus, Antiquities 14.58–71) (Josephus, Jewish War 1.141–158).

Pompey and his officers went into the sanctuary, where only the high priest might enter. Josephus says that he touched nothing, not even the two thousand talents of sacred money, and the next day ordered the temple cleansed and the sacrifices resumed (Josephus, Antiquities 14.71–73). Cicero, speaking at Rome four years later, agrees that Pompey took nothing (Cicero, Pro Flacco 67). Cassius Dio, more than 250 years afterwards, says that the wealth was plundered (Cassius Dio, Roman History 37.15–16). Tacitus notes that the inner shrine was now known to be empty, with no image (Tacitus, Histories 5.9). Pompey restored Hyrcanus as high priest and head of the nation, without a crown (Josephus, Antiquities 20.244). He imposed tribute, put the coastal and Greek cities that the Hasmoneans had conquered under the governor of Syria, and took Aristobulus and his children to Rome. "We lost our liberty," Josephus writes, "and became subject to the Romans" (Josephus, Antiquities 14.73–79).

The Psalms of Solomon give the response of pious Jews in the city. They tell of a sinner who broke down the walls with a battering-ram while foreigners trampled the altar (Psalms of Solomon 2), and of leaders who went out to welcome him and opened the gates (Psalms of Solomon 8). They read the disaster as judgment on Jerusalem's own sins, and they pray for a king, the son of David, "the anointed of the Lord", to cleanse the city of the nations that trample it (Psalms of Solomon 17). From this year Judea lay under Roman power; see Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Josephus dates the fall of the temple mount to the 179th Olympiad and the consulship of Gaius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero, which is 63 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.66). Cicero, the consul of that year, refers to the capture four years later as a known fact (Cicero, Pro Flacco 67).

The time of year is uncertain. Josephus says that the city fell "on the third month, on the day of the fast" (Josephus, Antiquities 14.66); in the War the third month is the third month of the siege (Josephus, Jewish War 1.141–158). Cassius Dio says that it fell on "the day of Saturn", the sabbath (Cassius Dio, Roman History 37.15–16). Some take the fast to be the Day of Atonement, in the autumn. Others think that Josephus's source meant the sabbath, which Greek and Roman writers wrongly supposed to be a fast day, and put the capture in the summer: see Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised by G. Vermes and F. Millar, vol. 1 (1973), section 12.

Josephus wrote about 140 to 160 years after the event and used earlier historians, among whom he names Strabo, Nicolaus of Damascus and Livy (Josephus, Antiquities 14.58–71). The Psalms of Solomon are the reaction of Jews in Jerusalem within a few years. They do not name Pompey, but the conqueror they describe is left dead and unburied in Egypt (Psalms of Solomon 2), as Pompey was, and almost all scholars take him to be Pompey: see Kenneth Atkinson, I Cried to the Lord (2004).

Primary sources

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
14.4–21; 14.29–33; 14.38–52; 14.54–57; 14.58–71; 14.71–73; 20.244; 14.73–79; 14.66

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
1.141–158

In Defence of Flaccus (Pro Flacco) Cicero · 59 BC
67

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
37.15–16

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
5.9

The Psalms of Solomon c. 63–40 BC
2; 8; 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Pompey, Hyrcanus II, Aristobulus II
Threads Church and State, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans 142 BC 263

LEADS TO

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea 40–37 BC 272

CHURCH AND STATE

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea After · 40–37 BC 272

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple Before · 167–164 BC 253

Herod Rebuilds the Temple After · 20/19 BC 280

← Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans Earlier · 142 BC
→ Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea Later · 40–37 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea

40–37 BC · Estimated date

The Roman senate names Herod, son of the Idumean Antipater, king of the Jews. Three years later he takes Jerusalem with a Roman army, and the last Hasmonean king is executed. Herod rules as Rome's client until his death.

Herod the Great was the son of Antipater, an Idumean and the friend and adviser of the high priest Hyrcanus II (Josephus, Antiquities 14.8–9). Mark Antony, who controlled the Roman East, appointed Herod and his brother Phasael tetrarchs and put the public affairs of the Jews in their hands (Josephus, Antiquities 14.324–326).

In 40 BC a Parthian army overran Syria. It brought with it Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, who had promised the Parthians money in return for the throne (Josephus, Antiquities 14.330–332). Hyrcanus and Phasael were seized. Antigonus had Hyrcanus's ears cut off, which barred him from the high priesthood, and Phasael killed himself. Herod escaped from Jerusalem by night with his family (Josephus, Antiquities 14.348–353, 365–367). He made his way by Egypt and Rhodes to Rome (Josephus, Antiquities 14.374–380).

There Antony and Octavian, the future Augustus, both took his side. The senate declared Antigonus an enemy of Rome, because he had accepted the kingdom from the Parthians, and voted to make Herod king. Herod left the senate house walking between Antony and Octavian, and the decree was laid up on the Capitol with a sacrifice (Josephus, Antiquities 14.381–389) (Josephus, Jewish War 1.282–285). Josephus says that Herod had not expected it: he had meant to ask for the throne for his wife's young brother, who was of the Hasmonean family (Josephus, Antiquities 14.381–389).

It took three years to make the decree good. In the spring of the third year Herod laid siege to Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiquities 14.465–481) together with Gaius Sosius, whom Antony had made governor of Syria (Cassius Dio, Roman History 49.22–23). During the siege he married Mariamne (Josephus, Jewish War 1.343–353), a granddaughter of both Hyrcanus and Aristobulus (Josephus, Antiquities 14.348–353, 365–367). The city fell after some five months, and the Roman soldiers killed without regard to age or sex. Antigonus surrendered to Sosius (Josephus, Antiquities 14.465–481) (Josephus, Jewish War 1.343–353). Herod kept the foreign troops out of the sanctuary and paid them from his own money to stop the looting (Josephus, Antiquities 14.482–486). Antigonus was taken in chains to Antony and beheaded (Josephus, Jewish War 1.357). Cassius Dio adds that he was first bound to a cross and flogged, which no king had suffered before at Roman hands (Cassius Dio, Roman History 49.22–23). "And thus", Josephus writes, "did the government of the Asamoneans cease", and it passed to a man "of no more than a vulgar family" (Josephus, Antiquities 14.487–491).

Herod owed his crown to Rome and kept it by loyalty to whoever ruled there. Tacitus sums it up: Antony gave him the throne, and Augustus enlarged his power (Tacitus, Histories 5.9). He is the King Herod of the Gospels: Matthew sets the birth of Jesus in his days (Matthew 2:1), and Luke begins his account of the births of John the Baptist and Jesus in them (Luke 1:5).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Josephus dates the senate's decree to the consulship of Domitius Calvinus and Asinius Pollio, which is 40 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.381–389). He dates the capture of Jerusalem to the consulship of Marcus Agrippa and Caninius Gallus, which is 37 BC, and says that the siege began in "the third year" after the decree (Josephus, Antiquities 14.465–481) (Josephus, Antiquities 14.487–491). These are the dates generally accepted: see Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised by G. Vermes and F. Millar, vol. 1 (1973), section 14.

His other figures do not all agree with them. He places the decree in the 184th Olympiad, which ended in the summer of 40 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.381–389), and he says that Jerusalem fell twenty-seven years to the day after Pompey took it, which counted exactly gives 36 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.487–491). Cassius Dio puts the capture under the consuls of 38 BC (Cassius Dio, Roman History 49.22–23). W. E. Filmer, "The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great", Journal of Theological Studies 17 (1966), pp. 283–298, and Andrew E. Steinmann, "When Did Herod the Great Reign?", Novum Testamentum 51 (2009), pp. 1–29, argue from such details for 39 and 36 BC. The question bears on the date of Herod's death; see the Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom.

Josephus is the only full source. He wrote more than a century later and drew on Nicolaus of Damascus, whom he accuses of shaping his account to gratify Herod (Josephus, Antiquities 14.8–9).

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 2:1; Luke 1:5

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
14.8–9; 14.324–326; 14.330–332; 14.348–353, 365–367; 14.374–380; 14.381–389; 14.465–481; 14.482–486; 14.487–491

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
1.282–285; 1.343–353; 1.357

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
49.22–23

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
5.9

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Jerusalem
Who Herod the Great
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pompey Takes Jerusalem 63 BC 268

LEADS TO

Herod Rebuilds the Temple 20/19 BC 280
The Birth of Jesus c. 6–4 BC 286
The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom 4 BC 291

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Judea Gains Independence under the Hasmoneans Before · 142 BC 263
The Birth of Jesus After · c. 6–4 BC 286

CHURCH AND STATE

Pompey Takes Jerusalem Before · 63 BC 268
Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor After · 27 BC 276

← Pompey Takes Jerusalem Earlier · 63 BC
→ Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor Later · 27 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor

27 BC · Firm date

Octavian, victor in Rome's civil wars, formally hands the state back to the senate and people and receives the name Augustus and command of the provinces that hold the armies. From now on one man rules the Roman world. Jesus is born in his reign.

Gaius Octavius was the great-nephew of Julius Caesar and took Caesar's name under his will (Suetonius, Augustus 7.2). After Caesar's murder he raised an army at the age of nineteen, became one of three men appointed to reorder the state, and defeated Caesar's assassins (Augustus, Res Gestae 1–2). In 31 BC Octavian, as he is called for these years, defeated his last rival, Mark Antony, in the sea battle off Actium. He then took Alexandria, where Antony had fled, and added Egypt to Rome's empire (Augustus, Res Gestae 25, 27) (Suetonius, Augustus 17).

What he did with that power he describes himself, in the record of his deeds that was inscribed after his death. "In my sixth and seventh consulships, when I had extinguished the flames of civil war, after receiving by universal consent the absolute control of affairs," he writes, "I transferred the republic from my own control to the will of the senate and the Roman people." In return the senate gave him the name Augustus. From then on, he says, he excelled all others in rank, but had no more power than his colleagues in each office (Augustus, Res Gestae 34).

Cassius Dio, a senator writing more than two centuries later, tells the same events less kindly. Octavian came into the senate in Rome and read a speech laying down his powers. The senators, some sincerely and some from fear, begged him to keep them (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.2.7–53.11). He then accepted for ten years the provinces that needed armies, and left the peaceful ones to the senate, so that he alone commanded soldiers (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.12–13). Dio says that he would have liked the name Romulus but saw that it suggested kingship, and took "Augustus", a word used of sacred things (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.16). Suetonius names the senator who proposed it, Munatius Plancus (Suetonius, Augustus 7.2). Dio's verdict is that the power of people and senate now passed wholly to one man and that Rome, whatever it was called, was from this time a monarchy (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.17).

Augustus ruled until his death in AD 14 (Suetonius, Augustus 100.1). He records that the gates of Janus, shut only in time of peace, were closed three times while he was leading citizen (Augustus, Res Gestae 13). Herod of Judea kept his throne under him; Tacitus says that Augustus, after his victory, increased Herod's power (Tacitus, Histories 5.9).

This is the government under which the New Testament opens. Luke dates the birth of Jesus by a decree of "Caesar Augustus" that all the world should be enrolled (Luke 2:1), and the ministry of John the Baptist by the fifteenth year of his successor Tiberius (Luke 3:1). Jesus is asked whether it is lawful to pay taxes to Caesar (Mark 12:14–17), and at his trial the chief priests tell Pilate, "We have no king but Caesar!" (John 19:15).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Augustus himself dates the settlement to his sixth and seventh consulships (Augustus, Res Gestae 34), which are the years 28 and 27 BC. Cassius Dio places the speech in the senate and the grant of the name in the seventh consulship, 27 BC (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.2.7–53.11) (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.16).

"Emperor" is a later word for his position. Augustus held no office of that name. He describes himself as princeps, the leading citizen (Augustus, Res Gestae 13), and counts his powers by his consulships and his years of tribunician power (Augustus, Res Gestae 4). Historians date the beginning of rule by emperors from 27 BC because the arrangements made then lasted; Dio, looking back, says so in as many words (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.17).

Primary sources

Scripture
Luke 2:1; Luke 3:1; Mark 12:14–17; John 19:15

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Augustus 7.2; Augustus 17; Augustus 100.1

Res Gestae Divi Augusti Augustus · AD 14
1–2; 25, 27; 34; 13; 4

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
53.2.7–53.11; 53.12–13; 53.16; 53.17

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
5.9

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Augustus
Threads Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

The Birth of Jesus c. 6–4 BC 286

CHURCH AND STATE

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea Before · 40–37 BC 272

The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom After · 4 BC 291

← Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea Earlier · 40–37 BC
→ Herod Rebuilds the Temple Later · 20/19 BC

THE SECOND TEMPLE PERIOD

Herod Rebuilds the Temple

20/19 BC · Estimated date

Herod replaces the temple built after the exile with a far larger sanctuary of white stone and gold on a greatly extended platform. This is the temple of the Gospels. Work on it continues for decades, almost until its destruction in AD 70.

In the eighteenth year of his reign Herod the Great announced that he would rebuild the temple in Jerusalem. Josephus gives him a speech: the temple built by the exiles who returned from Babylon was lower than Solomon's, because the Persian kings had fixed its measurements, and now that he had peace, wealth and the friendship of Rome he would make good the lack (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380–387). The people feared that he would pull the old building down and never finish the new. He promised to demolish nothing until everything was ready. He assembled a thousand wagons and ten thousand workmen, and he had priests trained as masons and carpenters (Josephus, Antiquities 15.388–390), since only priests could enter the inner courts. Herod himself, Josephus notes, never went into them, "because he was not a priest" (Josephus, Antiquities 15.417–420).

The new sanctuary stood on new foundations and was built of white stone, with a golden vine spreading above its doors (Josephus, Antiquities 15.391–395). Its front was plated with gold that flashed in the rising sun, and from a distance the building looked "like a mountain covered with snow" (Josephus, Jewish War 5.222–223). The innermost room, the Holy of Holies, was empty (Josephus, Jewish War 5.219). Around the sanctuary Herod enclosed an area twice the size of the old one and edged it with colonnades (Josephus, Jewish War 1.401). The royal portico along the south side had 162 columns in four rows (Josephus, Antiquities 15.411–416). Foreigners could go no further than the outer court. A low stone barrier marked the limit, with notices in Greek and Latin forbidding any foreigner to pass it on pain of death (Josephus, Antiquities 15.417–420) (Josephus, Jewish War 5.193–194).

The priests finished the sanctuary itself in a year and six months, and the colonnades and outer courts took eight years (Josephus, Antiquities 15.420–423). The work as a whole went on far longer. In John's Gospel people say, "It took forty-six years to build this temple!" (John 2:20). Josephus reports that it was finished only at the end of the governorship of Albinus, in the early 60s AD, when more than eighteen thousand workmen were left without employment (Josephus, Antiquities 20.215–219). A few years later the Romans burned it; see the Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple.

This is the temple in which the Gospels and Acts are set. The child Jesus is brought to it (Luke 2:27), and as a man he walks in its colonnades at the feast of Dedication (John 10:22–23). A disciple marvels at its stones, and Jesus answers that not one will be left on another (Mark 13:1–2). The barrier against foreigners lies behind the riot in which Paul was arrested, on the charge that he had brought Greeks into the temple (Acts 21:27–29).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

In the Antiquities Josephus puts the start of the work in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380–387). Counted from his capture of Jerusalem in 37 BC, that is 20/19 BC. In the earlier Jewish War he says the fifteenth year (Josephus, Jewish War 1.401), which on the same count would be 23/22 BC. The Antiquities is the fuller account and its date is the one generally followed: see Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised by G. Vermes and F. Millar, vol. 1 (1973), section 15.

John's Gospel has people in Jerusalem say that the temple has been forty-six years in building (John 2:20). Reckoned from 20/19 BC, that points to about AD 27 or 28, and it is one of the figures used to date the ministry of Jesus. The exact year depends on how Herod's regnal years and the forty-six years are counted.

Josephus is the main source for the rebuilding. He wrote about a century after it began, but he was himself a priest (Josephus, Jewish War 1.3), and by his own account the last of the work was finished only in his lifetime (Josephus, Antiquities 20.215–219).

Primary sources

Scripture

John 2:20; Luke 2:27; John 10:22–23; Mark 13:1–2; Acts 21:27–29

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
15.380–387; 15.388–390; 15.417–420; 15.391–395; 15.411–416; 15.420–423; 20.215–219

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
5.222–223; 5.219; 1.401; 5.193–194; 1.3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Herod the Great
Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea 40–37 BC 272

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple 167–164 BC 253

LEADS TO

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple AD 30 or 33 342

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Pompey Takes Jerusalem Before · 63 BC 268

The Feeding of the Five Thousand After · c. AD 29 or 32 323

← Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor Earlier · 27 BC

→ The Birth of Jesus Later · c. 6–4 BC

TIMELINE

The Life of Jesus

c. 6 BC – AD 33

Jesus of Nazareth is born under Herod, teaches and heals in Galilee and Judea, is crucified under Pontius Pilate, and is proclaimed risen by his followers.

The four Gospels are the main sources, with Paul's letters as the earliest written witness and brief notices in Josephus and Tacitus. The Gospels are not diaries: they arrange Jesus' words and deeds to proclaim who he is, so the order of events inside the ministry is approximate. The crucifixion is dated to AD 30 or 33.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Rome, Caesarea Philippi

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Birth of Jesus c. 6–4 BC 286

The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom 4 BC 291

Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule AD 6 295

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan c. AD 28–29 299
The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus c. AD 26–29 303
Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee c. AD 28–29 307
Jesus Appoints the Twelve c. AD 28–29 311
The Sermon on the Mount c. AD 28–29 315
The Execution of John the Baptist c. AD 28–32 319
The Feeding of the Five Thousand c. AD 29 or 32 323
Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327
The Transfiguration c. AD 29 or 32 331
The Raising of Lazarus AD 30 or 33 335
Jesus Enters Jerusalem AD 30 or 33 338
Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple AD 30 or 33 342
The Last Supper AD 30 or 33 346
Gethsemane and the Arrest AD 30 or 33 351
The Trials before the Council and Pilate AD 30 or 33 354
The Crucifixion AD 30 or 33 359
The Burial and Resurrection AD 30 or 33 364
The Appearances and the Great Commission AD 30 or 33 368
The Ascension AD 30 or 33 372

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Birth of Jesus

c. 6–4 BC · Estimated date

Matthew and Luke each tell, in a story set in the days of Herod, that Jesus was born at Bethlehem to Mary, a virgin betrothed to Joseph of David's line, and grew up at Nazareth in Galilee.

Two of the four Gospels tell of the birth of Jesus. Mark and John begin with him as an adult (Mark 1:9) (John 1:29–30), and Paul's letters say that he was "born to a woman, born under the law" and descended from David (Galatians 4:4) (Romans 1:3). Matthew and Luke tell different stories that share a core. In both, Mary is betrothed to Joseph, a descendant of David; she conceives by the Holy Spirit before they live together; an angel gives the name Jesus; the story is set in the days of Herod the Great; the child is born at Bethlehem and grows up at Nazareth (Matthew 1:18–2:1, 23) (Luke 1:5, 26–35; 2:4–7, 39).

Matthew tells the story through Joseph. An angel in a dream tells him not to fear to take Mary as his wife (Matthew 1:18–25). After the birth, wise men from the east come to Jerusalem looking for a newborn king of the Jews whose star they have seen. Herod sends them to Bethlehem, where they find the child with his mother in a house and offer gold, frankincense and myrrh. Warned in dreams, the wise men avoid Herod and Joseph takes the family to Egypt. Herod has the boys of Bethlehem aged two and under killed. After Herod's death the family returns and settles at Nazareth (Matthew 2). Matthew quotes a prophet at each step (Isaiah 7:14) (Micah 5:2) (Hosea 11:1) (Jeremiah 31:15).

Luke tells it through Mary. The angel Gabriel comes to her at Nazareth and announces that her son will receive the throne of David (Luke 1:26–38). A decree of Augustus requires everyone to be registered, and Joseph takes Mary to Bethlehem, the city of his ancestor David. There she gives birth and lays the child in a manger, "because there was no room for them in the inn". Shepherds, told of the birth by an angel, come to see him (Luke 2:1–20). He is circumcised on the eighth day and presented in the temple at Jerusalem, where Simeon and Anna speak about him, and the family goes home to Nazareth (Luke 2:21–40).

Beyond the shared core the two accounts relate different episodes. Matthew has no census, manger or shepherds, and his family appears to live at Bethlehem until the flight (Matthew 2:11, 22–23). Luke has no wise men, flight or killing of children, and his family returns to Galilee once the rites of the law are done (Luke 2:39) (Leviticus 12:2–8). Their genealogies of Joseph also differ (Matthew 1:1–17) (Luke 3:23–38). The killing of the children is reported only by Matthew; Josephus, who describes Herod's last years in detail, does not mention it there (Josephus, Antiquities book 17). Augustine, about AD 400, argued that each evangelist simply passes over what the other relates, and he set the two out as one continuous story (Augustine, Harmony of the Gospels 2.5.14–17).

Both evangelists present Jesus as the heir to the promise made to David and as conceived by the Holy Spirit (Matthew 1:1, 20) (Luke 1:32–35). The second claim passed into the creeds, which confess him as made flesh by the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Neither Gospel gives a year. Matthew puts the birth "in the days of King Herod" and has Herod kill boys up to two years old (Matthew 2:1, 16); Luke begins his story under the same king (Luke 1:5). Josephus's figures for Herod's reign place his death in 4 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 17.191) (see the Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom), which gives a birth about 6–4 BC. Luke's other statement agrees approximately: Jesus was "about thirty" when he began to teach, some time after the fifteenth year of Tiberius, AD 28–29 (Luke 3:1, 23).

Luke also ties the birth to a registration ordered by Augustus, "the first enrollment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria" (Luke 2:1–2). Josephus describes a census of Judea by Quirinius, but dates it after the removal of Archelaus, in AD 6–7, ten years after Herod died (Josephus, Antiquities 18.1–4) (Josephus, Antiquities 18.26). Three explanations are offered. Many scholars conclude that Luke attached the birth to the well-remembered census of AD 6 by mistake or as a loose setting: Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah (revised edition, 1993), in its appendix on the census; Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised by G. Vermes and F. Millar, vol. 1 (1973), pp. 399–427. Others argue for an earlier registration under Herod, with Quirinius holding an earlier command in the East: William M. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? (1898). Others translate the verse as "this enrollment was before Quirinius was governor of Syria": Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (1977), in the chapter on the date of Christ's birth, who offers it as a possible reading.

On the relation between the two narratives, Brown, in the work cited, judges that they are independent traditions which agree on the core and cannot be fully harmonised in detail; readers who combine them follow the approach that Augustine set out (Augustine, Harmony of the Gospels 2.5.14–17).

Scholars who date Herod's death to 1 BC place the birth in 3 or 2 BC: Jack Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (revised edition, 1998). Neither Gospel names the day or the season. The date 25 December stands in a Roman list of commemorations in an almanac compiled for the year 354, which opens with the birth of Christ at Bethlehem on the eighth day before the Kalends of January (Chronograph of 354 part 12).

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 1:9; John 1:29–30; Galatians 4:4; Romans 1:3; Matthew 1:18–2:1, 23; Luke 1:5, 26–35; 2:4–7, 39; Matthew 1:18–25; Matthew 2; Isaiah 7:14; Micah 5:2; Hosea 11:1; Jeremiah 31:15; Luke 1:26–38; Luke 2:1–20; Luke 2:21–40; Matthew 2:11, 22–23; Luke 2:39; Leviticus 12:2–8; Matthew 1:1–17; Luke 3:23–38; Matthew 1:1, 20; Luke 1:32–35; Matthew 2:1, 16; Luke 1:5; Luke 3:1, 23; Luke 2:1–2

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
book 17; 17.191; 18.1–4; 18.26

The Harmony of the Gospels Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 400
2.5.14–17

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354
part 12

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethlehem, Nazareth
Who Jesus, Mary, Joseph of Nazareth, Herod the Great Threads Kingship and Messiah, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

God's Covenant with David c. 1000 BC 110
Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea 40–37 BC 272
Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor 27 BC 276

LEADS TO

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus c. AD 26–29 303

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea Before · 40–37 BC 272

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus After · c. AD 26–29 303

COVENANT AND PROMISE

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets Before · c. 435 BC 230
The Sermon on the Mount After · c. AD 28–29 315

← Herod Rebuilds the Temple Earlier · 20/19 BC
→ The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom Later · 4 BC

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom

4 BC · Estimated date

Herod the Great dies at Jericho. Augustus divides his kingdom among three sons: Archelaus in Judea, Antipas in Galilee and Perea, Philip in the north-east. Matthew sets the return of Jesus' family from Egypt at this point.

Josephus describes the last months of Herod the Great at length. He writes that the king was about seventy and gravely ill (Josephus, Antiquities 17.146–148, 168–173). Two teachers of the law in Jerusalem, Judas and Matthias, told their students that the golden eagle Herod had set over the great gate of the temple broke the law against images, and a group of young men cut it down in broad daylight. No fewer than forty were arrested with their teachers. Herod had Matthias and his companions burned alive, and Josephus adds that there was an eclipse of the moon that night (Josephus, Antiquities 17.149–167).

The king sought relief at the hot springs of Callirrhoe beyond the Jordan and then returned to Jericho (Josephus, Antiquities 17.146–148, 168–173). There, Josephus says, he had leading men from the whole nation shut in the hippodrome and ordered that they be killed at his death, so that the country would mourn; his sister Salome released them instead (Josephus, Antiquities 17.174–179, 193). He had his son Antipater executed and died five days later (Josephus, Antiquities 17.187, 191).

His final will named Archelaus king, made Herod Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and gave another son, Philip, the districts north-east of the Sea of Galilee. It was to take effect only when the emperor had confirmed it (Josephus, Antiquities 17.188–190, 195). Archelaus buried his father at Herodium (Josephus, Antiquities 17.194–199). He told the crowds in the temple that he would not use the title of king until Augustus granted it. When mourners for the executed teachers stoned his soldiers at Passover, he sent in his army, and about three thousand people were killed (Josephus, Antiquities 17.200–218).

Archelaus then sailed for Rome (Josephus, Antiquities 17.219–222). A delegation of fifty from Judea followed and asked Augustus to end the rule of Herod's family and attach the country to the province of Syria (Josephus, Antiquities 17.299–314). Augustus gave Archelaus half the kingdom, namely Judea, Samaria and Idumea, with the title of ethnarch and the promise of kingship if he ruled well. Antipas received Galilee and Perea, and Philip received Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis (Josephus, Antiquities 17.317–320) (Josephus, Jewish War 2.93–97).

Matthew sets the childhood of Jesus against these events. In his account Joseph, who had fled to Egypt with the child and his mother, returns after Herod's death, is afraid to settle in Judea when he hears that Archelaus rules there, and makes his home at Nazareth in Galilee (Matthew 2:19–23). The division shaped the setting of the Gospels: Luke names Herod Antipas as tetrarch of Galilee and Philip as tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis when John the Baptist began to preach (Luke 3:1).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Josephus says that Herod reigned thirty-seven years from the day the Romans declared him king and thirty-four from the death of his rival Antigonus (Josephus, Antiquities 17.187, 191) (Josephus, Jewish War 1.665). He dates the first to the consuls of 40 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.389) and the capture of Jerusalem that led to the second to the consuls of 37 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 14.487–488). Counted inclusively, both figures end in 4 BC. He also sets the death after an eclipse of the moon (Josephus, Antiquities 17.167) and before a Passover (Josephus, Antiquities 17.200–218). Astronomical tables show a partial eclipse on the night of 12–13 March 4 BC, about a month before Passover.

The reigns of Herod's sons are counted from the same year. Archelaus was deposed in his tenth year (Josephus, Antiquities 17.342), which Cassius Dio puts under the consuls of AD 6 (Cassius Dio, Roman History 55.25.1, 55.27.6), and Philip died in the twentieth year of Tiberius after ruling thirty-seven years (Josephus, Antiquities 18.106). For these reasons 4 BC is the usual date: see Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, revised by G. Vermes and F. Millar, vol. 1 (1973), in the section on Herod the Great. T. D. Barnes, "The Date of Herod's Death", Journal of Theological Studies 19 (1968), pp. 204–209, prefers 5 BC and allows 4 BC.

A minority of scholars count Herod's years differently and connect the death with the total eclipse of 9–10 January 1 BC: W. E. Filmer, "The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great", Journal of Theological Studies 17 (1966), pp. 283–298, and Andrew E. Steinmann, "When Did Herod the Great Reign?", Novum Testamentum 51 (2009), pp. 1–29. The timeline follows the majority.

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 2:19–23; Luke 3:1

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
17.146–148, 168–173; 17.149–167; 17.174–179, 193; 17.187, 191; 17.188–190, 195; 17.194–199; 17.200–218; 17.219–222; 17.299–314; 17.317–320; 14.389; 14.487–488; 17.167; 17.342; 18.106

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.93–97; 1.665

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
55.25.1, 55.27.6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jericho, Jerusalem, Rome
Who Herod the Great, Archelaus, Herod Antipas, Augustus
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

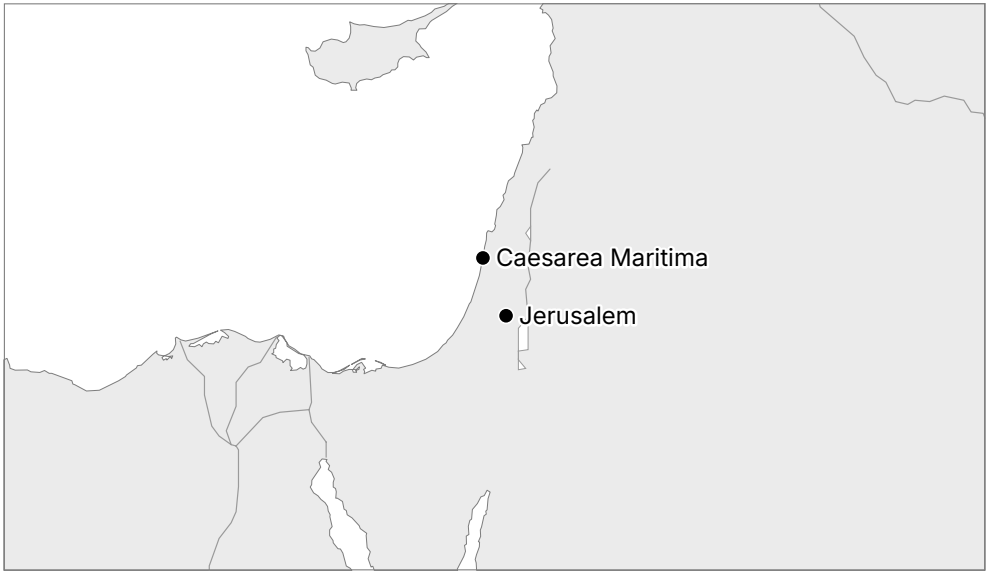
Herod the Great Becomes King of Judea 40–37 BC 272

LEADS TO

Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule AD 6 295

CHURCH AND STATE

Augustus Becomes Rome's First Emperor Before · 27 BC 276
Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule After · AD 6 295



← The Birth of Jesus Earlier · c. 6–4 BC
→ Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule Later · AD 6

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule

AD 6 · Firm date

Augustus banishes Archelaus and puts Judea, Samaria and Idumea under a Roman governor. Quirinius, legate of Syria, registers property for taxation, and Judas the Galilean calls for resistance.

Archelaus had ruled Judea, Samaria and Idumea since the death of his father, Herod. Josephus reports that the leading men of Judea and Samaria, together with his own brothers, accused him before Augustus of cruelty. The emperor summoned him to Rome, heard the case, banished him to Vienne in Gaul and confiscated his property (Josephus, Antiquities 17.342–344) (Josephus, Jewish War 2.111). Cassius Dio records the same sentence in a single line of his history of the year (Cassius Dio, Roman History 55.25.1, 55.27.6).

Augustus did not appoint another member of the family. Josephus writes in one place that the ethnarchy was made into a province and in another that it was attached to the province of Syria (Josephus, Jewish War 2.117–118) (Josephus, Antiquities 17.355). A governor of equestrian rank, Coponius, was sent out with the power to inflict the death penalty (Josephus, Jewish War 2.117–118). At the same time Quirinius, a senator and former consul, came to Syria as the emperor's legate with orders to assess property there, and he entered Judea to register what people owned and to sell off the estate of Archelaus (Josephus, Antiquities 18.1–4). Tacitus calls Caesarea, on the coast, the capital of Judea, as Antioch was of Syria (Tacitus, Histories 2.78); the book of Acts shows the governor holding court there (Acts 23:33–35).

The registration meant tax paid directly to Rome. Josephus says that the high priest Joazar persuaded most people to declare their property (Josephus, Antiquities 18.1–4). A man named Judas, from Gamala in Gaulanitis, whom Josephus elsewhere calls Judas the Galilean, joined with a Pharisee named Zadok to urge revolt. They called the census the beginning of slavery and taught that God alone should be their ruler (Josephus, Antiquities 18.4–11, 23–25) (Josephus, Jewish War 2.117–118). These passages do not say how Judas ended. In the book of Acts the Pharisee Gamaliel recalls that Judas of Galilee "rose up in the days of the enrollment", that he perished, and that his followers were scattered (Acts 5:37).

Josephus treats this as the beginning of the movement that led to the war of AD 66. He calls it a fourth school of thought beside the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes, and blames it for the destruction that followed (Josephus, Antiquities 18.4–11, 23–25). Two sons of Judas were crucified by a later governor (Josephus, Antiquities 20.102), and another, Menahem, was among the leaders of the revolt in Jerusalem (Josephus, Jewish War 2.433–434).

Judea was now governed by Roman officials. The fifth of them was Pontius Pilate (Josephus, Antiquities 18.29–35). Galilee stayed under Herod Antipas (Josephus, Jewish War 2.167–168). The question put to Jesus in Jerusalem, whether it was lawful to pay tax to Caesar, belongs to the situation the census created (Mark 12:13–17).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Josephus says that the registration was finished in the thirty-seventh year after Augustus defeated Antony at Actium (Josephus, Antiquities 18.26). The battle was fought on 2 September 31 BC (Cassius Dio, Roman History 51.1.1), so that year ran from the autumn of AD 6. Cassius Dio puts the banishment of "Herod of Palestine", as he calls Archelaus, under the consuls Aemilius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius, who held office in AD 6 (Cassius Dio, Roman History 55.25.1, 55.27.6). Josephus gives the length of Archelaus's rule as ten years in the Antiquities (Josephus, Antiquities 17.342–344) and nine in the War (Josephus, Jewish War 2.111).

Luke dates the birth of Jesus by a census under Quirinius (Luke 2:1–2), while both he and Matthew set the story in the days of Herod, who died ten years earlier (Luke 1:5) (Matthew 2:1). The difficulty and the explanations offered for it are set out in the dating note of the Birth of Jesus.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 23:33–35; Acts 5:37; Mark 12:13–17; Luke 2:1–2; Luke 1:5; Matthew 2:1

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
17.342–344; 17.355; 18.1–4; 18.4–11, 23–25; 20.102; 18.29–35; 18.26

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.111; 2.117–118; 2.433–434; 2.167–168

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
55.25.1, 55.27.6; 51.1.1

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
2.78

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Caesarea Maritima
Who Archelaus, Augustus, Quirinius, Judas the Galilean
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom 4 BC 291

LEADS TO

The Trials before the Council and Pilate AD 30 or 33 354

CHURCH AND STATE

The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom Before · 4 BC 291

The Trials before the Council and Pilate After · AD 30 or 33 354

← The Death of Herod and the Division of His Kingdom Earlier · 4 BC
→ John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan Later · c. AD 28–29

THE LIFE OF JESUS

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan

c. AD 28–29 · Estimated date

Luke dates to the fifteenth year of Tiberius the preaching of John, who calls Israel to repentance in the wilderness and baptises crowds in the Jordan. All four Gospels and the Jewish historian Josephus describe him.

Luke opens his account of John the Baptist with a formal date: the fifteenth year of the emperor Tiberius, when Pontius Pilate governed Judea, Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee, and Annas and Caiaphas held the high priesthood (Luke 3:1–2). Luke alone tells of John's birth, to the elderly priest Zechariah and his wife Elizabeth, a relative of Mary, and says that he lived in the desert until he appeared in public (Luke 1:5–25, 36, 57–80).

Mark and Matthew tell that John preached in the wilderness of Judea and along the Jordan, proclaiming "the baptism of repentance for forgiveness of sins". People came out from Jerusalem and all Judea and were baptised by him in the river, confessing their sins (Mark 1:4–5) (Matthew 3:1–6). He wore camel's hair with a leather belt and ate locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6), dress that recalled the prophet Elijah (2 Kings 1:8). The Gospels apply to him the "voice of one crying in the wilderness" from the book of Isaiah and Malachi's messenger who prepares the way (Mark 1:2–3) (Isaiah 40:3) (Malachi 3:1).

Matthew and Luke give the substance of his preaching. Judgment was near, descent from Abraham would protect no one, and every tree that bore no good fruit would be cut down (Matthew 3:7–10) (Luke 3:7–9). In Luke he tells the crowds to share clothing and food, tax collectors to take no more than was due, and soldiers to extort nothing (Luke 3:10–14). In all four Gospels he points beyond himself to one who is coming, whose sandal he is not fit to untie (in Matthew, to carry) and who will baptise with the Holy Spirit; the first three call that one mightier than John (Mark 1:7–8) (Matthew 3:11–12) (Luke 3:15–17) (John 1:26–27, 33). In John's Gospel he denies that he is the Christ, Elijah or the prophet (John 1:19–23); in Matthew, Jesus says of him, "this is Elijah, who is to come" (Matthew 11:14).

Josephus, writing about AD 93, also describes John. He calls him a good man who told the Jews to practise justice towards one another and piety towards God and so to come to baptism. The washing, Josephus explains, was not to gain pardon for sins but to purify the body once the soul had been cleansed by right conduct. Crowds gathered, and Herod Antipas feared that John's influence might lead to an uprising (Josephus, Antiquities 18.116–119). In this passage Josephus says nothing of a message about one who was to come, and he does not connect John with Jesus.

Antipas put John in prison (Luke 3:19–20); see the Execution of John the Baptist. In Matthew, Jesus, who was baptised by him, says that no one born of women is greater than John (Matthew 11:11). His following outlived him: the book of Acts tells of disciples at Ephesus, years later, who knew only "John's baptism" (Acts 19:1–7).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Luke gives a precise date: the word of God came to John "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar" (Luke 3:1–2). Augustus died on 19 August AD 14 (Suetonius, Augustus 100.1) and Tiberius succeeded him. Counted from that day, the fifteenth year runs from August AD 28 to August AD 29. If Luke used a calendar whose year began in the autumn or in January and counted the months of AD 14 as the first year, it is AD 27–28 or AD 28. A few scholars count from the powers Tiberius shared with Augustus in his last years and reach AD 26–27. The reckonings are set out in Jack Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (revised edition, 1998), and Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (1977), in the chapter on the commencement of Christ's ministry.

Luke's other names fit any of these years. Pontius Pilate came to Judea as the successor of Valerius Gratus and stayed ten years, leaving shortly before Tiberius died in March AD 37 (Josephus, Antiquities 18.35) (Josephus, Antiquities 18.89) (Tacitus, Annals 6.50). Luke does not say how long John preached before he was imprisoned.

Primary sources

Scripture

Luke 3:1–2; Luke 1:5–25, 36, 57–80; Mark 1:4–5; Matthew 3:1–6; Mark 1:6; 2 Kings 1:8; Mark 1:2–3; Isaiah 40:3; Malachi 3:1; Matthew 3:7–10; Luke 3:7–9; Luke 3:10–14; Mark 1:7–8; Matthew 3:11–12; Luke 3:15–17; John 1:26–27, 33; John 1:19–23; Matthew 11:14; Luke 3:19–20; Matthew 11:11; Acts 19:1–7

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.116–119; 18.35; 18.89

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Augustus 100.1

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
6.50

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jordan River, Judean Wilderness
Who John the Baptist, Tiberius, Herod Antipas
Threads Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets c. 435 BC 230

LEADS TO

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus c. AD 26–29 303

The Execution of John the Baptist c. AD 28–32 319

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Malachi and the Close of the Prophets Before · c. 435 BC 230

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee After · c. AD 28–29 307

← Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule Earlier · AD 6
→ The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus Later · c. AD 26–29

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus

c. AD 26–29 · Estimated date

Jesus comes from Nazareth to the Jordan and is baptised by John. The Gospels tell of the Spirit descending on him and a voice from heaven naming him the beloved Son, and then of forty days of testing in the wilderness.

Mark tells the event in three verses. Jesus came from Nazareth in Galilee and was baptised by John the Baptist in the Jordan. As he came up from the water he saw the heavens opening and the Spirit coming down on him like a dove, and a voice said, “You are my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased” (Mark 1:9–11).

The other Gospels tell it with differences. In Matthew, John at first refuses, saying that he ought to be baptised by Jesus, and Jesus answers that it is fitting “to fulfill all righteousness”; the voice speaks of Jesus in the third person: “This is my beloved Son” (Matthew 3:13–17). Luke mentions the baptism in passing and adds that Jesus was praying and that the Spirit came down “in a bodily form” (Luke 3:21–22). The Gospel of John does not narrate the baptism. There the Baptist testifies that he saw the Spirit descend and remain on Jesus, and calls him "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29–34). That Gospel places John's work at "Bethany beyond the Jordan", a place it does not further describe (John 1:28); the others name only the river. The words of the voice echo a royal psalm and the servant in the book of Isaiah on whom God puts his Spirit (Psalm 2:7) (Isaiah 42:1).

All three Synoptic Gospels follow the baptism with a time of testing. Mark says only that the Spirit drove Jesus into the wilderness, where he was tempted by Satan for forty days, was with the wild animals, and was served by angels (Mark 1:12–13). Matthew and Luke relate three temptations: to turn stones into bread after his fast, to throw himself from the pinnacle of the temple, and to gain all the kingdoms of the world by worshipping the devil. Jesus answers each with a sentence from Deuteronomy (Matthew 4:1–11) (Luke 4:1–13) (Deuteronomy 8:3; 6:13, 16). The two Gospels give the second and third temptations in opposite order. None of them says where in the wilderness this took place.

The book of Acts counts the public life of Jesus from this point. Peter's preaching there begins the story "after the baptism which John preached", when God anointed Jesus with the Holy Spirit, and the replacement for Judas must be someone who had been with them "beginning from the baptism of John" (Acts 10:37–38) (Acts 1:21–22). The letter to the Hebrews describes Jesus as one "who has been in all points tempted like we are, yet without sin" (Hebrews 4:15).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels give no date for the baptism itself. Luke puts it after John began to preach in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, AD 28–29 by the usual count, and says that Jesus was then "about thirty" (Luke 3:1–3, 21–23); see the dating note of John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan. John's Gospel offers a second indication. At the first Passover after the baptism, people in Jerusalem say that the temple has been forty-six years in building (John 2:13, 20). Josephus dates the start of Herod's rebuilding to the eighteenth year of his reign, about 20–19 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380), which brings that Passover to AD 27 or 28. Scholars therefore place the baptism between AD 26 and 29: see Jack Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (revised edition, 1998), and John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1 (1991), chapter 11.

That Jesus was baptised by John is among the facts of his life most widely accepted by historians, partly because the Gospels themselves treat it as needing explanation (Matthew 3:14–15): see Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 2 (1994), chapters 12–13. The vision and the voice, and the temptation, which has no human witness in the story, are reported only by the Gospels.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 1:9–11; Matthew 3:13–17; Luke 3:21–22; John 1:29–34; John 1:28; Psalm 2:7; Isaiah 42:1; Mark 1:12–13; Matthew 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13; Deuteronomy 8:3; 6:13, 16; Acts 10:37–38; Acts 1:21–22; Hebrews 4:15; Luke 3:1–3, 21–23; John 2:13, 20; Matthew 3:14–15

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
15.380

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jordan River, Judean Wilderness
Who Jesus, John the Baptist
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan c. AD 28–29 299
The Birth of Jesus c. 6–4 BC 286

LEADS TO

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee c. AD 28–29 307

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Birth of Jesus Before · c. 6–4 BC 286
Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee After · c. AD 28–29 307

← John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan Earlier · c. AD 28–29
→ Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee Later · c. AD 28–29

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee

c. AD 28–29 · Estimated date

Mark and Matthew tell how, after John's arrest, Jesus returns to Galilee, announces that the kingdom of God is at hand, calls four fishermen and makes Capernaum, on the lake, the centre of his teaching and healing.

Mark sums up the beginning in two sentences. After John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee proclaiming, "The time is fulfilled, and God's Kingdom is at hand! Repent, and believe in the Good News" (Mark 1:14–15). Matthew adds that he left Nazareth and settled at Capernaum, a town on the lake shore, and sees in the move the light that Isaiah promised to Galilee (Matthew 4:12–17) (Isaiah 9:1–2).

Mark and Matthew tell how Jesus, walking beside the Sea of Galilee, called two pairs of brothers who fished there: Simon, later called Peter, with Andrew, and James and John, the sons of Zebedee. They left their nets, and the second pair their father and his hired men, and followed him (Mark 1:16–20) (Matthew 4:18–22). Luke tells the call differently, after a catch of fish so large that the nets begin to break and Simon falls at Jesus' knees (Luke 5:1–11). In John's Gospel Andrew, a disciple of the Baptist, meets Jesus first and brings his brother Simon to him (John 1:35–42).

Mark then describes a single day at Capernaum. On the Sabbath Jesus taught in the synagogue, and the hearers were astonished because he taught "as having authority, and not as the scribes". He commanded an unclean spirit to leave a man, and it obeyed. In Simon's house he took Simon's mother-in-law by the hand and her fever left her. After sunset the town gathered at the door with its sick. Before dawn he went out alone to pray, and then moved on through the synagogues of Galilee (Mark 1:21–39).

Luke sets a visit to Nazareth at the head of his account. In the synagogue Jesus read from Isaiah, "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor", and said, "Today, this Scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing". When he went on to speak of prophets sent to foreigners, the congregation drove him out and tried to throw him from the brow of the hill (Luke 4:16–30) (Isaiah 61:1–2).

Matthew closes his summary with crowds coming from Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea and beyond the Jordan (Matthew 4:23–25). In the first three Gospels most of the public life of Jesus is spent in the towns around the lake, in the territory of Herod Antipas (Luke 3:1). John's Gospel sets more of it in Jerusalem, at the festivals (John 2:13; 5:1; 7:10).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Mark and Matthew start the preaching in Galilee after John was imprisoned (Mark 1:14) (Matthew 4:12), and Luke dates John's first appearance to the fifteenth year of Tiberius, AD 28–29 (Luke 3:1–2). That gives a beginning in about AD 28 or 29. Those who count Tiberius's years from an earlier point put it a year or two sooner; see the dating note of John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan.

The Gospels do not agree on the order of what followed. Luke puts the visit to Nazareth first (Luke 4:16–30); Mark and Matthew tell of a rejection there at a later stage (Mark 6:1–6) (Matthew 13:54–58). John's Gospel has Jesus gather disciples, visit Cana and Capernaum, and work in Judea before John was put in prison (John 1:35–2:12; 3:22–24). The length of the whole ministry is also inferred. The first three Gospels mention one Passover during the ministry, the fourth mentions three (John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55), which requires at least two years. The question is discussed in John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1 (1991), chapter 11, and Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (1977), in the chapter on the duration of Christ's ministry.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 1:14–15; Matthew 4:12–17; Isaiah 9:1–2; Mark 1:16–20; Matthew 4:18–22; Luke 5:1–11; John 1:35–42; Mark 1:21–39; Luke 4:16–30; Isaiah 61:1–2; Matthew 4:23–25; Luke 3:1; John 2:13; 5:1; 7:10; Mark 1:14; Matthew 4:12; Luke 3:1–2; Mark 6:1–6; Matthew 13:54–58; John 1:35–2:12; 3:22–24; John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Capernaum, Sea of Galilee, Nazareth
Who Jesus, Peter, Andrew, James Son of Zebedee, John the Apostle Threads Kingship and Messiah, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus c. AD 26–29 303

LEADS TO

Jesus Appoints the Twelve c. AD 28–29 311
The Feeding of the Five Thousand c. AD 29 or 32 323

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus Before · c. AD 26–29 303
The Feeding of the Five Thousand After · c. AD 29 or 32 323

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan Before · c. AD 28–29 299
The Execution of John the Baptist After · c. AD 28–32 319

← The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus Earlier · c. AD 26–29
→ Jesus Appoints the Twelve Later · c. AD 28–29

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Jesus Appoints the Twelve

c. AD 28–29 · Estimated date

From his wider following Jesus chooses twelve men to be with him and to be sent out to preach and heal. Mark, Matthew and Luke list their names from Simon Peter to Judas Iscariot; Acts lists the eleven who remained.

By this point, Mark says, Jesus had a large following from Galilee and beyond (Mark 3:7–8). He went up the mountain, called to him those he wanted, and appointed twelve "that they might be with him, and that he might send them out to preach" and to cast out demons (Mark 3:13–15). Luke adds that he spent the night before in prayer, chose the twelve from a larger body of disciples, and named them apostles, that is, men who are sent (Luke 6:12–13).

The New Testament has four lists of the names (Mark 3:16–19) (Matthew 10:2–4) (Luke 6:14–16) (Acts 1:13). Simon, to whom Jesus gave the name Peter, always comes first, and with him stand his brother Andrew and the brothers James and John. Then come Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Thomas, James the son of Alphaeus and Simon, called the Cananaean in Mark and Matthew and the Zealot in Luke and Acts. Judas Iscariot, "who also betrayed him", comes last in the three Gospel lists; the list in Acts, set after his death, has eleven names. The lists differ in one name: Mark and Matthew have Thaddaeus where Luke and Acts have Judas the son of James. Matthew's Gospel identifies the apostle Matthew with the tax collector whom Jesus called from his booth (Matthew 9:9; 10:3); Mark and Luke call that tax collector Levi (Mark 2:14) (Luke 5:27). John's Gospel gives no list but speaks of "the twelve" (John 6:67–71).

Mark tells that Jesus sent them out in pairs with authority over unclean spirits. They were to take no bread, bag or money, to stay in whatever house received them, and to shake the dust from their feet where they were refused (Mark 6:7–13). In Matthew's account they are told to go only to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" and to proclaim that the kingdom of heaven is at hand (Matthew 10:5–15).

The number answers to the twelve tribes: in Matthew and Luke, Jesus promises that they will sit on thrones judging the tribes of Israel (Matthew 19:28) (Luke 22:28–30). Acts tells that after the death of Judas the group chose Matthias by lot to fill his place (Acts 1:15–26). Paul, writing in the 50s, already cites an appearance of the risen Christ "to the twelve" in a summary that he says he had himself received (1 Corinthians 15:3–5).

Later generations traced the ministry of the churches back to these men. A letter sent from Rome to Corinth near the end of the first century says that the apostles, sent by Christ, appointed their first converts as bishops and deacons (1 Clement 42). How that succession is to be understood is a question on which the churches differ; see Papacy and Church Order.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

None of the Gospels dates the choice of the Twelve. Mark and Luke place it in the earlier part of the Galilean ministry, after the first disputes with the scribes and Pharisees and on "the mountain", which they do not name (Mark 3:13) (Luke 6:12). Matthew gives the list only when the Twelve are sent out (Matthew 10:1–5). The timeline sets the event in the first year of the ministry, about AD 28–29; see the dating note of Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee.

That Jesus chose a group of twelve during his lifetime is widely accepted by historians, since the earliest tradition already speaks of "the twelve" (1 Corinthians 15:5) and all three Gospel lists include the man who betrayed him: see John P. Meier, "The Circle of the Twelve: Did It Exist during Jesus' Public Ministry?", Journal of Biblical Literature 116 (1997), pp. 635–672.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 3:7–8; Mark 3:13–15; Luke 6:12–13; Mark 3:16–19; Matthew 10:2–4; Luke 6:14–16; Acts 1:13; Matthew 9:9; 10:3; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27; John 6:67–71; Mark 6:7–13; Matthew 10:5–15; Matthew 19:28; Luke 22:28–30; Acts 1:15–26; 1 Corinthians 15:3–5; Mark 3:13; Luke 6:12; Matthew 10:1–5; 1 Corinthians 15:5

The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians The church of Rome; attributed to Clement · c. AD 96

42

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Sea of Galilee
Who Jesus, Peter, Andrew, James Son of Zebedee, John the Apostle, Matthew, Thomas, Judas Iscariot
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee c. AD 28–29 307

LEADS TO

The Sermon on the Mount c. AD 28–29 315

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327

The Appearances and the Great Commission AD 30 or 33 368

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi After · c. AD 29 or 32 327

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Jonah Sent to Nineveh Before · c. 760 BC 154

The Appearances and the Great Commission After · AD 30 or 33 368

← Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee Earlier · c. AD 28–29
→ The Sermon on the Mount Later · c. AD 28–29

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Sermon on the Mount

c. AD 28–29 · Estimated date

Matthew presents the teaching of Jesus as one long discourse on a hillside in Galilee. It includes the Beatitudes, the command to love enemies, the Lord's Prayer and the Golden Rule. Luke has a shorter version.

Matthew sets the scene with crowds from Galilee and beyond. Jesus went up the mountain, sat down, and taught his disciples within hearing of the crowd (Matthew 4:25–5:2; 7:28). Neither Matthew nor Luke names the hill. Both have Jesus enter Capernaum, near the Sea of Galilee, when he has finished (Matthew 8:1, 5) (Luke 7:1).

The discourse opens with the Beatitudes, a series of blessings on the poor in spirit, those who mourn, the gentle, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers and the persecuted (Matthew 5:3–12). Jesus says that he has come not to destroy the law and the prophets but to fulfil them, and that his hearers' righteousness must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (Matthew 5:17–20). Six times he sets a deeper demand beside what "was said": not only murder but anger, not only adultery but the lustful look, no divorce except for sexual immorality, no oaths, no retaliation, and love even of enemies (Matthew 5:21–48).

The middle section concerns giving, prayer and fasting, which are to be done in secret and not for show. Here Matthew gives the Lord's Prayer (Matthew 6:1–18). Then come sayings on treasure in heaven, on serving God or Mammon, and on anxiety: "seek first God's Kingdom, and his righteousness" (Matthew 6:19–34). The last chapter warns against judging others, urges confident prayer, and sums up the law and the prophets in the rule to do to others what one would have them do to oneself (Matthew 7:1–12). It ends with the narrow gate, the tree known by its fruit, and the two houses, one built on rock and one on sand. The crowds were astonished, Matthew says, because he taught "with authority, and not like the scribes" (Matthew 7:13–29).

Luke's parallel is spoken on "a level place" after Jesus has come down from the mountain. It has four beatitudes, addressed directly to the poor and hungry, matched by four woes on the rich, then the love of enemies, the warning against judging, and the two builders (Luke 6:17–49).

An early church manual, the Didache, gives the Lord's Prayer in a form close to Matthew's and tells believers to say it three times a day (Didache 8). Augustine, whose commentary of about AD 393 speaks of "the sermon which our Lord Jesus Christ spoke on the mount", found in it "a perfect standard of the Christian life" (Augustine, On the Sermon on the Mount 1.1.1). Christians have differed on how its commands apply in public life. The Anabaptist articles agreed at Schleitheim in 1527 hold that Christ forbids his followers all swearing, citing the sermon, and that a Christian may not use the sword or serve as a magistrate (Schleitheim Confession articles 6–7). The Lutheran confession of Augsburg (1530) condemns the Anabaptists who forbid these offices to Christians and says that Christians may hold civil office, serve as soldiers and take oaths required by magistrates, because the gospel teaches an eternal righteousness of the heart and does not destroy the state or the family (Augsburg Confession XVI).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels give the sermon no date. Matthew places it near the start of the Galilean ministry, before he has told of the call of Matthew or the choice of the Twelve (Matthew 4:23–5:2; 9:9; 10:1–4); Luke places his shorter discourse directly after the choice of the Twelve (Luke 6:12–20). The timeline follows the general setting, about AD 28–29.

Many of the sayings that Matthew gives here stand in other settings in Luke, for example the Lord's Prayer (Luke 11:1–4). Most scholars conclude that Matthew, and to a lesser degree Luke, arranged sayings spoken on various occasions around a shorter discourse found in a source they shared: see Ulrich Luz, Matthew 1–7: A Commentary (revised edition, 2007). Hans Dieter Betz, The Sermon on the Mount (Hermeneia, 1995), argues instead that the sermon was put together in a Jewish-Christian community before Matthew, who took it over. Others hold that Jesus gave the substance of it on one occasion and repeated its themes elsewhere: see D. A. Carson, "Matthew", in The Expositor's Bible Commentary, vol. 8 (1984).

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 4:25–5:2; 7:28; Matthew 8:1, 5; Luke 7:1; Matthew 5:3–12; Matthew 5:17–20; Matthew 5:21–48; Matthew 6:1–18; Matthew 6:19–34; Matthew 7:1–12; Matthew 7:13–29; Luke 6:17–49; Matthew 4:23–5:2; 9:9; 10:1–4; Luke 6:12–20; Luke 11:1–4

The Didache (The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) Between about AD 50 and 150; most often placed near AD 100
8

On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 393–394
1.1.1

The Schleitheim Confession (Brotherly Union) Swiss Brethren assembled at Schleitheim; drafted by Michael Sattler · 24 February 1527
articles 6–7

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
XVI

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Sea of Galilee
Who Jesus
Threads Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Appoints the Twelve c. AD 28–29 311

The Covenant at Sinai c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 56

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Birth of Jesus Before · c. 6–4 BC 286

The Last Supper After · AD 30 or 33 346

← Jesus Appoints the Twelve Earlier · c. AD 28–29
→ The Execution of John the Baptist Later · c. AD 28–32

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Execution of John the Baptist

c. AD 28–32 · Estimated date

Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, has John the Baptist put to death. The Gospels tell of a beheading in prison and connect it with John's rebuke of the tetrarch's marriage to Herodias; Josephus places the death at Machaerus and gives a political motive.

Herod Antipas, who ruled Galilee and Perea, had long been married to a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabataean Arabs. Josephus relates that on a journey to Rome he stayed with a half-brother, fell in love with that brother's wife, Herodias, and agreed to marry her and send his own wife away. The Nabataean princess learned of the plan and escaped to her father by way of the border fortress of Machaerus (Josephus, Antiquities 18.109–112). Herodias was herself a granddaughter of Herod the Great (Josephus, Antiquities 18.109–112), and Josephus says that in leaving a living husband for his brother she defied the ancestral laws (Josephus, Antiquities 18.136–137).

The Gospels say that John the Baptist told the tetrarch, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife", and that Antipas put him in prison because of Herodias (Mark 6:17–18) (Luke 3:19–20). The law of Moses forbade a man to take his brother's wife (Leviticus 18:16; 20:21).

Mark tells the end at length. Herodias wanted John dead, but Antipas feared him, knowing him to be "a righteous and holy man", and kept him safe. At a banquet on the tetrarch's birthday for his courtiers, officers and the leading men of Galilee, the daughter of Herodias danced, and Antipas swore to give her whatever she asked. Prompted by her mother she asked for the head of John the Baptist on a platter. The tetrarch was distressed but would not break his oath before his guests. A guard beheaded John in the prison, and his disciples came and buried the body (Mark 6:19–29). Matthew tells the same story more briefly and says that Antipas had wanted to kill John but feared the people (Matthew 14:3–12). Neither Gospel names the place. Matthew does not name the girl (Matthew 14:6). In Mark the manuscripts differ: the translation quoted here reads "the daughter of Herodias herself", while the linked translation follows manuscripts in which the girl is herself named Herodias and is called the tetrarch's daughter (Mark 6:22).

Josephus names the place and gives a different motive. He also names a daughter of Herodias by her first marriage, Salome, without connecting her with John's death (Josephus, Antiquities 18.136–137). Antipas, he says, feared that John's hold over the crowds might lead to a rising, thought it better to strike first, and sent him in chains to Machaerus, where he was put to death (Josephus, Antiquities 18.116–119). His account of John says nothing of the banquet or of John's words about the marriage. He also calls the first husband of Herodias simply Herod, where Mark calls him Philip (Josephus, Antiquities 18.136–137) (Mark 6:17); the "Philip" printed in brackets in the linked translation was added by the translator.

When Antipas later heard of the works of Jesus, the Gospels report, he said that John, whom he had beheaded, had been raised from the dead (Mark 6:14–16). In Mark and Matthew, Jesus speaks of John as the Elijah who had already come and had been treated as his opponents pleased (Mark 9:11–13) (Matthew 17:10–13).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Neither source dates the execution. The Gospels place it during the Galilean ministry of Jesus, before the feeding of the five thousand (Mark 6:14–32) (Matthew 14:12–13). If John began to preach in AD 28–29 and Jesus was crucified in AD 30 or 33, the death falls between about AD 28 and 32; the timeline uses c. AD 29. See Harold W. Hoehner, Herod Antipas (1972).

Josephus mentions the death only in looking back. He says that when the Nabataean king Aretas destroyed the army of Antipas, some Jews saw in the defeat a punishment for what Antipas had done to John (Josephus, Antiquities 18.116–119). That battle was fought not long before Tiberius died in March AD 37, for the Roman reprisal was called off at the news of his death (Josephus, Antiquities 18.113–115) (Josephus, Antiquities 18.120–124). Josephus does not say how many years separated the execution from the battle. A minority of scholars infer that John died about AD 35 and date the crucifixion to AD 36: Nikos Kokkinos, "Crucifixion in A.D. 36", in Chronos, Kairos, Christos, edited by J. Vardaman and E. M. Yamauchi (1989).

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 6:17–18; Luke 3:19–20; Leviticus 18:16; 20:21; Mark 6:19–29; Matthew 14:3–12; Matthew 14:6; Mark 6:22; Mark 6:17; Mark 6:14–16; Mark 9:11–13; Matthew 17:10–13; Mark 6:14–32; Matthew 14:12–13

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.109–112; 18.136–137; 18.116–119; 18.113–115; 18.120–124

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Machaerus
Who John the Baptist, Herod Antipas, Herodias
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan c. AD 28–29 299

LEADS TO

The Feeding of the Five Thousand c. AD 29 or 32 323

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Maccabean Revolt and the Rededication of the Temple Before · 167–164 BC 253

The Martyrdom of Stephen After · c. AD 34 382

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee Before · c. AD 28–29 307

The Transfiguration After · c. AD 29 or 32 331

← The Sermon on the Mount Earlier · c. AD 28–29
→ The Feeding of the Five Thousand Later · c. AD 29 or 32

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Feeding of the Five Thousand

c. AD 29 or 32 · Estimated date

In a lonely place by the Sea of Galilee, all four Gospels relate, Jesus feeds a crowd of about five thousand with five loaves and two fish. John adds that the crowd wanted to make him king, and the discourse on the bread of life.

This is the only miracle of the Galilean ministry told in all four Gospels (Mark 6:30–44) (Matthew 14:13–21) (Luke 9:10–17) (John 6:1–15). In Mark the Twelve have just returned from their mission, and Jesus takes them away by boat on the lake to a deserted place to rest. Matthew adds that he had just heard of the death of John the Baptist. The crowds saw them go and followed on foot. Jesus had compassion on them, Mark says, "because they were like sheep without a shepherd", and he taught them; Matthew and Luke say that he healed their sick (Mark 6:30–34) (Matthew 14:12–14) (Luke 9:10–11). Luke sets the scene near Bethsaida.

As Mark tells it, late in the day the disciples asked him to send the people away to buy food. He answered, "You give them something to eat." They had five loaves and two fish; in John it is Andrew who points out a boy carrying five barley loaves and two fish. Jesus had the people sit down on the grass. He took the loaves, looked up to heaven, blessed and broke them, and gave them to the disciples to hand out, and he divided the fish. All ate and were satisfied, and the disciples filled twelve baskets with what was left. The men numbered about five thousand; Matthew adds that there were women and children besides (Mark 6:35–44) (Matthew 14:15–21) (John 6:5–13).

John alone reports the reaction. The people said, "This is truly the prophet who comes into the world", and Jesus, seeing that they meant to take him by force and make him king, withdrew to the mountain by himself (John 6:14–15). That night, according to Mark, Matthew and John, the disciples in their boat saw him walking on the sea (Mark 6:45–52) (Matthew 14:22–33) (John 6:16–21). Mark and Matthew also tell of a second feeding, of four thousand people with seven loaves (Mark 8:1–10, 19–20) (Matthew 15:32–39).

In John the crowd finds Jesus the next day at Capernaum, and he speaks in the synagogue there about the manna their ancestors ate in the wilderness and about himself: "I am the bread of life." He says that the bread he will give is his flesh, for the life of the world. Many of his disciples found the saying hard and left him. When he asked the Twelve whether they too would go, Peter answered, "You have the words of eternal life" (John 6:22–69).

The story recalls the account in Kings of Elisha feeding a hundred men with twenty barley loaves, with some left over (2 Kings 4:42–44), and the manna that Exodus says was given in the time of Moses (Exodus 16:4, 14–15). The actions of taking, blessing, breaking and giving return in the accounts of the Last Supper (Mark 6:41; 14:22).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

John says that the Passover was near (John 6:4), and Mark mentions green grass (Mark 6:39), so the Gospels set the event in spring. In John's outline this is the Passover one year before the one at which Jesus died (John 11:55). With a crucifixion in AD 30 that is the spring of AD 29, the year used here; with a crucifixion in AD 33 it is AD 32. See Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (1977), in the chapter on the duration of Christ's ministry.

The Gospels do not agree exactly on the place. Luke says that Jesus had withdrawn towards "a city called Bethsaida" (Luke 9:10). Mark has the disciples sent off by boat afterwards "to the other side, to Bethsaida" (Mark 6:45). John puts the scene across the lake from Capernaum and says that boats from Tiberias came near the spot (John 6:1, 17, 23). The first three Gospels speak of a deserted place, and Mark, Matthew and John have Jesus cross the lake to reach it. The exact site is unknown, and the site of Bethsaida is itself disputed; see Bethsaida.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 6:30–44; Matthew 14:13–21; Luke 9:10–17; John 6:1–15; Mark 6:30–34; Matthew 14:12–14; Luke 9:10–11; Mark 6:35–44; Matthew 14:15–21; John 6:5–13; John 6:14–15; Mark 6:45–52; Matthew 14:22–33; John 6:16–21; Mark 8:1–10, 19–20; Matthew 15:32–39; John 6:22–69; 2 Kings 4:42–44; Exodus 16:4, 14–15; Mark 6:41; 14:22; John 6:4; Mark 6:39; John 11:55; Luke 9:10; Mark 6:45; John 6:1, 17, 23

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethsaida, Sea of Galilee, Capernaum
Who Jesus, Andrew, Peter
Threads Temple and Worship, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee c. AD 28–29 307

The Execution of John the Baptist c. AD 28–32 319

LEADS TO

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Herod Rebuilds the Temple Before · 20/19 BC 280

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple After · AD 30 or 33 342

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Jesus Begins His Ministry in Galilee Before · c. AD 28–29 307
Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi After · c. AD 29 or 32 327

← The Execution of John the Baptist Earlier · c. AD 28–32
→ Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi Later · c. AD 29 or 32

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi

c. AD 29 or 32 · Estimated date

Mark and Matthew tell how, near Caesarea Philippi, Jesus asks his disciples who they say he is, and Peter answers: You are the Christ. Jesus then begins to speak of his coming suffering and death. Matthew adds the saying about the rock and the keys.

Mark sets the scene on the road among the villages of Caesarea Philippi, the city that the tetrarch Philip had built at the sources of the Jordan (Josephus, Antiquities 18.28). Jesus asked his disciples, "Who do men say that I am?" They answered that some said John the Baptist, others Elijah, others one of the prophets. He asked, "But who do you say that I am?" and Peter answered, "You are the Christ." Jesus ordered them to tell no one (Mark 8:27–30). Luke tells the same exchange without naming a place (Luke 9:18–21).

Matthew's account is longer. Peter says, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God", and Jesus replies that this has been revealed to him by the Father. He goes on: "you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my assembly, and the gates of Hades will not prevail against it." "Assembly" renders the Greek word usually translated "church". He promises Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven and says that what he binds and looses on earth will be bound and loosed in heaven (Matthew 16:13–20). The saying plays on the name Peter, in Aramaic Cephas, which means rock (John 1:42). Two chapters later the same words about binding and loosing are addressed to the disciples in the plural (Matthew 18:18).

In all three Gospels a prediction of suffering follows the confession. Jesus at once begins to teach that the Son of Man must suffer, be rejected and killed, and rise again. In Mark and Matthew, Peter protests and is rebuked: "Get behind me, Satan!" Jesus then tells his hearers that anyone who would follow him must take up his cross (Mark 8:31–38) (Matthew 16:21–28) (Luke 9:22–27). John's Gospel has a comparable confession by Peter at Capernaum (John 6:66–69).

The churches read Matthew's saying differently, and the difference bears on how the church is governed. The Catholic Church teaches that Christ built his church on Peter, who because of the faith he confessed remains its rock, that he gave Peter the keys, and that this office continues in the bishop of Rome as Peter's successor (Catechism of the Catholic Church 552) (Catechism of the Catholic Church 881–882). The Orthodox patriarchs, replying to Pope Pius IX in 1848, wrote that the church is founded on the rock of Peter's confession, which they call the answer of the apostles in common, and that the command "Feed my sheep" gave Peter no prerogative over the other apostles (Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs (1848) § 11). The Lutheran confessions likewise take the rock to be "the ministry of the confession which Peter made" and not his person, and hold that the keys belong to the whole church (Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope 22–29).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels give no date. Mark and Matthew place the scene after the two feedings and six days before the transfiguration (Mark 8:27; 9:2) (Matthew 16:13; 17:1). The timeline sets it in the later part of the Galilean ministry, about AD 29; on the chronology that puts the crucifixion in AD 33 it would be about AD 32.

The words about the rock and the keys stand only in Matthew (Matthew 16:17–19). Scholars differ on whether they were spoken on this occasion, on another, or took shape in the early church: the range of views is set out in Raymond E. Brown, Karl P. Donfried and John Reumann (editors), Peter in the New Testament (1973), a joint study by Protestant and Catholic scholars, and in Oscar Cullmann, Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr (2nd edition, 1962).

Primary sources

Scripture
Mark 8:27–30; Luke 9:18–21; Matthew 16:13–20; John 1:42; Matthew 18:18; Mark 8:31–38; Matthew 16:21–28; Luke 9:22–27; John 6:66–69; Mark 8:27; 9:2; Matthew 16:13; 17:1; Matthew 16:17–19

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.28

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
552; 881–882

Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem with their synods · May 1848
§ 11

Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope Philip Melanchthon; subscribed by the theologians assembled at Smalcald · February 1537
22–29

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Caesarea Philippi
Who Jesus, Peter
Threads Kingship and Messiah, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Appoints the Twelve c. AD 28–29 311
The Feeding of the Five Thousand c. AD 29 or 32 323

LEADS TO

The Transfiguration c. AD 29 or 32 331
Jesus Enters Jerusalem AD 30 or 33 338
The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul c. AD 64–68 453

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Feeding of the Five Thousand Before · c. AD 29 or 32 323
The Transfiguration After · c. AD 29 or 32 331

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Jesus Appoints the Twelve Before · c. AD 28–29 311
The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul After · c. AD 64–68 453

← The Feeding of the Five Thousand Earlier · c. AD 29 or 32
→ The Transfiguration Later · c. AD 29 or 32

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Transfiguration

c. AD 29 or 32 · Estimated date

Mark, Matthew and Luke tell how three disciples on a high mountain see Jesus changed in appearance, his clothes shining white, with Moses and Elijah beside him, and hear a voice from a cloud call him “my beloved Son”. The Gospels do not name the mountain.

Six days after Peter had called him the Christ, Mark and Matthew say, Jesus took Peter, James Son of Zebedee and John the Apostle up a high mountain by themselves (Mark 8:29; 9:2; Matthew 17:1). Luke says “about eight days”, and that he went up to pray (Luke 9:28).

There, the three Gospels report, his appearance changed in front of them. Mark says that his clothing became “glistening, exceedingly white” (Mark 9:2–3). Matthew adds that his face shone like the sun (Matthew 17:2). Moses and Elijah appeared and talked with him (Mark 9:4). Only Luke gives the subject: they spoke of his “departure”, which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem (Luke 9:30–31).

Peter proposed to make three tents, one each for Jesus, Moses and Elijah; Mark remarks that he did not know what to say, because they were very afraid (Mark 9:5–6).

A cloud then overshadowed them, and a voice came out of it: "This is my beloved Son. Listen to him" (Mark 9:7). In Matthew the disciples fell on their faces, and Jesus touched them and told them not to be afraid (Matthew 17:6–7). When they looked around they saw only Jesus (Mark 9:8). On the way down he ordered them to tell no one what they had seen until the Son of Man had risen from the dead (Mark 9:9). They asked why the scribes said that Elijah must come first. He answered that Elijah had already come and had been treated as people pleased (Mark 9:11–13); Matthew notes that the disciples understood him to mean John the Baptist (Matthew 17:13).

The Gospels do not name the mountain. Cyril of Jerusalem, teaching about three hundred years later, speaks of the transfiguration "on Mount Tabor" (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical Lectures 12.16), and Mount Tabor in Galilee is the traditional site.

In all three Gospels the scene stands between Jesus's first announcement that he must suffer and be killed (Mark 8:31) and his journey to Jerusalem. The voice echoes the one at his baptism (Mark 1:11), and the two figures beside him are the lawgiver and the prophet whose return Malachi had promised (Malachi 4:4–5). The second letter of Peter appeals to the event as something its author saw and heard: "we were eyewitnesses of his majesty", and "we heard this voice come out of heaven when we were with him on the holy mountain" (2 Peter 1:16–18).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels give no year. Mark and Matthew set the event six days after Peter's confession near Caesarea Philippi (Mark 8:27–29; 9:2; Matthew 17:1), and Luke "about eight days" after it (Luke 9:28). It stands in all three shortly before Jesus leaves Galilee for Judea and Jerusalem for the last time (Mark 10:1, 32; Matthew 19:1; Luke 9:51). The year therefore depends on the year of the crucifixion: about AD 29 if Jesus died in AD 30, about AD 32 if he died in AD 33. The evidence for those two years is set out under the Crucifixion.

The place is not fixed either. The Gospels speak only of "a high mountain" (Mark 9:2) and the second letter of Peter of "the holy mountain" (2 Peter 1:18). By about AD 350 Cyril of Jerusalem names Mount Tabor (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical Lectures 12.16), and that tradition is followed on the map. Modern writers have also proposed Mount Hermon, which rises above Caesarea Philippi, where the preceding scene is set (Mark 8:27).

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 8:29; 9:2; Matthew 17:1; Luke 9:28; Mark 9:2–3; Matthew 17:2; Mark 9:4; Luke 9:30–31; Mark 9:5–6; Mark 9:7; Matthew 17:6–7; Mark 9:8; Mark 9:9; Mark 9:11–13; Matthew 17:13; Mark 8:31; Mark 1:11; Malachi 4:4–5; 2 Peter 1:16–18; Mark 8:27–29; 9:2; Matthew 17:1; Mark 10:1, 32; Matthew 19:1; Luke 9:51; Mark 9:2; 2 Peter 1:18; Mark 8:27

Catechetical Lectures Cyril of Jerusalem · c. AD 350
12.16

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Tabor
Who Jesus, Peter, James Son of Zebedee, John the Apostle
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Execution of John the Baptist Before · c. AD 28–32 319
Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple After · AD 30 or 33 342

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi Before · c. AD 29 or 32 327
The Raising of Lazarus After · AD 30 or 33 335

← Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi Earlier · c. AD 29 or 32
→ The Raising of Lazarus Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Raising of Lazarus

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

John reports that Jesus called his friend Lazarus out of the tomb at Bethany four days after his death. Many believed, and the council in Jerusalem, on the advice of the high priest Caiaphas, resolved that Jesus must die.

John tells that Lazarus of Bethany, the brother of Martha and Mary of Bethany, fell ill, and that his sisters sent word to Jesus, who was then beyond the Jordan (John 10:40; 11:1–3). Jesus stayed where he was for two more days. Then he told his disciples plainly that Lazarus was dead and that he was going to him (John 11:6, 14–15). They reminded him that people in Judea had just tried to stone him, and Thomas said to the others, “Let’s go also, that we may die with him” (John 11:8, 16).

When Jesus arrived, Lazarus had been in the tomb four days. Bethany lay about fifteen stadia from Jerusalem, a little under three kilometres, and many had come out to console the sisters (John 11:17–19). Martha went to meet Jesus and said that her brother would not have died if he had been there. He answered, "I am the resurrection and the life," and she replied that she believed him to be "the Christ, God's Son, he who comes into the world" (John 11:20–27). Mary came and fell at his feet with the same words. Seeing her weep, and the mourners with her, Jesus was troubled, and he wept (John 11:32–35).

The tomb was a cave with a stone laid against it. Jesus told them to take the stone away. Martha objected that after four days there would be a stench. He prayed aloud and then cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come out!" John says that the dead man came out, bound hand and foot with wrappings, and that Jesus told them to free him (John 11:38–44).

Many who saw it believed in Jesus; others went and told the Pharisees. The chief priests and Pharisees called a council and said that if they let him go on, everyone would believe in him and the Romans would take away "both our place and our nation". Caiaphas, the high priest, told them that it was better for one man to die for the people than for the whole nation to perish, and from that day they planned his death (John 11:45–53). Jesus withdrew to a town called Ephraim near the wilderness (John 11:54).

In John's Gospel this sign leads directly to the last week. Six days before the Passover Jesus was again at Bethany, at a supper where Lazarus sat at table (John 12:1–2). The chief priests planned to kill Lazarus as well, because many believed on his account (John 12:10–11), and the crowd that went out to meet Jesus as he rode into Jerusalem did so because they had heard of the sign (John 12:17–18).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

John places the event between the feast of Dedication, in winter (John 10:22–23, 40), and the last Passover of Jesus's life, which was "at hand" soon afterwards (John 11:55). It therefore belongs to the weeks or months before the crucifixion, in AD 30 or AD 33; the evidence for those two years is set out under the Crucifixion.

Only John tells this story. Mark, Matthew and Luke do not mention it, and in Mark and Luke it is after the incident in the temple that the chief priests look for a way to destroy Jesus (Mark 11:18; Luke 19:45–47). Scholars differ on how John's account relates to the outline of the other three.

Primary sources

Scripture

John 10:40; 11:1–3; John 11:6, 14–15; John 11:8, 16; John 11:17–19; John 11:20–27; John 11:32–35; John 11:38–44; John 11:45–53; John 11:54; John 12:1–2; John 12:10–11; John 12:17–18; John 10:22–23, 40; John 11:55; Mark 11:18; Luke 19:45–47

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bethany
Who Jesus, Lazarus, Martha, Mary of Bethany
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

LEADS TO

Jesus Enters Jerusalem AD 30 or 33 338

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Transfiguration Before · c. AD 29 or 32 331

Jesus Enters Jerusalem After · AD 30 or 33 338

← The Transfiguration Earlier · c. AD 29 or 32
→ Jesus Enters Jerusalem Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Jesus Enters Jerusalem

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

A few days before the Passover Jesus rides into Jerusalem on a donkey from the Mount of Olives. Crowds spread cloaks and branches on the road and hail him with words from Psalm 118, as the one who comes in the name of the Lord.

In Mark's account Jesus came up to Jerusalem shortly before the Passover by way of Bethphage and Bethany, villages on the Mount of Olives (Mark 11:1; 14:1). He sent two disciples into the village ahead to untie a young donkey on which no one had yet sat, and to say to anyone who asked, "The Lord needs him". They brought the colt, threw their cloaks over it, and he sat on it (Mark 11:1–7). Matthew speaks of a donkey and her colt (Matthew 21:2, 7).

Many people spread their cloaks on the road, and others spread branches they had cut (Mark 11:8). John says that the crowd took palm branches and went out from the city to meet him (John 12:12–13). Those who went ahead and those who followed shouted, "Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord!", a cry taken from Psalm 118 (Mark 11:9; Psalm 118:25–26). Each Gospel adds words that speak of a king or of David: "the kingdom of our father David" in Mark, "the son of David" in Matthew, "the King" in Luke, "the King of Israel" in John (Mark 11:10; Matthew 21:9; Luke 19:38; John 12:13).

Matthew and John connect this with the words of the prophet Zechariah, who told Zion that her king would come to her lowly and riding on a donkey (Zechariah 9:9; Matthew 21:4–5; John 12:14–15). John adds that the disciples understood this only later (John 12:16), and that the crowd came out because it had heard of the raising of Lazarus (John 12:17–18).

Luke reports that some Pharisees asked Jesus to silence his disciples, and that he answered that the stones would cry out if they were silent. As the city came into view he wept over it and said that its enemies would surround it and leave not one stone on another (Luke 19:39–44). In Matthew the whole city was stirred and asked who this was, and the crowds answered, "This is the prophet, Jesus, from Nazareth of Galilee" (Matthew 21:10–11). In Mark he went into the temple, looked around at everything and, as it was already evening, went back to Bethany with the twelve (Mark 11:11).

Earlier, in Galilee, Jesus had withdrawn when a crowd wanted to make him king (John 6:15). Here he accepts the acclamation, and the week that opens with it ends with his execution under the title "King of the Jews" (Mark 15:26). Christians keep its memory on Palm Sunday. Egeria, a pilgrim in Jerusalem in the 380s, describes the people of the city coming down from the Mount of Olives on that day with branches of palm and olive, escorting their bishop as the Lord had been escorted (Egeria, Itinerary 31.2–3).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

All four Gospels place the entry at the beginning of Jesus's last stay in Jerusalem, shortly before the Passover at which he died. John counts the days: Jesus came to Bethany six days before the Passover and rode into the city on the next day (John 12:1, 12). Mark gives no count for the entry itself, but two days before the feast Jesus has already been in the city for some days (Mark 11:11–12, 20; 14:1).

The churches keep the day on the Sunday before Easter, which matches John's count as it is usually reckoned.

The year is the year of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33. The evidence for each is set out under the Crucifixion.

Primary sources

Scripture
Mark 11:1; 14:1; Mark 11:1–7; Matthew 21:2, 7; Mark 11:8; John 12:12–13; Mark 11:9; Psalm 118:25–26; Mark 11:10; Matthew 21:9; Luke 19:38; John 12:13; Zechariah 9:9; Matthew 21:4–5; John 12:14–15; John 12:16; John 12:17–18; Luke 19:39–44; Matthew 21:10–11; Mark 11:11; John 6:15; Mark 15:26; John 12:1, 12; Mark 11:11–12, 20; 14:1

Itinerary (The Pilgrimage of Egeria) Egeria · c. AD 381–384
31.2–3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Mount of Olives, Bethany
Who Jesus
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327

The Raising of Lazarus AD 30 or 33 335

LEADS TO

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple AD 30 or 33 342

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Raising of Lazarus Before · AD 30 or 33 335

The Trials before the Council and Pilate After · AD 30 or 33 354

← The Raising of Lazarus Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

Jesus overturns the tables of the money changers in the temple courts and drives out those buying and selling, calling the place a house of prayer made into a den of robbers. Three Gospels set this in his last week, John at the start of his ministry.

In Mark's account, on the day after he rode into Jerusalem, Jesus went into the temple and began to drive out those who were selling and buying there. He overturned the tables of the money changers and the seats of those who sold doves, and he would not let anyone carry anything through the temple (Mark 11:12, 15–16). Matthew and Luke tell the same incident straight after the entry into the city (Matthew 21:10–12; Luke 19:45).

He taught as he did it: "Isn't it written, 'My house will be called a house of prayer for all the nations?' But you have made it a den of robbers!" (Mark 11:17). The first phrase comes from Isaiah's promise that foreigners will be welcome in the temple (Isaiah 56:6–7). The second comes from the sermon in which Jeremiah warned that the temple would be destroyed as Shiloh had been (Jeremiah 7:11–14). Matthew adds that the blind and the lame came to Jesus in the temple and he healed them, and that children were shouting "Hosanna to the son of David" (Matthew 21:14–15).

The chief priests and the scribes heard of it and looked for a way to destroy him, but they feared him, because the crowd was astonished at his teaching (Mark 11:18). When he came back to the temple, the chief priests, scribes and elders asked him by what authority he did these things. He replied with a question of his own, whether the baptism of John was from heaven or from men. They would not answer, and he declined to answer them (Mark 11:27–33).

John tells the incident near the beginning of his Gospel, at an earlier Passover. Jesus found people selling oxen, sheep and doves, and money changers at their tables. He made a whip of cords, drove them all out with the animals, poured out the coins and said, "Don't make my Father's house a marketplace!" (John 2:13–16). Asked for a sign, he answered, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." John explains that he was speaking of the temple of his body, and that the disciples remembered it after he was raised from the dead (John 2:18–22).

A saying about the temple follows Jesus to his death. At the hearing before the high priest, Mark says, false witnesses claimed to have heard him speak of destroying the temple and building another in three days, and passers-by threw the same words at him on the cross (Mark 14:57–58; 15:29). The temple itself, which Herod the Great had begun to rebuild some fifty years earlier (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380), was destroyed by the Romans in AD 70; see the Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Mark, Matthew and Luke place the incident in the days after Jesus rode into Jerusalem for his last Passover (Mark 11:11–15; Matthew 21:10–12; Luke 19:45). John tells it at an earlier Passover, near the beginning of Jesus's public work and two Passovers before the last one (John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55). The timeline follows the three and gives the year of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33 (see the Crucifixion).

The difference has been explained in two ways. Augustine, about AD 400, concluded that Jesus did this twice, John recording the first occasion and the others the second (Augustine, Harmony of the Gospels 2.67.129). Most modern scholars think that there was one incident which the Gospels place differently, and most of these set it in the last week; so, for example, E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (1985), chapter 1.

If John's setting is followed, the remark that the temple had been forty-six years in building (John 2:20) points to about AD 27 or 28, since Josephus, in the Antiquities, dates the start of Herod's rebuilding to the eighteenth year of his reign (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380), usually reckoned as 20/19 BC.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 11:12, 15–16; Matthew 21:10–12; Luke 19:45; Mark 11:17; Isaiah 56:6–7; Jeremiah 7:11–14; Matthew 21:14–15; Mark 11:18; Mark 11:27–33; John 2:13–16; John 2:18–22; Mark 14:57–58; 15:29; Mark 11:11–15; Matthew 21:10–12; Luke 19:45; John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55; John 2:20

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
15.380

The Harmony of the Gospels Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 400
2.67.129

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Jesus
Threads Temple and Worship, Prophets and Prophecy

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Enters Jerusalem AD 30 or 33 338
Herod Rebuilds the Temple 20/19 BC 280

LEADS TO

The Last Supper AD 30 or 33 346

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Feeding of the Five Thousand Before · c. AD 29 or 32 323

The Last Supper After · AD 30 or 33 346

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

The Transfiguration Before · c. AD 29 or 32 331

John's Revelation on Patmos After · c. AD 95 474

← Jesus Enters Jerusalem Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Last Supper Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Last Supper

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

On the night before he dies Jesus eats with the twelve in Jerusalem, gives them bread and a cup, calling them his body and his blood of the covenant, and foretells his betrayal. John tells instead how he washed their feet. The Gospels differ on the day.

On the first day of Unleavened Bread, Mark says, when the Passover lamb was sacrificed, Jesus sent two disciples into Jerusalem to prepare the meal in a large upper room (Mark 14:12–16). Luke names them as Peter and John the Apostle (Luke 22:8). When evening came he arrived with the twelve (Mark 14:17).

While they were eating he said that one of them would betray him (Mark 14:18–21). Judas Iscariot had already agreed with the chief priests to hand him over (Mark 14:10–11). In John, Jesus gave a piece of bread to Judas, who went out at once: “It was night” (John 13:21–30).

Mark continues: "Jesus took bread, and when he had blessed, he broke it, and gave to them, and said, 'Take, eat. This is my body.'" He took a cup, gave thanks, and they all drank from it. He called it his blood of the covenant, poured out for many, and said that he would not drink wine again until he drank it new in the kingdom of God (Mark 14:22–25). Matthew adds "for the remission of sins" (Matthew 26:28). (The World English Bible, from which this entry quotes, reads "new covenant" in Mark and Matthew; the NRSVUE, which the links open, reads "covenant" and notes that other ancient authorities add "new".) Luke adds the command "Do this in memory of me" and words the saying over the cup as "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (Luke 22:19–20). The words recall the blood of the covenant at Sinai and Jeremiah's promise of a new covenant (Exodus 24:8; Jeremiah 31:31).

Paul's account is usually dated earlier than those of the Gospels. Writing to Corinth in the 50s, he gives the words over the bread and the cup as something he had "received" and had already handed on to that church (1 Corinthians 11:23–25).

John, who sets the meal "before the feast of the Passover", reports no words over bread and cup (John 13:1–2). In his Gospel Jesus rose from the supper, washed the disciples' feet and told them to do the same for one another (John 13:3–15). He gave them a "new commandment", to love one another as he had loved them (John 13:34–35), and foretold that Peter would deny him three times before the cock crowed (John 13:38). A long farewell follows, on his going to the Father and the coming of the Spirit, and a prayer for the disciples and for those who would believe through them, "that they may all be one" (John 14:1–3, 16–17; 16:7; 17:20–21).

Paul already speaks of the meal as one the church repeats, to "proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Corinthians 11:26). Christians differ on what the words over the bread and cup mean. The Council of Trent teaches for the Catholic Church that the substance of the bread and wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ (Council of Trent Session 13, chapter 4), and the Orthodox Confession of Dositheus of 1672 uses the same language (Confession of Dositheus decree 17 (pp. 143–149)). The Lutheran Augsburg Confession says that the body and blood are "truly present" and distributed (Augsburg Confession article 10). The Reformed Heidelberg Catechism says that the bread "does not become the body of Christ itself", though it is called so "agreeably to the nature and usage of sacraments", and that believers are nonetheless "as really partakers of his true body and blood, through the working of the Holy Ghost", as they receive the signs with the mouth (Heidelberg Catechism questions 78 and 79). The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England reject a change of substance and say that the body of Christ is received by faith, in a "heavenly and spiritual manner" (Thirty-Nine Articles article 28).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

All four Gospels set the supper on the night before Jesus died, and his death on the day before a Sabbath, a Friday (Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31). They differ on how that night stood to the Passover. In Mark, Matthew and Luke the supper is the Passover meal itself, prepared on the day the lambs were sacrificed and eaten that evening (Mark 14:12–17; Matthew 26:17–20; Luke 22:7–15), as the law prescribes for the fourteenth day of the first month (Exodus 12:2, 6–8). In John, on the morning after the supper Jesus's accusers have still to "eat the Passover" (John 18:28), and he is condemned on "the Preparation Day of the Passover" (John 19:14), so that the supper falls a day before the Passover meal.

Three kinds of explanation are offered. Some follow the first three Gospels and hold that the supper was a Passover meal; so Joachim Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (English edition 1966). Some follow John and hold that it was eaten a day before the Passover; so John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1 (1991), chapter 11. Some propose that two calendars were in use, so that both could be right; so Annie Jaubert, The Date of the Last Supper (French 1957, English 1965). Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah (1994), appendix II, reviews the proposals.

The year is the year of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33; see the Crucifixion.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 14:12–16; Luke 22:8; Mark 14:17; Mark 14:18–21; Mark 14:10–11; John 13:21–30; Mark 14:22–25; Matthew 26:28; Luke 22:19–20; Exodus 24:8; Jeremiah 31:31; 1 Corinthians 11:23–25; John 13:1–2; John 13:3–15; John 13:34–35; John 13:38; John 14:1–3, 16–17; 16:7; 17:20–21; 1 Corinthians 11:26; Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31; Mark 14:12–17; Matthew 26:17–20; Luke 22:7–15; Exodus 12:2, 6–8; John 18:28; John 19:14

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 13, chapter 4

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
decree 17 (pp. 143–149)

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
article 10

The Heidelberg Catechism Theologians and ministers of the Palatinate, by order of the elector Frederick III · 1563
questions 78 and 79

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 28

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Jesus, Peter, John the Apostle, Judas Iscariot
Threads Covenant and Promise, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple AD 30 or 33 342
The Exodus from Egypt c. 1446 or c. 1260 BC 52
The Call of Jeremiah 627 BC 172

LEADS TO

Gethsemane and the Arrest AD 30 or 33 351

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Sermon on the Mount Before · c. AD 28–29 315

The Crucifixion After · AD 30 or 33 359

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple Before · AD 30 or 33 342

The Crucifixion After · AD 30 or 33 359

← Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ Gethsemane and the Arrest Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

Gethsemane and the Arrest

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

After the supper Jesus prays in distress at Gethsemane on the Mount of Olives while his disciples sleep. Judas arrives with an armed party and identifies him with a kiss. Jesus is seized and the disciples flee.

When they had sung a hymn after the supper, Jesus and his disciples went out of the city, across the Kidron valley, to the Mount of Olives (Mark 14:26; John 18:1). Mark and Matthew name the place: Gethsemane (Mark 14:32; Matthew 26:36). John calls it a garden and says that Jesus often met there with his disciples, so that Judas knew it (John 18:1–2).

In Mark's account Jesus told the disciples to sit while he prayed, and took Peter, James and John further with him. He became greatly distressed and said to them, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even to death. Stay here, and watch" (Mark 14:32–34). He went a little further, fell on the ground and prayed: "Abba, Father, all things are possible to you. Please remove this cup from me. However, not what I desire, but what you desire" (Mark 14:35–36). Three times he came back and found the three asleep (Mark 14:37–41). Luke's account adds, in two verses that some ancient manuscripts lack, that an angel appeared and strengthened him, and that his sweat fell to the ground like great drops of blood (Luke 22:43–44).

While he was still speaking, Judas arrived with a crowd carrying swords and clubs, sent by the chief priests, scribes and elders (Mark 14:43). John speaks of a detachment of soldiers together with officers of the chief priests and Pharisees, carrying lanterns and torches (John 18:3). Judas had arranged a sign: he went up to Jesus, called him "Rabbi" and kissed him, and they seized him (Mark 14:44–46). In John, Jesus stepped forward himself, asked whom they were looking for, and answered, "I am he" (John 18:4–5).

One of those standing by drew a sword and cut off the ear of the high priest's servant (Mark 14:47). John says that it was Peter and that the servant's name was Malchus (John 18:10). In Matthew, Jesus told him to put the sword away, "for all those who take the sword will die by the sword" (Matthew 26:52), and in Luke he healed the man (Luke 22:51). Jesus asked the crowd why they had come for him with weapons as if for a robber, when he had taught daily in the temple (Mark 14:48–49). Then all the disciples left him and fled (Mark 14:50). He was bound and led to the high priest (John 18:12–13; Mark 14:53).

In the Gospels the prayer shows Jesus shrinking from death and accepting it, and the letter to the Hebrews recalls his "prayers and petitions with strong crying and tears" (Hebrews 5:7–8). By the 380s the pilgrim Egeria found a church at the place where he was said to have prayed. She describes the people of Jerusalem going down the mount by candlelight on the night before Good Friday to Gethsemane, where the account of the arrest was read aloud (Egeria, Itinerary 36.1–3).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The arrest took place in the night between the last supper and the crucifixion (Mark 14:17, 26, 32; 15:1). Since all four Gospels put the crucifixion on the day before a Sabbath (Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31), this was the night from Thursday to Friday. The year is the year of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33; the evidence is set out under the Crucifixion.

The Gospels name the place but do not describe where it lay beyond the Kidron valley and the Mount of Olives (Mark 14:26, 32; John 18:1). The site shown today at the foot of the mount rests on a tradition that can be followed back to the fourth century (Egeria, Itinerary 36.1–3).

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 14:26; John 18:1; Mark 14:32; Matthew 26:36; John 18:1–2; Mark 14:32–34; Mark 14:35–36; Mark 14:37–41; Luke 22:43–44; Mark 14:43; John 18:3; Mark 14:44–46; John 18:4–5; Mark 14:47; John 18:10; Matthew 26:52; Luke 22:51; Mark 14:48–49; Mark 14:50; John 18:12–13; Mark 14:53; Hebrews 5:7–8; Mark 14:17, 26, 32; 15:1; Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31; Mark 14:26, 32; John 18:1

Itinerary (The Pilgrimage of Egeria) Egeria · c. AD 381–384
36.1–3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Gethsemane, Mount of Olives
Who Jesus, Judas Iscariot, Peter

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Last Supper AD 30 or 33 346

LEADS TO

The Trials before the Council and Pilate AD 30 or 33 354

← The Last Supper Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Trials before the Council and Pilate Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Trials before the Council and Pilate

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

The Gospels tell how Jesus is questioned before the high priest Caiaphas and the council, judged guilty of blasphemy, and handed in the morning to the Roman prefect Pontius Pilate, who has him flogged and orders him crucified as “King of the Jews”.

Those who arrested Jesus took him to the high priest; John says that he was led first to Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas, and then to Caiaphas, the high priest that year (John 18:13, 24). In Mark the chief priests, elders and scribes gathered that night and looked for testimony against him. The witnesses did not agree, and some said that he had spoken of destroying the temple (Mark 14:53–59). Then the high priest asked, “Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?” Jesus answered, “I am. You will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of the sky.” The high priest tore his clothes and called it blasphemy, and they all judged him to deserve death (Mark 14:61–64). In the courtyard below, Peter three times denied that he knew him (Mark 14:66–72).

In the morning the council handed Jesus over to Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor (Mark 15:1; Matthew 27:1–2). In John the accusers tell Pilate that they are not permitted to put anyone to death (John 18:31). Luke gives the charge as misleading the nation, forbidding the payment of taxes to Caesar and calling himself "Christ, a king" (Luke 23:2). Pilate asked, "Are you the King of the Jews?", and Jesus answered, "So you say" (Mark 15:2). In John he adds, "My Kingdom is not of this world" (John 18:36). Luke alone reports that Pilate, learning that Jesus was a Galilean, sent him to Herod Antipas, who was then in Jerusalem. Herod questioned him, mocked him and sent him back (Luke 23:6–12).

At the feast, Mark says, the governor used to release a prisoner (Mark 15:6). In Mark, Matthew and Luke a crowd asked for Barabbas, whom Mark and Luke describe as held for insurrection and murder, and shouted for Jesus to be crucified; Mark and Matthew say that the chief priests stirred the crowd up (Mark 15:7–14; Matthew 27:15–23; Luke 23:18–21). In John the same demands come from "the Jews" and from the chief priests and their officers (John 18:38–40; 19:6, 15). Luke and John have Pilate declare that he finds no case against him (Luke 23:4; John 19:6). In John the accusers warn him, "If you release this man, you aren't Caesar's friend" (John 19:12). In Matthew he washes his hands before the crowd, and the people answer, "May his blood be on us, and on our children!" (Matthew 27:24–25). Pilate released Barabbas, had Jesus flogged and handed him over to be crucified (Mark 15:15).

Both judges are known from outside the New Testament. Josephus records the appointment and removal of Joseph Caiaphas (Josephus, Antiquities 18.33–35) (Josephus, Antiquities 18.89, 95), and an ossuary found in Jerusalem bears the name "Joseph son of Caiaphas" (Caiaphas ossuary). An inscription from Caesarea preserves most of Pilate's name and of his title, prefect of Judea; the first letters of each are restored (Pilate Stone lines 2–3). Philo, his contemporary, quotes a letter that calls him inflexible and merciless and says that he removed some gilded shields from Jerusalem only on the order of Tiberius (Philo, Embassy to Gaius 299–305). Josephus describes his clashes with the people over military standards and temple funds (Josephus, Antiquities 18.55–62) (Josephus, Jewish War 2.169–177). None of these passages mentions the trial of Jesus; on Josephus's notice of Jesus see the Crucifixion.

The first letter to Timothy remembers Jesus as the one who "before Pontius Pilate testified the good confession" (1 Timothy 6:13), and Pilate's name passed into the creed: "crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed). The people's answer in Matthew was later read as a judgment on the Jewish people and their descendants. Tertullian, early in the third century, takes it as a condemnation that they called down on themselves and their children and that God then carried out (Tertullian, Against Marcion 2.15). In 1965 the Second Vatican Council rejected the charge of collective guilt. Its declaration Nostra aetate says that, although Jewish authorities and those who followed them pressed for the death of Christ, what happened in his passion cannot be charged against all the Jews then living, without distinction, or against the Jews of today, and that Jews are not to be presented as rejected or accursed by God as if this followed from Scripture. It deplores hatred, persecution and antisemitism directed against Jews at any time and by anyone (Second Vatican Council, Nostra Aetate 4). The Catechism of the Catholic Church applies this to the verse: the crowd's cry does not extend responsibility to Jews of other times and places (Catechism of the Catholic Church 597).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The hearings fill the night and early morning before the crucifixion (Mark 14:53; 15:1, 25). They fall within the years in which both judges held office. Josephus says that Caiaphas was made high priest by the governor Valerius Gratus and that Pilate came as Gratus's successor (Josephus, Antiquities 18.33–35); that Pilate was sent to Rome after ten years in Judea and arrived after the emperor Tiberius had died; and that Caiaphas was deposed in the same period by Vitellius, the governor of Syria (Josephus, Antiquities 18.89, 95). Tiberius died on 16 March AD 37 (Tacitus, Annals 6.50), so Pilate's ten years ran from about AD 26 to the winter of 36/37. Within those limits the year is that of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33; see the Crucifixion.

The accounts of the hearings are those of the four Gospels, and they differ in detail: Mark and Matthew describe a session of the council at night, Luke one at daybreak, and John a questioning before Annas with no formal session (Mark 14:53–55; Matthew 26:57–59; Luke 22:66; John 18:19–24). Historians debate how far the proceedings followed Jewish and Roman legal procedure; Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah (1994), sets out the positions.

Primary sources

Scripture

John 18:13, 24; Mark 14:53–59; Mark 14:61–64; Mark 14:66–72; Mark 15:1; Matthew 27:1–2; John 18:31; Luke 23:2; Mark 15:2; John 18:36; Luke 23:6–12; Mark 15:6; Mark 15:7–14; Matthew 27:15–23; Luke 23:18–21; John 18:38–40; 19:6, 15; Luke 23:4; John 19:6; John 19:12; Matthew 27:24–25; Mark 15:15; 1 Timothy 6:13; Mark 14:53; 15:1, 25; Mark 14:53–55; Matthew 26:57–59; Luke 22:66; John 18:19–24

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.33–35; 18.89, 95; 18.55–62

The Caiaphas Ossuary First century AD search.inscriptionsisraelpalestine.org

The Pilate Stone Set up in the name of Pontius Pilate · AD 26–36
lines 2–3

On the Embassy to Gaius Philo of Alexandria · c. AD 41
299–305

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.169–177

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

Against Marcion Tertullian · c. AD 207–212
2.15

Nostra Aetate The Second Vatican Council · 28 October 1965
4

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
597

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
6.50

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Jesus, Caiaphas, Pontius Pilate, Herod Antipas
Threads Church and State, Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Gethsemane and the Arrest AD 30 or 33 351

Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule AD 6 295

LEADS TO

The Crucifixion AD 30 or 33 359

CHURCH AND STATE

Judea Comes under Direct Roman Rule Before · AD 6 295

Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea After · AD 44 399

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

Jesus Enters Jerusalem Before · AD 30 or 33 338

The Crucifixion After · AD 30 or 33 359

← Gethsemane and the Arrest Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Crucifixion Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Crucifixion

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

Jesus is crucified outside Jerusalem at a place called Golgotha, on the order of Pontius Pilate, under the charge "King of the Jews", and dies the same afternoon. Tacitus mentions the execution, and so does a passage of disputed wording in Josephus.

After Pilate's sentence, Mark tells, the soldiers dressed Jesus in purple, crowned him with thorns and mocked him as "King of the Jews". Then they led him out (Mark 15:16–20). A passer-by, Simon of Cyrene, was made to carry his cross (Mark 15:21). At Golgotha, "the place of a skull", near the city of Jerusalem, they crucified him between two others and cast lots for his clothes (Mark 15:22–27; John 19:20). The charge written above him read "The King of the Jews" (Mark 15:26). John says that it stood in Hebrew, Latin and Greek, and that Pilate refused to alter it (John 19:19–22).

Passers-by and the chief priests mocked him (Mark 15:29–32). Luke records the prayer "Father, forgive them, for they don't know what they are doing", a sentence that some ancient manuscripts lack, and a promise to one of the two crucified with him: "today you will be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23:34, 39–43). Women who had followed him from Galilee watched from a distance, among them Mary Magdalene (Mark 15:40–41). John places his mother Mary beside the cross with "the disciple whom he loved", to whom Jesus entrusted her (John 19:25–27); Irenaeus, about AD 180, identifies that disciple as John (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.1.1).

From the sixth hour, Mark says, there was darkness over the whole land. At the ninth hour Jesus cried out the first line of Psalm 22, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?", and then, with a loud cry, he died (Mark 15:33–37; Psalm 22:1). In Luke his last words are "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit" (Luke 23:46), in John "It is finished" (John 19:30). Mark reports that the veil of the temple was torn in two and that the centurion said, "Truly this man was the Son of God!" (Mark 15:38–39). Matthew adds an earthquake and the opening of tombs (Matthew 27:51–53). John reports that a soldier pierced Jesus's side with a spear, and appeals to an eyewitness for it (John 19:33–35).

Two writers outside the New Testament mention the execution. Tacitus, a Roman senator writing about AD 115–120 and hostile to the Christians, says that "Christus" was put to death by Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius (Tacitus, Annals 15.44). He does not say where he learned it. A passage in Josephus, written in AD 93–94, says that Pilate condemned Jesus to the cross "at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us". As the manuscripts give it, the passage also calls him the Christ and says that he appeared alive on the third day (Josephus, Antiquities 18.63–64). That wording is disputed, and how much of the passage Josephus himself wrote is debated; see Jewish Antiquities. So far as the passage is his, it is a second notice from outside the church. Neither writer gives the day or the place.

The death of Jesus stands at the centre of Christian preaching from the first. Paul hands on, as something he had himself received, "that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" (1 Corinthians 15:3), and he calls the message of "Christ crucified" a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Greeks (1 Corinthians 1:23). The first Christians read the event through Israel's Scriptures: the Passover lamb, of which no bone was to be broken (John 19:36; Exodus 12:46; 1 Corinthians 5:7), and Isaiah's servant who "bore the sin of many" (Isaiah 53:12; Luke 22:37).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels do not give the year. It is worked out from the evidence set out below, and two years satisfy it: AD 30 and AD 33. The timeline places the event at AD 30 and shows both.

The officials. Jesus died while Pontius Pilate governed Judea and Caiaphas was high priest (Matthew 26:57; 27:2). Josephus says that Pilate succeeded Valerius Gratus, who had appointed Caiaphas (Josephus, Antiquities 18.33–35), and that after ten years he was sent to Rome and arrived after Tiberius had died, about when Caiaphas was deposed (Josephus, Antiquities 18.89, 95). Tiberius died on 16 March AD 37 (Tacitus, Annals 6.50). The limits are therefore about AD 26 and AD 36.

The start of the ministry. Luke dates the preaching of John the Baptist to the fifteenth year of Tiberius (Luke 3:1–2), AD 28/29 by the usual count or a year or so earlier by others (see John the Baptist Preaches at the Jordan). Jesus was baptised after that, and John's Gospel then names three Passovers, the last being that of his death (John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55). In John, at the first of them the temple has been forty-six years in building (John 2:20); Josephus puts the start of the work in Herod's eighteenth year, about 20/19 BC (Josephus, Antiquities 15.380), which points to AD 27 or 28.

The day. All four Gospels put the death on the day before the Sabbath, a Friday (Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31). In John that Friday is the day of preparation for the Passover, the 14th of the month Nisan (John 19:14); in the other three the Passover meal has been eaten the evening before, which makes it the 15th (Mark 14:12–17). The Jewish month began with the sighting of the new moon, so the weekday of 14 and 15 Nisan can be calculated for each year. Within Pilate's term a Friday coincided with the 14th of Nisan, or fell within a day of it, in AD 30 (7 April) and AD 33 (3 April). The other years either have no such Friday or, like AD 27 and AD 34, are hard to fit to the rest of the evidence.

The two proposals. AD 30 gives a ministry of about two years beginning in AD 28; so John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, vol. 1 (1991), chapter 11. It suits the forty-six years of John 2:20. AD 33 follows from counting the fifteenth year of Tiberius as AD 29 and allowing three or more years; so Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (1977), and Colin J. Humphreys and W. G. Waddington, "Dating the Crucifixion", Nature 306 (1983), pp. 743–746, who give the astronomical calculations. The evidence does not decide between them.

The place, Golgotha, is described only as outside the city and near it (John 19:20; Hebrews 13:12); on the traditional site see Golgotha.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 15:16–20; Mark 15:21; Mark 15:22–27; John 19:20; Mark 15:26; John 19:19–22; Mark 15:29–32; Luke 23:34, 39–43; Mark 15:40–41; John 19:25–27; Mark 15:33–37; Psalm 22:1; Luke 23:46; John 19:30; Mark 15:38–39; Matthew 27:51–53; John 19:33–35; 1 Corinthians 15:3; 1 Corinthians 1:23; John 19:36; Exodus 12:46; 1 Corinthians 5:7; Isaiah 53:12; Luke 22:37; Matthew 26:57; 27:2; Luke 3:1–2; John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55; John 2:20; Mark 15:42; Matthew 27:62; Luke 23:54; John 19:31; John 19:14; Mark 14:12–17; John 19:20; Hebrews 13:12

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.1.1

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
15.44; 6.50

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.63–64; 18.33–35; 18.89, 95; 15.380

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Golgotha, Jerusalem
Who Jesus, Pontius Pilate, Mary, Mary Magdalene, John the Apostle Threads Covenant and Promise, Kingship and Messiah, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Trials before the Council and Pilate AD 30 or 33 354

The Prophecy of Comfort and the Suffering Servant c. 550–539 BC 204

The Binding of Isaac c. 2050 BC 35

LEADS TO

The Burial and Resurrection AD 30 or 33 364

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Last Supper Before · AD 30 or 33 346

The Burial and Resurrection After · AD 30 or 33 364

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Trials before the Council and Pilate Before · AD 30 or 33 354

The Burial and Resurrection After · AD 30 or 33 364

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Last Supper Before · AD 30 or 33 346

Pentecost After · AD 30 or 33 378

← The Trials before the Council and Pilate Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Burial and Resurrection Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Burial and Resurrection

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

The Gospels tell that Jesus was buried in a rock tomb on the evening of his death and that on the first day of the week women found the tomb open and empty and were told that he had risen. That God raised him from the dead is the central claim of Christian faith.

Jesus died on the day before the Sabbath. That evening, Mark tells, Joseph of Arimathea, a respected member of the council, went to Pilate and asked for the body. Pilate made sure from the centurion that Jesus was dead and granted it. Joseph wrapped the body in a linen cloth, laid it in a tomb cut out of rock and rolled a stone against the entrance (Mark 15:42–46). John adds that Nicodemus brought myrrh and aloes, and that the tomb was new and lay in a garden at the place of crucifixion (John 19:39–42); see Golgotha. Mary Magdalene and another Mary saw where he was laid (Mark 15:47). Matthew alone says that the chief priests had the tomb sealed and guarded (Matthew 27:62–66).

Very early on the first day of the week, Mark says, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome came with spices to anoint the body. They found the stone rolled back. Inside, a young man in a white robe told them: "He has risen. He is not here." They were to tell the disciples and Peter that he was going ahead of them to Galilee. They fled and said nothing to anyone, "for they were afraid" (Mark 16:1–8). There the Gospel ends in Codex Sinaiticus, one of the oldest copies (Codex Sinaiticus Mark 16:8); the verses that follow in most Bibles are discussed under the Appearances and the Great Commission.

The other Gospels tell the discovery with differences. In Matthew there is an earthquake, an angel rolls the stone away, and Jesus himself meets the women as they run to tell the disciples (Matthew 28:1–10). In Luke two men in dazzling clothes speak to the women, the apostles think their report nonsense, and Peter runs to the tomb and sees the linen cloths lying by themselves (Luke 24:1–12). John names only Mary Magdalene, who comes while it is still dark and fetches Peter and "the other disciple whom Jesus loved", who find the cloths lying there. She stays, weeping, and sees Jesus. She takes him for the gardener until he says her name, and she goes and tells the disciples that she has seen the Lord (John 20:1–18). All four agree on the day, on Mary Magdalene and on the open, empty tomb. None describes the rising itself.

The testimony usually dated earliest is Paul's. Writing in the 50s, he repeats what he had "received": that Christ died for our sins, "that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures, and that he appeared to Cephas, then to the twelve". He adds appearances to more than five hundred, to James, to all the apostles and last to himself (1 Corinthians 15:3–8). Paul mentions the burial but not the women or the finding of the empty tomb. Matthew reports another account current in his day, that the disciples had stolen the body (Matthew 28:11–15).

That God raised Jesus from the dead is the central claim of Christian faith. "If Christ has not been raised," Paul writes, "then our preaching is in vain, and your faith also is in vain" (1 Corinthians 15:14). Acts shows Christians gathering on the first day of the week (Acts 20:7), and the creed confesses that "the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Gospels date the burial to the evening of the crucifixion, a Friday, and the discovery of the empty tomb to the morning after the Sabbath, the first day of the week (Mark 15:42; 16:1–2; Luke 23:54–24:1). Counting both ends, that is "the third day" of the formula Paul hands on (1 Corinthians 15:4; Luke 24:21). If the crucifixion was on 7 April AD 30, the Sunday was 9 April; if on 3 April AD 33, it was 5 April. The evidence for the two years is set out under the Crucifixion.

The sources used here are the four Gospels and Paul's summary in 1 Corinthians, a letter of the 50s that hands on a formula Paul says he had himself received (1 Corinthians 15:3–5). Whether Jesus rose from the dead is a question on which historians divide along with everyone else. For the view that a bodily resurrection best explains the evidence see N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (2003); for the view that the appearances were visions and the tomb story grew later see Gerd Lüdemann, The Resurrection of Jesus (1994).

On the traditional site of the tomb, in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, see Golgotha.

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 15:42–46; John 19:39–42; Mark 15:47; Matthew 27:62–66; Mark 16:1–8; Matthew 28:1–10; Luke 24:1–12; John 20:1–18; 1 Corinthians 15:3–8; Matthew 28:11–15; 1 Corinthians 15:14; Acts 20:7; Mark 15:42; 16:1–2; Luke 23:54–24:1; 1 Corinthians 15:4; Luke 24:21; 1 Corinthians 15:3–5

Codex Sinaiticus Middle of the fourth century AD
Mark 16:8

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Golgotha, Jerusalem
Who Jesus, Mary Magdalene, Peter, Joseph of Arimathea

Threads Kingship and Messiah, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Crucifixion AD 30 or 33 359

LEADS TO

The Appearances and the Great Commission AD 30 or 33 368

The Four Gospels Are Written c. AD 65–100 458

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated AD 335 602

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

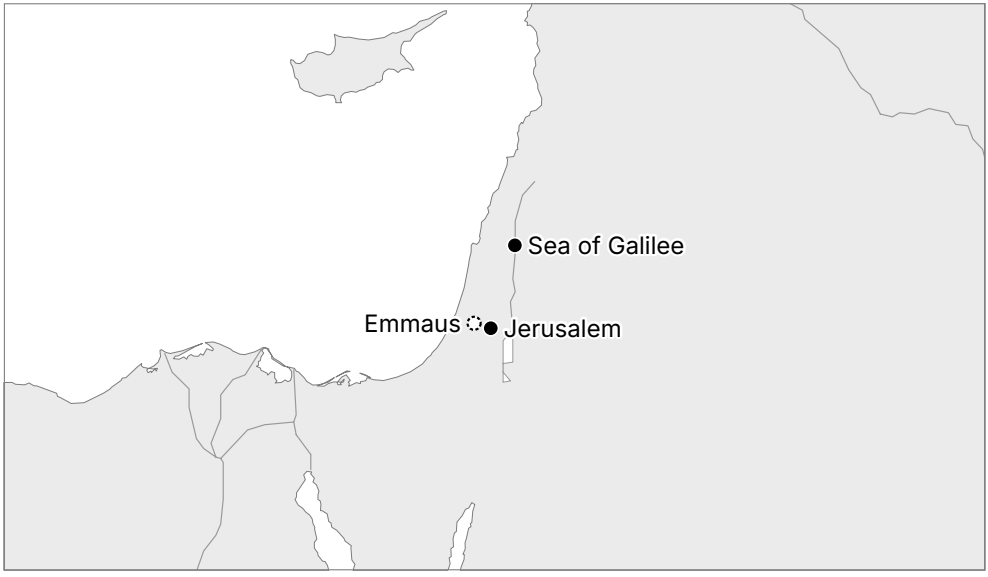
The Crucifixion Before · AD 30 or 33 359

The Ascension After · AD 30 or 33 372

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Crucifixion Before · AD 30 or 33 359

The Council of Jerusalem After · c. AD 49 407



← The Crucifixion Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Appearances and the Great Commission Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Appearances and the Great Commission

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

The Gospels and Paul report that the risen Jesus appeared to his followers, in Jerusalem, on the road to Emmaus and in Galilee, and sent them to make disciples of all nations. The accounts differ on where and in what order.

Luke tells that on the day the tomb was found empty two disciples, one of them named Cleopas, were walking to the village of Emmaus. A stranger joined them and explained from Moses and the prophets that the Christ had to suffer. At table he took bread, gave thanks and broke it; they recognised Jesus, and he vanished. They hurried back to Jerusalem and were told, "The Lord is risen indeed, and has appeared to Simon!" (Luke 24:13–35). While they were speaking Jesus stood among them. He showed them his hands and feet and ate a piece of fish in front of them. He said that repentance and forgiveness of sins were to be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem (Luke 24:36–47).

John sets a meeting on the same evening behind locked doors. Jesus showed the disciples his hands and his side and said, "As the Father has sent me, even so I send you." He breathed on them and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit!" (John 20:19–23). Thomas was absent and said that he would not believe unless he touched the wounds. Eight days later Jesus came again and offered them to him, and Thomas answered, "My Lord and my God!" (John 20:24–29).

Two accounts are set in Galilee. In John, seven disciples fishing on the Sea of Galilee see Jesus on the shore at daybreak and haul in a great catch at his word. After breakfast he asks Peter three times whether he loves him, and three times charges him to feed his lambs and tend his sheep (John 21:1–17). In Matthew the eleven go to a mountain in Galilee. They worship him, though not without doubt. He says: "All authority has been given to me in heaven and on earth. Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" and promises to be with them always (Matthew 28:16–20).

Paul's list is usually dated earliest. Writing in the 50s, he names appearances to Cephas, to the twelve, to more than five hundred at once, most of them still alive, to James, to all the apostles and last to himself (1 Corinthians 15:5–8). The appearance to Peter alone is mentioned by Paul and by Luke, and neither narrates it (Luke 24:34). The closing verses of Mark in most Bibles add a short summary: to Mary Magdalene, to two walking in the country, to the eleven at table (Mark 16:9–14). Codex Sinaiticus, one of the oldest manuscripts, does not have these verses (Codex Sinaiticus Mark 16:8).

The command in Matthew, later called the Great Commission, sets out what Acts shows the first Christians doing: baptising those who accepted their message, and carrying it beyond Israel (Acts 2:38–41; 10:44–48). The Didache, an early church manual, already directs that baptism be given "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit" (Didache 7).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The appearances begin on the day the tomb was found empty (Luke 24:13; John 20:19). John sets a further one "after eight days" and another later in Galilee (John 20:26; 21:1), and Acts says that Jesus showed himself to the apostles over forty days (Acts 1:3). The year is that of the crucifixion, AD 30 or AD 33; see the Crucifixion.

The accounts do not give one sequence. In Mark and Matthew the disciples are sent to Galilee and, in Matthew, see Jesus there (Mark 16:7; Matthew 28:16). In Luke's Gospel every appearance is in or near Jerusalem, all seem to fall on one day, and the disciples are told to stay in the city (Luke 24:13, 33–36, 49). John has appearances in Jerusalem and then one in Galilee. Paul's list names no places (1 Corinthians 15:5–8). Some readers combine the accounts into a single order; others hold that separate traditions, one centred on Galilee and one on Jerusalem, lie behind them.

Mark 16:9–20, which summarises several appearances, is absent from Codex Sinaiticus, written in the fourth century (Codex Sinaiticus Mark 16:8), and, as Metzger reports, from Codex Vaticanus of the same century. Irenaeus, however, already quotes verse 19 as Mark's about AD 180 (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.10.5). Most scholars regard the passage as an early addition to the Gospel; see Bruce M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament (2nd edition, 1994), on Mark 16:9–20.

Primary sources

Scripture

Luke 24:13–35; Luke 24:36–47; John 20:19–23; John 20:24–29; John 21:1–17; Matthew 28:16–20; 1 Corinthians 15:5–8; Luke 24:34; Mark 16:9–14; Acts 2:38–41; 10:44–48; Luke 24:13; John 20:19; John 20:26; 21:1; Acts 1:3; Mark 16:7; Matthew 28:16; Luke 24:13, 33–36, 49

Codex Sinaiticus Middle of the fourth century AD
Mark 16:8

The Didache (The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) Between about AD 50 and 150; most often placed near AD 100
7

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.10.5

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Emmaus, Sea of Galilee
Who Jesus, Peter, Thomas, Mary Magdalene
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Burial and Resurrection AD 30 or 33 364

Jesus Appoints the Twelve c. AD 28–29 311

LEADS TO

The Ascension AD 30 or 33 372

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Jesus Appoints the Twelve Before · c. AD 28–29 311

Pentecost After · AD 30 or 33 378

← The Burial and Resurrection Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Ascension Later · AD 30 or 33

THE LIFE OF JESUS

The Ascension

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

Luke reports that the risen Jesus, after telling his apostles to wait in Jerusalem for the Holy Spirit, was taken up from the Mount of Olives and hidden by a cloud. Acts places this forty days after the resurrection.

Luke tells of the departure of Jesus twice. At the end of his Gospel, Jesus leads the disciples out as far as Bethany, lifts his hands and blesses them, and while he blesses them he is carried up into heaven. They return to Jerusalem with great joy and are continually in the temple praising God (Luke 24:50–53).

The opening of Acts is fuller. For forty days Jesus had shown himself alive to the apostles and spoken about the kingdom of God (Acts 1:3). He told them not to leave Jerusalem but to wait for "the promise of the Father": within a few days they would be baptised in the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:4–5). They asked whether he would now restore the kingdom to Israel. He answered that the times were not theirs to know, and that they would receive power and be his witnesses "in Jerusalem, in all Judea and Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth" (Acts 1:6–8). Then, as they watched, "he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight". Two men in white told them that this Jesus would come back in the same way as they had seen him go (Acts 1:9–11). They walked back to the city from the Mount of Olives, a Sabbath day's journey away (Acts 1:12).

The other Gospels do not narrate the scene. Matthew ends in Galilee with the promise "I am with you always" (Matthew 28:20). In John the risen Jesus tells Mary Magdalene, "I am ascending to my Father and your Father" (John 20:17). The longer ending of Mark says in one sentence that he "was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God" (Mark 16:19); on those verses see the Appearances and the Great Commission.

Elsewhere the New Testament speaks less of a departure than of an enthronement. Peter's speech at Pentecost says that Jesus has been exalted to the right hand of God, and applies to him the psalm "Sit at my right hand" (Acts 2:33–35; Psalm 110:1). The same language recurs in the letters (Ephesians 1:20; Hebrews 1:3).

For Luke the event closes the time of the appearances and opens the time of the church: not many days later comes Pentecost (Acts 1:5; 2:1–4). The creed joins it to the expectation of Christ's return: he "ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the Right Hand of the Father. And he shall come again with glory" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed). By the fourth century Christians marked the place on the Mount of Olives. Eusebius says that the mother of the emperor Constantine built a church on the mount of the ascension (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.41–43), and the pilgrim Egeria knew a spot there called the Imbomon, "the place whence the Lord ascended into heaven" (Egeria, Itinerary 43.5).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts says that Jesus appeared to the apostles "over a period of forty days" and was then taken up (Acts 1:3, 9). Counted from the Sunday on which the Gospels place the resurrection, the fortieth day is a Thursday: 18 May if the year was AD 30, 14 May if it was AD 33 (see the Crucifixion for the two years). The feast of the Ascension is traditionally kept on that Thursday. Forty is also a round number in Scripture (Exodus 24:18; Mark 1:13), and Luke's Gospel, read by itself, moves from the resurrection to the departure without a break (Luke 24:36, 50–51); the two books have the same author (Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:1–2), who gives the fuller account in the second.

Apart from one sentence in the longer ending of Mark (Mark 16:19), Luke is the only New Testament writer who narrates the event. In the Gospel the words "and was carried up into heaven" are missing from the first hand of Codex Sinaiticus, where a corrector has added them (Codex Sinaiticus Luke 24:51), and the NRSVUE notes that other ancient authorities lack them. The place is "as far as Bethany" in the Gospel and the Mount of Olives in Acts (Luke 24:50; Acts 1:12); Bethany lay on the Mount of Olives (Mark 11:1). The spot shown on the mount goes back to the fourth century (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.41–43) (Egeria, Itinerary 43.5).

Primary sources

Scripture

Luke 24:50–53; Acts 1:3; Acts 1:4–5; Acts 1:6–8; Acts 1:9–11; Acts 1:12; Matthew 28:20; John 20:17; Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33–35; Psalm 110:1; Ephesians 1:20; Hebrews 1:3; Acts 1:5; 2:1–4; Acts 1:3, 9; Exodus 24:18; Mark 1:13; Luke 24:36, 50–51; Luke 1:1–4; Acts 1:1–2; Luke 24:50; Acts 1:12; Mark 11:1

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

Life of Constantine Eusebius of Caesarea · AD 337–339
3.41–43

Itinerary (The Pilgrimage of Egeria) Egeria · c. AD 381–384
43.5

Codex Sinaiticus Middle of the fourth century AD
Luke 24:51

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount of Olives, Bethany
Who Jesus
Threads Kingship and Messiah

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Appearances and the Great Commission AD 30 or 33 368

LEADS TO

Pentecost AD 30 or 33 378

KINGSHIP AND MESSIAH

The Burial and Resurrection Before · AD 30 or 33 364

← The Appearances and the Great Commission Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ Pentecost Later · AD 30 or 33
TIMELINE

The Apostolic Age

c. AD 30–100

From Pentecost to the death of the last apostles: the gospel spreads from Jerusalem to Rome, Gentiles are admitted, and the New Testament is written.

Acts and the letters of Paul are the chief sources, anchored by a few fixed points: the death of Herod Agrippa in AD 44, Gallio's term in Corinth in 51–52, the fire of Rome in 64 and the fall of Jerusalem in 70. By the end of the century there are Christian communities from Syria to Italy.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Rome, Kodungallur, Mylapore, Malta

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

Pentecost AD 30 or 33 378

The Martyrdom of Stephen c. AD 34 382

The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official c. AD 34 385

The Conversion of Paul c. AD 31–36 388
The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius c. AD 40 392
The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395
Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea AD 44 399
Paul's First Missionary Journey c. AD 46–48 403
The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407
Claudius Expels Jews from Rome c. AD 49 411
Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch c. AD 49 415
Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe c. AD 49–52 419
The Letters of Paul c. AD 50–60 424
The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India AD 52 429
Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem c. AD 53–57 433
Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea c. AD 57–59 437
Paul's Voyage to Rome c. AD 59–62 441
The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord AD 62 445
The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449
The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul c. AD 64–68 453
The Four Gospels Are Written c. AD 65–100 458
The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462
The Fall of Masada AD 73 or 74 466
The Didache, an Early Church Manual c. AD 50–120 470
John's Revelation on Patmos c. AD 95 474
The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) c. AD 96 478

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Pentecost

AD 30 or 33 · Estimated date

At the feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem, Acts says, the Holy Spirit comes on the followers of Jesus, Peter preaches that God has raised Jesus and made him Lord and Christ, and about three thousand people are baptised.

Pentecost is the Greek name, "fiftieth", for the Jewish feast of Weeks: Josephus, writing in Greek, says that it falls on the fiftieth day and calls it Pentecost (Josephus, Antiquities 3.252). It was the harvest festival kept seven weeks after the sheaf offering of Passover week (Leviticus 23:5–16) (Deuteronomy 16:9–10). According to Acts the followers of Jesus, about a hundred and twenty people, had stayed in Jerusalem after his ascension, as he had told them to (Acts 1:4–5, 12–15).

Acts says that on the day of Pentecost they were all together when a sound like a rushing wind filled the house. Tongues "like fire" appeared and rested on each of them, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other languages (Acts 2:1–4). Jews from many lands were living in the city. A crowd gathered, and each heard the disciples speaking in his own language. Acts lists them, from Parthians and Medes to visitors from Rome. They were amazed and perplexed, and some mocked and said that the speakers were full of new wine (Acts 2:5–13).

Peter stood up with the other eleven apostles and addressed the crowd. What they saw, he said, was what the prophet Joel had foretold: God would pour out his Spirit on all flesh (Acts 2:14–21) (Joel 2:28–32). He went on to speak of Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had crucified and whom God had raised up, and he ended: "God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified" (Acts 2:22–36). When the hearers asked what they should do, Peter told them to repent and be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of sins. Those who accepted his word were baptised, and Acts counts about three thousand added that day (Acts 2:37–41).

Acts then describes the life of the group. They held to the apostles' teaching and fellowship, to the breaking of bread and to prayer. They shared their possessions, selling property to provide for anyone in need, and met daily in the temple and in their homes (Acts 2:42–47).

In Acts this day is the start of the public preaching about Jesus, and Peter later refers back to it as "the beginning" (Acts 11:15). It also carries out the promise at the opening of the book that the disciples would receive power and be witnesses from Jerusalem to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). Paul later reckons his travels by the feast: he writes that he will stay at Ephesus until Pentecost, and Acts has him hurrying to be in Jerusalem by that day (1 Corinthians 16:8) (Acts 20:16).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives the day and not the year. Pentecost was kept on the fiftieth day after the sheaf offering of Passover week (Leviticus 23:5–16), and Acts places this Pentecost after forty days of appearances of the risen Jesus and a further wait in Jerusalem (Acts 1:3–5). The year is therefore the year of the crucifixion, for which AD 30 and AD 33 are the two usual proposals; see the Crucifixion. The timeline places the event at 30 and shows both years.

Acts is the only New Testament book that tells of this day. John's Gospel has the risen Jesus breathe on the disciples on the evening of the first day of the week and say, "Receive the Holy Spirit!" (John 20:19–22). Paul's letters speak of believers receiving the Spirit (Galatians 3:2) (1 Corinthians 12:13) but do not describe the day.

Primary sources

Scripture

Leviticus 23:5–16; Deuteronomy 16:9–10; Acts 1:4–5, 12–15; Acts 2:1–4; Acts 2:5–13; Acts 2:14–21; Joel 2:28–32; Acts 2:22–36; Acts 2:37–41; Acts 2:42–47; Acts 11:15; Acts 1:8; 1 Corinthians 16:8; Acts 20:16; Acts 1:3–5; John 20:19–22; Galatians 3:2; 1 Corinthians 12:13

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
3.252

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Peter
Threads Mission and Expansion, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Ascension AD 30 or 33 372

LEADS TO

The Martyrdom of Stephen c. AD 34 382
Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea AD 44 399
The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India AD 52 429

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Appearances and the Great Commission Before · AD 30 or 33 368
The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official After · c. AD 34 385

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Crucifixion Before · AD 30 or 33 359

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple After · AD 66–70

462

← The Ascension Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Martyrdom of Stephen Later · c. AD 34

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Martyrdom of Stephen

c. AD 34 · Estimated date

Acts tells how Stephen, one of seven men chosen to serve the Jerusalem church, is accused before the council of speaking against the temple and the law and is stoned to death. The persecution that follows scatters the believers beyond Jerusalem.

Acts introduces Stephen in a dispute over the daily distribution of food in the Jerusalem church. The believers whom Acts calls Hellenists complained against those it calls Hebrews that their widows were being passed over. The twelve apostles had the community choose seven men to take charge of the matter, and Stephen is named first among them, with Philip the Evangelist second. The apostles prayed and laid their hands on them (Acts 6:1–6).

Stephen, Acts says, did great wonders and signs among the people. Members of the synagogue called that of the Freedmen, with Jews from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia and Asia, argued with him and could not answer him. They brought him before the council, where witnesses, whom Acts calls false, said that he never stopped speaking against the temple and the law, and that he taught that Jesus of Nazareth would destroy the temple and change the customs handed down by Moses (Acts 6:8–15).

His reply fills most of a chapter. It retells the history of Israel from Abraham through Joseph and Moses to Solomon. Its points are that the people repeatedly rejected those whom God sent, and that the Most High "doesn't dwell in temples made with hands". It ends by charging the hearers with resisting the Holy Spirit and with the betrayal and murder of "the Righteous One" (Acts 7:2–53).

The hearers were enraged. Stephen, looking up, said that he saw the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. They rushed at him, drove him out of the city and stoned him. The witnesses laid their cloaks at the feet of a young man named Saul, the future apostle Paul. Stephen died praying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit", and "Lord, don't hold this sin against them" (Acts 7:54–60).

Acts says that a great persecution of the Jerusalem church began that day. All except the apostles were scattered through Judea and Samaria, and Saul went from house to house dragging men and women to prison (Acts 8:1–3). Those who were scattered carried the message with them: Philip to Samaria, others as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch (Acts 8:4–5) (Acts 11:19–20). Stephen is the first follower of Jesus whose death for his testimony Acts records. In a later speech in Acts Paul calls him the Lord's "witness" and recalls that he himself stood by and approved (Acts 22:20). The Greek word for "witness" there, martys, is the one from which "martyr" comes.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives no date. It sets Stephen's death after the first growth of the church in Jerusalem and before the conversion of Saul, who is present at the stoning (Acts 7:58) (Acts 8:1). The year therefore depends on the date of Paul's conversion, which is itself reckoned backwards from later fixed points to about AD 31–36; see the Conversion of Paul. No other New Testament book mentions Stephen. Paul's letters say that he persecuted the church (Galatians 1:13) but do not name Stephen.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 6:1–6; Acts 6:8–15; Acts 7:2–53; Acts 7:54–60; Acts 8:1–3; Acts 8:4–5; Acts 11:19–20; Acts 22:20; Acts 7:58; Acts 8:1; Galatians 1:13

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Stephen, Paul
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pentecost AD 30 or 33 378

LEADS TO

The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official c. AD 34 385

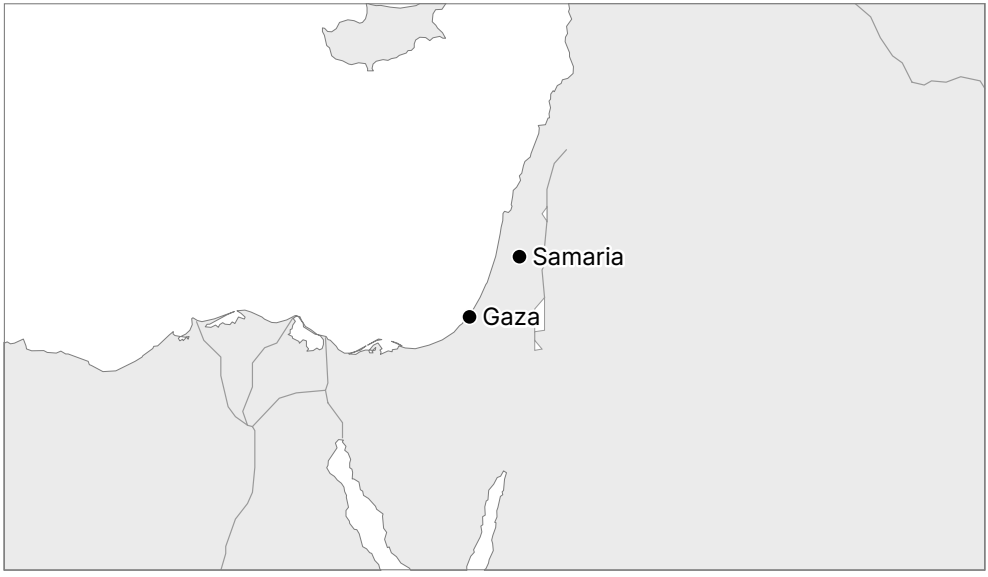
The Conversion of Paul c. AD 31–36 388

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Execution of John the Baptist Before · c. AD 28–32 319

Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea After · AD 44 399



← Pentecost Earlier · AD 30 or 33
→ The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official Later · c. AD 34

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official

c. AD 34 · Estimated date

Acts tells how Philip, driven from Jerusalem by persecution, preaches in Samaria, where Peter and John follow him, and then baptises an official of the Ethiopian queen on the road to Gaza. In Acts the message here first passes beyond Judea.

The persecution after the death of Stephen scattered the believers of Jerusalem, and those who were scattered preached wherever they went (Acts 8:1, 4). Philip the Evangelist, one of the seven chosen with Stephen, went down to the city of Samaria. Jews and Samaritans, John's Gospel notes, had no dealings with each other (John 4:9). Acts says that the crowds listened to Philip and saw the signs he did, that many who were paralysed or lame were healed, and that men and women believed and were baptised (Acts 8:5–12).

Among them was a man named Simon, who had long amazed the Samaritans with his magic and was called "that great power of God" (Acts 8:9–13). When the apostles in Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word, they sent Peter and John the Apostle. The two, Acts says, prayed for the new believers and laid their hands on them, and they received the Holy Spirit. Simon offered the apostles money for the power to do the same. Peter answered, "May your silver perish with you", and told him to repent (Acts 8:14–24). Peter and John preached in many Samaritan villages on their way back (Acts 8:25). Justin, a Christian writer of about AD 150, also knows of a Samaritan magician named Simon, from the village of Gitto, who he says was honoured as a god at Rome in the reign of Claudius (Justin, First Apology 26).

Acts then tells how an angel sent Philip south to the desert road that runs from Jerusalem down to Gaza. There he met an Ethiopian eunuch, an official of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, in charge of all her treasure. He had come to Jerusalem to worship and was sitting in his chariot reading the prophet Isaiah (Acts 8:26–30). The passage was the one about the sheep led to the slaughter (Isaiah 53:7–8). The man asked whom the prophet meant, and Philip, starting from that text, told him about Jesus. When they came to water the official asked to be baptised, and Philip baptised him. Acts says that the Spirit then took Philip away and that the Ethiopian went on his way rejoicing. Philip was next found at Azotus and preached in all the towns from there to Caesarea (Acts 8:31–40).

With these stories Acts moves beyond Jerusalem and Judea for the first time: to Samaritans, and to a foreign official on his way home. It does not say whether the Ethiopian was a Jew, a convert to Judaism or a Gentile who worshipped Israel's God (Acts 8:27). The order follows the words at the opening of the book, "in all Judea and Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth" (Acts 1:8). In Acts the apostles in Jerusalem did not begin this mission; they took it up by sending Peter and John (Acts 8:5, 14).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives no date. It joins Philip's preaching directly to the scattering that followed Stephen's death (Acts 8:1, 4–5) and tells it before the conversion of Saul, so the timeline places it in the same year as those events, about AD 34; see the Conversion of Paul for how that year is reached. No other New Testament book tells of it.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 8:1, 4; John 4:9; Acts 8:5–12; Acts 8:9–13; Acts 8:14–24; Acts 8:25; Acts 8:26–30; Isaiah 53:7–8; Acts 8:31–40; Acts 8:27; Acts 1:8; Acts 8:5, 14; Acts 8:1, 4–5

First Apology Justin Martyr · c. AD 150–155
26

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Samaria, Gaza
Who Philip the Evangelist, Peter, John the Apostle
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Martyrdom of Stephen c. AD 34 382

LEADS TO

The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius c. AD 40 392

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Pentecost Before · AD 30 or 33 378

The Conversion of Paul After · c. AD 31–36 388

← The Martyrdom of Stephen Earlier · c. AD 34
→ The Conversion of Paul Later · c. AD 31–36

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Conversion of Paul

c. AD 31–36 · Estimated date

Saul of Tarsus, a Pharisee who is persecuting the followers of Jesus, becomes one of them near Damascus. Acts tells the story three times, and Paul's own letters speak of it as a revelation of God's Son and a call to preach to the Gentiles.

Paul, whom Acts calls Saul until his first missionary journey (Acts 13:9), describes his earlier life in his letters. He was a Pharisee, zealous for the traditions of his ancestors, and he persecuted the church and tried to destroy it (Galatians 1:13–14) (Philippians 3:5–6). Acts says that he obtained letters from the high priest to the synagogues of Damascus, so that he could bring any followers of "the Way" as prisoners to Jerusalem (Acts 9:1–2).

As he came near Damascus, Acts says, a light from the sky shone around him. He fell to the ground and heard a voice: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" He asked who was speaking, and the answer was, "I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting." Blinded, he was led into the city, and three days later a disciple named Ananias of Damascus, sent by a vision, laid his hands on him. Saul recovered his sight and was baptised (Acts 9:3–19).

Acts tells the story twice more, in speeches of Paul, and the versions differ in detail. In the first his companions hear the voice but see no one; in the second they see the light but do not hear, or do not understand, the voice; in the third they all fall to the ground (Acts 9:7) (Acts 22:9) (Acts 26:13–14). In the first two Saul is told to go into the city and wait, and his commission is spoken to Ananias or by him (Acts 9:6, 15–17) (Acts 22:10–15). In the third Jesus himself sends him to the Gentiles on the road, and Ananias is not mentioned (Acts 26:16–18). Paul's letters give no narrative. They say that God chose "to reveal his Son" in him so that he might preach him among the Gentiles, and that the risen Christ appeared to him last of all (Galatians 1:15–16) (1 Corinthians 15:8–9) (1 Corinthians 9:1).

What followed is also told differently. In Acts Saul preaches in the synagogues of Damascus, escapes a plot of the Jews of the city against his life by being lowered from the wall in a basket, and goes to Jerusalem, where Barnabas brings him to the apostles. He is then sent away to Tarsus (Acts 9:19–30). Paul says that he consulted no one and did not go up to Jerusalem, but went away to Arabia and came back to Damascus. Only after three years did he go to Jerusalem, for fifteen days, to visit Cephas, and he saw no other apostle except James, the Lord's brother. He then went to Syria and Cilicia, still unknown by sight to the churches of Judea (Galatians 1:16–24). Paul also tells of the basket, but in his account the danger came from the governor under King Aretas, who was guarding the city to arrest him (2 Corinthians 11:32–33).

Paul rested his claim to be an apostle on this event (1 Corinthians 9:1) (1 Corinthians 15:8–9). His message, he wrote, came not from any human being but "through revelation of Jesus Christ" (Galatians 1:11–12). On his letters see the Letters of Paul.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Neither Acts nor Paul gives a year. The date is reckoned backwards. Paul says that he went up to Jerusalem "after three years" and again "after a period of fourteen years" (Galatians 1:18) (Galatians 2:1). If the second visit is the meeting of about AD 48–49 (see the Council of Jerusalem) and the two spans follow one another, seventeen years separate it from the conversion, which then falls about AD 31–32. If both spans are counted from the conversion, the interval is fourteen years and the date about AD 34–35. If Paul counts part-years as whole years, the intervals are a year or two shorter and the dates later by as much. The text does not say which way to count.

A second check is Paul's escape from Damascus, which Acts places just before his first visit to Jerusalem, three years after the conversion by Paul's own count (Acts 9:25–26) (Galatians 1:17–18). Paul says that the city was then guarded by an official of "King Aretas" (2 Corinthians 11:32–33). This is Aretas IV, king of the Nabataeans, whom Josephus shows at war with Herod Antipas and still reigning when the emperor Tiberius died (Josephus, Antiquities 18.109–115) (Josephus, Antiquities 18.120–125); Tiberius died in March AD 37 (Suetonius, Tiberius 73.1). Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, Division I, vol. II (English translation, 1890), pp. 356–359, notes that the dated coins and inscriptions of Aretas run to the forty-eighth year of his reign and puts that reign from about 9 BC to AD 40. The escape would then be no later than about 40, and the conversion no later than about 37. Paul does not explain how an officer of Aretas came to be guarding Damascus. Douglas A. Campbell, "An Anchor for Pauline Chronology: Paul's Flight from 'the Ethnarch of King Aretas' (2 Corinthians 11:32–33)", Journal of Biblical Literature 121 (2002), pp. 279–302, argues that Aretas could have controlled the city only for a short time, from late 36 into 37; three years back by Paul's count, that would put the conversion about 33–34. Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), dates it to 31/32. The timeline places it at 34 and shows the range 31–36.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 13:9; Galatians 1:13–14; Philippians 3:5–6; Acts 9:1–2; Acts 9:3–19; Acts 9:7; Acts 22:9; Acts 26:13–14; Acts 9:6, 15–17; Acts 22:10–15; Acts 26:16–18; Galatians 1:15–16; 1 Corinthians 15:8–9; 1 Corinthians 9:1; Acts 9:19–30; Galatians 1:16–24; 2 Corinthians 11:32–33; Galatians 1:11–12; Galatians 1:18; Galatians 2:1; Acts 9:25–26; Galatians 1:17–18

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
18.109–115; 18.120–125

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Tiberius 73.1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Damascus, Jerusalem
Who Paul, Ananias of Damascus, Barnabas
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Martyrdom of Stephen c. AD 34 382

LEADS TO

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official Before · c. AD 34 385

The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius After · c. AD 40 392

← The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official Earlier · c. AD 34
→ The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius Later · c. AD 40

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius

c. AD 40 · Estimated date

Acts tells how Peter, after a vision at Joppa, enters the house of the Roman centurion Cornelius at Caesarea, preaches there, and has him and his household baptised without circumcision, and how the church in Jerusalem accepts what he has done.

Acts introduces Cornelius as a centurion of the Italian cohort at Caesarea Maritima (Acts 10:1), the city where it later shows the Roman governor of Judea in residence (Acts 23:33). Acts calls him a devout man who feared God with all his household, gave generously to the needy and prayed constantly (Acts 10:1–2). He was a Gentile, and uncircumcised (Acts 10:45) (Acts 11:3).

According to Acts, an angel appeared to Cornelius in a vision one afternoon and told him to send to Joppa for a man named Simon Peter (Acts 10:3–8). The next day, as the messengers were on their way, Peter went up to pray on the roof of the house where he was staying. He fell into a trance and saw a great sheet let down from heaven, holding all kinds of animals, reptiles and birds. A voice told him to kill and eat. Peter refused, since he had never eaten anything unclean, and the voice answered: "What God has cleansed, you must not call unclean." This happened three times (Acts 10:9–16). While he was wondering what it meant, the messengers arrived, and the Spirit told him to go with them (Acts 10:17–23).

At Caesarea Cornelius had gathered his relatives and friends. Peter told them that it was unlawful for a Jew to associate with a foreigner or visit him, but that God had shown him he should call no person unclean (Acts 10:24–29). He then spoke about Jesus: his work in Galilee and Judea, his death, his resurrection on the third day, and the forgiveness of sins through his name for everyone who believes (Acts 10:34–43). While he was still speaking, Acts says, the Holy Spirit fell on all who were listening, and the Jewish believers who had come with Peter heard them speaking in other languages and praising God. Peter asked whether anyone could refuse them water for baptism, and ordered that they be baptised (Acts 10:44–48).

When Peter returned to Jerusalem, believers there who held to circumcision took him to task: "You went in to uncircumcised men, and ate with them!" Peter told the whole story in order and asked how he could have stood in God's way. They fell silent and then said, "Then God has also granted to the Gentiles repentance to life!" (Acts 11:1–18).

Acts has already told of an Ethiopian baptised by Philip and will next tell of preaching to "Hellenists" at Antioch (Acts 8:38) (Acts 11:20–21); see the Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians. It gives the Cornelius story at far greater length and tells it twice (Acts 10:1–11:18). In this story an apostle is led to accept Gentiles, and the Jerusalem church agrees. Peter appeals to it again when the question of circumcision is argued out at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:7–11).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives no date. It tells the story after Saul's first visit to Jerusalem and departure for Tarsus (Acts 9:26–30) and before the persecution by Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:1), who ruled Judea from AD 41 until his death in 44; see Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea. That leaves the later 30s or the opening years of the 40s. The timeline's "about AD 40" marks this interval and is not a year fixed by any source. No other New Testament book mentions Cornelius.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 10:1; Acts 23:33; Acts 10:1–2; Acts 10:45; Acts 11:3; Acts 10:3–8; Acts 10:9–16; Acts 10:17–23; Acts 10:24–29; Acts 10:34–43; Acts 10:44–48; Acts 11:1–18; Acts 8:38; Acts 11:20–21; Acts 10:1–11:18; Acts 15:7–11; Acts 9:26–30; Acts 12:1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Caesarea Maritima, Joppa
Who Peter, Cornelius
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Gospel Reaches Samaria and an Ethiopian Official c. AD 34 385

LEADS TO

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Conversion of Paul Before · c. AD 31–36 388

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians After · c. AD 43 395

← The Conversion of Paul Earlier · c. AD 31–36
→ The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians Later · c. AD 43

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians

c. AD 43 · Estimated date

Acts tells how believers scattered from Jerusalem begin to preach to non-Jews at Antioch in Syria. Barnabas is sent to them and brings Saul from Tarsus. Acts says that the disciples were first called Christians there and that the church sent famine relief to Judea.

Josephus calls Antioch the metropolis of Syria, ranks it third among the cities of the Roman empire, and says that it had a large and long-established Jewish community, which had drawn many Greeks to its worship (Josephus, Jewish War 3.29) (Josephus, Jewish War 7.43–45).

According to Acts, believers scattered by the persecution that followed Stephen's death travelled as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch, speaking only to Jews. Some of them, men from Cyprus and Cyrene, began at Antioch to speak also to "Hellenists", by which Acts here appears to mean people who were not Jews, since it sets them against "Jews only". A great number believed (Acts 11:19–21). The church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas to see what was happening. He was glad at what he found, and went to Tarsus to look for Saul, the future apostle Paul. He brought him back, and for a whole year the two met with the church and taught a large number of people (Acts 11:22–26).

"The disciples were first called Christians in Antioch" (Acts 11:26). The word is rare in the New Testament. It occurs twice more, once on the lips of King Agrippa II and once in a passage about suffering "as a Christian" (Acts 26:28) (1 Peter 4:16). The Roman historian Tacitus, writing of the year 64, says that it was the name the crowd gave them (Tacitus, Annals 15.44).

Acts says that prophets came down from Jerusalem and that one of them, Agabus, foretold a great famine over all the world, which came in the reign of Claudius. The disciples at Antioch decided to send help, each according to his means, to the believers in Judea, and sent it to the elders there by Barnabas and Saul (Acts 11:27–30). Josephus records a great famine in Judea under the procurators Fadus and Tiberius Alexander, during which Queen Helena bought grain in Egypt and figs in Cyprus for the people of Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiquities 20.101) (Josephus, Antiquities 20.51–53).

Acts lists the prophets and teachers of the church: Barnabas, Simeon called Niger, Lucius of Cyrene, Manaen, who had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul. While they were worshipping and fasting, Acts says, the Holy Spirit told them to set apart Barnabas and Saul for a new work, and they laid hands on them and sent them off (Acts 13:1–3). In Acts Antioch thus becomes the base of the mission to the Gentiles. Paul set out from it on each of his three journeys in Acts (Acts 15:35–40) (Acts 18:22–23). It was there that the dispute over circumcision broke out, and there that he confronted Peter over eating with Gentiles (Acts 15:1–2) (Galatians 2:11–14).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives a sequence without a year. The first preaching at Antioch follows the scattering after Stephen's death (Acts 11:19). Barnabas and Saul then teach there for "a whole year", and a famine foretold by Agabus comes "in the days of Claudius" (Acts 11:26–28). Claudius reigned from AD 41 to 54.

Josephus places a great famine in Judea under the procurators Fadus and Tiberius Alexander (Josephus, Antiquities 20.101). Fadus was sent out after the death of Agrippa I, which fell in AD 44 (see Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea), and Alexander's successor arrived about the eighth year of Claudius, AD 48 (Josephus, Antiquities 19.363) (Josephus, Antiquities 20.103–104). Acts tells of Agrippa's death between the sending of the relief and its note that Barnabas and Saul had completed their service (Acts 11:30) (Acts 12:25). The year of teaching at Antioch therefore falls in the early or middle 40s, and the timeline places it about AD 43.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 11:19–21; Acts 11:22–26; Acts 11:26; Acts 26:28; 1 Peter 4:16; Acts 11:27–30; Acts 13:1–3; Acts 15:35–40; Acts 18:22–23; Acts 15:1–2; Galatians 2:11–14; Acts 11:19; Acts 11:26–28; Acts 11:30; Acts 12:25

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
3.29; 7.43–45

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
15.44

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
20.101; 20.51–53; 19.363; 20.103–104

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Antioch
Who Barnabas, Paul
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

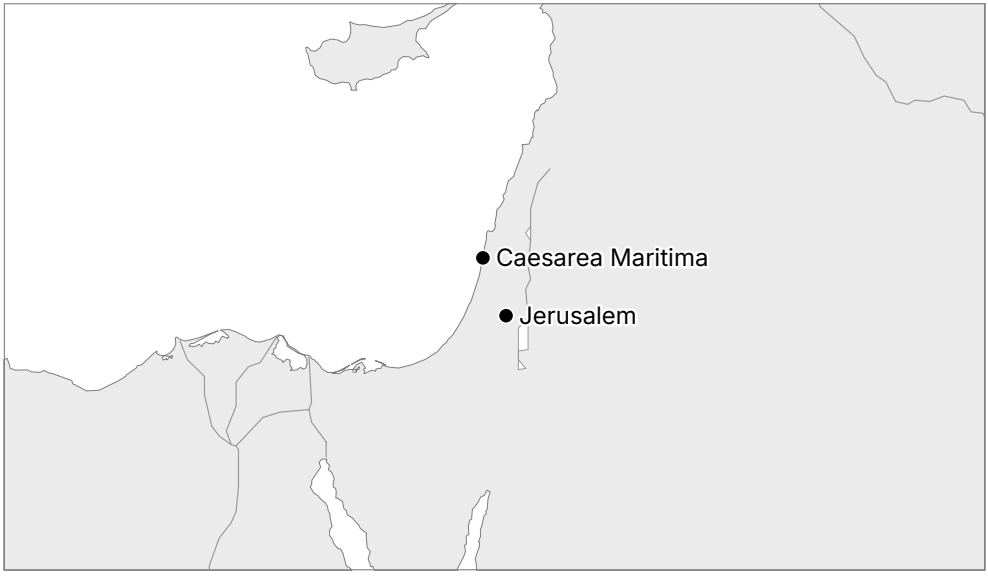
The Conversion of Paul c. AD 31–36 388
The Martyrdom of Stephen c. AD 34 382

LEADS TO

Paul's First Missionary Journey c. AD 46–48 403
Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch c. AD 49 415
Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom c. AD 110 484
Christianity Takes Root in Edessa c. AD 201 528

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius Before · c. AD 40 392
Paul's First Missionary Journey After · c. AD 46–48 403



← The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius Earlier · c. AD 40
→ Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea Later · AD 44

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea

AD 44 · Firm date

Acts says that King Herod Agrippa I had the apostle James, son of Zebedee, put to death and imprisoned Peter, who escaped. The king died suddenly at Caesarea. Acts and Josephus both describe his death, and the figures Josephus gives put it in AD 44.

Herod Agrippa I was a grandson of Herod the Great (Josephus, Antiquities 19.274–275). The emperor Gaius made him king of the former tetrarchy of Philip, and Claudius, whom he had helped to the throne, gave him Judea and Samaria as well, so that from AD 41 he ruled the whole of his grandfather's kingdom (Josephus, Antiquities 18.237) (Josephus, Antiquities 19.274–275) (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.8.2). Josephus describes him as generous and mild, a king who liked to live in Jerusalem and kept the Jewish law carefully (Josephus, Antiquities 19.328–331). Acts calls him "King Herod" (Acts 12:1).

Acts says that he "stretched out his hands to oppress some of the assembly". He had James Son of Zebedee, the brother of John and one of the Twelve, killed with the sword. Seeing that this pleased the people, he arrested Peter during the feast of Unleavened Bread and put him under a guard of sixteen soldiers, meaning to bring him out after the Passover (Acts 12:1–4).

On the night before he was to be brought out, Acts says, an angel woke Peter, who was sleeping in chains between two soldiers. The chains fell off, and the angel led him past the guards and through the iron gate, which opened by itself. Peter went to the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, where many were praying, sent word of his escape "to James, and to the brothers", and left for another place. Herod had the guards executed (Acts 12:6–19).

The king then went down to Caesarea Maritima. In Acts, envoys from Tyre and Sidon had come to ask for peace. On an appointed day Herod, in royal robes, addressed them from his throne, and the people shouted, "The voice of a god, and not of a man!" At once, Acts says, an angel of the Lord struck him, "because he didn't give God the glory", and he was eaten by worms and died (Acts 12:19–23). Josephus, writing some fifty years after the event, tells it this way. At a festival in Caesarea in honour of the emperor, he says, Agrippa entered the theatre at dawn in a robe woven of silver, which blazed in the sun. His flatterers hailed him as a god, and he did not rebuke them. Then he saw an owl perched above him, took it for an omen, and was seized by violent pain in the belly. He was carried to the palace and died five days later, in his fifty-fourth year (Josephus, Antiquities 19.343–350).

The two accounts agree on the place, on a public appearance in splendid dress, on an acclamation that the king did not refuse and on the suddenness of what followed, and both treat his death as a punishment. They differ on what the gathering was and on the manner of his end. Claudius then put the kingdom under a Roman procurator, Cuspius Fadus (Josephus, Antiquities 19.360–363). Acts reports the execution of no other member of the Twelve (Acts 12:2). The James to whom Peter sends word is a different man, usually identified as James the Just, the Lord's brother, who appears from here on as the leading figure of the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:17) (Acts 15:13) (Galatians 1:19).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Josephus gives the reckoning, in the passage numbered 19.8.2 in Whiston's translation and 19.343–352 in the Greek text. Agrippa died in the seventh year of his reign: four years under Gaius and three under Claudius, in the last three of which he ruled Judea and Samaria as well (Josephus, Antiquities 19.350–351). Gaius made him king soon after becoming emperor (Josephus, Antiquities 18.237), which was on the death of Tiberius in March AD 37 (Suetonius, Tiberius 73.1), and Claudius added Judea and Samaria at the start of his own reign (Josephus, Antiquities 19.274–275) (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.8.2), which began in January AD 41 (see Claudius). Josephus says that Agrippa had reigned three years over the whole of Judea when he came to Caesarea (Josephus, Antiquities 19.343–350), and three years from 41 is AD 44.

The month is less certain. Josephus says that the king was holding shows at Caesarea in honour of the emperor during a festival, but does not name the festival (Josephus, Antiquities 19.343–350). Acts places the execution of James and the arrest of Peter at Passover (Acts 12:3–4) and the king's death some time later (Acts 12:19–23); it does not say in which year of his reign the Passover fell.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 12:1; Acts 12:1–4; Acts 12:6–19; Acts 12:19–23; Acts 12:2; Acts 12:17; Acts 15:13; Galatians 1:19; Acts 12:3–4

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
19.274–275; 18.237; 19.328–331; 19.343–350; 19.360–363; 19.350–351

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
60.8.2

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Tiberius 73.1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Caesarea Maritima
Who Herod Agrippa I, James Son of Zebedee, Peter

Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pentecost AD 30 or 33 378

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrdom of Stephen Before · c. AD 34 382

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea After · c. AD 57–59 437

CHURCH AND STATE

The Trials before the Council and Pilate Before · AD 30 or 33 354

Claudius Expels Jews from Rome After · c. AD 49 411

← The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians Earlier · c. AD 43
→ Paul's First Missionary Journey Later · c. AD 46–48

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul's First Missionary Journey

c. AD 46–48 · Estimated date

Acts tells how Barnabas and Paul, sent out by the church at Antioch, preach in Cyprus and in the cities of southern Asia Minor, first in the synagogues and then to Gentiles, and found churches there before returning to Antioch.

According to Acts, the church at Antioch sent out Barnabas and Saul, with prayer, fasting and the laying on of hands (Acts 13:1–3). They sailed from Seleucia to Cyprus, Barnabas's home island, and preached in the synagogues of Salamis, with John Mark as their assistant (Acts 13:4–5) (Acts 4:36).

At Paphos, at the other end of the island, the proconsul Sergius Paulus sent for them. A Jewish magician named Bar-Jesus, also called Elymas, who was with the proconsul, opposed them. Acts says that Saul told him he would be blind for a time, that a mist and darkness fell on him at once, and that the proconsul believed. At this point Acts begins to call Saul by his other name, Paul, and usually to name him first (Acts 13:6–13). They crossed to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark left them and went back to Jerusalem (Acts 13:13).

At Pisidian Antioch Paul was invited to speak in the synagogue. Acts gives the speech at length. It runs from the exodus to David, presents Jesus as David's promised descendant, put to death and raised by God, and declares that through him everyone who believes is justified from all that the law of Moses could not set right (Acts 13:14–41). The next sabbath almost the whole city gathered. When Jews of the city contradicted them, Paul and Barnabas said, "we turn to the Gentiles", and many Gentiles believed. The two were driven out of the district (Acts 13:44–51). At Iconium many Jews and Greeks believed, the city was divided, and after a long stay the two fled from an attempt to stone them (Acts 14:1–6).

At Lystra, Acts says, Paul healed a man who had been lame from birth. The crowd shouted in Lycaonian that the gods had come down, called Barnabas Zeus and Paul Hermes (Jupiter and Mercury in some English versions), and the priest of Zeus brought oxen to sacrifice. The two tore their clothes and protested that they were only men, bringing news of the living God who made heaven and earth (Acts 14:8–18). Then Jews arrived from Antioch and Iconium and won over the crowd. Paul was stoned and dragged out of the city for dead, but got up and went on the next day to Derbe (Acts 14:19–20). Paul's own list of his sufferings includes the words "Once I was stoned" (2 Corinthians 11:25).

From Derbe they went back through Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, encouraging the new disciples and appointing elders in each church. They then came down to the coast and sailed for Antioch in Syria, where they reported that God "had opened a door of faith to the nations" (Acts 14:21–28). The churches founded on this journey included Gentiles (Acts 14:27). In Acts, whether such converts had to be circumcised and keep the law of Moses is the question that takes Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem (Acts 15:1–5).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives no dates for the journey, and Paul's letters give no account of it; 2 Timothy recalls persecutions "at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra" (2 Timothy 3:11). Acts places it after the death of Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:23–25), which fell in AD 44 (see Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea), and before the meeting in Jerusalem (Acts 15:1–2), which is itself put at about AD 48 or 49; see the Council of Jerusalem. It names the proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, but gives no year for his term (Acts 13:7). The length of the journey is not stated either: Acts speaks of "a long time" at Iconium and again at Antioch afterwards (Acts 14:3, 28).

Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), dates the journey to 45–47. The timeline's 46–48 is an estimate of the same kind and could move a year either way.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 13:1–3; Acts 13:4–5; Acts 4:36; Acts 13:6–13; Acts 13:13; Acts 13:14–41; Acts 13:44–51; Acts 14:1–6; Acts 14:8–18; Acts 14:19–20; 2 Corinthians 11:25; Acts 14:21–28; Acts 14:27; Acts 15:1–5; 2 Timothy 3:11; Acts 12:23–25; Acts 15:1–2; Acts 13:7; Acts 14:3, 28

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Antioch, Paphos, Pisidian Antioch, Lystra
Who Paul, Barnabas, John Mark
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

LEADS TO

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians Before · c. AD 43 395

The Council of Jerusalem After · c. AD 49 407

← Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea Earlier · AD 44
→ The Council of Jerusalem Later · c. AD 49

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Council of Jerusalem

c. AD 49 · Estimated date

Acts tells how Paul and Barnabas go up from Antioch to Jerusalem to settle whether Gentile believers must be circumcised, and how the apostles and elders decide that they need not be. Whether the meeting Paul describes in Galatians is the same one is disputed.

The churches founded from Antioch included Gentiles (Acts 14:27). Acts says that men came down from Judea and taught that without circumcision according to the custom of Moses they could not be saved. After sharp argument the church sent Paul, Barnabas and others to the apostles and elders in Jerusalem (Acts 15:1–2).

In Acts the matter is argued before the apostles and elders. Believers from the party of the Pharisees said that the Gentiles must be circumcised and keep the law of Moses (Acts 15:4–6). Peter recalled that God had given the Spirit to Gentiles through his own preaching, and asked why they should be given a yoke that neither their ancestors nor they themselves had been able to bear (Acts 15:7–11). Then James the Just spoke. He quoted words of the prophets about the rest of humankind seeking the Lord and gave his judgement: Gentiles who turn to God should not be troubled, but should abstain from things polluted by idols, from sexual immorality, from what is strangled and from blood (Acts 15:13–21). The quotation is from Amos, where the Hebrew text speaks instead of possessing "the remnant of Edom" (Amos 9:11–12).

Acts gives the text of a letter that carried the decision to the Gentile believers of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia, taken by Judas Barsabbas and Silas. It laid on them "no greater burden" than these four abstentions, with the words "it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us" (Acts 15:22–31).

Paul describes in Galatians a visit to Jerusalem at which the circumcision of Gentile believers was at issue; whether it is this meeting or an earlier visit is disputed (see the dating note). He went up "by revelation" with Barnabas, taking Titus, a Greek, and set out privately before the leaders the message he preached to the Gentiles. Titus was not compelled to be circumcised, and Paul says that he did not give way to "false brothers" who had come in to spy on their freedom. The leaders, Paul says, added nothing to him. James, Cephas and John, "reputed to be pillars", gave him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship: they should go to the Gentiles, and the others to the circumcised. They asked only that he remember the poor (Galatians 2:1–10).

If the two accounts describe one meeting, they agree on the question, the chief persons and the outcome: circumcision was not required of Gentiles. They differ in several points. Acts describes an assembly of apostles, elders and church, and Paul a private meeting with the leaders. In Acts the church of Antioch sends him; Paul says he went by revelation. Galatians does not mention the letter or its four abstentions. Acts says that Paul delivered the decisions to his churches, and has James cite them again on Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (Acts 16:4) (Acts 21:25).

Paul goes on to tell of a dispute over how Jewish and Gentile believers were to eat together. When Cephas came to Antioch, he says, he ate with Gentiles until "some people came from James", then drew back, and Barnabas went with him. Paul opposed Cephas "to his face" (Galatians 2:11–14). Paul's own rule in 1 Corinthians is that a man called uncircumcised should not be circumcised, and in Acts James repeats the decision on Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (1 Corinthians 7:18–19) (Acts 21:25).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts places the meeting between Paul's first journey and his second, on which he reached Corinth about AD 50; that arrival is tied to the Gallio inscription (see Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe). Allowing for the travel through Asia Minor and Macedonia that Acts describes in between (Acts 15:36–18:1), the meeting falls about AD 48 or 49. Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), puts it in 48; the timeline places it at 49.

Which visit Paul is describing in Galatians 2 is disputed, and the answer affects the dating of his whole career. He says it took place "after a period of fourteen years", and it is the second visit to Jerusalem that he mentions after his conversion (Galatians 1:18) (Galatians 2:1). In Acts the meeting about circumcision is Paul's third visit, after a second on which he and Barnabas brought famine relief (Acts 9:26) (Acts 11:29–30) (Acts 15:2). One view identifies the visit of Galatians 2 with the meeting of Acts 15, as J. B. Lightfoot did in Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (10th ed., 1890). Another identifies it with the famine visit, as William M. Ramsay argued in St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (1895); on that view the letter to the Galatians may have been written before the meeting described in Acts 15. The narrative below sets the two accounts side by side and does not decide between these views.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 14:27; Acts 15:1–2; Acts 15:4–6; Acts 15:7–11; Acts 15:13–21; Amos 9:11–12; Acts 15:22–31; Galatians 2:1–10; Acts 16:4; Acts 21:25; Galatians 2:11–14; 1 Corinthians 7:18–19; Acts 15:36–18:1; Galatians 1:18; Galatians 2:1; Acts 9:26; Acts 11:29–30; Acts 15:2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Antioch
Who James the Just, Peter, Paul, Barnabas

Threads Creeds and Councils, Mission and Expansion, Covenant and Promise

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul's First Missionary Journey c. AD 46–48 403
The Baptism of the Gentile Cornelius c. AD 40 392

LEADS TO

Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch c. AD 49 415
Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe c. AD 49–52 419
The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord AD 62 445
The Didache, an Early Church Manual c. AD 50–120 470
The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith After · c. AD 180 515

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Paul's First Missionary Journey Before · c. AD 46–48 403
Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch After · c. AD 49 415

COVENANT AND PROMISE

The Burial and Resurrection Before · AD 30 or 33 364

← Paul's First Missionary Journey Earlier · c. AD 46–48
→ Claudius Expels Jews from Rome Later · c. AD 49

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Claudius Expels Jews from Rome

c. AD 49 · Estimated date

The emperor Claudius orders Jews to leave Rome after disturbances that Suetonius links to one “Chrestus”. Acts names Aquila and Priscilla, whom Paul meets at Corinth, among those who left. Whether “Chrestus” means Christ is disputed.

In his Life of Claudius, written about AD 120, the biographer Suetonius lists among the emperor’s dealings with foreign peoples one sentence about the Jews of Rome: since they “constantly made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus”, he expelled them from the city (Suetonius, Claudius 25.4). He says nothing more about the disturbances or about Chrestus.

Acts mentions such an order. When Paul came to Corinth he found there a Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, who had recently come from Italy with his wife Priscilla, “because Claudius had commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome”. Paul stayed and worked with them, since they shared his trade of tentmaking (Acts 18:1–3). Acts does not say what caused the order or whether the couple were already believers in Jesus.

Two later writers add to the picture, and complicate it. Cassius Dio, in the early third century, says that Claudius did not drive the Jews out, because their numbers would have made that hard to do without a riot, but ordered them not to hold meetings while keeping their ancestral way of life (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.6.6). The Christian historian Orosius, early in the fifth century, repeats Suetonius's sentence with the name written "Christus", dates the expulsion to the ninth year of Claudius, and adds that it cannot be determined whether the emperor acted against Jews who were rioting against Christ or meant Christians to be expelled as well (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.6.15–16).

Who Chrestus was is not settled. On one reading the name is a form of "Christus", and Suetonius has passed on a confused report of disputes among the Jews of Rome about Jesus. On the other he means a man named Chrestus who was in Rome at the time. The dating note names a work for each reading. If the first is right, there were believers in Jesus in Rome within about twenty years of the crucifixion. Neither Suetonius nor Acts says so.

Paul's letter to the Romans, written some years later, greets Prisca and Aquila and the church that met in their house. The letter is addressed to a community that he had not founded and had not yet visited (Romans 16:3–5) (Romans 1:8–13) (Romans 15:20–24).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Suetonius gives no date; his Life of Claudius is arranged by subject (Suetonius, Claudius 25.4). Two years are proposed.

AD 49 rests on two things. Orosius, a Christian historian of the early fifth century, puts the expulsion in the ninth year of Claudius, which ran from January 49 to January 50 (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.6.15–16). He names Josephus as his authority. Dixon Slingerland, "Suetonius Claudius 25.4, Acts 18, and Paulus Orosius' Historiarum adversum paganos libri VII: Dating the Claudian Expulsion(s) of Roman Jews", Jewish Quarterly Review 83 (1992), pp. 127–144, finds no source for such a statement in Josephus and judges the date to be Orosius's own construction. And Acts says that Aquila and Priscilla had "recently" come from Italy when Paul reached Corinth (Acts 18:2), an arrival that the Gallio inscription puts at about AD 50; see Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe. Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), dates the edict to 49.

AD 41 rests on Cassius Dio, who reports under the first year of Claudius that the emperor did not expel the Jews, because they were too many, but forbade them to hold meetings (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.6.6); his next year begins three chapters later (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.9.1–10.1). Gerd Lüdemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (1984), dates the order that Acts mentions to 41 on this ground. Slingerland, Claudian Policymaking and the Early Imperial Repression of Judaism at Rome (1997), argues that Dio and Suetonius describe two different measures. Tacitus's account of the year 49 survives and does not mention an expulsion (Tacitus, Annals 12.5–24). The timeline places the event at about 49 and marks the date as an estimate.

On Chrestus, J. C. Rolfe's note on the passage in the Loeb edition of Suetonius (1914) takes the name as another form of Christus and thinks it probable, though uncertain, that Suetonius has made an error of chronology and is not speaking of some Jew of that name. Slingerland, in the book named above, argues that nothing in the sentence points to Jesus.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 18:1–3; Romans 16:3–5; Romans 1:8–13; Romans 15:20–24; Acts 18:2

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Claudius 25.4

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
60.6.6; 60.9.1–10.1

Seven Books of History against the Pagans Paulus Orosius · c. AD 417
7.6.15–16

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
12.5–24

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Claudius, Aquila, Priscilla
Threads Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449

CHURCH AND STATE

Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea Before · AD 44 399

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea After · c. AD 57–59 437

← The Council of Jerusalem Earlier · c. AD 49
→ Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch Later · c. AD 49

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch

c. AD 49 · Estimated date

Paul tells the Galatians how Cephas, who had been eating with Gentile believers at Antioch, withdrew when people came from James, and how he rebuked him in front of everyone. Whether this came before or after the council of Jerusalem in Acts 15 is disputed.

The account is Paul's own, written to the churches of Galatia (Galatians 1:1–2). In the text that the New Revised Standard Version translates he calls the other apostle Cephas, the name that John's Gospel explains as Peter (John 1:42); the World English Bible, which is quoted here, prints "Peter" in verses 11 and 14. When Cephas came to Antioch, Paul says, he ate with the Gentile believers. Then "some people came from James", and he drew back and kept apart, "fearing those who were of the circumcision". The other Jewish believers joined him in what Paul calls hypocrisy, and even Barnabas was carried along (Galatians 2:11–13). James is the Lord's brother, whom Paul has just named among the leaders in Jerusalem (Galatians 1:19) (Galatians 2:9).

Paul says that he opposed Cephas "to his face" and spoke to him in front of them all: "If you, being a Jew, live as the Gentiles do, and not as the Jews do, why do you compel the Gentiles to live as the Jews do?" (Galatians 2:11, 14). His words pass, with no marked break, into the argument of the whole letter: no one is justified by works of the law, and "if righteousness is through the law, then Christ died for nothing" (Galatians 2:15–21). He does not say how Cephas answered or how the matter ended.

Acts, in its account of these years at Antioch, mentions no visit of Peter (Acts 14:26–15:2) (Acts 15:30–40). It says that Peter had earlier been criticised in Jerusalem for eating with uncircumcised men (Acts 11:2–3). Of Paul and Barnabas at Antioch it reports a sharp quarrel over whether to take John Mark on their next journey, after which Barnabas sailed for Cyprus and Paul set out with Silas (Acts 15:36–40).

Later readers explained the passage in different ways. Clement of Alexandria, as Eusebius reports him, held that this Cephas was not the apostle but one of the seventy disciples who bore the same name (Eusebius, Church History 1.12.2). Jerome wrote in his commentary on Galatians, as he quotes it in his later reply to Augustine, that Peter did not sin and that Paul did not presume to rebuke one greater than himself: the rebuke was a matter of policy, not a real disagreement. He said that he was following Origen and other Greek commentators, who had used this reading to answer Porphyry, a critic who turned the passage against the apostles (Augustine, Letter 75.4–11 (from Jerome)).

Augustine of Hippo objected in two letters to Jerome, which the translation used here dates to 394 or 395 and to 397. If Paul wrote that Peter was at fault when he was not, he argued, a falsehood stands in Scripture and its authority is shaken throughout; Peter "was truly corrected" and Paul told the truth (Augustine, Letter 28.3–5) (Augustine, Letter 40.3–7). Jerome defended himself in 404, in the letter numbered 112 among his own and 75 among Augustine's (Augustine, Letter 75.4–11 (from Jerome)). Augustine replied the next year, held to his reading, and named Cyprian and Ambrose as authorities on his side (Augustine, Letter 82.4–8, 24).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Paul gives no date. He tells of the incident directly after the meeting in Jerusalem (Galatians 2:1–10) and joins the two only with the words "But when" (Galatians 2:11), so the order of events is inferred from the order of the telling.

If the meeting of Galatians 2 is the one described in Acts 15, the incident belongs to the stay of Paul and Barnabas at Antioch that followed it (Acts 15:30–35), about AD 49. J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (10th ed., 1890), in his note on 2:11, places it there. If the meeting of Galatians 2 is the earlier famine visit, the incident can be put before the meeting of Acts 15, with the people "from James" among the men who came down from Judea (Acts 15:1–2). William M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (1895), chapter 7, argues for that order. The dating note on the council of Jerusalem sets out the wider question. The timeline places the incident after the council and marks the year as approximate.

Primary sources

Scripture

Galatians 1:1–2; John 1:42; Galatians 2:11–13; Galatians 1:19; Galatians 2:9; Galatians 2:11, 14; Galatians 2:15–21; Acts 14:26–15:2; Acts 15:30–40; Acts 11:2–3; Acts 15:36–40; Galatians 2:1–10; Galatians 2:11; Acts 15:30–35; Acts 15:1–2

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
1.12.2

Letters Augustine of Hippo · AD 386–430
75.4–11 (from Jerome); 28.3–5; 40.3–7; 82.4–8, 24

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Antioch
Who Paul, Peter, Barnabas, James the Just
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Council of Jerusalem Before · c. AD 49 407
Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe After · c. AD 49–52 419

← Claudius Expels Jews from Rome Earlier · c. AD 49
→ Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe Later · c. AD 49–52

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe

c. AD 49–52 · Estimated date

With Silas and Timothy, Paul crosses from Asia Minor to Macedonia and founds churches at Philippi, Thessalonica and Corinth. Acts brings him before the proconsul Gallio at Corinth, whose year of office an inscription at Delphi puts at about AD 51–52.

In Acts, after the meeting in Jerusalem Paul proposed to revisit the churches he and Barnabas had founded. They disagreed so sharply over taking John Mark that they parted. Barnabas sailed with Mark for Cyprus, and Paul took Silas through Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15:36–41). At Lystra he added Timothy, the son of a Jewish mother and a Greek father, and circumcised him (Acts 16:1–3). Acts says that the Spirit kept them from preaching in Asia and Bithynia, and that at Troas Paul saw in a vision a man of Macedonia asking for help. They sailed at once. Here the narrator of Acts first writes “we” (Acts 16:6–11).

At Philippi, a Roman colony, a dealer in purple cloth named Lydia was baptised with her household and took the travellers into her house (Acts 16:12–15). Acts says that Paul drove a spirit out of a slave girl who told fortunes and that her owners had him and Silas beaten with rods and jailed. It tells how an earthquake opened the prison at midnight, the jailer was baptised with his household, and the magistrates came to appease them on learning that the two were Roman citizens (Acts 16:16–40). Paul recalls being "shamefully treated" at Philippi (1 Thessalonians 2:2).

At Thessalonica Paul argued in the synagogue on three sabbaths that the Christ had to suffer and rise. Some Jews and many Greeks joined him, and a mob then accused the believers of proclaiming "another king, Jesus" (Acts 17:1–9). He was sent on to Beroea and from there to Athens (Acts 17:10–15). In Athens, Acts has him speak before the Areopagus. Starting from an altar inscribed "To an unknown god", he proclaimed the God who made the world and will judge it through a man he raised from the dead. Some mocked, and a few believed (Acts 17:16–34).

At Corinth Paul lodged and worked with Aquila and Priscilla, was rejoined by Silas and Timothy, and when the synagogue turned against him moved to the house next door. Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed. Paul stayed eighteen months (Acts 18:1–11). Acts next tells how Jews of the city brought him before the proconsul Gallio, charging that he taught people to worship God contrary to the law. Gallio answered that he would not judge questions about "words and names and your own law", and dismissed the case (Acts 18:12–17). Paul later sailed by way of Ephesus to Caesarea and returned to Antioch (Acts 18:18–22).

Paul's letters confirm the outline: Philippi, then Thessalonica, then Athens, and preaching at Corinth with Silvanus and Timothy (1 Thessalonians 2:2) (1 Thessalonians 3:1) (2 Corinthians 1:19). They differ in a detail. Paul says that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica from Athens, while in Acts Silas and Timothy stay in Beroea and rejoin him only at Corinth (1 Thessalonians 3:1–2) (Acts 17:14–15) (Acts 18:5). These are the first churches in Macedonia and Greece that Acts records. On the usual dating Paul wrote the first of his surviving letters during this journey; see the Letters of Paul.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives intervals and one synchronism. Paul stayed at Corinth "a year and six months", was brought before the tribunal "when Gallio was proconsul of Achaia", and stayed "many more days" afterwards (Acts 18:11–12, 18).

The inscription from Delphi dates Gallio. It is a copy on stone of a letter of Claudius, and it survives in fragments. In lines 5–6 the stone has the end of a name, then "Gallio" and the words "my friend and proconsul", of which some letters are restored. The editors complete the name as Junius; the verb that makes Gallio the source of a report to the emperor is also their restoration. In line 2 the numeral 26 survives. The editors restore before it the word imperator, so that it counts the emperor's acclamations, and they restore his year of tribunician power, which is lost, as the twelfth (Gallio inscription (FD III 4, 286) lines 2 and 5–6). The twenty-seventh acclamation had followed by that twelfth year, which ran from 25 January 52 to 24 January 53 (CIL VI 1256), so the letter was written no later than that year. James H. Oliver, who re-edited the letter in Hesperia 40 (1971), pp. 239–240, heads the text "A.D. 52" and judges that Gallio was probably still proconsul when the emperor wrote.

Achaia had been governed since AD 44 by proconsuls chosen by lot (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.24.1). Dio says that such governors held office for a year (Cassius Dio, Roman History 53.13.2), and Claudius required them to leave Rome by the middle of April (Cassius Dio, Roman History 60.17.3), so that a term began in the late spring or the summer. A proconsul in office in the first half of 52 would therefore have arrived in 51, and Gallio's year is commonly put from the summer of 51 to the summer of 52, as in R. M. Gummere's note on Seneca's letter in the Loeb edition (1925). If the letter was written later in 52, a term of 52–53 is possible. Seneca says that Gallio took ship at once when he began to run a fever in Achaia (Seneca, Moral Letters 104.1), so he may not have served a full year; Tacitus calls Seneca his brother (Tacitus, Annals 15.73).

Acts does not say at what point in the eighteen months the hearing fell. Counting back from 51 or 52 puts Paul's arrival at Corinth about AD 50, and the start of the journey, after the meeting in Jerusalem, about 49. Rainer Riesner, Paul's

Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), has Paul in Corinth in 50–51.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 15:36–41; Acts 16:1–3; Acts 16:6–11; Acts 16:12–15; Acts 16:16–40; 1 Thessalonians 2:2; Acts 17:1–9; Acts 17:10–15; Acts 17:16–34; Acts 18:1–11; Acts 18:12–17; Acts 18:18–22; 1 Thessalonians 3:1; 2 Corinthians 1:19; 1 Thessalonians 3:1–2; Acts 17:14–15; Acts 18:5; Acts 18:11–12, 18

The Gallio Inscription from Delphi Issued in the name of the emperor Claudius · AD 52 lines 2 and 5–6

The Dedicatory Inscription of the Aqua Claudia Set up in the name of the emperor Claudius · AD 52
wiki.eagle-network.eu

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
60.24.1; 53.13.2; 60.17.3

Moral Letters to Lucilius Seneca the Younger · c. AD 62–65
104.1

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
15.73

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Philippi, Thessalonica, Athens, Corinth
Who Paul, Silas, Timothy, Lydia, Gallio
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

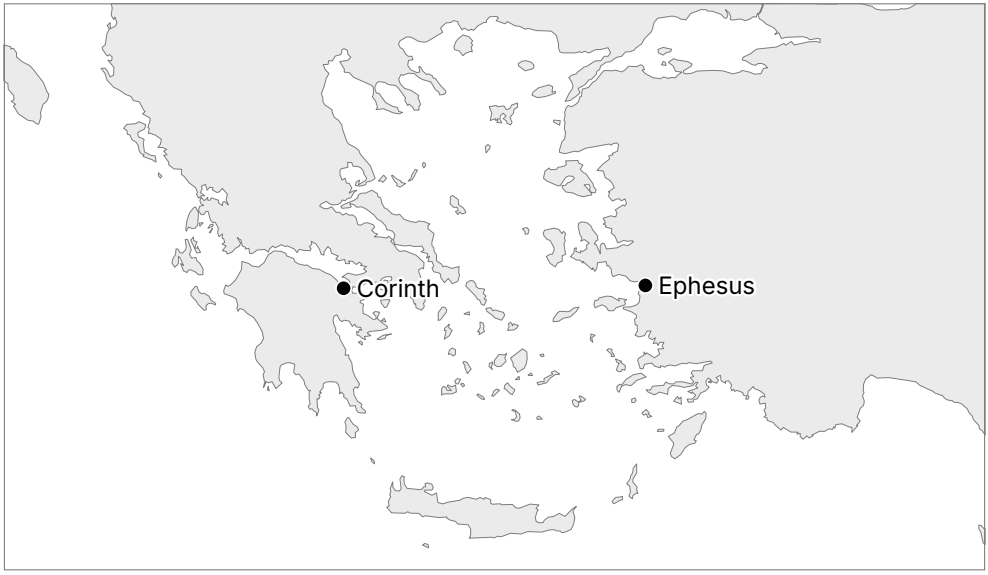
LEADS TO

The Letters of Paul c. AD 50–60 424

Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem c. AD 53–57 433

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch Before · c. AD 49 415
The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India After · AD 52 429



← Paul Opposes Peter at Antioch Earlier · c. AD 49
→ The Letters of Paul Later · c. AD 50–60

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Letters of Paul

c. AD 50–60 · Estimated date

In the course of his missions Paul writes letters to the churches he has founded and to others. On the usual dating they are older than the Gospels. They came to be collected and read alongside the Scriptures.

Paul wrote to his churches when he could not be with them (2 Corinthians 13:10). The first letter to the Thessalonians opens in the name of "Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy". It was written after Timothy, whom Paul had sent back from Athens, returned with good news of the new church, and it ends with the charge that it be read to all the believers (1 Thessalonians 1:1) (1 Thessalonians 3:1–6) (1 Thessalonians 5:27). On the usual dating it was written about AD 50–51 at Corinth, earlier than the Gospels as most scholars date them; see the Four Gospels Are Written.

The others likewise answer to particular needs. Galatians is a protest to churches that were turning to "a different good news" (Galatians 1:6–9). 1 Corinthians, written at Ephesus, replies to reports of division and to questions the Corinthians had put in writing (1 Corinthians 1:11) (1 Corinthians 7:1) (1 Corinthians 16:8). Romans introduces Paul and his message to a church he had not yet visited, as he was about to take a collection to Jerusalem and hoped to go on to Spain (Romans 1:8–15) (Romans 15:23–28).

The letters show how they were made. Several name co-senders (1 Corinthians 1:1) (Philippians 1:1). Paul dictated at least some of them: the scribe of Romans adds his own greeting, "I, Tertius, who write the letter", and Paul closes other letters with a line in his own hand (Romans 16:22) (1 Corinthians 16:21) (Galatians 6:11). The letter to the Colossians asks that it be read at Laodicea as well and exchanged for a letter from there (Colossians 4:16).

They hold early written statements of what the first Christians believed. Paul reminds the Corinthians of what he had himself "received" and passed on: that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, was buried, was raised on the third day, and appeared to Cephas, to the Twelve and to many others (1 Corinthians 15:3–8). Romans sets out its theme as the good news that is "the power of God for salvation for everyone who believes" (Romans 1:16–17).

Thirteen letters in the New Testament bear Paul's name. 2 Thessalonians, itself one of the disputed letters, warns against a letter "as if from us" and points to the greeting in Paul's own hand as the mark of a real one (2 Thessalonians 2:2) (2 Thessalonians 3:17). Seven of the thirteen are generally treated as undisputed, and scholars are divided over the other six; the dating note lists them and names works that discuss them.

The letters came to be known beyond the churches they were written to, and to be gathered. About AD 96 the church of Rome could tell the Corinthians, "Take up the epistle of the blessed Apostle Paul" (1 Clement 47). 2 Peter speaks of "all of his letters" and sets them beside "the other Scriptures" (2 Peter 3:15–16). The papyrus book known as Papyrus 46 is divided between two libraries. The University of Michigan calls it the oldest known copy of Paul's writings, and dates it about AD 200 on one of its pages and to the third century on another (Papyrus 46 P.Mich.inv. 6238) (Papyrus 46 introduction). The Chester Beatty in Dublin calls it the earliest surviving collection of his letters and labels its leaf third century (Papyrus 46 CBL BP II f.61). Michigan's description gives the contents in this order: Romans, Hebrews, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians and 1 Thessalonians, with the last leaves lost (Papyrus 46 contents).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The letters carry no dates. They are dated by fitting what they say about Paul's movements into the framework of Acts, which the Gallio inscription anchors at Corinth in about AD 51–52 (see Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe). 1 Thessalonians was written when Timothy had just come back from Thessalonica (1 Thessalonians 3:6), which matches the stay at Corinth of about AD 50–51 (Acts 18:5). 1 Corinthians was written at Ephesus, 2 Corinthians after Paul had gone on to Macedonia, and Romans when he was about to carry the collection to Jerusalem (1 Corinthians 16:8) (2 Corinthians 7:5) (Romans 15:25–26); these belong to the years about 53–57 (see Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem). Philippians and Philemon were written in custody, in a place they do not name (Philippians 1:13) (Philemon). The date of Galatians depends on which churches it addresses and which Jerusalem visit it describes; see the Council of Jerusalem. Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), dates it to 48, before 1 Thessalonians; Raymond E. Brown, in the work named below, takes 1 Thessalonians to be the first of the letters.

Authorship. Thirteen letters bear Paul's name. Seven are generally treated as undisputed: Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians and Philemon. The other six are disputed: 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Ephesians, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. Some scholars hold that Paul wrote them; others that followers wrote them in his name after his death. Raymond E. Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (1997), treats the seven as undisputed and discusses the six in ascending order of doubt, ending with the letters to Timothy and Titus. D. A. Carson and Douglas J. Moo, An Introduction to the New Testament (2nd ed., 2005), defend Paul's authorship of the letters to Timothy and Titus and contest Brown's estimate of how many scholars reject Ephesians. This wiki does not take a side. Hebrews names no author.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Corinthians 13:10; 1 Thessalonians 1:1; 1 Thessalonians 3:1–6; 1 Thessalonians 5:27; Galatians 1:6–9; 1 Corinthians 1:11; 1 Corinthians 7:1; 1 Corinthians 16:8; Romans 1:8–15; Romans 15:23–28; 1 Corinthians 1:1; Philippians 1:1; Romans 16:22; 1 Corinthians 16:21; Galatians 6:11; Colossians 4:16; 1 Corinthians 15:3–8; Romans 1:16–17; 2 Thessalonians 2:2; 2 Thessalonians 3:17; 2 Peter 3:15–16; 1 Thessalonians 3:6; Acts 18:5; 2 Corinthians 7:5; Romans 15:25–26; Philippians 1:13; Philemon

The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians The church of Rome; attributed to Clement · c. AD 96

47

Papyrus 46 c. AD 200 or third century

P.Mich.inv. 6238; introduction; CBL BP II f.61; contents

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Corinth, Ephesus
Who Paul, Timothy
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe c. AD 49–52 419

LEADS TO

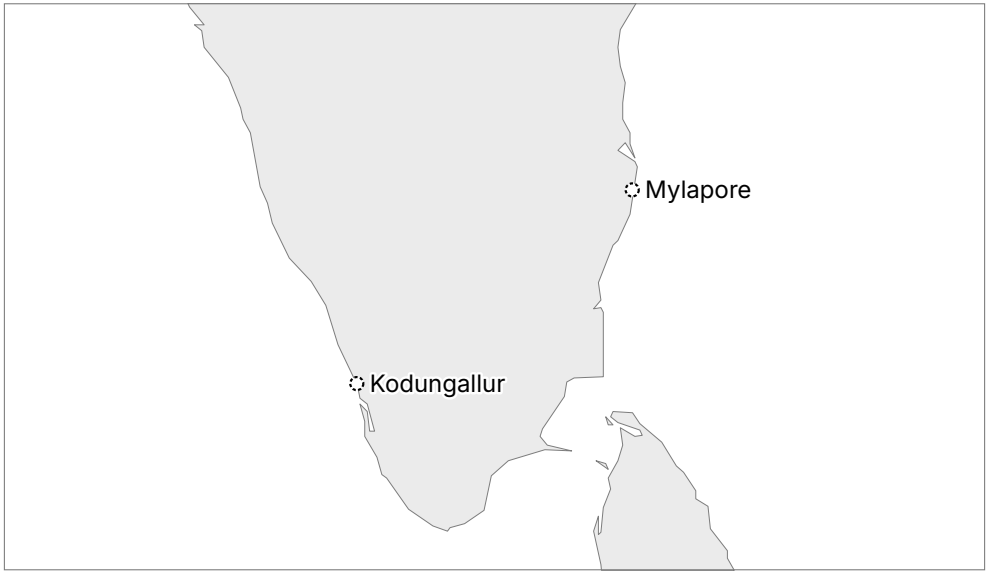
The Four Gospels Are Written c. AD 65–100 458

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church c. AD 144 496

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls Before · c. 150 BC – AD 68 258

The Four Gospels Are Written After · c. AD 65–100 458



← Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe Earlier · c. AD 49–52
→ The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India Later · AD 52

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India

AD 52 · Traditional date

Tradition holds that the apostle Thomas preached in India and died there. The oldest account cited, the Acts of Thomas, sets him at the court of a King Gundaphoros; the tradition of Kerala and Mylapore is attested later. Cosmas reports churches in India about AD 547.

What is told of the apostle Thomas after the New Testament comes from later writings, and they do not agree on where he went. Eusebius, early in the fourth century, cites Origen for a tradition that Parthia was allotted to Thomas (Eusebius, Church History 3.1.1–3).

The Acts of Thomas send him to India. The apostles divide the world by lot, and India falls to Judas Thomas. He refuses to go, and Jesus sells him as a carpenter to Abbanes, a merchant of "Gundaphoros, the king of the Indians" (Acts of Thomas 1–2). Given money to build the king a palace, Thomas spends it on the poor. The king's brother dies, is shown the palace in heaven and returns to life, and both brothers receive the seal from the apostle (Acts of Thomas 17–27). In the kingdom of another ruler, Misdeus, four soldiers spear Thomas on a mountain. He is laid in a royal tomb, and one of the brethren later carries his bones away to the West (Acts of Thomas Consummation of Thomas).

A king Gondophares is known from coins. The British Museum's catalogue of 1886 reports that they were found at Begram and in the Punjab, in the north-west of the subcontinent (Coins of Gondophares, British Museum Catalogue (1886) pp. xliii–xlv). The king of the Acts thus bears the name of a ruler of that region, far from Kerala and Mylapore.

In the fourth century Ephrem the Syrian, who spent his last years at Edessa, has the devil lament: "The Apostle whom I slew in India is before me in Edessa." He speaks of a merchant who brought the bones there (Ephrem, Nisibene Hymns 42.1–3). Gregory of Nazianzus pairs Thomas with India as he pairs Peter with Judaea (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 33.11).

The evidence for Christians in India is separate from the story of Thomas. Eusebius passes on a report that Pantaenus of Alexandria went to India and found that Bartholomew had preached there before him (Eusebius, Church History 5.10.2–3). Cosmas Indicopleustes, about AD 547, knew of a church in Male, "where the pepper grows", and a bishop at Calliana appointed from Persia (Cosmas, Christian Topography 3 (McCrindle pp. 118–119)). He says that the church on Taprobane belonged to Persian Christians settled there (Cosmas, Christian Topography 11 (McCrindle p. 365)). Copper plates that their editor assigns, from the form of the letters, to the ninth century or the early tenth record a ruler's grant to a church built at Kollam by a man the text calls Maruvan Sapir Iso (Kollam copper plates pp. 62–63, 66, 69). None of these passages names Thomas.

The southern tradition appears later among the sources cited here. Marco Polo's book of 1298 says that the body of St Thomas lies in a small town in the province of Maabar, visited by Christian and Muslim pilgrims, and that the Christians who kept the church told how the saint was killed by an arrow shot at a peacock (Marco Polo, Travels 3.18). A chronology published by an eparchy of the Syro-Malabar Church dates his landing at Kodungallur to AD 52 and his martyrdom at Mylapore to AD 72 (Syro-Malabar Eparchy of Melbourne, Significant Dates AD 52 and 72).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

None of the ancient sources cited here gives a year for Thomas's coming to India. The year shown, AD 52, is the one that the Syro-Malabar Church, one of the churches of the Thomas Christians of Kerala, gives for his landing at Kodungallur, with AD 72 for his death at Mylapore, in a chronology published by its eparchy of Melbourne (Syro-Malabar Eparchy of Melbourne, Significant Dates AD 52 and 72); the page states the dates without naming a source for them.

The oldest account cited here, the Acts of Thomas, is anonymous and carries no date. M. R. James, The Apocryphal New Testament (1924), assigns it to the third century. He reports that by the weight of authority it was composed in Syriac and that the surviving Greek text is a translation, though he thought it still arguable that the work was first written in Greek. Percy Gardner, The Coins of the Greek and Scythic Kings of Bactria and India in the British Museum (1886), likewise speaks of legends of Thomas "dating from the third century". The King Gundaphoros of the Acts bears the name of a king whose coins Gardner dates not later than the middle of the first century AD (Coins of Gondophares, British Museum Catalogue (1886) pp. xliii–xlv). On that dating a king of the name reigned in or before the apostle's lifetime. The coins do not mention Thomas.

The entry is placed on the timeline at the traditional year and marked as tradition. The datable evidence for Christians in India, from the report about Pantaenus that Eusebius passes on to Cosmas about AD 547 and the copper plates of Kollam, is set out in the narrative.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.1.1–3; 5.10.2–3

The Acts of Thomas Third century AD
1–2; 17–27; Consummation of Thomas

Coins of King Gondophares in the British Museum Struck in the name of Gondophares · Not later than the middle of the first century AD, according to the catalogue
pp. xliii–xlv

Nisibene Hymns Ephrem the Syrian · Mid fourth century, before AD 373
42.1–3

Orations Gregory of Nazianzus · c. AD 362–383
33.11

Christian Topography Cosmas Indicopleustes · c. AD 547
3 (McCrindle pp. 118–119); 11 (McCrindle p. 365)

The Kollam (Tarisappalli) Copper Plates Issued by Ayyan Adigal Tiruvadi, governor of Venad · Ninth or early tenth century; the fifth year of King Sthanu Ravi
pp. 62–63, 66, 69

The Travels of Marco Polo Marco Polo, written down by Rustichello of Pisa · 1298
3.18

Significant Dates in the History of the Syro-Malabar Church Syro-Malabar Eparchy of St Thomas the Apostle, Melbourne
AD 52 and 72

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Kodungallur, Mylapore
Who Thomas
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pentecost AD 30 or 33 378

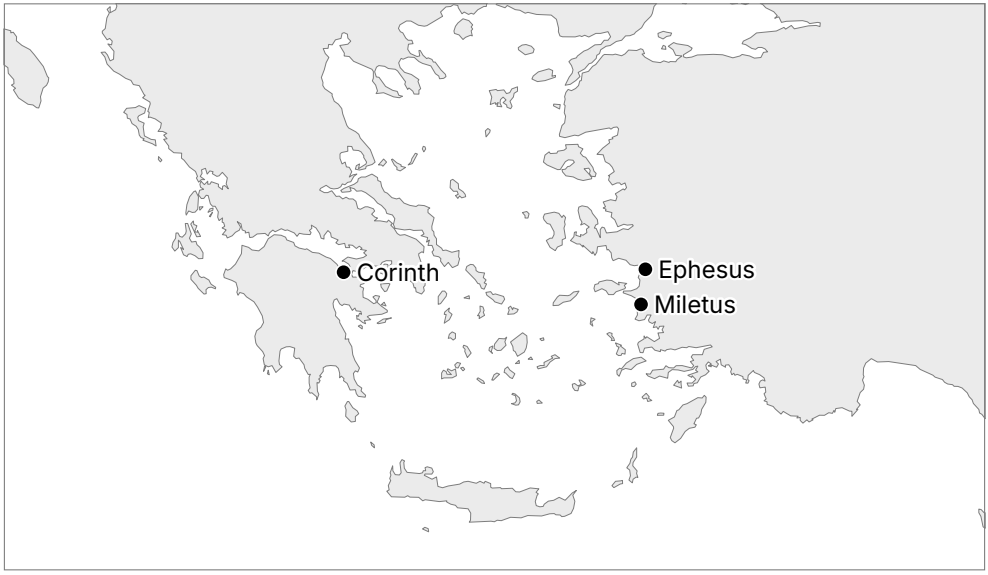
LEADS TO

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath 1599–1653 1137

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe Before · c. AD 49–52 419

Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem After · c. AD 53–57 433



← The Letters of Paul Earlier · c. AD 50–60
→ Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem Later · c. AD 53–57

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem

c. AD 53–57 · Estimated date

Paul works for some three years at Ephesus, then travels through Macedonia and Greece gathering money from his Gentile churches for the poor of Jerusalem, and sets out to deliver it in spite of warnings.

After some time at Antioch, Paul set out again through Galatia and Phrygia (Acts 18:22–23). Before he reached Ephesus, a Jew from Alexandria named Apollos had come there, an eloquent man who knew the Scriptures well and taught about Jesus but knew only the baptism of John. Priscilla and Aquila took him aside and explained the way more accurately, and he went on to Achaia (Acts 18:24–19:1).

Paul taught at Ephesus for three months in the synagogue and then for two years in the hall of Tyrannus, so that, Acts says, all who lived in the province of Asia heard the message (Acts 19:8–10). Acts tells of healings, of Jewish exorcists who tried to use the name of Jesus, and of magicians who burned their books (Acts 19:11–20). From Ephesus Paul wrote to Corinth, where the church had split into parties that used the names of Paul, Apollos and Cephas (1 Corinthians 1:11–12) (1 Corinthians 16:8). He speaks of "many adversaries" in Ephesus and of a danger in Asia so grave that he despaired of life (1 Corinthians 16:9) (2 Corinthians 1:8–10). Acts tells of a riot: the silversmith Demetrius, whose trade was in shrines of Artemis, roused the craftsmen, and a crowd filled the theatre and shouted for two hours, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!", until the town clerk dismissed them (Acts 19:23–41).

Through these years Paul was organising a collection. He told the churches of Galatia and Corinth to set money aside on the first day of each week (1 Corinthians 16:1–4). He went on to Macedonia, where the churches gave beyond their means, and pressed Corinth to finish what it had begun a year before (Acts 20:1) (2 Corinthians 8:1–11). He then spent three months in Greece (Acts 20:2–3). His letter to the Christians of Rome, written as he was about to leave for Jerusalem, says that he is carrying the gift of Macedonia and Achaia to the poor among the believers there, and that he hopes afterwards to visit Rome on his way to Spain (Romans 15:23–28). The Gentiles, he wrote, had shared in the spiritual goods of the Jerusalem believers and owed them a share of their material ones. He asked for prayer that he would be rescued from the unbelievers in Judea and that the gift would be accepted (Romans 15:27, 30–31).

A plot made him return through Macedonia. He sailed from Philippi after the feast of Unleavened Bread and at Miletus sent for the elders of Ephesus, telling them that they would not see him again (Acts 20:3–6, 17–38). At Caesarea the prophet Agabus bound his own hands and feet with Paul's belt as a sign of what awaited him, and Paul went up to Jerusalem (Acts 21:8–17).

The letters to Corinth and to Rome come from these years. In the chapters of Acts cited here the collection is not described. In Paul's later defence before Felix he says that he came to bring alms and offerings to his nation (Acts 24:17).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts gives intervals, not years: three months in the synagogue at Ephesus and two years in the hall of Tyrannus (Acts 19:8–10), three years in all by the reckoning of the Miletus speech (Acts 20:31), three months in Greece (Acts 20:3), a departure from Philippi after the days of Unleavened Bread and a wish to reach Jerusalem by Pentecost (Acts 20:6, 16).

These intervals hang between two outside points. The earlier is Gallio's term as proconsul of Achaia, which falls during Paul's previous stay at Corinth (Acts 18:12); see Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe. The later is the replacement of Felix by Festus, two years after Paul's arrest (Acts 24:27), and that year is itself disputed; see Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea. Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), puts Paul in Ephesus in 52–55 and his arrest in Jerusalem in 57. Other reconstructions move the whole sequence by a year or two in either direction.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 18:22–23; Acts 18:24–19:1; Acts 19:8–10; Acts 19:11–20; 1 Corinthians 1:11–12; 1 Corinthians 16:8; 1 Corinthians 16:9; 2 Corinthians 1:8–10; Acts 19:23–41; 1 Corinthians 16:1–4; Acts 20:1; 2 Corinthians 8:1–11; Acts 20:2–3; Romans 15:23–28; Romans 15:27, 30–31; Acts 20:3–6, 17–38; Acts 21:8–17; Acts 24:17; Acts 20:31; Acts 20:3; Acts 20:6, 16; Acts 18:12; Acts 24:27

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Ephesus, Corinth, Miletus
Who Paul, Apollos, Priscilla, Aquila
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul Carries the Gospel into Europe c. AD 49–52 419

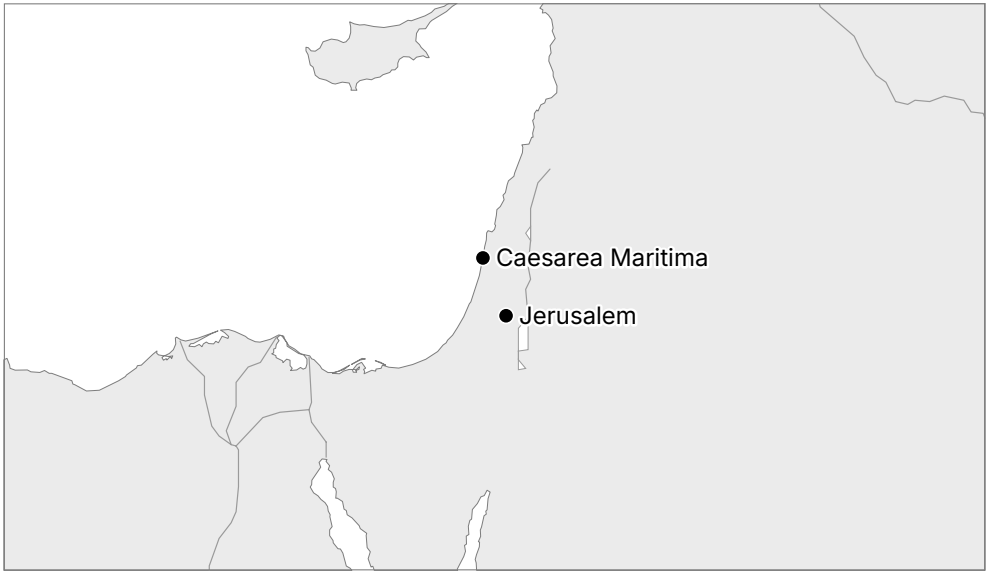
LEADS TO

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea c. AD 57–59 437

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India Before · AD 52 429

Paul's Voyage to Rome After · c. AD 59–62 441



← The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India Earlier · AD 52
→ Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea Later · c. AD 57–59

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea

c. AD 57–59 · Estimated date

A riot in the temple puts Paul into Roman custody. He is held for two years at Caesarea under the governor Felix, defends himself before Festus and King Agrippa, and appeals to the emperor.

When Paul reached Jerusalem, James and the elders told him that thousands of Jewish believers, all zealous for the law, had heard that he taught Jews to abandon Moses. On their advice he joined four men who were under a vow and paid their expenses in the temple (Acts 21:17–26). There Jews from Asia seized him, shouting that he had brought Greeks into the holy place. The crowd dragged him out and was beating him when the Roman tribune, Claudius Lysias, came down with soldiers and put him in chains (Acts 21:27–36) (Acts 23:26). The tribune at first took him for the Egyptian who had lately led four thousand men into the wilderness (Acts 21:38); Josephus tells of an Egyptian prophet, with thirty thousand followers by his count, whose following Felix scattered at the Mount of Olives (Josephus, Jewish War 2.261–263).

Paul addressed the crowd from the barracks steps, avoided a flogging by declaring that he was a Roman citizen, and was brought before the council, where his claim to stand for the resurrection of the dead divided Pharisees from Sadducees (Acts 21:40–22:29) (Acts 22:30–23:10). Learning that more than forty men had sworn to kill him, the tribune sent him by night under guard to the governor at Caesarea Maritima (Acts 23:12–35).

The governor was Felix, a brother of Pallas, who had married Drusilla, a sister of King Agrippa (Josephus, Antiquities 20.137–143). Tacitus calls him a freedman and says that he exercised a king's power in the spirit of a slave (Tacitus, Histories 5.9). The high priest Ananias and an advocate charged Paul with stirring up riots as a leader of "the sect of the Nazarenes" and with trying to profane the temple; Paul replied that he had come to bring alms to his nation (Acts 24:1–21). Felix put off a decision, hoped for a bribe, and left Paul in custody for two years (Acts 24:22–27).

His successor, Porcius Festus, proposed a trial in Jerusalem. Paul refused and appealed to Caesar (Acts 25:1–12). Before sending him, Festus set the case before Agrippa and Bernice, who was the king's sister (Josephus, Antiquities 19.354). Paul told once more how he had been turned from persecutor to preacher, and Agrippa said that the man could have been released if he had not appealed (Acts 25:13–26:32).

Acts records the judgment of the tribune, of Festus and of Agrippa that Paul had done nothing deserving death (Acts 23:29) (Acts 25:25) (Acts 26:31). The appeal took him to Rome as a prisoner (Acts 27:1; 28:16). This account rests on Acts alone among the sources cited here; the passages of Josephus on the governors and the king do not mention Paul.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Acts supplies the intervals: Paul hoped to reach Jerusalem by Pentecost (Acts 20:16), and he had been held for two years when Felix was replaced by Festus (Acts 24:27). Neither Acts nor Josephus gives the year of that change of governors, and everything depends on it.

Josephus puts it under Nero and says that Felix escaped punishment because his brother Pallas then stood high in Nero's favour (Josephus, Antiquities 20.182). Tacitus records that Nero removed Pallas from his post in AD 55 (Tacitus, Annals 13.14), and on that ground a minority of scholars have put the arrival of Festus as early as 55 or 56. Most place it between 58 and 60. Paul addresses Felix as one who has judged the nation "for many years" (Acts 24:10), and the rising of the Egyptian, which Josephus tells among the events of Nero's reign, already lay in the past when Paul was arrested (Acts 21:38) (Josephus, Jewish War 2.250–263). Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), dates the arrest to 57 and the sending of Paul to Rome to 59, and the timeline follows that reckoning.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 21:17–26; Acts 21:27–36; Acts 23:26; Acts 21:38; Acts 21:40–22:29; Acts 22:30–23:10; Acts 23:12–35; Acts 24:1–21; Acts 24:22–27; Acts 25:1–12; Acts 25:13–26:32; Acts 23:29; Acts 25:25; Acts 26:31; Acts 27:1; 28:16; Acts 20:16; Acts 24:27; Acts 24:10

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.261–263; 2.250–263

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
20.137–143; 19.354; 20.182

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
5.9

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
13.14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Caesarea Maritima
Who Paul, Felix, Festus, Herod Agrippa II
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem c. AD 53–57 433

LEADS TO

Paul's Voyage to Rome c. AD 59–62 441

CHURCH AND STATE

Claudius Expels Jews from Rome Before · c. AD 49 411

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution After · AD 64 449

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Herod Agrippa Kills James and Dies at Caesarea Before · AD 44 399

The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord After · AD 62 445

← Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem Earlier · c. AD 53–57
→ Paul's Voyage to Rome Later · c. AD 59–62

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

Paul's Voyage to Rome

c. AD 59–62 · Estimated date

Sent to Italy as a prisoner, Paul is shipwrecked on Malta, winters there and reaches Rome, where he lives for two years under guard and teaches all who come to him. There the book of Acts ends.

Paul and other prisoners were handed to a centurion named Julius for the passage to Italy. The account is told in the first person plural, "we" (Acts 27:1–2); Irenaeus, writing about AD 180, took the narrator to be Luke, Paul's companion (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.14.1). At Myra the centurion moved his party onto a ship from Alexandria bound for Italy. It made slow progress and put in at Fair Havens in Crete. The safe season for sailing was over, and Paul warned against going on, but the centurion listened to the ship's master and its owner, and most wanted to reach a better harbour for the winter (Acts 27:5–12).

A gale drove the ship before it for fourteen days. The crew threw the cargo and tackle overboard. Paul told the company that an angel had said to him that he must stand before Caesar and that no one on board would be lost. There were 276 people in the ship. It ran aground and broke up, and all of them reached the shore (Acts 27:13–44).

The island was Malta. Acts says that the islanders showed the survivors unusual kindness, that Paul shook off a viper unharmed, and that he healed the father of Publius, the chief man of the island (Acts 28:1–10). After three months they sailed in another Alexandrian ship by Syracuse and Rhegium to Puteoli, where they found believers. Christians from Rome came out along the road to meet them (Acts 28:11–15).

In Rome Paul was allowed to live by himself with a soldier to guard him. He called together the leaders of the Jewish community, who said that they had had no letters about him and wished to hear his views. Some were persuaded and others were not, and Paul declared that the message would go to the Gentiles (Acts 28:16–28). Acts closes with the words that he stayed two whole years in his own rented house, receiving all who came and teaching about Jesus "with all boldness, without hindrance" (Acts 28:30–31).

Acts does not say how the appeal ended. Letters written in Paul's name from prison name Aristarchus and Luke among those with him (Philemon 23–24) (Colossians 4:10, 14), and the letter to the Philippians sends greetings from "Caesar's household" (Philippians 4:22); none of them says where he was held. Eusebius, some 250 years later, assigns the mention of Aristarchus to this Roman custody and reports, as something said, that Paul was then released, preached again and came to Rome a second time (Eusebius, Church History 2.22.1–2). For that, see the Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The voyage follows Paul's appeal before Festus (Acts 25:12), so its year depends on when Festus took office, which is disputed; see Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea. Within that frame Acts gives the seasons. The ship was still off Crete when "the Fast" had passed (Acts 27:9), which is the Day of Atonement in early autumn (Leviticus 16:29–30). The company spent three months on Malta (Acts 28:11), and Paul then lived two whole years in Rome (Acts 28:30).

Rainer Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (1998), has Paul sent to Rome in 59 and under house arrest there from 60 to 62, and the timeline follows that reckoning. Those who put Festus's arrival earlier or later move the voyage with it.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 27:1–2; Acts 27:5–12; Acts 27:13–44; Acts 28:1–10; Acts 28:11–15; Acts 28:16–28; Acts 28:30–31; Philemon 23–24; Colossians 4:10, 14; Philippians 4:22; Acts 25:12; Acts 27:9; Leviticus 16:29–30; Acts 28:11; Acts 28:30

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.14.1

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
2.22.1–2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Malta, Rome
Who Paul, Luke
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea c. AD 57–59 437

LEADS TO

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul c. AD 64–68 453

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Paul in Ephesus and the Collection for Jerusalem Before · c. AD 53–57 433

Christianity Takes Root in Edessa After · c. AD 201 528

← Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea Earlier · c. AD 57–59
→ The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord Later · AD 62

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord

AD 62 · Firm date

While Judaea is between Roman governors, the high priest Ananus has James, the leader of the Jerusalem church, condemned and stoned. Josephus records it within a generation; Christian writers a century later tell a fuller story.

James appears in the New Testament as "the Lord's brother", whom Paul met in Jerusalem three years after his own conversion (Galatians 1:15–19). Paul counts him among those to whom the risen Christ appeared and among the "pillars" of the Jerusalem church (1 Corinthians 15:7) (Galatians 2:9). In Acts he gives the deciding opinion at the council on the Gentiles and receives Paul on his last visit (Acts 15:13–22) (Acts 21:18). The New Testament does not report his death.

The earliest surviving account is that of Josephus, written about thirty years after the event. Festus had died in office, and Nero had sent Albinus to replace him. In the interval King Agrippa gave the high priesthood to Ananus ben Ananus.

Josephus calls him bold and insolent, and a Sadducee, of the party that he says was the most severe in judging offenders. Ananus assembled a council of judges and brought before it "the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, whose name was James", with some others. He accused them of breaking the law and handed them over to be stoned. Those in the city who were thought the fairest and the strictest about the laws protested to Agrippa, and some went to meet Albinus and told him that Ananus had no right to convene the council without his consent. Albinus wrote to Ananus in anger, and Agrippa deposed him (Josephus, Antiquities 20.197–203).

Christian tradition is later and fuller. Hegesippus, who wrote in the later second century (Eusebius, Church History 4.22.3–4), is quoted at length by Eusebius. He calls James "the Just" and says that he drank no wine, ate no meat, never cut his hair, and prayed in the temple so constantly that his knees grew hard like a camel's. At Passover, he says, the scribes and Pharisees set James on the pinnacle of the temple to turn the people from Jesus. He proclaimed him instead as the Son of Man seated in heaven, and they threw him down, stoned him, and a fuller killed him with his club (Eusebius, Church History 2.23.4–18). Clement of Alexandria, about AD 200, in a sentence that Eusebius quotes, says that James was thrown from the pinnacle of the temple and beaten to death with a fuller's club (Eusebius, Church History 2.1.4).

The two accounts differ. In Josephus a Sadducean high priest uses a court; in Hegesippus scribes and Pharisees act on the spot. They agree that James was put to death in Jerusalem and that he was stoned.

According to Hegesippus the church then chose Symeon son of Clopas, a cousin of Jesus, to lead it (Eusebius, Church History 4.22.3–4). Josephus's sentence shows a first-century writer outside the church identifying James by his brother, "Jesus, who was called Christ" (Josephus, Antiquities 20.197–203).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Josephus sets the death between the death of the governor Festus and the arrival of his successor Albinus, and says that Ananus held the high priesthood for only three months (Josephus, Antiquities 20.197–203). He gives no year. Elsewhere he says that Albinus was already governor at the feast of Tabernacles four years before the war began (Josephus, Jewish War 6.300–305), and that the war began in the twelfth year of Nero, AD 66 (Josephus, Jewish War 2.284). That puts Albinus in Judaea by the autumn of 62 and the death of James earlier in the same year.

Hegesippus sets the death at a Passover and says that Vespasian's siege followed at once (Eusebius, Church History 2.23.4–18), which would be several years later. Josephus was a contemporary and Hegesippus wrote about a century after the event, so the year 62 is generally accepted.

Primary sources

Scripture
Galatians 1:15–19; 1 Corinthians 15:7; Galatians 2:9; Acts 15:13–22; Acts 21:18

Jewish Antiquities Flavius Josephus · AD 93–94
20.197–203

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
4.22.3–4; 2.23.4–18; 2.1.4

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
6.300–305; 2.284

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who James the Just, Ananus ben Ananus
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea Before · c. AD 57–59 437

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution After · AD 64 449

← Paul's Voyage to Rome Earlier · c. AD 59–62
→ The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution Later · AD 64

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution

AD 64 · Firm date

Fire destroys much of Rome in July of AD 64. To turn suspicion from himself, the historian Tacitus says, Nero blames the Christians of the city and has them put to death with public cruelty.

The fire began on 19 July among the shops beside the Circus Maximus and burned for six days, then broke out a second time. Of the fourteen districts of Rome, Tacitus says, four were untouched and three were levelled. Nero was at Antium when it started. He returned, opened the Campus Martius and his own gardens to the homeless and lowered the price of grain, but a report spread that he had sung of the fall of Troy while the city burned (Tacitus, Annals 15.38–41). Tacitus leaves open whether the fire was an accident or the emperor's doing (Tacitus, Annals 15.38–41). Suetonius and Cassius Dio say outright that Nero set it (Suetonius, Nero 38) (Cassius Dio, Roman History 62.16–18).

What followed is told at length by Tacitus. Neither relief nor religious rites, he says, could end the belief that the fire had been ordered. To stop the rumour Nero put the blame on a group "called Christians by the populace". Tacitus explains the name: Christus had been executed by the procurator Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius, and the movement had spread from Judaea to the capital. First those who confessed were arrested. On their information a great number were then convicted, less for arson than for "hatred against mankind". Some were dressed in animal skins and torn by dogs, some were crucified, and some were burned as torches after dark. Nero gave his gardens for the spectacle and went among the crowd dressed as a charioteer. Tacitus thinks the Christians deserved punishment, yet he records that people pitied them, because they seemed to die for one man's cruelty and not for the public good (Tacitus, Annals 15.44).

Suetonius confirms the punishment and not the occasion. In a list of Nero's public measures he says that penalties were inflicted on the Christians, "a class of men given to a new and mischievous superstition" (Suetonius, Nero 16.2). He describes the fire in another place and does not connect the two (Suetonius, Nero 38). Dio's account of the fire does not mention Christians (Cassius Dio, Roman History 62.16–18).

A Christian letter from Rome, a generation later, may refer to these deaths. After speaking of Peter and Paul, the letter known as 1 Clement adds that a "great multitude" of believers suffered insults and tortures, among them women (1 Clement 6). It names neither Nero nor the fire. By about AD 200 Tertullian, in words that Eusebius quotes, called Nero the first emperor to persecute the Christians (Eusebius, Church History 2.25.3–4).

The sources cited here give no number of the dead, mention no law against the Christians, and speak only of the city of Rome. Later tradition placed the deaths of Peter and Paul in this persecution; see the Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Tacitus tells of the fire under the consuls Gaius Laecanius and Marcus Licinius, the year AD 64 (Tacitus, Annals 15.33), and says that it broke out on 19 July (Tacitus, Annals 15.38–41). The year of the fire is not in doubt.

The punishment of the Christians is less exactly placed. Tacitus sets it after the first measures of rebuilding and the religious rites that followed the fire, without a date (Tacitus, Annals 15.44); it is usually put in the later part of 64. Suetonius gives no date at all (Suetonius, Nero 16.2).

Of the writers cited here only Tacitus links the Christians with the fire, and he wrote some fifty years later. Brent D. Shaw, "The Myth of the Neronian Persecution", Journal of Roman Studies 105 (2015), argues that the passage reflects the ideas of Tacitus's own day and not the events of the 60s. Christopher P. Jones, "The Historicity of the Neronian Persecution: A Response to Brent Shaw", New Testament Studies 63 (2017), defends the account as credible. Most historians accept it in substance.

Primary sources

Annals Tacitus · c. AD 115–120
15.38–41; 15.44; 15.33

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Nero 38; Nero 16.2

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
62.16–18

The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians The church of Rome; attributed to Clement · c. AD 96
6

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
2.25.3–4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Nero
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Paul's Voyage to Rome c. AD 59–62 441

Claudius Expels Jews from Rome c. AD 49 411

LEADS TO

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul c. AD 64–68 453

John's Revelation on Patmos c. AD 95 474

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians c. AD 112 488

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord Before · AD 62 445

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul After · c. AD 64–68 453

CHURCH AND STATE

Paul's Arrest and Imprisonment at Caesarea Before · c. AD 57–59 437

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple After · AD 66–70 462

← The Death of James, the Brother of the Lord Earlier · AD 62
→ The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul Later · c. AD 64–68

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul

c. AD 64–68 · Traditional date

The New Testament does not tell how Peter and Paul died. A letter from Rome, usually dated about AD 96, says that both suffered and died for their witness; writers from about AD 170 onwards place their deaths at Rome, and later ones under Nero.

The New Testament does not narrate the death of either apostle. Acts leaves Paul under guard in Rome (Acts 28:16, 30–31). The second letter to Timothy has him say that he is "already being offered" and that the time of his departure has come (2 Timothy 4:6–8). In John's Gospel Jesus tells Peter that in old age he will stretch out his hands and be taken where he does not wish to go, which the evangelist explains as a sign of how Peter would die (John 21:18–19). The first letter of Peter sends greetings from "Babylon" (1 Peter 5:13), which later writers took to be a name for Rome (Eusebius, Church History 2.15.2).

The first witness outside the New Testament is 1 Clement, written from Rome and usually dated about AD 96, a generation after the reign of Nero. It sets Peter and Paul before the Corinthians as examples "furnished in our own generation" of men persecuted to death. Peter endured many labours and, having "suffered martyrdom", went to the place of glory. Paul was seven times in chains, preached in east and west, reached the limit of the west and "suffered martyrdom under the prefects" (1 Clement 5). The letter names no place, year or manner of death. About AD 110 Ignatius of Antioch wrote to the Roman Christians that he did not give them orders "as Peter and Paul" had (Ignatius, To the Romans 4).

The details come later. About 170 Dionysius of Corinth wrote that the two had taught together in Italy and died as martyrs at the same time (Eusebius, Church History 2.25.5–8). Irenaeus, about 180, calls the Roman church founded by Peter and Paul (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.2). About 200 Tertullian wrote that at Rome Peter suffered as his Lord had and Paul died a death like John's (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 36); the John meant is usually taken to be John the Baptist, who was beheaded. The Roman writer Gaius, at the same period, offered to show the "trophies" of the apostles at the Vatican and on the road to Ostia (Eusebius, Church History 2.25.5–8). Origen, in the third century, in a passage that Eusebius reports, says that Peter was crucified head downwards at his own request and that Paul was martyred at Rome under Nero (Eusebius, Church History 3.1.2). Eusebius, who preserves several of these quotations, sums up in the early fourth century: Paul was beheaded at Rome and Peter crucified under Nero (Eusebius, Church History 2.25.5–8).

The churches draw different conclusions from Peter's presence in Rome. The Catholic Church teaches that Christ made Peter the rock of his church and that the bishop of Rome is Peter's successor (Catechism of the Catholic Church 881–882). The Orthodox patriarchs wrote in 1848 that Rome's see is reckoned Peter's by a single tradition and not from Scripture, which speaks rather for Antioch, and that its primacy was an honour given because Rome was the imperial city (Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs (1848) §§ 11, 13). Among Protestants, Calvin did not dispute that Peter died at Rome but could not believe that he had been its bishop, least of all for a long time (Calvin, Institutes 4.6.15).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The earliest sources cited here give no date. The letter from Rome known as 1 Clement shows only that both apostles were dead when it was written, on the usual dating about AD 96 (1 Clement 5); see the Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement). Dionysius of Corinth, about 170, says that they died "at the same time", and Eusebius, in the early fourth century, places both deaths in Nero's attack on the Christians (Eusebius, Church History 2.25.5–8). Jerome, writing in 392–393, is more exact: both died on the same day in the fourteenth year of Nero (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 1, 5), which is AD 67–68.

The range shown runs from the fire of Rome in 64 (see the Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution) to Nero's death in 68 (Suetonius, Nero 57). Those who accept the tradition differ within it: some connect the deaths with the persecution after the fire, others follow Jerome, and the two apostles need not have died in the same year. Because every date comes from later writers, the confidence is marked traditional.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 28:16, 30–31; 2 Timothy 4:6–8; John 21:18–19; 1 Peter 5:13

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
2.15.2; 2.25.5–8; 3.1.2

The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians The church of Rome; attributed to Clement · c. AD 96
5

The Letters of Ignatius of Antioch Ignatius of Antioch · c. AD 110
To the Romans 4

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.3.2

Prescription against Heretics Tertullian · c. AD 200
36

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
881–882

Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem with their synods · May 1848
§§ 11, 13

Institutes of the Christian Religion John Calvin · First edition 1536; final Latin edition 1559
4.6.15

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
1, 5

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Nero 57

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Peter, Paul, Nero
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449

Paul's Voyage to Rome c. AD 59–62 441

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi c. AD 29 or 32 327

LEADS TO

The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) c. AD 96 478

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution Before · AD 64 449

John's Revelation on Patmos After · c. AD 95 474

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Peter's Confession at Caesarea Philippi Before · c. AD 29 or 32 327

The Didache, an Early Church Manual

After · c. AD 50–120

← The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution Earlier · AD 64
→ The Four Gospels Are Written Later · c. AD 65–100

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Four Gospels Are Written

c. AD 65–100 · Estimated date

Four accounts of the words, deeds, death and resurrection of Jesus are written, on the usual dating, in the later first century. None names its author; the names Matthew, Mark, Luke and John come from second-century testimony.

None of the four Gospels names its author in its text. Two of them say something about how they came to be written. Luke's preface says that many had already undertaken to draw up an account, that the matter had been handed down by those who were eyewitnesses from the beginning, and that the writer, having traced everything carefully, is setting it out in order for a certain Theophilus (Luke 1:1–4). John says that it was written "that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God", and a closing note ascribes it to the disciple whom Jesus loved: "We know that his witness is true" (John 20:30–31) (John 21:20, 24).

The oldest surviving statements about the writers come from Papias of Hierapolis, early in the second century, in words preserved by Eusebius. On the authority of an elder he says that Mark had been Peter's interpreter and wrote down accurately, though not in order, what he remembered of Peter's teaching, having never heard the Lord himself. Of Matthew he says that he put together "the oracles" in the Hebrew language and that each interpreted them as he could (Eusebius, Church History 3.39.15–16).

Irenaeus, about AD 180, gives all four. Matthew issued a Gospel among the Hebrews in their own language while Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome. After their departure Mark, Peter's disciple and interpreter, handed down Peter's preaching in writing. Luke, Paul's companion, recorded the gospel that Paul preached. Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord who had leaned on his breast, published a Gospel while living at Ephesus (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.1.1). Clement of Alexandria, about AD 200, reports a different sequence as the tradition of the elders: the Gospels with genealogies came first, Mark wrote at Rome while Peter was still alive, and John wrote last, a "spiritual Gospel" (Eusebius, Church History 6.14.5–7). The ancient witnesses thus disagree about the order and, if the "departure" of which Irenaeus speaks is the death of the apostles, about whether Mark wrote before or after Peter died.

The oldest manuscript evidence is widely held to be a papyrus fragment of John 18 in the John Rylands Library, dated by its handwriting to the second century; the library adds that recent research points to a date nearer AD 200 (Papyrus 52).

For Irenaeus the four were a fixed set: he argues that there can be neither more nor fewer than four Gospels (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.11.8). Their dates, their order and their relation to one another have been studied ever since, and none of these questions is closed.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No Gospel carries a date. The limits are set from outside: the events they narrate, about AD 30, and their earliest use by other writers. Papias, early in the second century, already knows writings of Mark and Matthew (Eusebius, Church History 3.39.15–16), and a papyrus leaf of John survives from the second century (Papyrus 52). Within those limits the arguments turn on how the Gospels depend on one another and on whether the sayings about the temple (Mark 13:1–2) (Luke 21:20–24) were written down before or after its destruction in AD 70.

Most scholars put Mark first, close to the year 70; Adela Yarbro Collins, Mark: A Commentary (2007), dates it during the Jewish war, before the temple fell. Raymond E. Brown, An Introduction to the New Testament (1997), puts Matthew at 80–90, give or take a decade, and reports 70–100 as the majority view; in An Introduction to the Gospel of John (2003) he sets the final form of John between 90 and 110. A minority dates all four before 70: John A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (1976), and Jonathan Bernier, Rethinking the Dates of the New Testament (2022), who puts Mark in the 40s. Irenaeus himself places Matthew in the years when Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome, and Mark after their departure (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.1.1).

The range shown, about 65–100, is the majority view and no more than that. Whether the traditional names are those of the actual writers is debated in the same way, and this entry does not decide it. Rome and Ephesus are shown as places only because Clement of Alexandria and Irenaeus name them (Eusebius, Church History 6.14.5–7) (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.1.1); where each Gospel was written is not known.

Primary sources

Scripture
Luke 1:1–4; John 20:30–31; John 21:20, 24; Mark 13:1–2; Luke 21:20–24

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.39.15–16; 6.14.5–7

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.1.1; 3.11.8

Papyrus 52 (Rylands Greek P 457) 2nd century AD
digitalcollections.manchester.ac.uk

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Ephesus
Who John Mark, Matthew, Luke, John the Apostle
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Letters of Paul c. AD 50–60 424

The Burial and Resurrection AD 30 or 33 364

LEADS TO

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church c. AD 144 496

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Letters of Paul Before · c. AD 50–60 424

John's Revelation on Patmos After · c. AD 95 474

← The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul Earlier · c. AD 64–68

→ The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple Later · AD 66–70

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple

AD 66–70 · Firm date

Judaea rises against Rome in AD 66. After four years of war Titus takes Jerusalem; the temple is burned, the city is razed, and the daily sacrifice comes to an end.

Josephus puts the outbreak in the spring of AD 66, under the governor Gessius Florus, whose greed and violence he blames for it (Josephus, Jewish War 2.277–284). In the temple its captain, Eleazar, persuaded the priests to accept no offering from a foreigner, and the sacrifice for the emperor stopped. Josephus calls this the true beginning of the war (Josephus, Jewish War 2.409–410). Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, intervened with an army and was defeated with the loss of more than five thousand men (Josephus, Jewish War 2.555).

Nero gave the command to Vespasian, who gathered an army in Syria with his son Titus (Josephus, Jewish War 3.1–8). Josephus himself, the rebel commander in Galilee (Josephus, Jewish War 2.568), was captured at Jotapata and, by his own account, told Vespasian that he would be emperor (Josephus, Jewish War 3.392–408). Tacitus says that in two summers Vespasian took everything except Jerusalem, and that the civil war at Rome then halted the campaign (Tacitus, Histories 5.10). In July 69 the legions of Egypt and Judaea proclaimed Vespasian emperor (Suetonius, Vespasian 6), and the war was left to Titus (Tacitus, Histories 5.10).

Titus encamped before the city at Passover in AD 70, when it was full of pilgrims (Josephus, Jewish War 5.567) (Josephus, Jewish War 6.420–421). Inside, rival factions had been fighting one another, and famine set in (Tacitus, Histories 5.12–13) (Josephus, Jewish War 6.420–421). On the seventeenth of Panemus the daily sacrifice ceased for want of men to offer it (Josephus, Jewish War 6.94). On the tenth of Loos the temple burned. Josephus says that a soldier threw a brand through a window without orders and that Titus tried in vain to have the fire put out (Josephus, Jewish War 6.249–266). The rest of the city fell a month later (Josephus, Jewish War 6.403–408), and Titus had the city and the temple levelled, leaving three towers and part of the western wall (Josephus, Jewish War 7.1–3). Josephus counts 1,100,000 dead and 97,000 prisoners (Josephus, Jewish War 6.420–421); Tacitus had heard that the besieged numbered 600,000 (Tacitus, Histories 5.12–13).

At the triumph in Rome the golden table, the seven-branched lampstand and a copy of the Law were carried in procession (Josephus, Jewish War 7.148–152). The relief on the Arch of Titus shows soldiers bearing the lampstand, the table and the trumpets (Arch of Titus). The tax that Jews everywhere had paid to the temple now went to the Capitol in Rome (Josephus, Jewish War 7.218).

Josephus is the main narrative source. He watched the siege from the Roman camp and afterwards lived at Rome under the patronage of the victors (Josephus, Life 416–423); he blames the rebels for the city's ruin and clears Titus of burning the temple (Josephus, Jewish War 6.403–408) (Josephus, Jewish War 6.249–266). The surviving text of Tacitus breaks off before the city falls.

The Gospels record a saying of Jesus that not one stone of the temple would be left on another, and Luke speaks of Jerusalem surrounded by armies (Mark 13:1–2) (Luke 21:20–24). Eusebius, some 250 years after the war, reports that the Christians of Jerusalem, warned by a revelation given before the war, left the city and settled at Pella in Perea (Eusebius, Church History 3.5.3).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Josephus, who was there, dates both ends. The war began in the month Artemisius of the twelfth year of Nero, the spring of AD 66 (Josephus, Jewish War 2.277–284). The temple burned on the tenth of the month Loos and the last part of the city fell on the eighth of Gorpiaeus, in the second year of Vespasian (Josephus, Jewish War 6.249–266) (Josephus, Jewish War 6.435). Vespasian's reign was counted from 1 July 69 (Suetonius, Vespasian 6), so the year is 70.

Josephus uses Macedonian month names for the Jewish months, and their exact equivalents in the Roman calendar are not agreed. The burning of the temple is usually put at the end of August and the fall of the upper city about a month later. Josephus notes that the tenth of Loos was the day on which the Babylonians had burned the first temple (Josephus, Jewish War 6.249–266) (Jeremiah 52:12–13).

Primary sources

Scripture

Mark 13:1–2; Luke 21:20–24; Jeremiah 52:12–13

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.277–284; 2.409–410; 2.555; 3.1–8; 2.568; 3.392–408; 5.567; 6.420–421; 6.94; 6.249–266; 6.403–408; 7.1–3; 7.148–152; 7.218; 6.435

Histories Tacitus · c. AD 100–110
5.10; 5.12–13

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Vespasian 6

The Arch of Titus After AD 81, under Domitian web.archive.org

The Life of Flavius Josephus Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
416–423

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.5.3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Vespasian, Titus, Josephus
Threads Temple and Worship, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Herod Rebuilds the Temple 20/19 BC 280
Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple AD 30 or 33 342
The Fall of Jerusalem and the Destruction of the Temple 587/586 BC 200

LEADS TO

The Fall of Masada AD 73 or 74 466
The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina AD 132–135 492

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Pentecost Before · AD 30 or 33 378
The Didache, an Early Church Manual After · c. AD 50–120 470

CHURCH AND STATE

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution Before · AD 64 449
Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians After · c. AD 112 488

← The Four Gospels Are Written Earlier · c. AD 65–100
→ The Fall of Masada Later · AD 73 or 74

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Fall of Masada

AD 73 or 74 · Estimated date

Three or four years after Jerusalem fell, the Roman governor Flavius Silva besieges Masada, a rock fortress by the Dead Sea still held by rebels. Josephus says that the defenders killed their families and themselves, 960 dead in all, the night before the Romans entered.

At the outbreak of the revolt in AD 66, Josephus says, rebels took the fortress of Masada by treachery and killed its Roman garrison (Josephus, Jewish War 2.408). When the rebel leader Menahem was killed in Jerusalem, his kinsman Eleazar son of Jair escaped there (Josephus, Jewish War 2.442–448). Josephus calls the holders of Masada Sicarii and says that they raided the country round about. At Engedi, one Passover, they killed more than seven hundred women and children (Josephus, Jewish War 4.398–405).

Masada was still held after Jerusalem fell. When the governor Bassus died, Flavius Silva succeeded him and marched against it, the one stronghold still in revolt (Josephus, Jewish War 7.252–253). He built a wall round the whole rock so that no one could escape, and pitched his camp (Josephus, Jewish War 7.275–279). On a spur on the western side, called the White Promontory, his men raised an embankment with a platform of stone on top, and brought up an iron-plated tower and a ram. When the ram broke the wall, the defenders built a second one of timber and earth, and Silva had it set on fire (Josephus, Jewish War 7.304–319).

Josephus then gives Eleazar two long speeches urging his men to die free rather than be enslaved (Josephus, Jewish War 7.320–388). The men, he says, killed their wives and children. Ten chosen by lot killed the rest, and one of the ten killed the other nine, set fire to the palace and ran himself through. By his count nine hundred and sixty died; two women and five children, who had hidden underground, survived. It was the fifteenth of the month Xanthicus (Josephus, Jewish War 7.389–401). The Romans, entering the next morning, found silence and fire, and learned from the women what had been done (Josephus, Jewish War 7.402–406). Silva left a garrison and returned to Caesarea (Josephus, Jewish War 7.407–408).

The narrative rests on Josephus alone. By his own account he had left for Rome with Titus after the war in Judaea (Josephus, Life 422–423), and he names the two women as the source of what the Romans learned (Josephus, Jewish War 7.402–406). Pliny the Elder mentions Masada as a fortress on a rock near the Dead Sea (Pliny, Natural History 5.73). Inscriptions that Silva set up at Urbs Salvia in Italy list his offices, and one preserves, but for its first two letters, the phrase “of the province of Judaea” (Urbs Salvia inscriptions of Flavius Silva AE 1969/70, 183b, lines 1–3). Roman camps, fortifications and an assault ramp still surround the rock (UNESCO World Heritage List, Masada Description). What the excavations of the 1960s found, and how scholars weigh Josephus’s story against it, is set out in the note on dating.

Josephus presents the fall of Masada as the end of the war in Judaea: no enemy, he says, was left in the country (Josephus, Jewish War 7.407–408).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Josephus gives the day, the fifteenth of the month Xanthicus, and no year (Josephus, Jewish War 7.389–401). The last date he gives before it is the fourth year of Vespasian, for another event told earlier in the same book (Josephus, Jewish War 7.219). From that the year 73 was inferred, and the World Heritage listing gives AD 73 for the fall (UNESCO World Heritage List, Masada Description). Werner Eck, "Die Eroberung von Masada und eine neue Inschrift des L. Flavius Silva Nonius Bassus", Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 60 (1969), pp. 282–289, argued from the order of the offices in Silva's inscription (Urbs Salvia inscriptions of Flavius Silva AE 1969/70, 183b, lines 1–3) that he cannot have become governor of Judaea before the spring of 73, and so proposed the spring of 74 for the fall of Masada. Eck's argument and the older inference are given here as Hannah M. Cotton reports them in "The Date of the Fall of Masada: The Evidence of the Masada Papyri", Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 78 (1989), pp. 157–162. Cotton sets against the inscription papyri found at Masada that give circumstantial support to 73, and concludes that the evidence cannot decide the issue. Jonathan Roth, "The Length of the Siege of Masada", Scripta Classica Israelica 14 (1995), pp. 87–110, calls the choice between 73 and 74 a matter of controversy and lists the literature. The timeline places the event at 73 and shows both years.

Roth notes that only one account of the siege survives, that of Josephus. How far his account of the last night can be trusted is also debated. Shaye J. D. Cohen, "Masada: Literary Tradition, Archaeological Remains, and the Credibility of Josephus", Journal of Jewish Studies 33 (1982), pp. 385–405, sets it beside the finds of Yigael Yadin's excavation of 1963–1965. He notes that Yadin found three skeletons in the northern palace and twenty-five in a cave on the southern cliff, and traces of many separate fires, where Josephus has 960 dead in the palace and a single heap set alight. Cohen concludes that some of the defenders did kill themselves, that Josephus enlarged and embellished this, and that Eleazar's speeches are Josephus's own composition.

Jodi Magness, Masada: From Jewish Revolt to Modern Myth (2019), holds that archaeology is not equipped to settle whether the mass suicide took place. She reports that Yadin took a group of twelve potsherds inscribed with names, one of them "ben Yair", for the lots of Josephus's story, and that Joseph Naveh, who published them, could not identify them conclusively as such.

Primary sources

The Jewish War Flavius Josephus · c. AD 75–79
2.408; 2.442–448; 4.398–405; 7.252–253; 7.275–279; 7.304–319; 7.320–388; 7.389–401; 7.402–406; 7.407–408; 7.219

The Life of Flavius Josephus Flavius Josephus · c. AD 94–100
422–423

Natural History Pliny the Elder · AD 77
5.73

Building Inscriptions of Flavius Silva at Urbs Salvia (AE 1969/70, 183) Set up by L. Flavius Silva Nonius Bassus · After the death of Titus in AD 81, since he is called "deified"
AE 1969/70, 183b, lines 1–3

Masada (UNESCO World Heritage List, no. 1040) UNESCO World Heritage Centre · Inscribed 2001
Description

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Masada
Who Eleazar ben Yair, Flavius Silva

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462

← The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple Earlier · AD 66–70
→ The Didache, an Early Church Manual Later · c. AD 50–120

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Didache, an Early Church Manual

c. AD 50–120 · Estimated date

An anonymous handbook, “The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles”, sets out for one early community how to live, how to baptize, fast and pray, what to say over the cup and the bread, and how to treat travelling prophets and local leaders.

The Didache is a short manual in Greek, headed as the teaching of the Lord through the twelve apostles to the nations (Didache 1–6). It begins with the words “There are two ways, one of life and one of death”. Its first six chapters are moral instruction, with sayings close to those of the Sermon on the Mount (Didache 1–6).

The rest gives rules for a community. Those who have received this instruction are to be baptized “into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit” in running water; if there is none, in other water, and failing that by pouring water three times on the head. The baptizer and the candidate fast beforehand (Didache 7). Believers are to fast on Wednesdays and Fridays and to say the Lord's Prayer three times a day, in a form very close to Matthew's (Didache 8) (Matthew 6:9–13).

For the eucharist the manual supplies prayers of thanksgiving, first over the cup and then over the broken bread. One of them asks that, as the bread was once scattered over the hills and was gathered into one, so the church may be gathered from the ends of the earth into the kingdom. Only the baptized may eat and drink. A further thanksgiving after the meal ends with the Aramaic cry Maran atha (Didache 9–10). On the Lord's day the community is to meet, break bread and give thanks after confessing its sins, "that your sacrifice may be pure", and those who have quarrelled must first be reconciled (Didache 14).

The manual knows two kinds of minister. Apostles and prophets travel from place to place and are to be received, but tested: one who stays more than two days or asks for money is a false prophet. A true prophet who settles is to receive the first-fruits (Didache 11–13). The community is also to appoint for itself bishops and deacons, who carry out for it the service of the prophets and teachers (Didache 15). The book ends with a warning to be ready for the last days (Didache 16).

Eusebius, in the early fourth century, lists "the so-called Teachings of the Apostles" among books that were known but not received as Scripture (Eusebius, Church History 3.25.4). The complete Greek text is known today from a single manuscript that came to light in the nineteenth century; see the Didache (The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles). It records what one community was told to do, at a stage when wandering prophets and resident officers stood side by side.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The work names no author, place or date. Its date is argued from its contents: it still expects travelling apostles and prophets alongside locally chosen bishops and deacons (Didache 11–13) (Didache 15), and it appeals to what the Lord commanded "in his Gospel" (Didache 8). Aaron Milavec, The Didache: Faith, Hope, and Life of the Earliest Christian Communities, 50–70 C.E. (2003), puts it in the middle of the first century. Kurt Niederwimmer, The Didache: A Commentary (1998), dates the compilation to about 110–120. The timeline shows the whole range and places the entry near the end of the first century.

The place is equally uncertain. Most scholars think of Syria or Palestine, and some of Egypt. Antioch is given here only as a marker for Syria; the text does not mention it.

Primary sources

Scripture
Matthew 6:9–13

The Didache (The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) Between about AD 50 and 150; most often placed near AD 100
1–6; 7; 8; 9–10; 14; 11–13; 15; 16

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.25.4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Antioch
Threads Temple and Worship, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

LEADS TO

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship c. AD 155–165 500

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple Before · AD 66–70 462

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians After · c. AD 112 488

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul Before · c. AD 64–68 453

The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) After · c. AD 96 478

← The Fall of Masada Earlier · AD 73 or 74
→ John’s Revelation on Patmos Later · c. AD 95

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

John's Revelation on Patmos

c. AD 95 · Estimated date

A Christian prophet named John, on the island of Patmos, writes down visions addressed to seven churches of Asia. They show Christ in glory, the fall of the city the book calls Babylon and a new Jerusalem, and become the last book of the New Testament.

The book opens as a revelation of Jesus Christ sent "to his servant, John" (Revelation 1:1). John calls himself the brother of his readers and their partner in suffering. He was, he says, on the island called Patmos "because of God's Word and the testimony of Jesus Christ", and was "in the Spirit on the Lord's day" when a voice told him to write what he saw and send it to seven churches of Asia, beginning with Ephesus. He turned and saw one "like a son of man" standing among seven lampstands (Revelation 1:4, 9–13).

Seven short messages follow, each praising or rebuking one church. Ephesus has left its first love; Smyrna is about to suffer; at Pergamum a witness named Antipas has been killed; Laodicea is lukewarm (Revelation 2:4, 10, 13) (Revelation 3:16).

The visions that fill the rest of the book show the souls of those killed for their testimony, a beast that makes war on the saints and demands worship, and a woman called "Babylon the great", drunk with the blood of the martyrs and seated on seven mountains, "the great city, which reigns over the kings of the earth" (Revelation 6:9–11) (Revelation 13:7–8) (Revelation 17:5–9, 18). When Irenaeus discussed the beast's number, one of the names he weighed was Lateinos, because "the Latins are they who at present bear rule"; he would not decide between it and others (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.30.3). The book ends with a new heaven and a new earth, the new Jerusalem coming down from God, and the prayer "Yes, come, Lord Jesus" (Revelation 21:1–4) (Revelation 22:20).

The writer names himself only as John and counts himself among the prophets (Revelation 22:8–9). Justin, in the middle of the second century, calls him "one of the apostles of Christ" (Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 81), and Irenaeus calls him John, the Lord's disciple (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.20.11). In the third century Dionysius of Alexandria argued from its language and style that the book was not by the author of John's Gospel, though he held it to be the work of a holy man of that name (Eusebius, Church History 7.25). Eusebius suggested a second John, an elder mentioned by Papias (Eusebius, Church History 3.39.5–6). The identification with the apostle is therefore ancient, and so is the doubt.

Eusebius reports as tradition that John was banished to Patmos under Domitian and returned to Ephesus when Domitian died (Eusebius, Church History 3.18) (Eusebius, Church History 3.20). He also records that in his own day some received the book as Scripture and others rejected it (Eusebius, Church History 3.25.2–4).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The book gives no date. Irenaeus, about AD 180, says that the vision was seen "towards the end of Domitian's reign" (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.30.3). Domitian was killed in September 96 (Suetonius, Domitian 17), so this points to about 95, and most scholars accept it; so Adela Yarbro Collins, Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse (1984), who relies on Irenaeus and does not assume a general persecution under Domitian. Leonard L. Thompson, The Book of Revelation: Apocalypse and Empire (1990), likewise doubts that such a persecution took place.

A minority prefers a date about 68–70, soon after Nero's death. The arguments are drawn from the text: the temple and the holy city are spoken of as still to be trampled (Revelation 11:1–2), and of seven kings "five have fallen, the one is" (Revelation 17:10), which is read as a count of emperors ending with Nero's successor. John A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (1976), argues this case. The timeline follows Irenaeus; the earlier date is recorded here.

Primary sources

Scripture

Revelation 1:1; Revelation 1:4, 9–13; Revelation 2:4, 10, 13; Revelation 3:16; Revelation 6:9–11; Revelation 13:7–8; Revelation 17:5–9, 18; Revelation 21:1–4; Revelation 22:20; Revelation 22:8–9; Revelation 11:1–2; Revelation 17:10

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
5.30.3; 4.20.11

Dialogue with Trypho Justin Martyr · c. AD 155–165
81

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
7.25; 3.39.5–6; 3.18; 3.20; 3.25.2–4

The Lives of the Twelve Caesars Suetonius · c. AD 120
Domitian 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Patmos, Ephesus
Who John of Patmos, Domitian
Threads Scripture and Canon, Prophets and Prophecy, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449

Daniel at the Babylonian Court c. 605–536 BC 189

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Four Gospels Are Written Before · c. AD 65–100 458

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church After · c. AD 144 496

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

Jesus Drives the Traders from the Temple Before · AD 30 or 33 342

The New Prophecy of Montanus After · c. AD 157–172 508

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul Before · c. AD 64–68 453

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom After · c. AD 110 484

← The Didache, an Early Church Manual Earlier · c. AD 50–120
→ The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) Later · c. AD 96

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement)

c. AD 96 · Estimated date

The church of Rome sends a long letter to the church of Corinth, where presbyters have been removed from office, and tells those responsible to submit to them. It appeals to an order handed down from the apostles and is linked from the second century with the name of Clement.

The letter names no writer. It is addressed from "the church of God which sojourns at Rome" to the church at Corinth, and it begins by apologising that troubles at Rome have delayed an answer on matters the Corinthians had raised (1 Clement 1). A few headstrong people, it says, had stirred up a revolt in the Corinthian church, and men who had served blamelessly had been put out of their ministry (1 Clement 1) (1 Clement 44).

Most of the long letter is a sermon against jealousy and for humility, argued from the Scriptures. Among its examples it names Peter and Paul, who suffered and died "in our own generation", and a great number of others (1 Clement 5– 6). It then turns to order. As Israel had its high priest, priests and Levites, each with an appointed service, so in the church God sent Christ, Christ sent the apostles, and the apostles appointed their first converts as bishops and deacons (1 Clement 40–42). Foreseeing strife over this office, they also arranged that when those men died other approved men should succeed them. To depose such men is therefore a serious sin (1 Clement 44). The letter calls the office from which men were removed the "episcopate" and the revolt a sedition against the presbyters (1 Clement 44) (1 Clement 47), and it names no single bishop at Corinth or at Rome. It recalls that Paul once wrote to Corinth about parties (1 Clement 47), tells the leaders of the revolt to submit to the presbyters (1 Clement 57), and warns that those who disobey what God has said "through us" put themselves in danger (1 Clement 59). Three envoys carried it and were to bring back word of peace (1 Clement 63–65).

About 170 Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, told the Romans that the letter "written to us through Clement" was still read in his church (Eusebius, Church History 4.23.11). Irenaeus, about 180, says that the church of Rome sent it in the time of Clement of Rome, whom he counts third after the apostles (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.3), and Eusebius knew it as read in many churches (Eusebius, Church History 3.16).

The churches do not read the letter alike, and only two of their readings are given here. The Catholic Church cites it for the teaching that the apostles appointed successors whose office continues in the bishops (Catechism of the Catholic Church 861), and Pope Benedict XVI said that the letter could be called a first exercise of the Roman primacy after the death of Peter (Benedict XVI, General Audience, 7 March 2007). The Orthodox patriarchs answered in 1848 that Corinth turned to Rome as the nearer great church, in the imperial capital, and that such brotherly help is no proof of papal power over the churches (Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs (1848) § 14). No Protestant confession that discusses the letter was found for this entry, so a Protestant reading is not represented; the question of what the letter shows about bishops, presbyters and the standing of Rome is not closed.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The letter carries no date. It was written after the deaths of Peter and Paul, which it places in "our own generation" (1 Clement 5–6), and late enough for some of the men appointed by the apostles to have died and for the church of Corinth to be called ancient (1 Clement 44) (1 Clement 47). It was known at Corinth by about 170 (Eusebius, Church History 4.23.11). Irenaeus sets it in the time of Clement (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.3), whose years as bishop Eusebius gives as the twelfth of Domitian to the third of Trajan, about AD 92–100 (Eusebius, Church History 3.15) (Eusebius, Church History 3.34).

The usual date of about 96 rests on reading the "sudden and successive calamitous events" of the opening (1 Clement 1) as a persecution under Domitian, who died in that year. The letter does not say what the events were. L. L. Welborn, "On the Date of First Clement", Biblical Research 29 (1984), concludes only that it falls between 80 and 140. Thomas J. Herron, Clement and the Early Church of Rome: On the Dating of Clement's First Epistle to the Corinthians (2008), argues for a date before 70.

Primary sources

The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians The church of Rome; attributed to Clement · c. AD 96
1; 44; 5–6; 40–42; 47; 57; 59; 63–65

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
4.23.11; 3.16; 3.15; 3.34

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.3.3

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
861

General Audience of 7 March 2007: Saint Clement, Bishop of Rome Pope Benedict XVI · 7 March 2007
vatican.va

Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem with their synods · May 1848
§ 14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Corinth
Who Clement of Rome
Threads Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul c. AD 64–68 453

LEADS TO

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom c. AD 110 484

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Didache, an Early Church Manual Before · c. AD 50–120 470

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom After · c. AD 110 484

← John's Revelation on Patmos Earlier · c. AD 95
→ Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom Later · c. AD 110
TIMELINE

The Church under Rome

AD 100–313

An illegal and growing minority. Martyrs, apologists and bishops; the rule of faith and the canon of Scripture take shape; the first monks go into the desert.

The sources are now the Christians' own letters, apologies and martyr acts, together with Roman officials' reports. Persecution was local and sporadic until the empire-wide measures of Decius and Diocletian. In these centuries the church settled the outline of its ministry, its worship and its Scriptures.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom c. AD 110 484
Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians c. AD 112 488
The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina AD 132–135 492
Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church c. AD 144 496

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship c. AD 155–165 500
The Martyrdom of Polycarp c. AD 155–156 504
The New Prophecy of Montanus c. AD 157–172 508
The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne AD 177 512
Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515
The Muratorian List of New Testament Books c. AD 170–200 520
Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin c. AD 197–220 524
Christianity Takes Root in Edessa c. AD 201 528
The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity 7 March AD 203 532
Origen and the School of Alexandria c. AD 203–254 536
The Decian Persecution AD 250 540
Cyprian on the Unity of the Church AD 251–258 544
Antony Withdraws to the Desert c. AD 270–285 549
Armenia Adopts Christianity AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553
The Great Persecution under Diocletian AD 303–311 557
Galerius Grants Toleration 30 April AD 311 561
Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge 28 October AD 312 565

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom

c. AD 110 · Traditional date

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, is taken under guard to Rome to be thrown to wild beasts. On the way he writes seven letters that urge unity around the bishop, insist that Christ truly suffered, and ask the Roman Christians not to save him.

Ignatius of Antioch calls himself “the bishop of Syria” (Ignatius, To the Romans 2). His letters do not say who arrested him or on what charge. They show him as a condemned man on the road from Antioch in Syria to Rome, chained to a squad of ten soldiers whom he calls “ten leopards”, and expecting to be thrown to wild beasts when he arrives (Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeans 11) (Ignatius, To the Romans 5) (Ignatius, To the Ephesians 1).

The road led through Asia Minor. At Smyrna, where Polycarp was bishop, he wrote to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia and Tralles, whose delegates had come to meet him, and to the church of Rome (Ignatius, To the Ephesians 21)

(Ignatius, To the Magnesians 2; 15) (Ignatius, To the Trallians 1; 12) (Ignatius, To the Romans 10). From Troas he wrote to Philadelphia, to Smyrna and to Polycarp, and says that he must sail at once for Neapolis (Ignatius, To the Philadelphians 11) (Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeans 12) (Ignatius, To Polycarp 8).

The letters press two points. The first is unity around the bishop. The bishop presides "in the place of God", the presbyters in the place of the council of the apostles, and the deacons are entrusted with the service of Jesus Christ (Ignatius, To the Magnesians 6). Nothing that concerns the church is to be done without the bishop; that is to be counted "a proper Eucharist" which is held by the bishop or by one to whom he has entrusted it; and where the bishop appears, there the people are to be, "even as, wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church" (Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeans 8). The second is that Christ was truly born, truly crucified and truly raised, against those who said he only seemed to suffer (Ignatius, To the Trallians 9–10). Such people, Ignatius says, stay away from the Eucharist because they do not confess it to be the flesh of Jesus Christ (Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeans 7).

To Rome he writes differently. He greets a church that "presides in the place of the region of the Romans" and "presides over love" (Ignatius, To the Romans, greeting), and begs it not to intervene for him: "I am the wheat of God, and let me be ground by the teeth of the wild beasts, that I may be found the pure bread of Christ." He does not give them orders, he adds, as Peter and Paul did (Ignatius, To the Romans 4).

The letters stop before he reaches Rome. Polycarp, writing to Philippi, counts Ignatius among those who are now with the Lord, sends copies of his letters and asks for any further news (Polycarp, To the Philippians 9; 13). Irenaeus, about 180, quotes the sentence about the wheat as the words of a man condemned to the beasts (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 5.28.4). Eusebius, two centuries after the event, gives the death in Rome as what "report says" (Eusebius, Church History 3.36).

The churches do not read these letters alike, and only one reading is documented here. The Catechism of the Catholic Church quotes the letter to Smyrna for the bishop's office and the greeting to Rome, "which presides in charity", for the communion of the other churches with the church of Rome (Catechism of the Catholic Church 896) (Catechism of the Catholic Church 834). No Orthodox or Protestant document that discusses these passages was found for this entry, so those readings are not represented.

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The letters carry no year. The letter to Rome is dated in late August (Ignatius, To the Romans 10), and nothing in the seven letters names an emperor or a governor. The date rests on Eusebius, who wrote two centuries later and sets Ignatius's episcopate, journey and death in his account of the reign of Trajan (AD 98–117) (Eusebius, Church History 3.21–22) (Eusebius, Church History 3.36). Jerome, later still, puts the death in Trajan's eleventh year, about AD 108 (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 16). The letters are therefore usually placed around 110. Because the year comes from this later tradition and not from the letters, the date is marked traditional.

Some historians hold that Eusebius had no firm information and date the letters later. Timothy D. Barnes, "The Date of Ignatius", Expository Times 120 (2008), pp. 119–130, argues for the 140s. The letter of Polycarp, who knew Ignatius and died in the 150s or 160s, sets the outer limit (Polycarp, To the Philippians 9; 13).

Primary sources

The Letters of Ignatius of Antioch Ignatius of Antioch · c. AD 110
To the Romans 2; To the Smyrnaeans 11; To the Romans 5; To the Ephesians 1; To the Ephesians 21; To the Magnesians 2; 15; To the Trallians 1; 12; To the Romans 10; To the Philadelphians 11; To the Smyrnaeans 12; To Polycarp 8; To the Magnesians 6; To the Smyrnaeans 8; To the Trallians 9–10; To the Smyrnaeans 7; To the Romans, greeting; To the Romans 4

Letter to the Philippians Polycarp of Smyrna · c. AD 110–140
9; 13

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
5.28.4

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.36; 3.21–22

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
896; 834

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
16

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Antioch, Smyrna, Rome
Who Ignatius of Antioch, Polycarp
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) c. AD 96 478

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

LEADS TO

The Martyrdom of Polycarp c. AD 155–156 504

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

John's Revelation on Patmos Before · c. AD 95 474

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians After · c. AD 112 488

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) Before · c. AD 96 478

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith After · c. AD 180 515

← The Roman Church Writes to Corinth (1 Clement) Earlier · c. AD 96
→ Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians Later · c. AD 112

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians

c. AD 112 · Estimated date

The governor of Bithynia and Pontus reports to the emperor on his trials of Christians and on what they do when they meet. Trajan rules that they are not to be hunted out, but are to be punished if accused and convicted.

Pliny the Younger governed Bithynia and Pontus, on the south coast of the Black Sea, as the representative of the emperor Trajan (Pliny, Letters 10.17a–18). In his second year there he wrote to ask the emperor how to deal with people denounced to him as Christians. He had never been present at a trial of Christians, he says, and did not know what was usually punished or how far to inquire: whether age made a difference, whether those who gave up the faith should be pardoned, and whether "the name itself" was punishable or only crimes that went with it (Pliny, Letters 10.96).

He then describes what he had done. He asked the accused three times whether they were Christians, warning them of the penalty, and ordered those who persisted to be led away. The Latin says only that he ordered them to be led off (duci iussi); the words "to prison" in the translation linked here are not in it (Pliny, Letters 10.96 (Latin)). Tertullian, citing the letter about 197, took Pliny to have condemned Christians to death (Tertullian, Apology 2). Roman citizens he set aside to be sent to Rome (Pliny, Letters 10.96). When an unsigned list of names reached him, he released those who denied the charge once they had called on the gods, offered incense and wine before the emperor's image and cursed Christ (Pliny, Letters 10.96).

Some said they had left the Christians years before, and from them Pliny learned what the group did. They met on a fixed day before dawn and sang a hymn "to Christ, as though he were a god". They bound themselves by oath to commit no theft, robbery or adultery and to break no trust. Later they met again for an ordinary, harmless meal, which they had given up after his edict against associations (Pliny, Letters 10.96). He had two slave women who were called ministrae ("deaconesses" in the translation) questioned under torture, and found only "a debased superstition" (Pliny, Letters 10.96 (Latin)) (Pliny, Letters 10.96). The movement, he adds, had spread through towns, villages and countryside, and the temples had been almost deserted (Pliny, Letters 10.96).

Trajan approved. No fixed rule could be laid down. Christians were not to be hunted out. Those accused and convicted were to be punished, but anyone who denied being a Christian and proved it by praying to the gods was to be pardoned, whatever his past. Unsigned accusations were to be ignored (Pliny, Letters 10.97).

The two letters are official documents written by the governor and the emperor themselves, and Pliny's is a description of Christian worship by an outsider who had questioned former members. They show that the name alone was treated as punishable while no search was ordered. Tertullian called the ruling a self-contradiction: it forbade a search as though Christians were innocent and ordered their punishment as though they were guilty (Tertullian, Apology 2). Eusebius, in the fourth century, says that he took his account of the exchange from Tertullian (Eusebius, Church History 3.33).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The letters from the province appear to stand in the order in which they were written. Pliny reached his province on 17 September (Pliny, Letters 10.17a). One set of new-year vows follows (Pliny, Letters 10.35). The letter about the Christians comes after his next greeting for the emperor's birthday, which fell in September (Pliny, Letters 10.88), and before a second set of new-year vows (Pliny, Letters 10.100), so it belongs to the autumn or winter of his second year. Letters shortly before and after it concern Amisus and Amastris, cities of Pontus (Pliny, Letters 10.92) (Pliny, Letters 10.98).

No letter names the year. Historians work it out from other evidence for Pliny's career, and the proposals for his arrival run from AD 109 to 111, which puts this letter between 110 and 112. A. N. Sherwin-White, The Letters of Pliny: A Historical and Social Commentary (1966), argues for the earliest of these years.

Primary sources

Letters Pliny the Younger · c. AD 97–112
10.17a–18; 10.96; 10.96 (Latin); 10.97; 10.17a; 10.35; 10.88; 10.100; 10.92; 10.98

Apology Tertullian · c. AD 197
2

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.33

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bithynia and Pontus
Who Pliny the Younger, Trajan
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Fire of Rome and Nero's Persecution AD 64 449

LEADS TO

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship c. AD 155–165 500

The Decian Persecution AD 250 540

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom Before · c. AD 110 484

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship After · c. AD 155–165 500

CHURCH AND STATE

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple Before · AD 66–70 462

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina After · AD 132–135 492

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Didache, an Early Church Manual Before · c. AD 50–120 470

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina After · AD 132–135 492

← Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom Earlier · c. AD 110
→ The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina Later · AD 132–135

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina

AD 132–135 · Estimated date

The Jews of Judaea rise against Rome under Simon bar Kosiba, called Bar Kokhba. Hadrian's armies crush the revolt at great cost, Jerusalem becomes the Roman colony Aelia Capitolina, and Jews are barred from the city.

Cassius Dio, whose account survives only in a later abridgement, says that the emperor Hadrian founded a city at Jerusalem in place of the one razed in the Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple, named it Aelia Capitolina, and raised a temple of Jupiter on the site of the temple. This, Dio says, brought on the war: the Jews could not bear to see foreigners settled and foreign rites planted in their city (Cassius Dio, Roman History 69.12). A late Roman biography of Hadrian gives another cause, a ban on circumcision (Historia Augusta, Hadrian 14.2).

By Dio's account the rebels waited until Hadrian had left the region. They avoided open battle and fought from fortified positions and underground passages (Cassius Dio, Roman History 69.12). Eusebius, in the fourth century, calls their leader Barcocheba and says the name means "star" (Eusebius, Church History 4.6). Letters found in caves near the Dead Sea show that he was Simon bar Kosiba: they are his orders to his officers to send men and take over grain (Bar Kokhba letters) and, in one case, to bring palm branches and citrons, which its excavator, Yigael Yadin, connected with the feast of Sukkot (Bar Kokhba letters letter to Yehudah bar Menashe). A coin of his first year names "Shimon Prince of Israel" and is dated "Year 1 of the Redemption of Israel" (Coin of Bar Kokhba, year 1 (Harvard Art Museums 2008.2.105)).

Dio goes on: Hadrian sent his best generals, among them Julius Severus, brought from Britain. Severus avoided pitched battles, cut off small groups and starved them out. Dio counts fifty strongholds and 985 villages destroyed and 580,000 men killed in the fighting, and says that nearly all Judaea was left desolate. Roman losses were so heavy that Hadrian, writing to the senate, left out the customary words "I and the legions are in health" (Cassius Dio, Roman History 69.13–14). Eusebius says that the war was fiercest at Betar, a strong fortress not far from Jerusalem, where after a long siege the rebels were worn down by hunger and thirst and their leader "suffered his just punishment" (Eusebius, Church History 4.6). The Mishnah lists the capture of Betar among the disasters of the ninth of Av (Mishnah, Ta'anit 4:6).

Afterwards, Eusebius reports from Aristo of Pella, Jews were forbidden by Hadrian's decree to enter the district of Jerusalem (Eusebius, Church History 4.6). Justin Martyr, writing some twenty years later, says that a Jew caught entering it faced death (Justin, First Apology 47). He also says that during the war Bar Kokhba ordered Christians to be cruelly punished unless they denied Jesus Christ (Justin, First Apology 31).

For the church of Jerusalem, as Eusebius tells it, the war was a break. He reports that its first fifteen bishops, down to this siege, are said to have all been of Hebrew descent, and that the Roman city which then arose, colonised by another people, had a church made up of Gentiles, with Marcus as the first bishop after those "of the circumcision" (Eusebius, Church History 4.5) (Eusebius, Church History 4.6).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No ancient writer gives the years of the war. Cassius Dio says only that the Jews rose once Hadrian had left Egypt and Syria (Cassius Dio, Roman History 69.12). Eusebius, citing Aristo of Pella, puts the height of the fighting, at Betar, in Hadrian's eighteenth year, which ran from August 134 to August 135 (Eusebius, Church History 4.6). The rebels dated their coins by an era of their own; a coin of "Year 1 of the Redemption of Israel" is assigned to 132–133 by the museum that holds it (Coin of Bar Kokhba, year 1 (Harvard Art Museums 2008.2.105)), and the Israel Antiquities Authority dates the documents from the refuge caves to 132–135 (Bar Kokhba letters). The beginning in 132 is generally accepted. The end is put late in 135 or early in 136.

The sources also disagree about the order of events. Dio makes the founding of Aelia Capitolina the cause of the war (Cassius Dio, Roman History 69.12); Eusebius describes the Roman city as arising after it (Eusebius, Church History 4.6). Werner Eck, "The Bar Kokhba Revolt: The Roman Point of View", Journal of Roman Studies 89 (1999), pp. 76–89, sets out the evidence of Roman inscriptions for the scale of the war.

Primary sources

Roman History Cassius Dio · c. AD 200–235
69.12; 69.13–14

Historia Augusta Fourth century AD
Hadrian 14.2

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
4.6; 4.5

The Bar Kokhba Letters Issued in the name of Shim'on bar Kosiba · AD 132–135
cojs.org; letter to Yehudah bar Menashe; deadseascrolls.org.il

Bronze Coin of Bar Kokhba, Year One Struck by the rebel administration of Shim'on bar Kosiba · AD 132–133
harvardartmuseums.org

Mishnah c. AD 200
Ta'anit 4:6

First Apology Justin Martyr · c. AD 150–155
47; 31

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Betar
Who Hadrian, Simon bar Kokhba
Threads Temple and Worship, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the Temple AD 66–70 462

LEADS TO

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated AD 335 602

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians Before · c. AD 112 488

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship After · c. AD 155–165 500

CHURCH AND STATE

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians Before · c. AD 112 488

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship After · c. AD 155–165 500

← Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians Earlier · c. AD 112
→ Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church Later · c. AD 144

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church

c. AD 144 · Traditional date

Marcion of Pontus teaches at Rome that the God of the Jewish scriptures is not the Father of Jesus, and gives his followers one Gospel and ten letters of Paul. By his opponents' account the Roman church expels him; his followers form churches of their own.

No writing of Marcion's survives except in what his opponents quote from it. What is known of him comes from the Christians who wrote against him: Justin, who was his contemporary at Rome, Irenaeus a generation later, and above all the five books of Tertullian, written about sixty years after the events.

They agree that he came from Pontus on the Black Sea (Justin, First Apology 26) (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.1–2). Tertullian calls him a shipmaster and says that he joined the church at Rome and gave it a sum of money (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 30) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.4). Irenaeus says that he took up and developed the teaching of Cerdo, who had come to Rome earlier (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.1–2).

As his opponents report it, Marcion taught that the God proclaimed by the law and the prophets, the maker of the world, was not the Father of Jesus Christ. The creator was just; above him was another God, good and until then unknown, whom Jesus revealed in the days of Tiberius (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.1–2) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.2) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.6). Tertullian says that he set out the contrasts between law and gospel in a work called the Antitheses (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.19), and that he baptized only those who were unmarried or had given up marriage (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.29).

He gave his followers a set of scriptures to match. In place of the Jewish scriptures and the Gospels read in the churches he used one Gospel, a form of Luke without the birth stories and with no author's name, and ten letters of Paul, which Tertullian goes through one by one, without those to Timothy and Titus (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.1–2) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.2) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 5.2–21). His opponents say that he cut these texts down. His own claim, as Tertullian reports it, was that he was restoring a gospel that defenders of Judaism had interpolated, and he appealed to Paul's rebuke of Peter in Galatians (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.3) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.4).

Tertullian says that the church expelled him and gave back his money (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 30) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.4). Churches that traced themselves to him or to his followers still existed in Tertullian's day (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.5). Justin says that in his day Marcion had followers "of every nation" (Justin, First Apology 26) (Justin, First Apology 58). Irenaeus tells how Polycarp, meeting him, called him "the first-born of Satan" (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.4).

Irenaeus says that Marcion was the only one who had dared openly to cut the Scriptures (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.27.4). In answering him, the writers of the wider church said which books they received: Irenaeus argued that the Gospels are four, neither more nor fewer, and Tertullian defended Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and the letters to Timothy and Titus that Marcion left out (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.11.7–8) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.2) (Tertullian, Against Marcion 5.21). See Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith and the Muratorian List of New Testament Books.

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The year comes from a figure that Tertullian reports from the Marcionites themselves. They counted 115 years and six and a half months "between Christ and Marcion", and Tertullian sets Christ's coming in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.19). Counted from AD 28–29 this gives 144. Tertullian does not say what the interval ends with; it is usually taken to be Marcion's break with the Roman church. He was writing in the fifteenth year of Severus, AD 207–208, some sixty years later (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.15).

The other evidence gives only a range. Justin, about 150–155, says that Marcion was still alive and teaching (Justin, First Apology 26). Irenaeus says that he flourished under Anicetus, the tenth bishop of Rome, after Cerdo had come under Hyginus, the ninth (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.4.3). Tertullian elsewhere places Marcion in the Roman church under Eleutherus (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 30). That does not fit the other evidence: Irenaeus names Eleutherus as the twelfth bishop, in office when he himself was writing about 180 (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.3). Judith M. Lieu, Marcion and the Making of a Heretic: God and Scripture in the Second Century (2015), examines what can be recovered from these hostile reports.

Primary sources

First Apology Justin Martyr · c. AD 150–155
26; 58

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
1.27.1–2; 3.3.4; 1.27.4; 3.11.7–8; 3.4.3; 3.3.3

Prescription against Heretics Tertullian · c. AD 200
30

Against Marcion Tertullian · c. AD 207–212
4.4; 1.2; 4.6; 1.19; 1.29; 4.2; 5.2–21; 4.3; 4.5; 5.21; 1.15

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Marcion
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Four Gospels Are Written c. AD 65–100 458

The Letters of Paul c. AD 50–60 424

LEADS TO

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

The Muratorian List of New Testament Books c. AD 170–200 520

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

John's Revelation on Patmos Before · c. AD 95 474

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith After · c. AD 180 515

← The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina Earlier · AD 132–135
→ Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship Later · c. AD 155–165

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship

c. AD 155–165 · Estimated date

Justin, a philosopher turned Christian teacher at Rome, addresses a defence of the Christians to the emperor Antoninus Pius and describes their baptism and Sunday Eucharist. Some years later he is tried by the city prefect and beheaded.

Justin Martyr introduces himself as the son of Priscus and grandson of Bacchius, from Flavia Neapolis in Palestine (Justin, First Apology 1). In his Dialogue with Trypho he tells how he went from a Stoic teacher to a Peripatetic, a Pythagorean and a Platonist, until an old man he met in a field near the sea pointed him to the Hebrew prophets. “A flame was kindled in my soul,” he says, and he found in Christianity the one philosophy that was safe and profitable (Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 2–8). He adds elsewhere that the sight of Christians facing death without fear had convinced him that the slanders against them were false (Justin, Second Apology 12). He lived at Rome, by his own account for the second time, and taught those who came to his lodging (Acts of Justin 2).

About 150–155 he addressed a defence of the Christians to the emperor Antoninus Pius, his sons, the senate and the Roman people (Justin, First Apology 1). He asks that Christians be judged for what they do and not condemned for a name (Justin, First Apology 4; 7). He also claims the best of the Greeks for his side: those who lived "reasonably" before Christ, such as Socrates and Heraclitus, were Christians, though they were thought atheists (Justin, First Apology 46).

He then describes Christian worship. Converts pray and fast, are taken to water and are washed in the name of the Father, of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit (Justin, First Apology 61). They are then led to the assembly. After common prayers and a kiss, bread and a cup of wine mixed with water are brought to the one presiding, who gives thanks at length; the people answer "Amen", and deacons distribute the food and carry it to those absent (Justin, First Apology 65). Only those who believe what is taught, have been baptized and live as Christ taught may share it. It is not received as common bread and drink, Justin writes. As Jesus Christ was made flesh and had flesh and blood, "so likewise have we been taught that the food which is blessed by the prayer of His word, and from which our blood and flesh by transmutation are nourished, is the flesh and blood of that Jesus who was made flesh" (Justin, First Apology 66). On the day called Sunday all gather; the "memoirs of the apostles" or the prophets are read, the one presiding gives an address, and prayers, thanksgiving and distribution follow. A collection is left with him for orphans, widows, the sick, prisoners and strangers (Justin, First Apology 67). The churches read Justin's words on the Eucharist differently, and only one use of them is documented here: the Catechism of the Catholic Church quotes these chapters as a witness to the order of the Eucharistic celebration (Catechism of the Catholic Church 1345). No Orthodox or Protestant document that discusses them was found for this entry.

Justin expected to be denounced, perhaps by Crescens, a Cynic philosopher he had worsted in debate (Justin, Second Apology 3); Tatian, whom Irenaeus calls a hearer of Justin (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.28.1), says, as Eusebius quotes him, that Crescens tried to bring about his death (Eusebius, Church History 4.16). The record of his trial shows him with six companions before the prefect Rusticus. They refused to sacrifice, and were scourged and beheaded (Acts of Justin 1–5).

Justin's chapters on baptism and the Sunday assembly are a detailed account of Christian worship in the middle of the second century, written by a participant for outsiders.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The First Apology is addressed to Antoninus Pius, who reigned from 138 to 161, and to his adopted sons (Justin, First Apology 1). Justin remarks in it that Christ was born a hundred and fifty years earlier (Justin, First Apology 46), and it is usually placed about 150–155.

The record of his trial gives no date. It names the judge as Rusticus, prefect of Rome (Acts of Justin 1–5). Eusebius places Justin's death under the emperors who followed Antoninus, Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, who ruled together from 161 to 169 (Eusebius, Church History 4.16) (Eusebius, Church History 4.18). About 165 is the conventional year. The date range shown runs from about the time of the Apology to the martyrdom.

Primary sources

First Apology Justin Martyr · c. AD 150–155
1; 4; 7; 46; 61; 65; 66; 67

Dialogue with Trypho Justin Martyr · c. AD 155–165
2–8

Second Apology Justin Martyr · c. AD 150–161
12; 3

The Martyrdom of Justin and His Companions After c. AD 165
2; 1–5

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
1345

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
1.28.1

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
4.16; 4.18

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Justin Martyr, Antoninus Pius
Threads Temple and Worship, Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians c. AD 112 488
The Didache, an Early Church Manual c. AD 50–120 470

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina Before · AD 132–135 492
The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated After · AD 335 602

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians Before · c. AD 112 488
The Martyrdom of Polycarp After · c. AD 155–156 504

CHURCH AND STATE

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina Before · AD 132–135 492
Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin After · c. AD 197–220 524

← Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church Earlier · c. AD 144
→ The Martyrdom of Polycarp Later · c. AD 155–156

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Martyrdom of Polycarp

c. AD 155–156 · Estimated date

Polycarp, the aged bishop of Smyrna, is arrested, refuses before the proconsul to curse Christ, and is burned in the stadium. His church describes his death in a letter and keeps his bones and the anniversary of his death.

The account of Polycarp's death is a letter from the church of Smyrna to the church of Philomelium and to "all the congregations of the Holy and Catholic Church in every place", taken down by one Evarestus (Martyrdom of Polycarp greeting; 20). Its writers say that they saw what they describe (Martyrdom of Polycarp 13–16).

Polycarp was a link to the first generation. Irenaeus, who had seen him as a boy, says that he was taught by apostles and appointed bishop of Smyrna by them, and that he was "a very old man" when he died (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.4). Irenaeus also tells, in a letter that Eusebius quotes, that Polycarp visited Rome in the time of bishop Anicetus, where the two failed to agree on the keeping of Easter and parted in peace (Eusebius, Church History 5.24.16–17).

A persecution had broken out at Smyrna, and the crowd in the stadium, after watching a Christian named Germanicus die, shouted for Polycarp. The letter contrasts him with Quintus, who came forward of his own accord and then gave way: "we do not commend those who give themselves up" (Martyrdom of Polycarp 3–4). Polycarp withdrew to a farm, was betrayed by a servant under torture, had food set before the men sent to arrest him and prayed for two hours before going with them (Martyrdom of Polycarp 5–8).

In the stadium the proconsul urged him to swear by the fortune of Caesar and to curse Christ. He answered: "Eighty and six years have I served Him, and He never did me any injury: how then can I blaspheme my King and my Saviour?" (Martyrdom of Polycarp 9) He declared himself a Christian and was threatened with the beasts and with fire; the crowd then demanded that he be burned alive (Martyrdom of Polycarp 10–12). The letter says that the flames arched around him without consuming him, that an executioner then stabbed him, and that his blood put out the fire (Martyrdom of Polycarp 13–16).

The body was burned so that the Christians should not, as their opponents put it, leave the Crucified and "begin to worship this one". The writers answer that they adore Christ as the Son of God and love the martyrs as his disciples and followers (Martyrdom of Polycarp 17–18). They gathered the bones, "more precious than the most exquisite jewels", laid them in a fitting place, and intended to meet there each year on the anniversary of his death (Martyrdom of Polycarp 18). He was, the letter says, the twelfth to be martyred at Smyrna, counting those from Philadelphia (Martyrdom of Polycarp 19).

The letter presents itself as the work of eyewitnesses writing within a year of the death. It shows a church recording a martyr's death for other churches, keeping his remains and marking the anniversary.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The letter itself gives no year. A closing note, which may be a later addition, dates the death to the second day of the month Xanthicus, the seventh day before the Kalends of March (23 February), "a great Sabbath", when Statius Quadratus was proconsul of Asia (Martyrdom of Polycarp 21). The older translation linked elsewhere in this entry reads "May". W. H. Waddington, Mémoire sur la chronologie de la vie du rhéteur Aelius Aristide (1867), worked out from other evidence that Quadratus held office in 154–155, which gives 23 February 155; others have reckoned 22 February 156.

Two things pull the other way. Eusebius, in the fourth century, places the martyrdom after the accession of Marcus Aurelius in 161 (Eusebius, Church History 4.14.10–4.15.1). And Irenaeus says that Polycarp visited Rome when Anicetus was bishop (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.4). By the lengths of office that Eusebius gives for the bishops before him, Anicetus took office only in the mid-150s (Eusebius, Church History 4.10–11), which leaves little or no room for the visit before February 155. Some historians therefore prefer a date in the 160s. The timeline places the event at 155 and shows 155–156.

Primary sources

The Martyrdom of Polycarp The church of Smyrna · c. AD 155–170 greeting; 20; 13–16; 3–4; 5–8; 9; 10–12; 17–18; 18; 19; 21

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.3.4

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
5.24.16–17; 4.14.10–4.15.1; 4.10–11

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Smyrna
Who Polycarp
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom c. AD 110 484

LEADS TO

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship Before · c. AD 155–165 500

The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne After · AD 177 512

← Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship Earlier · c. AD 155–165
→ The New Prophecy of Montanus Later · c. AD 157–172

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The New Prophecy of Montanus

c. AD 157–172 · Estimated date

In Phrygia a convert named Montanus and two women, Priscilla and Maximilla, begin to prophesy in ecstasy and announce a new outpouring of the Spirit. The bishops of Asia reject the movement, which spreads none the less as far as Rome and Africa.

Almost everything known about the “New Prophecy” comes from its opponents. Eusebius, writing more than a century later, quotes two of them at length, an unnamed writer of Asia Minor and a certain Apollonius (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.7–9) (Eusebius, Church History 5.18.2). Epiphanius, two centuries after the events, preserves another attack together with some sayings of the prophets (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.2.4). No English translation of his book is in the public domain, and what he says is paraphrased here from the Greek text to which the citations link. A friendly witness is Tertullian, who took the side of the prophecy (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 1).

The unnamed writer passes on a report that it began at Ardabau, a village on the border of Mysia and Phrygia. By this account a recent convert, Montanus, fell into a trance and began to utter strange things, "contrary to the constant custom of the Church". Some hearers rebuked him as possessed; others took it for the Holy Spirit. Two women were seized in the same way (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.7–9). Eusebius names them as Priscilla and Maximilla (Eusebius, Church History 5.14). Their followers spoke of "the new prophecy" (Eusebius, Church History 5.19.2). In a saying that Epiphanius quotes, Montanus speaks in the first person as the one who inspires: a man is like a lyre and the speaker comes upon him like a plectrum; the man sleeps and the speaker keeps watch; it is the Lord who puts men's hearts into ecstasy (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.4.1).

Apollonius charges that Montanus taught the dissolving of marriages, made rules for fasts, appointed collectors of money, and gave the name Jerusalem to Pepuza and Tymion, two small towns of Phrygia, where he wanted people to gather (Eusebius, Church History 5.18.2). Epiphanius reports the story that a prophetess, Quintilla or Priscilla (he says he does not know which), slept at Pepuza and said that Christ came to her there in the form of a woman and revealed to her that the place was holy and that Jerusalem would come down to it from heaven (Epiphanius, Panarion 49.1). He also quotes a saying of Maximilla that after her there would be no more prophets, only the end (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.2.4). He grants that the group accepted the whole of the Old and New Testaments and the resurrection of the dead (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.1.3).

The same writer says that the Christians of Asia met in many places, examined the sayings, judged them profane and shut their adherents out of communion (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.10). Bishops who came to test the spirit in Maximilla were kept from doing so, and she complained: "I am driven away from the sheep like a wolf. I am not a wolf. I am word and spirit and power" (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.17). The writer repeats a rumour that Montanus and Maximilla hanged themselves, and adds that he does not know whether it is true (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.13–15).

The question went beyond Asia. During the persecution at Lyon (see the Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne) the Christians of Gaul wrote about it to Asia, Phrygia and Rome (Eusebius, Church History 5.3.4). Tertullian says that a bishop of Rome had recognised the prophecies and then, persuaded by one Praxeas, withdrew his letter of peace, and that he himself broke with his opponents over "the Paraclete" (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 1).

The dispute made the churches ask whether new prophecy could stand beside what the apostles had handed down. The unnamed writer says that he long hesitated to write at all, for fear of seeming to add to "the Gospel of the New Testament" (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.3).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The sources give two dates. Epiphanius says that the "Phrygians" arose about the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, AD 156–157 (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.1.2). The Chronicle of Eusebius, in Jerome's Latin version, enters the beginning of the "Cataphrygian" prophecy under the eleventh year of Marcus Aurelius, AD 171 (Jerome, Chronicle year 11 of Marcus Aurelius (AD 171)). The unnamed writer whom Eusebius quotes says only that Montanus began when one Gratus was proconsul of Asia, and he gives no year for Gratus (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.7–9).

The other writers do not settle the matter. Apollonius wrote in the fortieth year after Montanus began to prophesy (Eusebius, Church History 5.18.12), and the unnamed writer more than thirteen years after Maximilla died (Eusebius, Church History 5.16.19), but neither says in what year he was writing. By the time of the persecution at Lyon, which Eusebius dates to 177, the dispute had reached Gaul and Rome (Eusebius, Church History 5.3.4). Historians are divided between the two dates. Christine Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy (1996), reviews the arguments for each; William Tabbernee, Fake Prophecy and Polluted Sacraments: Ecclesiastical and Imperial Reactions to Montanism (2007), places the beginning about 165. The timeline places the event at 165 and shows the range.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
5.16.7–9; 5.18.2; 5.14; 5.19.2; 5.16.10; 5.16.17; 5.16.13–15; 5.3.4; 5.16.3; 5.18.12; 5.16.19

Panarion Epiphanius of Salamis · c. AD 374–377
48.2.4; 48.4.1; 49.1; 48.1.3; 48.1.2

Against Praxeas Tertullian · c. AD 210–218
1

Chronicle Jerome, translating and continuing Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 380 year 11 of Marcus Aurelius (AD 171)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Pepuza
Who Montanus, Maximilla
Threads Prophets and Prophecy, Revival and Unity

In context

LEADS TO

Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin c. AD 197–220 524

The Charismatic Renewal 1960–1967 1418

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY

John's Revelation on Patmos Before · c. AD 95 474

REVIVAL AND UNITY

George Fox and the Quakers After · 1652 1183

← The Martyrdom of Polycarp Earlier · c. AD 155–156
→ The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne Later · AD 177

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne

AD 177 · Estimated date

Mob violence against the Christians of Lyon and Vienne ends in trials before the governor. The aged bishop Pothinus dies in prison, and the slave Blandina and others are killed in the amphitheatre. The survivors describe it in a letter to Asia.

Eusebius, writing in the fourth century, preserves long extracts from a letter sent by "the servants of Christ residing at Vienne and Lyons, in Gaul" to their fellow Christians in Asia and Phrygia (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.1–3).

As the letter tells it, trouble began in the streets. Christians at Lyon were barred from houses, baths and markets and set upon by the crowd, then questioned in the forum by the city authorities and held for the governor. When he arrived, a young man of rank, Vettius Epagathus, asked to speak for the accused; the governor asked only whether he too was a Christian, and he was put with the rest. About ten gave way. Pagan slaves of Christian households, afraid of torture, accused their masters of cannibal feasts and incest, and the city turned savage (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.5–15).

The letter dwells on those who held out. Sanctus, a deacon from Vienne, answered every question with "I am a Christian." Blandina, a slave whose mistress was also on trial, wore out her torturers and kept saying, "I am a Christian, and there is nothing vile done by us." Many died in the prison (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.17–28). Pothinus, the bishop of Lyon, more than ninety years old, was beaten before the tribunal and died in prison two days later (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.29–31).

The governor wrote to the emperor, and the reply was that those who denied should be released and the rest put to death. At a festival that drew crowds from many nations, the Roman citizens were beheaded and the others sent to the beasts; Attalus of Pergamum, a citizen, was sent to the beasts as well to please the crowd (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.44–52). Blandina had already been hung on a stake in the amphitheatre and left untouched by the animals (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.37–44). On the last day she saw Ponticus, a boy of about fifteen, die, and was then scourged, burned, tied in a net and thrown to a bull (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.53–56). The bodies were left exposed for six days, burned, and swept into the Rhône, to mock the hope of resurrection (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.59–63).

While they lived, the prisoners refused to be called martyrs, keeping that name for Christ and for those already dead (Eusebius, Church History 5.2.2–7). Through them many who had denied the faith came back and confessed it (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.45–48). Eusebius adds that from prison they also wrote to Asia and Phrygia and to Eleutherus of Rome about the prophecy of Montanus (see the New Prophecy of Montanus) (Eusebius, Church History 5.3.4). They sent their letter to Rome by the presbyter Irenaeus, who succeeded Pothinus as bishop (Eusebius, Church History 5.4.1–2; 5.5.8).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The year comes from Eusebius, who introduces the letter by saying that persecution broke out again "in the seventeenth year of the Emperor Antoninus Verus", that is of Marcus Aurelius, and that Eleutherus was then bishop of Rome (Eusebius, Church History 5, introduction). Marcus became emperor in March 161, so his seventeenth year began in March 177. The letter as Eusebius quotes it names neither year nor emperor; it speaks only of "Caesar" (Eusebius, Church History 5.1.44–52).

Eusebius is not consistent. His Chronicle, in Jerome's version, enters the deaths in Gaul ten years earlier, beside that of Polycarp (Jerome, Chronicle AD 167). The Church History, where he had the letter before him, is generally followed, and 177 is the accepted date.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
5.1.1–3; 5.1.5–15; 5.1.17–28; 5.1.29–31; 5.1.44–52; 5.1.37–44; 5.1.53–56; 5.1.59–63; 5.2.2–7; 5.1.45–48; 5.3.4; 5.4.1–2; 5.5.8; 5, introduction

Chronicle Jerome, translating and continuing Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 380
AD 167

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Lyon
Who Blandina, Pothinus, Irenaeus
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

LEADS TO

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrdom of Polycarp Before · c. AD 155–156 504

The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity After · 7 March AD 203 532

← The New Prophecy of Montanus Earlier · c. AD 157–172
→ Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith Later · c. AD 180

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith

c. AD 180 · Estimated date

Irenaeus, bishop of Lyon, writes five books against the followers of Valentinus and Marcion. Against their claim to a secret tradition he sets three public tests: the faith the churches confess, the four Gospels, and the succession of bishops from the apostles.

Irenaeus says that as a boy in Asia Minor he had seen and heard Polycarp (Eusebius, Church History 5.20.5–6) (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.4). Eusebius, in the fourth century, reports that at the time of the persecution at Lyon he was a presbyter there, and that he succeeded Pothinus as bishop (Eusebius, Church History 5.4.1–2; 5.5.8–9). He wrote among people he calls "the Keltae". A friend had asked him for an account of the teaching of the followers of Valentinus, whose writings he had read and some of whom he had met (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1, preface 2–3).

These teachers, as Irenaeus describes them, appealed past the Scriptures to a truth handed down by word of mouth to the "perfect", and claimed to be wiser than the apostles (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.2.1–2). He answers with three public tests.

The first is the faith itself, the "rule of the truth" that each Christian received at baptism (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.9.4). The church, scattered over the whole world, has received from the apostles belief in one God the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth; in one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, made flesh for our salvation; and in the Holy Spirit, who foretold through the prophets the birth from a virgin, the passion, the resurrection, the ascension and the coming again in glory. The churches from Germany to Libya hold it alike (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.10.1–2).

The second is the written Gospel. What the apostles preached they later handed down in writing: Matthew among the Hebrews, Mark as Peter's interpreter, Luke as Paul's companion, and John, the disciple of the Lord, at Ephesus (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.1.1). There can be neither more nor fewer than four Gospels, as there are four winds and four living creatures round the throne (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.11.8).

The third is the succession of bishops. The apostles handed on their own place to the bishops they appointed, and the lists can be recited (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.1). Because it would take too long to list them for every church, he gives one, that of the "very great, the very ancient, and universally known" church founded at Rome by Peter and Paul (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.2), from Linus to Eleutherius, the twelfth (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.3). Of that church he says, in a sentence that survives only in the Latin version: "For it is a matter of necessity that every Church should agree with this Church, on account of its pre-eminent authority, that is, the faithful everywhere, inasmuch as the apostolical tradition has been preserved continuously by those [faithful men] who exist everywhere." The translators say in a note that they are far from sure their rendering is correct, and the note adds another, in which every church must "resort" to this church "on account of more potent principality" (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.2).

The churches read the sentence differently. The Catechism of the Catholic Church quotes it for the communion of all particular churches with the church of Rome (Catechism of the Catholic Church 834). The Orthodox patriarchs wrote in 1848 that Irenaeus does not say what the defenders of the papal claims take him to say, and that even on their reading he was praising a church that then kept the faith of the Fathers (Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs (1848) § 13). A. Cleveland Coxe, the Episcopal bishop who edited the translation in America, argues in the same note that the faith was kept at Rome by those who came there from every side, so that Rome mirrored the faith of the churches and was not its source (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.2).

Irenaeus goes on to cite Smyrna and Ephesus in the same way, and peoples who keep the faith without any writings (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.4) (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.4.1–2). Some years later, as Eusebius records, he wrote to Victor of Rome urging him not to cut off the churches of Asia over the date of Easter (Eusebius, Church History 5.24.11–17).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The third book names Eleutherius as the bishop who "does now" hold the see of Rome (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.3.3). Eusebius has Eleutherus take office about the seventeenth year of Marcus Aurelius, AD 177, and die after thirteen years, in the tenth year of Commodus, AD 189 (Eusebius, Church History 5, introduction; 5.22). In 177 Irenaeus was still a presbyter; he became bishop after the death of Pothinus (Eusebius, Church History 5.4.1–2; 5.5.8–9). The work was therefore written between about 177 and 189, and its five books were composed over some time. The usual date is about 180.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
5.20.5–6; 5.4.1–2; 5.5.8–9; 5.24.11–17; 5, introduction; 5.22

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.3.4; 1, preface 2–3; 3.2.1–2; 1.9.4; 1.10.1–2; 3.1.1; 3.11.8; 3.3.1; 3.3.2; 3.3.3; 3.4.1–2

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
834

Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem with their synods · May 1848
§ 13

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Lyon
Who Irenaeus
Threads Scripture and Canon, Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne AD 177 512
Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church c. AD 144 496
The Martyrdom of Polycarp c. AD 155–156 504

LEADS TO

The Muratorian List of New Testament Books c. AD 170–200 520
Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin c. AD 197–220 524
Cyprian on the Unity of the Church AD 251–258 544
The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found c. December 1945 1390

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church Before · c. AD 144 496
The Muratorian List of New Testament Books After · c. AD 170–200 520

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Jerusalem Before · c. AD 49 407
Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin After · c. AD 197–220 524

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Ignatius of Antioch Writes on the Road to Martyrdom Before · c. AD 110 484

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church After · AD 251–258

← The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne Earlier · AD 177
→ The Muratorian List of New Testament Books Later · c. AD 170–200

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Muratorian List of New Testament Books

c. AD 170–200 · Estimated date

A Latin fragment, copied in a manuscript now in Milan, lists the books received in the church as it knew it. It counts four Gospels, Acts and thirteen letters of Paul. If it dates from the late second century, it is the oldest such list to survive.

The text is named after Ludovico Antonio Muratori, who printed it in 1740 from a manuscript in the Biblioteca Ambrosiana in Milan. It fills three pages of a codex of the late seventh or eighth century that otherwise contains works of Eucherius, Ambrose and others (Muratorian Fragment, Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana, I 101 sup., fols. 10r–11r). The text begins in the middle of a sentence (Muratorian Fragment, section 1). Because the author speaks of Rome simply as “the city”, the list is usually thought to come from there (Muratorian Fragment, section 2).

What survives opens with the end of a remark about one Gospel and then calls that of Luke “the third book of the Gospel” and that of John, “one of the disciples", the fourth, so the lost beginning dealt with two others. John, it says, wrote at the urging of his fellow disciples and bishops after a fast and a revelation to the apostle Andrew. The Gospels differ in what they teach, but "there is no difference as regards the faith of believers", since one Spirit declares in all of them the Lord's birth, passion, resurrection and two comings (Muratorian Fragment, section 1).

Next come the Acts of the Apostles, written by Luke (Muratorian Fragment, section 2), and the letters of Paul. He wrote to seven churches by name, as John did in the Apocalypse, and so addressed the one church spread through the world; with the letters to Philemon, Titus and Timothy this makes thirteen. Letters to the Laodiceans and Alexandrians are rejected as forgeries in Paul's name connected with the heresy of Marcion, "for it is not suitable for gall to be mingled with honey" (Muratorian Fragment, section 3).

The list then names Jude, two letters of John, the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Apocalypses of John and of Peter, "though some among us will not have this latter read in the Church". The Shepherd of Hermas may be read, but not publicly among the prophets or the apostles, because it was written recently. The writings of Valentinus, Basilides, Marcion's followers and the "Cataphrygians" are refused (Muratorian Fragment, section 4). Hebrews, James and the letters of Peter are not mentioned.

The fragment shows a church that already treated four Gospels, Acts and thirteen letters of Paul as settled, while the edges of the collection were still open. It tests a book by whether it comes from the apostles' time and whether it is read in the whole church. For a list of exactly the twenty-seven books of the later New Testament, see Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament, of the year 367.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The manuscript is dated by the library that holds it to AD 676–750 (Muratorian Fragment, Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana, I 101 sup., fols. 10r–11r). The list it copies is older, and how much older is disputed. The main clue in the text is its remark that Hermas wrote the Shepherd "very recently in our times in the city of Rome", when his brother Pius was bishop there (Muratorian Fragment, section 4). Eusebius places Pius between Hyginus and Anicetus, in the 140s and 150s (Eusebius, Church History 4.10–11). The usual conclusion is that the list was drawn up at or near Rome a generation later, about 170–200, and its rejection of the "Cataphrygians" fits a time when Montanism was a live issue.

Albert C. Sundberg, "Canon Muratori: A Fourth-Century List", Harvard Theological Review 66 (1973), pp. 1–41, and Geoffrey Mark Hahneman, The Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon (1992), argue instead that it is an eastern list of the fourth century, when comparable catalogues first appear. Everett Ferguson, "Canon Muratori: Date and Provenance", Studia Patristica 17.2 (1982), pp. 677–683, defends the earlier date, which most scholars still hold. Eckhard J. Schnabel, "The Muratorian Fragment: The State of Research", Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 57 (2014), pp. 231–264, reviews the debate.

Primary sources

The Muratorian Fragment List: c. AD 170–200 (disputed); manuscript: AD 676–750
Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana, I 101 sup., fols. 10r–11r; section 1; section 2; section 3; section 4

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
4.10–11

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Marcion Breaks with the Roman Church c. AD 144 496

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

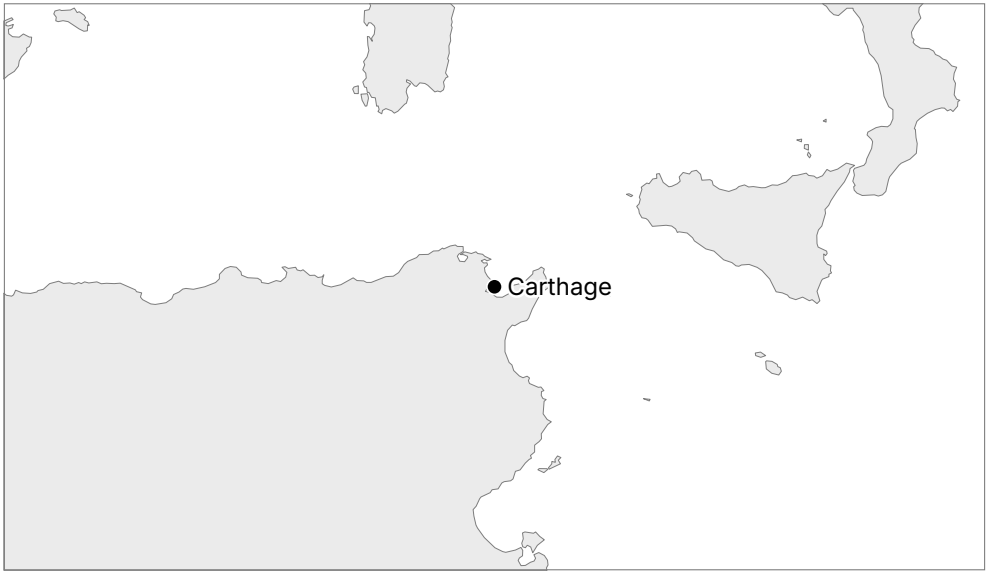
LEADS TO

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith Before · c. AD 180 515

Origen and the School of Alexandria After · c. AD 203–254



← Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith Earlier · c. AD 180
→ Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin Later · c. AD 197–220

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin

c. AD 197–220 · Estimated date

At Carthage Tertullian writes a large body of Christian literature in Latin: a defence of the Christians before Roman governors, attacks on Marcion and other teachers, and a treatise on God as Trinity, three persons of one substance.

Most of what is told of Tertullian's life comes from a short notice by Jerome, written almost two centuries later. It calls him a presbyter from Carthage, the son of a centurion, who was active under the emperors Severus and Caracalla, went over to the teaching of Montanus in middle life and is said to have lived to old age. Jerome ranks him as chief of the Latin Christian writers after Victor and Apollonius (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 53).

The Apology is addressed to the governors who tried Christians. It protests that they are condemned for a name, without the inquiry given to any other accused (Tertullian, Apology 1–2). "We are but of yesterday, and we have filled every place among you" (Tertullian, Apology 37). It describes their meetings for prayer, including prayer for the emperors, for the reading of Scripture and for discipline, and a monthly voluntary collection for the poor, orphans, the aged and prisoners, so that outsiders remark "how they love one another" (Tertullian, Apology 39). Whatever disaster strikes, the cry is "Away with the Christians to the lion!" (Tertullian, Apology 40). Persecution defeats itself: "the blood of Christians is seed" (Tertullian, Apology 50). In a later appeal to the governor Scapula he argues that it is "a fundamental human right" for each person to worship as he is convinced, and that religion cannot be compelled (Tertullian, To Scapula 2).

Against rival teachers he argued from the churches' descent from the apostles. Truth is what the churches received from the apostles, the apostles from Christ and Christ from God, and those outside that line have no claim on the Scriptures (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 21; 37). He sums up the "rule of faith" in a few lines (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 13) and asks, "What indeed has Athens to do with Jerusalem?" (Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 7)

His treatise Against Praxeas answers a teacher who, as Tertullian reports him, held that the Father himself was born and suffered (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 1). There is one only God, Tertullian writes, but under a "dispensation" (in Greek oikonomia) "which distributes the Unity into a Trinity", Father, Son and Holy Spirit: three "not in condition, but in degree; not in substance, but in form; not in power, but in aspect; yet of one substance, and of one condition, and of one power" (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 2). One is other than another "on the ground of Personality, not of Substance" (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 12). His Latin words in these passages are trinitas, substantia and persona (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 2; 12 (Latin)).

By then he had parted from many of his fellow Christians. He says that he and his friends "withdrew" over their recognition of the Paraclete, the Spirit speaking in the New Prophecy (see the New Prophecy of Montanus) (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 1). By Jerome's account he "lapsed to the doctrine of Montanus" and wrote books against the church (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 53).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Two of Tertullian's works can be dated from what they say. The Apology speaks of the rebels Niger and Albinus and of their supporters as still being rounded up (Tertullian, Apology 35), which puts it just after Septimius Severus won the civil war in 197. The first book of Against Marcion names its own year, the fifteenth of Severus, AD 207–208 (Tertullian, Against Marcion 1.15). The order and dates of the other treatises are worked out from cross-references and from how far each reflects his adherence to the New Prophecy.

Jerome, writing about 393, says that Tertullian flourished under Severus and Caracalla, who ruled between 193 and 217, and that he lived to a great age (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 53). The latest of his surviving works are usually put at about 220, and no source gives the year of his death. The range shown is that of his writing.

Primary sources

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
53

Apology Tertullian · c. AD 197
1–2; 37; 39; 40; 50; 35

To Scapula Tertullian · c. AD 212
2

Prescription against Heretics Tertullian · c. AD 200
21; 37; 13; 7

Against Praxeas Tertullian · c. AD 210–218
1; 2; 12; 2; 12 (Latin)

Against Marcion Tertullian · c. AD 207–212
1.15

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Carthage
Who Tertullian
Threads Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

The New Prophecy of Montanus c. AD 157–172 508

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith Before · c. AD 180 515

Origen and the School of Alexandria After · c. AD 203–254 536

CHURCH AND STATE

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship Before · c. AD 155–165 500

The Decian Persecution After · AD 250 540

← The Muratorian List of New Testament Books Earlier · c. AD 170–200 → Christianity Takes Root in Edessa Later · c. AD 201

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Christianity Takes Root in Edessa

c. AD 201 · Estimated date

A flood report of November 201, kept in the archives of Edessa, lists a church of the Christians among the buildings destroyed. It is dated evidence of a church in the Syriac-speaking East, where a later tradition traced the church back to a letter from Jesus.

Eusebius calls Edessa a royal city, whose king ruled beyond the Euphrates and whose records were kept in Syriac (Eusebius, Church History 1.13). He also knew a letter from the churches of its district, Osrhoene, written during the dispute about the date of Easter near the end of the second century (Eusebius, Church History 5.23.2).

In November 201 the river that ran through the city burst its banks at night. A report written by the city's scribes and deposited in its archives, and copied centuries later into the Chronicle of Edessa, tells how King Abgar VIII watched from a tower by torchlight while the western wall gave way. The water wrecked his palace and the buildings along the river and drowned more than two thousand people. Among the losses the report lists "the temple of the church of the Christians" (Chronicle of Edessa 8).

The Christian teacher Bardaisan, whose birth in 154 the city's chronicle records, belongs to these years (Chronicle of Edessa 6). Eusebius says that he wrote dialogues in Syriac against the followers of Marcion, at a time when rival teachings abounded in Mesopotamia (Eusebius, Church History 4.30). A dialogue from his school speaks of "the new race of us Christians", who meet on the first day of the week, and names believers in Parthia, Persia, Media and Edessa. It also says that King Abgar, on becoming a believer, forbade a rite of self-castration performed in honour of a goddess (Book of the Laws of the Countries). It does not say which king of that name is meant.

By the time Eusebius wrote, early in the fourth century, a story was told that traced the church of Edessa to the lifetime of Jesus. Eusebius reports that an earlier King Abgar, being ill, wrote to ask Jesus to come and heal him; that Jesus answered by letter, promising to send a disciple; and that after the ascension Thaddaeus, one of the seventy, came to Edessa, cured the king and preached to the citizens. Eusebius says that he translated the letters from Syriac documents in the city's archives (Eusebius, Church History 1.13). The city's own chronicle, which draws on those archives, has no such story, and the first bishop it names is Conon, who began to build a church in the Seleucid year 624, AD 312–313 (Chronicle of Edessa 1–12).

What the flood report and the writings of Bardaisan's circle show is a Christian community settled in Edessa and writing in Syriac by the opening of the third century (Chronicle of Edessa 8) (Book of the Laws of the Countries). The story of Abgar's letter, which Eusebius passed on to Greek readers, is an account of those beginnings that was current in his day (Eusebius, Church History 1.13).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Chronicle of Edessa dates the flood to the month of Second Tishrin (November) in the year 513 of the Seleucid era, which began in October AD 201 (Chronicle of Edessa 8). The chronicle was compiled in the sixth century, but this entry reproduces a report signed by the city's scribes and archivists. It shows a church building in Edessa by 201; when the first Christians came there is not known, and the event is placed at this year for that reason.

B. H. Cowper, who translated the chronicle, took the notice as proof that the Christians of Edessa had a house of worship by that date (note to entry 106 on the linked page). Walter Bauer suggested that the words about the church were added by the sixth-century compiler, and that the correspondence of Abgar and Jesus is a legend composed in Edessa in the time of its bishop Conon, shortly before Eusebius wrote (Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, 1934; English translation 1971, chapter 1). The document that Eusebius translates dates the story to "the three hundred and fortieth year", which by the Seleucid era used at Edessa is about AD 29 (Eusebius, Church History 1.13). A. C. McGiffert, in the notes to the linked translation, calls Eusebius the first writer to mention the letters and judges them a later forgery; they are not treated here as a record of the first century.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
1.13; 5.23.2; 4.30

The Chronicle of Edessa Sixth century, after AD 540, using older city records
8; 6; 1–12

The Book of the Laws of the Countries A pupil of Bardaisan named Philip · Early third century
newadvent.org

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Edessa
Who Abgar VIII, Bardaisan
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church at Antioch, Where Believers Were First Called Christians c. AD 43 395

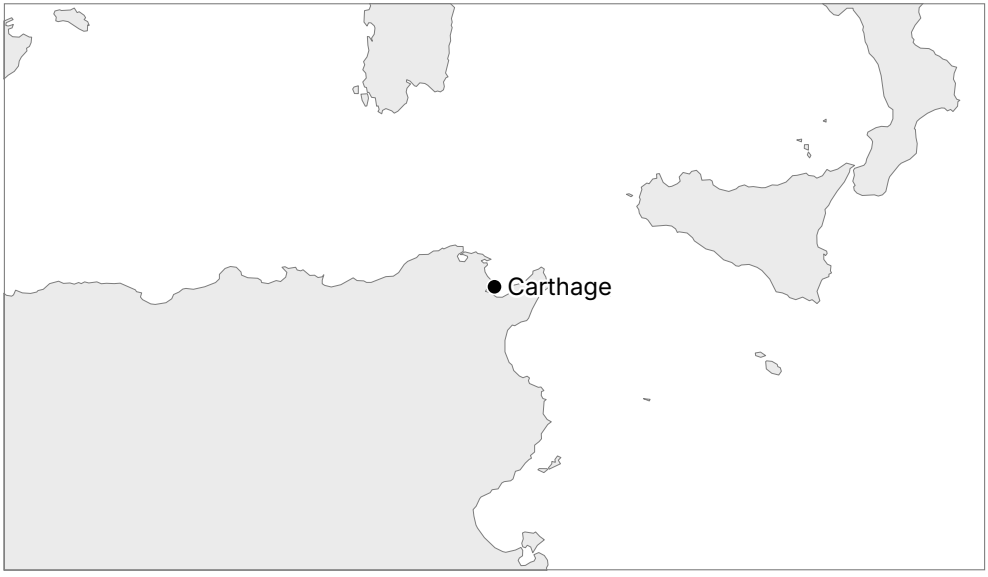
LEADS TO

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon 1 February AD 410 656

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Paul's Voyage to Rome Before · c. AD 59–62 441

Armenia Adopts Christianity After · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553



← Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin Earlier · c. AD 197–220
→ The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity Later · 7 March AD 203

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity

7 March AD 203 · Estimated date

A group of newly baptised Christians is put to death in the arena in Roman Africa, among them the young mother Perpetua and Felicity, who gave birth in prison. The account preserves Perpetua's own prison diary and her visions.

A group of catechumens was arrested together: Revocatus and his fellow-servant Felicity, Saturninus, Secundulus, and Perpetua, a married woman of good family, about twenty-two years old, with a baby at the breast. The account that survives says that from this point it gives Perpetua's story as she wrote it herself. She tells how her father tried to shake her resolve, how the prisoners were baptised, and how frightened she was of the dark and the heat of the prison until she was allowed to keep her child with her (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 1.1–2). In a vision she climbed a narrow golden ladder hung with iron weapons, past a dragon, to a garden where a white-haired shepherd welcomed her, and she understood that she was to die (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 1.3).

At the hearing the procurator Hilarianus urged her to spare her father's grey hairs and her infant and to sacrifice for the welfare of the emperors. She answered, "I am a Christian." All were condemned to the beasts (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 2.1–2). Two more visions concerned her dead brother Dinocrates, whom she saw first in distress and then, after her prayers, refreshed; in a last one she fought and beat an Egyptian in the arena, and took it to mean that her fight would be against the devil (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 2.3–3.2).

An editor completes the story. Felicity, eight months pregnant, feared that her execution would be put off; she gave birth in prison three days before the games, and a Christian woman took the child (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 5.2). On the day, Perpetua refused on behalf of them all to let them be dressed as priests of Saturn and priestesses of Ceres. The men faced a leopard, a bear and a boar. The two women were tossed by a wild cow, and Perpetua helped Felicity to her feet. At the end all were killed with the sword, and Perpetua guided the hand of the young gladiator to her throat (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 6.1–4).

The editor asks that the account be read for the building up of the church (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 6.1–4). Tertullian appeals to what Perpetua saw of paradise on the day of her passion (Tertullian, On the Soul 55). By the middle of the fourth century the church at Rome kept the feast of Perpetua and Felicity on 7 March (Chronograph of 354 part 12, 7 March). The account itself names no city; Prosper of Aquitaine, in the fifth century, sets the deaths at Carthage (Prosper, Chronicle 757 (p. 434)). In the pages given as her own the martyr speaks in the first person: a woman, a young mother, whose chief opponent in the story is her own father.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Passion, in the Latin text translated here, gives neither a year nor the name of the city. It says that the martyrs died at games held for the birthday of "Geta Caesar" (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 2.3, 5.3) and that the procurator Hilarianus was acting for a proconsul who had died (Passion of Perpetua and Felicity 2.1–2). The year comes from a late Roman list of consuls, which enters the martyrdom under Plautianus and Geta, the consuls of AD 203 (Fasti Vindobonenses priores AD 203 (p. 287)). Prosper of Aquitaine, in the fifth century, has the same notice but enters it after the consuls of 204 (Prosper, Chronicle 757 (p. 434)), so a neighbouring year cannot be excluded. Eusebius dates a persecution of the same reign at Alexandria to the tenth year of Severus, AD 202–203 (Eusebius, Church History 6.1–6.2.2).

The day comes from the list of martyrs' feasts kept at Rome and preserved in the Chronograph of 354, which enters Perpetua and Felicitas, "of Africa", on the Nones of March, that is 7 March (Chronograph of 354 part 12, 7 March); the consular list and Prosper give the same day (Fasti Vindobonenses priores AD 203 (p. 287)) (Prosper, Chronicle 757 (p. 434)). The city is named by Prosper, more than two centuries after the event: he says that they suffered "at Carthage in Africa", in the camp (Prosper, Chronicle 757 (p. 434)). A Greek version of the Passion and the later, shorter Latin Acts say that the group was arrested at Thuburbo Minus, a town not far from Carthage; the editors of the Greek text judged that the amphitheatre, near a military camp, can hardly be any other than that of Carthage (J. Rendel Harris and S. K. Gifford, The Acts of the Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, 1890). Tertullian, writing to a later proconsul, recalls "the presidency of Hilarian" as a time of popular outcry against the Christians' burial grounds (Tertullian, To Scapula 3).

Primary sources

The Passion of Perpetua and Felicity Shortly after the martyrdom, c. AD 203–210
1.1–2; 1.3; 2.1–2; 2.3–3.2; 5.2; 6.1–4; 2.3, 5.3

On the Soul Tertullian · Early third century
55

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354
part 12, 7 March

Chronicle Prosper of Aquitaine · c. AD 433–455
757 (p. 434)

Fasti Vindobonenses priores After AD 493, from older consular lists
AD 203 (p. 287)

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
6.1–6.2.2

To Scapula Tertullian · c. AD 212
3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Carthage
Who Perpetua, Felicity
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrs of Lyon and Vienne Before · AD 177 512

The Decian Persecution After · AD 250 540

← Christianity Takes Root in Edessa Earlier · c. AD 201
→ Origen and the School of Alexandria Later · c. AD 203–254

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Origen and the School of Alexandria

c. AD 203–254 · Estimated date

Origen takes charge of Christian teaching at Alexandria as a young man and spends fifty years on the text and meaning of Scripture, first there and then at Caesarea. He compiles the Hexapla, writes a systematic account of Christian teaching, and dies after torture under Decius.

Eusebius says that Clement of Alexandria had charge of the instruction of converts in the church at Alexandria and that Origen, as a boy, was among his pupils (Eusebius, Church History 6.6). In the persecution under Severus Origen's father was beheaded. Origen, not yet seventeen, wanted to give himself up and was kept at home only because his mother hid his clothes (Eusebius, Church History 6.1–6.2.12). In his eighteenth year the bishop, Demetrius, entrusted the teaching of converts to him. He sold his books of Greek literature for a small daily allowance, fasted, and slept on the floor (Eusebius, Church History 6.3.3–9). Eusebius also reports, as a rash act of his youth, that he took literally the saying about those who make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven (Matthew 19:12) (Eusebius, Church History 6.8.1–3).

His life's work was the Bible. He learned Hebrew, collected the Greek translations and set them in parallel columns beside the Hebrew text in the work called the Hexapla (Eusebius, Church History 6.16). A wealthy friend, Ambrose, paid for more than seven shorthand writers and as many copyists, and the commentaries followed (Eusebius, Church History 6.23.1–2). In On First Principles he separated what the apostles had taught plainly, about God, Christ and the Spirit, from the questions they had left open, on which he offered his own reasoning; and he held that Scripture has a meaning beyond the obvious one (Origen, On First Principles preface 2–8). A reader, he wrote, should find in it three levels, like the body, soul and spirit of a person (Origen, On First Principles 4.1.11). The pagan philosopher Porphyry, in a passage that Eusebius quotes, says that he met Origen in his youth and complains that he applied to the Jewish Scriptures the figurative methods that Greek writers used on their own mysteries (Eusebius, Church History 6.19.4–8).

On a journey he was ordained presbyter by the bishops of Palestine, and Demetrius turned against him (Eusebius, Church History 6.8.4–5, 6.23.4). He left Alexandria for Caesarea Maritima (Eusebius, Church History 6.26), where students came to him from other provinces and where, past sixty, he wrote his reply to the pagan critic Celsus (Eusebius, Church History 6.30, 6.36.1–2). In the persecution of Decius he was chained, racked and threatened with fire (Eusebius, Church History 6.39.5). He died not long afterwards, aged sixty-nine (Eusebius, Church History 7.1).

Origen's work bears on what the church read as Scripture and on how it read it. Eusebius quotes his list of the twenty-two books of the Hebrew Scriptures and his statement that four Gospels alone are undisputed in the church (Eusebius, Church History 6.25.1–4). His opinions were contested after his death: when Rufinus put On First Principles into Latin more than a century later, he explained in his preface that he had left out or altered passages on the Trinity that he judged to be corrupt (Origen, On First Principles prologue of Rufinus).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The chronology comes from Eusebius. He puts the death of Origen's father in the tenth year of the emperor Severus, AD 202–203, when Origen was not quite seventeen, and his appointment as teacher in his eighteenth year (Eusebius, Church History 6.1–6.2.12) (Eusebius, Church History 6.3.3–9). That gives a birth about 185 and a beginning about 203. The move to Caesarea is dated to the tenth year of Alexander Severus, about 231 (Eusebius, Church History 6.26).

Eusebius says that Origen died aged sixty-nine in the reign of Gallus, who ruled from 251 to 253 (Eusebius, Church History 7.1). Sixty-nine years from a birth about 185 lead to 254 or 255, just after Gallus, so the two statements do not quite agree and the year of death is given as about 254.

Primary sources

Scripture
Matthew 19:12

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
6.6; 6.1–6.2.12; 6.3.3–9; 6.8.1–3; 6.16; 6.23.1–2; 6.19.4–8; 6.8.4–5, 6.23.4; 6.26; 6.30, 6.36.1–2; 6.39.5; 7.1; 6.25.1–4

On First Principles Origen · c. AD 220–230 preface 2–8; 4.1.11; prologue of Rufinus

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Alexandria, Caesarea Maritima
Who Origen, Clement of Alexandria
Threads Scripture and Canon, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek c. 250 BC 244

LEADS TO

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

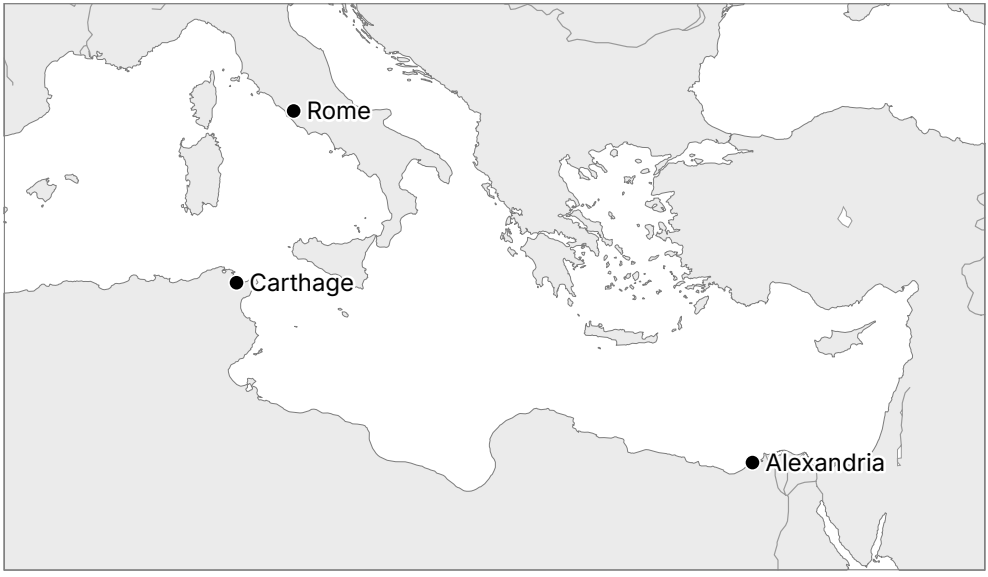
The Muratorian List of New Testament Books Before · c. AD 170–200 520

Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths After · c. AD 341 606

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin Before · c. AD 197–220 524

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church After · AD 251–258 544



← The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity Earlier · 7 March AD 203
→ The Decian Persecution Later · AD 250

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Decian Persecution

AD 250 · Firm date

The emperor Decius orders the inhabitants of the empire to sacrifice to the gods and obtain a certificate. Bishops are executed or driven into hiding, many Christians comply, and the churches are left divided over how to receive them back.

Decius became emperor in succession to Philip (Eusebius, Church History 6.39.1). Soon afterwards an order went out that people should sacrifice to the gods. None of the writers cited here quotes the order, and what it demanded is seen in certificates on papyrus that survive from Egypt. In one of them, dated June 250, a villager and his two children declare before the local commission for sacrifices that they have always sacrificed to the gods and have now done so in the commissioners' presence, poured a libation and tasted the offerings; two officials sign as witnesses (P.Mich. inv. 262). The certificate does not mention Christians. Christian writers took the measure as an attack on the church, and Eusebius puts it down to Decius's hatred of his predecessor (Eusebius, Church History 6.39.1).

At Rome the bishop, Fabian, died in January 250, and two presbyters and a deacon were imprisoned (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Fabius and Cornelius) (Chronograph of 354 part 12, 20 January). The list dates his successor from the consuls of the following year (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Fabius and Cornelius); Cyprian wrote that the emperor, whom he calls a tyrant, would rather have heard of a rival emperor than of a new bishop at Rome (Cyprian, Letters 51.9 [55.9]). In the East, Eusebius reports, the bishops of Jerusalem and Antioch died in prison, and Origen was tortured (Eusebius, Church History 6.39.2–5).

Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in a letter that Eusebius quotes, described what happened when the decree arrived there. Many of the more prominent Christians came forward at once; others went because their public offices required it, or were pressed by their friends; called by name, they went up to the sacrifices, some of them pale and shaking. Others fled or were arrested, and of those some gave way after days in prison or under torture. Some held out and were burned or beheaded (Eusebius, Church History 6.41.10–16).

Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, went into hiding when the crowd called for him, and governed his church by letter (Cyprian, Letters 14.1–2 [20.1–2]). On his return he said that most of his people had denied their faith at the first threat, that some had hurried to the forum before they were summoned, and that parents had carried their infants with them to the altar (Cyprian, On the Lapsed 7–9). Others had obtained a certificate without sacrificing. He counted that a lesser fault but still a denial (Cyprian, On the Lapsed 27–28).

Cyprian opened his address to his church with the words that peace had been restored (Cyprian, On the Lapsed 1). Decius was killed in battle after a reign of less than two years (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 4) (Eusebius, Church History 7.1). The order had been applied at Rome and in Africa, Egypt, Syria and Palestine, and it left behind baptised Christians who had sacrificed or obtained certificates and now asked to return. A council of African bishops ruled that those with certificates might be readmitted after their cases were examined, and that those who had sacrificed should do penance and be reconciled when in danger of death (Cyprian, Letters 51.6, 51.17 [55.6, 55.17]). The dispute that followed is told under Cyprian on the Unity of the Church.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Two documents fix the year. The fourth-century list of Roman bishops places Fabian's death in January of the consulship of Decius, for the second time, and Gratus, which is AD 250 (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Fabius and Cornelius). The certificate of sacrifice cited here is dated 23 Pauni in the first year of Decius, which falls in June 250 (P.Mich. inv. 262). The order to sacrifice was therefore in force from the first weeks of 250 and was still being applied in Egypt in the summer. Decius reigned less than two years and was succeeded by Gallus (Eusebius, Church History 7.1); the same list of bishops names Decius as consul for 251 and Gallus as consul for 252 (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Fabius and Cornelius).

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
6.39.1; 6.39.2–5; 6.41.10–16; 7.1

Certificate of Sacrifice from Theadelphia (P.Mich. inv. 262) June AD 250 apps.lib.umich.edu

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354
part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Fabius and Cornelius; part 12, 20 January

Letters Cyprian of Carthage and his correspondents · c. AD 249–258
51.9 [55.9]; 14.1–2 [20.1–2]; 51.6, 51.17 [55.6, 55.17]

On the Lapsed Cyprian of Carthage · AD 251
7–9; 27–28; 1

On the Deaths of the Persecutors Lactantius · c. AD 313–316
4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Carthage, Alexandria
Who Decius, Fabian, Cyprian
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pliny Asks Trajan How to Treat Christians c. AD 112 488

LEADS TO

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church AD 251–258 544

The Great Persecution under Diocletian AD 303–311 557

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicity Before · 7 March AD 203 532

The Great Persecution under Diocletian After · AD 303–311 557

CHURCH AND STATE

Tertullian Writes Christian Theology in Latin Before · c. AD 197–220 524

Armenia Adopts Christianity After · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553

← Origen and the School of Alexandria Earlier · c. AD 203–254
→ Cyprian on the Unity of the Church Later · AD 251–258

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church

AD 251–258 · Firm date

Faced with rival bishops at Rome and Carthage after the Decian persecution, Cyprian argues that there is one church, held together by one episcopate, outside which there is no salvation. He then defends his view of baptism against the bishop of Rome and dies a martyr in 258.

In 251 the church at Rome chose Cornelius as bishop (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Cornelius). Eusebius reports that the presbyter Novatian held that Christians who had sacrificed could never be received back, and that a synod of sixty bishops condemned him; he quotes a letter of Cornelius which says that Novatian had himself consecrated as a rival by three bishops brought to Rome for the purpose (Eusebius, Church History 6.43.1–2, 6.43.8–9). Novatian's envoys were turned away at Carthage (Cyprian, Letters 40.1–2 [44.1–2]). Cyprian, who faced a breakaway group of his own there (Cyprian, Letters 54.14 [59.14]), then wrote On the Unity of the Church.

Christ gave the keys to Peter first, Cyprian argues, although all the apostles received equal power, in order to show that unity begins from one (Matthew 16:18–19) (Cyprian, On the Unity of the Church 4). The bishops hold that unity in common: "The episcopate is one, each part of which is held by each one for the whole" (Cyprian, On the Unity of the Church 5). Whoever leaves the church leaves salvation: "He can no longer have God for his Father, who has not the Church for his mother" (Cyprian, On the Unity of the Church 6).

The chapter on Peter survives in two versions. One adds that a primacy is given to Peter and asks whether a man who deserts the chair of Peter can think that he is in the church; the other lacks those sentences, which the editor of the translation linked here prints in his notes and calls spurious (Cyprian, On the Unity of the Church 4, with the editor's notes). Pope Leo XIII, in an encyclical of 1896, quotes the chapter in support of the Catholic teaching that Christ chose Peter and his successors as the principle and centre of the church's unity (Leo XIII, Satis Cognitum 15). Calvin, in the Institutes, quotes it to show that Christ gave the keys to one man not to set him above the others but to commend the unity of the church, the other apostles being Peter's equals in honour and power (Calvin, Institutes 4.6.4).

Writing to Cornelius, Cyprian called Rome "the throne of Peter" and "the chief church whence priestly unity takes its source" (Cyprian, Letters 54.14 [59.14]). Yet he held that baptism given outside the church was void, since there is "no salvation out of the Church", and that converts from heresy must be baptised (Cyprian, Letters 72.21 [73.21]). Stephen I of Rome ruled that nothing should be changed from what had been handed down: such converts were to be received by the laying on of hands. Cyprian called this an error (Cyprian, Letters 73.1–2 [74.1–2]). Eusebius quotes Dionysius of Alexandria as saying that Stephen had written that he would not hold communion with the bishops of Cilicia, Cappadocia and Galatia, who followed the same practice (Eusebius, Church History 7.3, 7.5.3–5). On 1 September 256 eighty-seven African bishops voted for Cyprian's position, after he had told them that none of them set himself up as "a bishop of bishops" (Council of Carthage (256) opening address). Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia attacked Stephen for boasting of his succession from Peter (Cyprian, Letters 74.17 [75.17]).

Under the emperor Valerian Cyprian was exiled in August 257 and beheaded near Carthage on 14 September 258 (Proconsular Acts of Cyprian pp. xxv–xxviii). In 314 the Council of Arles decided against the African custom of rebaptising (Council of Arles (314) canon 9 (8)). His sentences on the one church and the one episcopate have been quoted on opposite sides since, as the appeals of Calvin and Leo XIII show (Calvin, Institutes 4.6.4) (Leo XIII, Satis Cognitum 15).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

On the Unity of the Church belongs to 251, the year from which the Roman list of bishops dates Cornelius (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Cornelius), against whom Novatian was consecrated and whose envoys were turned away at Carthage (Cyprian, Letters 40.1–2 [44.1–2]). The minutes of the council of eighty-seven bishops give only the day, 1 September (Council of Carthage (256) opening address). It belongs to the dispute with Stephen. Cyprian was sent into exile on 30 August 257 (Proconsular Acts of Cyprian pp. xxv–xxviii), and Stephen was dead before 6 August 258, the day on which his successor Xystus was executed, as Cyprian reported at the time (Cyprian, Letters 81.1 [80.1]) (Chronograph of 354 part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Xystus). The latest 1 September that fits is therefore that of 256, the year usually given; the heading "258" printed with the linked translation cannot be right. Cyprian's exile and death are dated by the consuls of the year in the record of his trial: 30 August 257 and 14 September 258 (Proconsular Acts of Cyprian pp. xxv–xxviii).

Chapter 4 of the treatise exists in two versions. Maurice Bévenot concluded from the manuscripts that Cyprian wrote both, the one that speaks of a primacy in 251 and the other as a revision during his dispute with Stephen (St. Cyprian's De Unitate chap. 4 in the Light of the Manuscripts, Rome, 1937).

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 16:18–19

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354
part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Cornelius; part 13 (Liberian Catalogue), Xystus

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
6.43.1–2, 6.43.8–9; 7.3, 7.5.3–5

Letters Cyprian of Carthage and his correspondents · c. AD 249–258
40.1–2 [44.1–2]; 54.14 [59.14]; 72.21 [73.21]; 73.1–2 [74.1–2]; 74.17 [75.17]; 81.1 [80.1]

On the Unity of the Church Cyprian of Carthage · AD 251, with a later revision of chapter 4
4; 5; 6; 4, with the editor's notes

Satis Cognitum Pope Leo XIII · 29 June 1896
15

Institutes of the Christian Religion John Calvin · First edition 1536; final Latin edition 1559
4.6.4

The Judgment of Eighty-Seven Bishops on the Baptism of Heretics 1 September AD 256
opening address

The Proconsular Acts of Cyprian AD 257–258, with a narrative frame added soon after
pp. xxv–xxviii

The Council of Arles (314) The bishops assembled at Arles · AD 314
canon 9 (8)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Carthage, Rome
Who Cyprian, Novatian, Stephen I
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Decian Persecution AD 250 540

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

LEADS TO

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles AD 314 576

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith Before · c. AD 180 515

The Council of Chalcedon After · October AD 451 681

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Origen and the School of Alexandria Before · c. AD 203–254 536

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles After · AD 314 576

← The Decian Persecution Earlier · AD 250
→ Antony Withdraws to the Desert Later · c. AD 270–285

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Antony Withdraws to the Desert

c. AD 270–285 · Estimated date

A young Egyptian Christian hears the words of Jesus to the rich man read in church, gives away his property and withdraws by stages into the desert. Others follow, and the Life written by Athanasius makes him the model of the monk.

Antony the Great was born in Egypt to Christian parents who owned good land. They died when he was about eighteen or twenty and left him with a young sister. Some months later he went into church as the Gospel was being read and heard the words of Jesus to the rich man: “If you want to be perfect, go, sell what you have, and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me” (Matthew 19:21). He took the words as spoken to himself, gave his land to the villagers, sold his goods for the poor, and placed his sister with a community of Christian women (Athanasius, Life of Antony 1–3).

Athanasius says that there were then few monasteries in Egypt and that no monk yet knew the deep desert; those who wished to live in this way stayed near their own villages. Antony began like them, learning from an old solitary nearby and working with his hands (Athanasius, Life of Antony 3–4). He then moved to the tombs outside the village, where the Life describes him beaten by demons and comforted by a vision (Athanasius, Life of Antony 8–10). At about thirty-five he crossed the river to a deserted fort and shut himself in, receiving bread twice a year (Athanasius, Life of Antony 10, 12–13). The Life gives the fort no name; Palladius, about 420, calls Antony's settlement by the river Pispir (Palladius, Lausiac History 21.1).

After nearly twenty years his friends broke down the door. He came out, Athanasius says, in sound health and even temper, healed the sick, reconciled enemies and persuaded many to take up the solitary life, so that "the desert was colonised by monks" (Athanasius, Life of Antony 14). During the persecution under Maximinus he went to Alexandria to serve the confessors (Athanasius, Life of Antony 46–47). Finding himself pressed by visitors, he travelled three days into the inner desert with a party of Saracens and settled on what the Life calls the inner mountain (Athanasius, Life of Antony 49–51), which later tradition names Mount Colzim. He died there at a great age (Athanasius, Life of Antony 89–92).

The account given here comes from one book, which Athanasius wrote for monks abroad who had asked how Antony lived, and which he offers them as a pattern (Athanasius, Life of Antony prologue). A generation after Antony's death Augustine of Hippo heard at Milan how two imperial officials at Trier had come upon the Life in a cottage, read it, and given up the emperor's service that same day, and he says that until then Antony's name had been unknown to him (Augustine, Confessions 8.6.14–15).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Life gives ages, not years. Antony was about eighteen or twenty when his parents died and he gave his property away (Athanasius, Life of Antony 1–3), about thirty-five when he left the tombs for the deserted fort across the river (Athanasius, Life of Antony 8–10), and nearly a hundred and five when he died (Athanasius, Life of Antony 89–92). Jerome's Chronicle places his death in the nineteenth year of Constantius, AD 356 (Jerome, Chronicle AD 356). Counting back, he was born about 251, renounced his property about 270, shut himself in the fort about 285 and came out of it about 305. These years are only as exact as the round ages Athanasius gives. The years shown are those of this first withdrawal, to the tombs near his village and then to the fort by the Nile. The move to the inner mountain, the second place listed, came much later: it followed the persecution under Maximinus and the martyrdom of Peter, bishop of Alexandria (Athanasius, Life of Antony 46–47), which Eusebius puts in the ninth year of the persecution, about 311 (Eusebius, Church History 7.32.31).

Primary sources

Scripture
Matthew 19:21

Life of Antony Athanasius of Alexandria · c. AD 356–362
1–3; 3–4; 8–10; 10, 12–13; 14; 46–47; 49–51; 89–92; prologue

Lausiac History Palladius of Helenopolis · c. AD 419–420
21.1

Confessions Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 397–400
8.6.14–15

Chronicle Jerome, translating and continuing Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 380
AD 356

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
7.32.31

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Pispir, Mount Colzim
Who Antony the Great
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

LEADS TO

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism c. AD 320 580

The Conversion of Augustine AD 386 640

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Community of the Dead Sea Scrolls Before · c. 150 BC – AD 68 258

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism After · c. AD 320 580

← Cyprian on the Unity of the Church Earlier · AD 251–258

→ Armenia Adopts Christianity Later · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Armenia Adopts Christianity

AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 · Traditional date

King Tiridates of Armenia, by the account of the Armenian church, is converted by Gregory the Illuminator and brings his court and people to baptism. The Armenian church dates this to 301; the story was written down more than a century later.

There were Christians in Armenia before the kingdom's conversion. Eusebius lists among the letters of Dionysius of Alexandria, who wrote about the middle of the third century, one on repentance "to the brethren in Armenia", whose bishop was named Merozanes (Eusebius, Church History 6.46.2). How the royal house came to the faith is told at length in the History that bears the name of Agathangelos, written in Armenian well over a century after the events. What follows is its account, as given in the abridged English version linked here.

Gregory the Illuminator was the son of a Parthian noble who had murdered the Armenian king. He was carried as an infant to Roman territory and brought up a Christian at Caesarea in Cappadocia. The murdered king's son, Tiridates III, grew up in the Roman empire, served in its army, was honoured by the emperor and won back his throne with a great army. Gregory entered his service without saying who he was (Agathangelos, History 1.5–14). When he refused to honour the goddess Anahit the king had him tortured and then, learning whose son he was, thrown into a pit, where he survived for thirteen years (Agathangelos, History 1.15–26).

Meanwhile, the History continues, a company of Christian women, led by Gayane and including the beautiful Hripsime, fled from the emperor Diocletian to the royal city of Vagharshapat. Tiridates desired Hripsime, was refused, and had the women killed (Agathangelos, History 2.3–15). He was then struck with madness and behaved like an animal. His sister learned in a vision that only the prisoner in the pit could help. Gregory was drawn up alive, and the king knelt before him (Agathangelos, History 2.16–19).

In the same account Gregory preached for many days, buried the martyrs, and told of a vision in which a column of fire with a cross of light marked the place in the city where a church was to be built. The king was healed and gave orders for the pagan shrines to be destroyed (Agathangelos, History 3.1–19). Tiridates then sent Gregory to Caesarea, where Bishop Leontius and his colleagues consecrated him bishop (Agathangelos, History 3.22–25). On his return he baptised the court and a great number of people in the Euphrates, set up churches with priests and bishops, and had children taught to read the Scriptures in Syriac and Greek (Agathangelos, History 4.5–9).

Two notices from outside Armenia stand beside this. The Greek historian Sozomen, about 440, had heard that Tiridates became a Christian through a divine sign in his own house and ordered his subjects by herald to adopt the same religion (Sozomen, Church History 2.8). Eusebius, a contemporary, says that the emperor Maximinus went to war with the Armenians, old allies of Rome, because they were Christians and he tried to force them to sacrifice, and that he was defeated (Eusebius, Church History 9.8.2–4). Eusebius thus counts the Armenians as Christians by about 312. The Armenian Apostolic Church commemorates Gregory's release from the pit as the beginning of the nation's conversion, as the dating note shows. If the conversion is put about 314, it belongs to the years in which the Roman state gave up persecution; if in 301, it came before the last persecution began. Either way it took place in a kingdom that Eusebius calls an ally of Rome (Eusebius, Church History 9.8.2–4).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The History of Agathangelos, in the abridgement linked here, gives no dates, and it was written in the second half of the fifth century. The year 301 is the date kept by the Armenian Apostolic Church: its calendar says that Gregory's release from the pit "in the year 301" began the conversion of the nation (Mother See of Holy Etchmiadzin).

Many historians prefer a date about 314. The participants in an international symposium on the subject reached a broad consensus that 301 is "historically untenable" and that 314 is far more likely, according to the publisher's summary of its proceedings (Werner Seibt, ed., Die Christianisierung des Kaukasus / The Christianization of Caucasus, Vienna, 2002). The fixed points from outside Armenia are few. Eusebius, a contemporary, calls the Armenians Christians when the emperor Maximinus attacked them, which was about 312 (Eusebius, Church History 9.8.2–4); and Agathangelos sends Gregory to be consecrated by Leontius of Caesarea and has Gregory's son attend the Council of Nicaea in 325 (Agathangelos, History 3.22–25) (Agathangelos, History 4.19). The timeline shows the traditional year and both dates.

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
6.46.2; 9.8.2–4

History of the Armenians Agathangelos · Second half of the fifth century
1.5–14; 1.15–26; 2.3–15; 2.16–19; 3.1–19; 3.22–25; 4.5–9; 4.19

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
2.8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Vagharshapat
Who Gregory the Illuminator, Tiridates III
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

The Conversion of Georgia c. AD 326–337 589
The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians 1915–1916 1358

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Christianity Takes Root in Edessa Before · c. AD 201 528
The Conversion of Georgia After · c. AD 326–337 589

CHURCH AND STATE

The Decian Persecution Before · AD 250 540
The Great Persecution under Diocletian After · AD 303–311 557

← Antony Withdraws to the Desert Earlier · c. AD 270–285
→ The Great Persecution under Diocletian Later · AD 303–311

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

The Great Persecution under Diocletian

AD 303–311 · Firm date

In February 303 Diocletian orders churches demolished and Scriptures burned. Further edicts imprison the clergy and require everyone to sacrifice. The persecution is brief in the West and lasts eight years in the East.

Eusebius describes the years before the persecution, under Diocletian, as a time of favour: Christians governed provinces and served in the imperial household, and congregations had outgrown their old buildings and were putting up large churches in every city (Eusebius, Church History 8.1.1–6). Lactantius, who taught rhetoric at the emperor's residence, Nicomedia (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 80), says the change began when Christian attendants made the sign of the cross at a sacrifice and the soothsayers blamed them for its failure. In his account Diocletian then ordered the palace staff and the army to sacrifice, his junior colleague Galerius urged a general persecution through the winter, and an oracle of Apollo decided the matter (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 10–11).

On 23 February 303, Lactantius relates, officials broke into the church at Nicomedia, burned the Scriptures they found and had the building levelled (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 12). The edict posted next day, he says, stripped Christians of rank and of the protection of the courts (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 13). Eusebius gives its other terms: churches were to be razed and the Scriptures burned (Eusebius, Church History 8.2.4–5). Lactantius tells of two fires in the palace within fifteen days and accuses Galerius of having them set; Eusebius mentions a fire and says he does not know how it began. Both say that the Christians were blamed and that members of the household and clergy of the city were put to death (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 14–15) (Eusebius, Church History 8.6.1–10).

More edicts followed. The clergy everywhere were to be imprisoned and then forced by torture to sacrifice (Eusebius, Church History 8.2.4–5) (Eusebius, Church History 8.6.1–10). In the second year, Eusebius reports from Palestine, a general order required all the people in every city to sacrifice and pour libations (Eusebius, Martyrs of Palestine 3.1).

An official record of the first edict at work is preserved among the papers appended to the work of Optatus. On 19 May 303 the curator of the city of Cirta in Numidia went to "the house in which the Christians were accustomed to assemble" and demanded the Scriptures. The bishop said that the readers had them. The clerk listed what was handed over, chalices of gold and silver, lamps, and stores of clothing, and the search went on from house to house as books were handed over (Optatus, Against the Donatists appendix 2 (Gesta apud Zenophilum), pp. 352–356). Clergy who surrendered the Scriptures in this way were afterwards called traitors, and the charge lay behind the Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles.

Enforcement was uneven. In Gaul the junior emperor Constantius, according to Lactantius, let church buildings be pulled down but harmed no one; Eusebius says he did not even do that (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 15–16) (Eusebius, Church History 8.13.12–13). Eusebius says that Maxentius, when he gained power at Rome, ordered the persecution to stop (Eusebius, Church History 8.14.1). Eusebius reckons that the western provinces suffered for less than two years and Palestine for eight (Eusebius, Martyrs of Palestine 13.11–12).

Galerius, dying, issued an edict of toleration in 311 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34–35); see Galerius Grants Toleration.

The narrative comes from two Christian writers, Lactantius and Eusebius, who lived through these years and wrote as advocates. The record from Cirta was made by the officials who carried the edict out.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Lactantius dates the destruction of the church at Nicomedia to the feast of Terminus, seven days before the Kalends of March, in the eighth consulship of Diocletian and the seventh of Maximian: 23 February 303. The edict was posted the next day (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 12) (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 13). Eusebius, in Palestine, says that the edicts were published in March, in the nineteenth year of Diocletian (Eusebius, Church History 8.2.4–5). A municipal record from Cirta in Numidia shows the order being carried out there on 19 May of the same consular year (Optatus, Against the Donatists appendix 2 (Gesta apud Zenophilum), pp. 352–356).

The end is fixed by the edict of Galerius, posted at Nicomedia on 30 April 311 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34–35). In the provinces ruled by Maximinus persecution was renewed (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 36) and did not finally stop until 313; Lactantius counts ten years and about four months from the destruction of the church to the letter of Licinius in June 313 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48).

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
8.1.1–6; 8.2.4–5; 8.6.1–10; 8.13.12–13; 8.14.1

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
80

On the Deaths of the Persecutors Lactantius · c. AD 313–316
10–11; 12; 13; 14–15; 15–16; 34–35; 36; 48

The Martyrs of Palestine Eusebius of Caesarea · Soon after AD 311
3.1; 13.11–12

Against the Donatists Optatus of Milevis · c. AD 364–375
appendix 2 (Gesta apud Zenophilum), pp. 352–356

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nicomedia
Who Diocletian, Galerius
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Decian Persecution AD 250 540

LEADS TO

Galerius Grants Toleration 30 April AD 311 561
The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles AD 314 576

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Decian Persecution Before · AD 250 540
The Martyrs of Najran After · AD 523 (or 518) 699

CHURCH AND STATE

Armenia Adopts Christianity Before · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553
Galerius Grants Toleration After · 30 April AD 311 561

← Armenia Adopts Christianity Earlier · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314
→ Galerius Grants Toleration Later · 30 April AD 311

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Galerius Grants Toleration

30 April AD 311 · Firm date

The emperor Galerius, mortally ill, issues an edict that ends the Great Persecution in his territories. It allows Christians to exist again and to rebuild their meeting places, and asks them to pray for the emperors and the state.

Eusebius calls Galerius the author of the whole persecution (Eusebius, Church History 8.16.2–8.17.2). Lactantius relates that in the eighteenth year of his reign he was attacked by an ulcer of the lower body that the doctors could not check, and that he suffered for a year (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 33). Lactantius and Eusebius both describe the disease in detail and both present it as God's punishment (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 33) (Eusebius, Church History 8.16.2–8.17.2). The anonymous Origo Constantini says that he had returned to Serdica when the disease attacked him, and that he died of it (Origo Constantini 3.8).

Near the end he issued an edict. Lactantius gives it in Latin and Eusebius in a Greek translation, and the two agree in substance. The emperors, it says, had wished to restore everything to the ancient laws and public order of the Romans, and to bring back to a sound mind the Christians, who had abandoned the religion of their ancestors and made laws for themselves. Many had submitted under threat and many had suffered. But since very many persisted, and now neither worshipped the gods nor honoured their own God, the emperors in their clemency thought it right to extend their pardon: Christians might exist again and restore their meeting places, provided they did nothing against good order. In return they were to pray to their God for the safety of the emperors, of the state and of themselves (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34) (Eusebius, Church History 8.17.3–11). In the copy Eusebius translated, the heading carried the names of Galerius, Constantine and Licinius (Eusebius, Church History 8.17.3–11).

Lactantius says that the edict was posted at Nicomedia on 30 April 311, that the prisons were opened and Donatus, the friend to whom he addressed his book, came out after six years, and that Galerius died within days (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 35).

In the eastern provinces the edict had a short life. Eusebius says that Maximinus, who ruled in the East, did not publish it but gave a spoken order, which his chief official, Sabinus, passed to the governors by letter: Christians were no longer to be molested. Prisoners were released (Eusebius, Church History 9.1.1–7). Within six months, by the same account, he was forbidding Christian meetings in the cemeteries and encouraging cities to petition for the Christians' expulsion (Eusebius, Church History 9.2); Lactantius also tells of petitions from the cities (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 36). Toleration was secured in the East only two years later, when Licinius published at Nicomedia the letter that he and Constantine had agreed on at Milan (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48). That step is told under the Edict of Milan.

The edict does not praise the Christians or say that the persecution had been wrong. It records that the attempt to bring them back had failed, grants pardon, and asks them to pray to their God for the emperors and the state (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Lactantius says that the edict was published at Nicomedia on the day before the Kalends of May in the eighth consulship of Galerius and the second of Maximinus, that is 30 April 311 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 35).

Neither Lactantius nor Eusebius says where the edict was drawn up. It is often called the Edict of Serdica because the Origo Constantini places the emperor's last illness and death in that city (Origo Constantini 3.8); that text does not mention the edict. The date above, and the first place listed, are those of its publication at Nicomedia, which Lactantius records (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 35). Eusebius says only that it was published "in the cities" (Eusebius, Church History 8.16.2–8.17.2).

Primary sources

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
8.16.2–8.17.2; 8.17.3–11; 9.1.1–7; 9.2

On the Deaths of the Persecutors Lactantius · c. AD 313–316
33; 34; 35; 36; 48

The Origin of the Emperor Constantine Anonymous (the Anonymus Valesianus, first part) · Fourth century, perhaps c. AD 390
3.8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nicomedia, Serdica
Who Galerius
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Persecution under Diocletian AD 303–311 557

LEADS TO

Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge 28 October AD 312 565

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572

CHURCH AND STATE

The Great Persecution under Diocletian Before · AD 303–311 557

Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge After · 28 October AD 312 565

← The Great Persecution under Diocletian Earlier · AD 303–311
→ Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge Later · 28 October AD 312

THE CHURCH UNDER ROME

Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge

28 October AD 312 · Firm date

Constantine defeats Maxentius outside Rome and becomes master of the western empire. Christian writers say that he fought under a sign of Christ shown to him beforehand, in a dream according to Lactantius, in the sky according to the later account of Eusebius.

In 312 Constantine brought an army across the Alps into Italy against Maxentius, who held Rome. He defeated Maxentius's generals at Verona and advanced on the city (Zosimus, New History 2.15–16) (Origo Constantini 4.12).

Lactantius wrote his account within a few years of the battle. In it Maxentius, warned by soothsayers that he would die if he left Rome, stays inside the walls while Constantine camps opposite the Milvian Bridge. On the anniversary of his accession Maxentius is jeered by the crowd at the circus, reads in the Sibylline books that the enemy of the Romans will perish that day, and marches out. His army is beaten with the broken bridge at its back, and he is driven into the Tiber in the crush (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 44). The Origo Constantini adds that his body was recovered next day and the head carried into Rome (Origo Constantini 4.12). The pagan historian Zosimus says that the bridge had been built to collapse as a trap and gave way under the fugitives; he mentions omens but no Christian sign (Zosimus, New History 2.15–16).

The Christian sources explain the victory in different ways. Lactantius says that Constantine was directed in a dream to mark "the heavenly sign" on his soldiers' shields, and that he did so, using the letter X with an upright line through it bent round at the top, "the cipher of Christ" (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 44). He says nothing of a sign in the sky. Eusebius, in his Church History, says only that Constantine prayed to God and to Christ for aid, and that after the victory he set up a statue of himself at Rome holding the sign of the cross (Eusebius, Church History 9.9.2–12). In the Life of Constantine, written after the emperor's death in 337, Eusebius reports what he says Constantine told him on oath: that about midday, on the march, at a place not named, he and his army saw a cross of light above the sun with the words "Conquer by this"; that Christ appeared to him in sleep the following night with the same sign and told him to copy it; and that he then had the jewelled standard made which bore the monogram of Christ (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 1.28–29) (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 1.30–32).

The senate's monument is more reserved. The arch dedicated to Constantine in 315 says that he overcame the tyrant instinctu divinitatis, by the prompting of the divinity, and names no god (Arch of Constantine dedicatory inscription).

The Roman calendar marks the emperor's entry into the city on the next day (Chronograph of 354 part 6 (calendar), 28–29 October). Eusebius says that the victor set up at Rome a statue of himself with an inscription crediting the city's deliverance to "this salutary sign", and that he and Licinius then drew up a decree in favour of the Christians (Eusebius, Church History 9.9.2–12). The letter that Licinius published in June 313 says that the two emperors had met at Milan and agreed that Christians and all others should be free to follow the religion they chose (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The day comes from the official Roman calendar preserved in the Chronograph of 354, which marks 28 October as evictio tyranni, the expulsion of the tyrant, and 29 October as the emperor's entry into the city (Chronograph of 354 part 6 (calendar), 28–29 October). The year is given by the same collection's list of city prefects, which heads 312 with a consulship of Maxentius, equates it with the consulship of Constantine and Licinius, and records a change of prefect on 27 October (Chronograph of 354 part 10 (city prefects), year 312).

Lactantius says that the battle fell on the anniversary of Maxentius's accession, which he gives as the sixth day before the Kalends of November; by strict count that is 27 October, one day earlier than the calendar (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 44).

The two accounts of Constantine's vision cannot be dated against each other with certainty. Lactantius wrote within about four years of the battle. Eusebius's first account, in the Church History, was written not long after it and has no vision. His second, in the Life of Constantine, was written after the emperor's death in 337 and reports what Constantine told him long after the event (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 1.28–29).

Primary sources

New History Zosimus · c. AD 500
2.15–16

The Origin of the Emperor Constantine Anonymous (the Anonymus Valesianus, first part) · Fourth century, perhaps c. AD 390
4.12

On the Deaths of the Persecutors Lactantius · c. AD 313–316
44; 48

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
9.9.2–12

Life of Constantine Eusebius of Caesarea · AD 337–339
1.28–29; 1.30–32

The Arch of Constantine Dedicated by the Senate and People of Rome · Dedicated AD 315
dedicatory inscription

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354

part 6 (calendar), 28–29 October; part 10 (city prefects), year 312

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Constantine, Maxentius
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Galerius Grants Toleration 30 April AD 311 561

LEADS TO

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572

CHURCH AND STATE

Galerius Grants Toleration Before · 30 April AD 311 561

The Edict of Milan After · AD 313 572

← Galerius Grants Toleration Earlier · 30 April AD 311
→ The Edict of Milan Later · AD 313
TIMELINE

Councils and the Christian Empire

AD 313–600

Toleration, then establishment. The great councils define the doctrines of the Trinity and of Christ, the canon is fixed, monasticism spreads, and the faith reaches Ethiopia, Persia and Ireland.

With Constantine the church moves from the margins to the centre of public life. Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus and Chalcedon produce the creeds still confessed today; Chalcedon also leaves lasting divisions with the churches of Egypt, Syria, Armenia and Persia. Jerome, Augustine and the Cappadocians shape theology for centuries.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles AD 314 576

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism c. AD 320 580

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584

The Conversion of Georgia c. AD 326–337 589
Constantine Dedicates Constantinople 11 May AD 330 594
King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian c. AD 330–356 598
The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated AD 335 602
Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths c. AD 341 606
The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia AD 359–360 610
Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion AD 361–363 615
Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619
The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623
The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628
The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632
Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636
The Conversion of Augustine AD 386 640
Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance AD 390 644
African Councils List the Books of Scripture AD 393–397 648
John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile AD 398–407 652
The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon 1 February AD 410 656
The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God August AD 410 660
Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace AD 411–418 664
The Council of Ephesus June AD 431 668
Patrick's Mission to Ireland c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional) 672
The Second Council of Ephesus August AD 449 676
The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681
The End of the Western Roman Empire AD 476 686
The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism AD 482–519 690
The Baptism of Clovis c. AD 496–508 695
The Martyrs of Najran AD 523 (or 518) 699
Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia 27 December AD 537 708
Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church c. AD 542–578 712
The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms c. AD 543–580 717
The Second Council of Constantinople AD 553 721
Columba Founds Iona AD 563 725
The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo 8 May AD 589 728
Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English AD 590–604 733

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Edict of Milan

AD 313 · Firm date

Constantine and Licinius agree at Milan that Christians and everyone else may worship as they choose. The text that survives is a letter Licinius had posted at Nicomedia in June 313, which also orders confiscated church property returned.

In 311 the emperor Galerius had ended the persecution with an edict that allowed Christians to exist again and to rebuild their meeting places (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34–35). After his victory at the Milvian Bridge, Constantine went to Milan that winter. Licinius, who ruled in Illyricum, came there to marry Constantine's sister Constantia (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 45) (Origo Constantini 5.13).

While the wedding was being celebrated, Maximinus Daia, who ruled the lands beyond the Bosphorus, marched out of Syria and invaded Licinius's territory (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 45). Licinius marched to meet him and defeated him on the last day of April 313 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 46–47). He then crossed into Bithynia, entered Nicomedia, and on 13 June ordered a letter addressed to the governor to be posted there (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48).

The letter speaks in the names of both emperors. It says that when they met at Milan they resolved to grant to Christians and to everyone else the freedom to follow whatever religion each person chose, so that whatever divinity there is in heaven might be favourable to them and to their subjects. Earlier restrictions on Christians are cancelled. Places of assembly that had been confiscated are to be handed back without payment, whether they had since been bought or received as gifts, and the present holders may apply for compensation from the emperors' bounty. Other property that belonged to the churches as corporate bodies is to be returned in the same way (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48).

This is the text commonly called the Edict of Milan. In form it is a letter to a provincial governor, and the copy that Lactantius gives, in Latin, is the one Licinius had posted at Nicomedia (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48). Eusebius gives the letter in a Greek translation, with an opening passage that Lactantius does not have (Eusebius, Church History 10.5.2–14). Neither writer gives a law issued at Milan itself. Eusebius also preserves a letter of Constantine to the proconsul of Africa ordering that property of the churches be restored (Eusebius, Church History 10.5.15–17).

The letter went beyond what Galerius had allowed: it granted the same freedom of worship to Christians and to all others, and gave the churches back what they had lost (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 34–35) (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48). It did not make Christianity the religion of the empire. Licinius later turned against the Christians in his own territory, according to Eusebius (Eusebius, Church History 10.8.8–19), and Constantine defeated him and became sole emperor (Origo Constantini 5.23–29).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Lactantius dates the posting of the letter at Nicomedia to the Ides of June in the third consulship of Constantine and Licinius, which is 13 June 313 (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 48). The meeting at Milan that the letter refers to took place in the winter before, after Constantine had settled affairs at Rome (Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 45). Neither Lactantius nor Eusebius gives a day for the meeting.

Primary sources

On the Deaths of the Persecutors Lactantius · c. AD 313–316
34–35; 45; 46–47; 48

The Origin of the Emperor Constantine Anonymous (the Anonymus Valesianus, first part) · Fourth century, perhaps c. AD 390
5.13; 5.23–29

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
10.5.2–14; 10.5.15–17; 10.8.8–19

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Milan, Nicomedia
Who Constantine, Licinius
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge 28 October AD 312 565
Galerius Grants Toleration 30 April AD 311 561

LEADS TO

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584
Constantine Dedicates Constantinople 11 May AD 330 594
Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion AD 361–363 615

CHURCH AND STATE

Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge Before · 28 October AD 312 565
The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles After · AD 314 576

← Constantine's Victory at the Milvian Bridge Earlier · 28 October AD 312
→ The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles Later · AD 314

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles

AD 314 · Firm date

Two rival bishops claim Carthage after the persecution. One party appeals to Constantine, who refers the case to bishops at Rome and then to a council at Arles. Both find for Caecilian, but the African church is still divided ninety years later.

The account of how the division began comes from Optatus, a bishop of Caecilian's communion who wrote some sixty years later against the other side. During the Great Persecution under Diocletian, he says, some bishops in Africa gave up the Scriptures to the authorities; the Latin word for such men is traditores, "handers-over" (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.13). When the persecution ended, Caecilian was elected bishop of Carthage and consecrated by Felix of Aptunga. Optatus relates that a party in the city, supported by bishops from Numidia, alleged that Felix had been a traditor, declared the consecration void and set up a rival bishop, Majorinus (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.18–20).

Constantine, now ruling Africa, sent money to Caecilian's clergy and exempted them from public duties (Eusebius, Church History 10.6–7). The opponents handed the proconsul a dossier of charges for the emperor (Augustine, Letter 88.2) and asked him for judges from Gaul (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.22). Constantine referred the case to Miltiades, bishop of Rome, with three Gallic bishops (Eusebius, Church History 10.5.18–20). By Optatus's account nineteen bishops met at the Lateran on 2 October 313, cleared Caecilian and condemned Donatus, who led the accusers (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.23–24).

The losing party complained that the judges had been few and hasty. Constantine then ordered bishops from many provinces to assemble at Arles by 1 August (Eusebius, Church History 10.5.21–24). The council reported to Silvester of Rome that the accusers had been "condemned or rejected" (Council of Arles (314) letter to Silvester). Its canons ruled that clergy proved from public records to have handed over the Scriptures were to be removed, but that ordinations they had performed stood (Council of Arles (314) canon 14 (13)); that converts from heresy who had been baptised in the name of the Trinity were not to be baptised again, against the custom of the Africans (Council of Arles (314) canon 9 (8)); and that Easter should be kept on one day everywhere and no bishop should consecrate another by himself (Council of Arles (314) canons 1 and 20).

The accusers appealed from the bishops to the emperor himself. Constantine wrote that they were asking judgement of a man who himself awaited the judgement of Christ (Optatus, Against the Donatists Appendix 5). He heard the case all the same, and Augustine, also an opponent, writing from the records eighty to ninety years later, says that he pronounced Caecilian innocent (Augustine, Letter 43.20) and ordered the property of the dissidents' congregations confiscated (Augustine, Letter 88.3). A proconsular inquiry, Optatus adds, cleared Felix (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.27).

The division did not end. The party took its name from Donatus of Carthage; Jerome, no friend of his, writes that he "deceived almost all Africa, and especially Numidia" (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 93). In 406 the Catholic clergy of Hippo were still writing to a Donatist bishop, complaining of attacks by his followers and defending the imperial laws against his party (Augustine, Letter 88.6–9). In this case a Christian emperor was asked to settle a dispute between bishops, and did so by convening councils. And a council ruled that an ordination is not undone by the fault of the bishop who performed it, and that baptism in the name of the Trinity is not repeated.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Constantine's summons told the bishops to be at Arles by 1 August and gives no year (Eusebius, Church History 10.5.21–24). The year follows from the order of events. The proconsul's report that opened the case is dated 15 April in Constantine's third consulship, 313 (Augustine, Letter 88.2). The hearing at Rome under Miltiades met on 2 October (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.23–24); Miltiades died in January 314 and Silvester succeeded him at the end of that month, by the Roman list of bishops drawn up in 354 (Chronograph of 354 list of the bishops of Rome, Miltiades and Silvester). The council of Arles wrote to Silvester (Council of Arles (314) letter to Silvester), so its 1 August is that of 314. The manuscripts of Optatus put the Roman hearing in Constantine's fourth consulship, 315, which cannot be right if Miltiades presided. Optatus also calls the day a Friday (Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.23–24), and 2 October was a Friday in 313, not in 315.

Primary sources

Against the Donatists Optatus of Milevis · c. AD 364–375
1.13; 1.18–20; 1.22; 1.23–24; Appendix 5; 1.27

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
10.6–7; 10.5.18–20; 10.5.21–24

Letters Augustine of Hippo · AD 386–430
88.2; 43.20; 88.3; 88.6–9

The Council of Arles (314) The bishops assembled at Arles · AD 314 letter to Silvester; canon 14 (13); canon 9 (8); canons 1 and 20

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
93

The Chronograph of 354 AD 354
list of the bishops of Rome, Miltiades and Silvester

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Arles, Carthage, Rome
Who Caecilian, Donatus of Carthage, Constantine Threads Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Persecution under Diocletian AD 303–311 557

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church AD 251–258 544

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

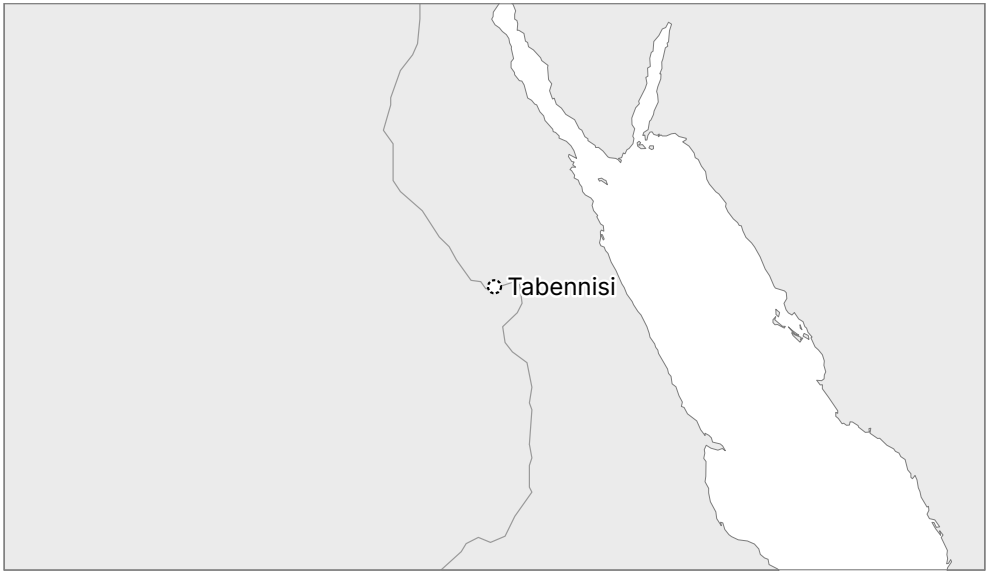
Cyprian on the Unity of the Church Before · AD 251–258 544

The First Council of Nicaea After · May AD 325 584

CHURCH AND STATE

The Edict of Milan Before · AD 313 572

The First Council of Nicaea After · May AD 325 584



← The Edict of Milan Earlier · AD 313
→ Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism Later · c. AD 320

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism

c. AD 320 · Estimated date

At Tabennisi in Upper Egypt, Pachomius gathers monks into a walled community with a common rule, shared meals and work, and a single superior. By his death there are several houses of men and women, and his rule is later translated for the West.

The ancient Life says that Pachomius was born to pagan parents in the Thebaid, in Upper Egypt, and that at twenty he was conscripted and shipped away with other recruits. In a city where they were held under guard, local people brought them food. He was told that they were Christians, and he vowed to serve their God if he were set free (Life of Pachomius 2–4). On his discharge he went to the village of Chenoboskion, was baptised, and attached himself to an old hermit named Palamon (Life of Pachomius 5–6).

Some time later, praying at an abandoned village called Tabennisi, he heard a voice telling him to stay and build a monastery, because many would come to him. The Life adds that an angel gave him a tablet with a rule for those he would teach, and that he built a small cell on the spot (Life of Pachomius 12). Palladius, writing about 420, also tells of an angel who gave him the rule on a tablet of brass (Palladius, Lausiac History 32.1–7). His brother John joined him, and he began to enlarge the buildings for the numbers he expected (Life of Pachomius 14–15). Three men came first, then many more. He set the more able in charge of the others, and since he would not have any of the monks hold clerical office they called in priests from nearby villages for the Eucharist (Life of Pachomius 23–24).

The rule that Palladius reports has the monks living three to a cell inside one enclosure, eating together, wearing a common habit, working according to their strength and meeting for set prayers through the day and night (Palladius, Lausiac History 32.1–7). Jerome, who translated the community's rules into Latin about 404, describes houses of about forty monks, each under a housemaster and each grouped by a trade; thirty or forty such houses made a monastery, and all the monasteries had one head and assembled twice a year (Rule of Pachomius Jerome's preface 2–8). A monastery was built across the river for Pachomius's sister; other women joined her, and they kept the same rule (Life of Pachomius 28) (Palladius, Lausiac History 33.1).

The Life tells how Athanasius came to the monasteries on a tour of the Thebaid, and how Pachomius hid among the monks to avoid being ordained (Life of Pachomius 27). It says that he died of an illness on 9 May, shortly after Easter (Life of Pachomius 53). Palladius gives seven thousand monks living under the rule in his own day, thirteen hundred of them in the chief house (Palladius, Lausiac History 32.7–9).

The Life itself begins from the hermits: Antony in the inner desert and the solitaries of Nitria (Life of Pachomius 1). See Antony Withdraws to the Desert. Pachomius, in Jerome's words, was among those who first laid the foundations of the coenobia, the monasteries of the common life (Rule of Pachomius Jerome's preface 1).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No source gives a year for the foundation. The Life says that Pachomius was twenty when he was conscripted, during Constantine's war against Maxentius (Life of Pachomius 2–4), which ended at the battle of the Milvian Bridge in October 312; that he was baptised on his release and then lived with the hermit Palamon (Life of Pachomius 5–6); and that only afterwards did he settle at Tabennisi (Life of Pachomius 12). The foundation therefore falls some years after 313. The date of about 320 used here is an estimate from that sequence.

The Life dates his death to 14 Pachon, that is 9 May, soon after Easter, and names no year (Life of Pachomius 53). Modern scholarship places it in 346: see Philip Rousseau, Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt (1985).

Primary sources

Life of Pachomius (Latin version of Dionysius Exiguus) Anonymous Greek author; Latin translation by Dionysius Exiguus · Greek original late fourth century; this Latin version early sixth century
2–4; 5–6; 12; 14–15; 23–24; 28; 27; 53; 1

Lausiac History Palladius of Helenopolis · c. AD 419–420
32.1–7; 33.1; 32.7–9

The Rule of Pachomius, in Jerome's Latin translation Pachomius and his successors; translated and prefaced by Jerome · Rules of the fourth century; Latin translation c. AD 404
Jerome's preface 2–8; Jerome's preface 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Tabennisi
Who Pachomius
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Antony Withdraws to the Desert c. AD 270–285 549

LEADS TO

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623

Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Antony Withdraws to the Desert Before · c. AD 270–285 549

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity After · c. AD 370–381 623

← The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles Earlier · AD 314
→ The First Council of Nicaea Later · May AD 325

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The First Council of Nicaea

May AD 325 · Firm date

Constantine gathers some three hundred bishops at Nicaea over the teaching of Arius. They confess the Son to be “of one substance with the Father”, agree a common date for Easter and issue twenty canons. Catholic, Orthodox and Reformation churches still appeal to the council.

According to Socrates, Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, objected to the teaching of his bishop, Alexander of Alexandria. If the Father begot the Son, he argued, the Son had a beginning, and there was a time when he was not (Socrates, Church History 1.5–6). In his own words, “the Son has a beginning, but … God is without beginning” (Theodoret, Church History 1.4). Alexander excommunicated him, and other bishops took sides (Socrates, Church History 1.5–6). Constantine sent Hosius of Cordoba to Alexandria with a letter urging peace (Socrates, Church History 1.7). When that failed he summoned the bishops to Nicaea (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.6–7).

No minutes of the council survive; it is known from its own documents and from what participants wrote afterwards. Eusebius of Caesarea describes bishops from Mesopotamia to Spain; the bishop "of the imperial city", too old to travel, sent presbyters (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.6–7), whom Socrates names as presbyters of Rome (Socrates, Church History 1.13). Counts of the bishops differ: Eusebius says more than 250 (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.8), Eustathius of Antioch about 270 (Theodoret, Church History 1.7), Athanasius "three hundred more or less" and later 318 (Athanasius, Defence of the Nicene Definition 3) (Athanasius, To the Bishops of Africa 2). By Eusebius's account Constantine opened the sessions in the palace and joined in the debate (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.10–14).

Eusebius told his own church that he had offered a creed and that the emperor urged its acceptance with one word added, homoousios, "of one substance" (Socrates, Church History 1.8). Athanasius, who attended as Alexander's deacon (Socrates, Church History 1.8), says the bishops wanted to use only the words of Scripture, found that Arius's supporters could take each phrase in their own sense, and so wrote that the Son is "from the essence" of the Father and "one in essence" with him (Athanasius, Defence of the Nicene Definition 19–20). The creed calls the Son "begotten, not made" and "of one substance" with the Father, and condemns those who say there was a time when he was not (Creed of Nicaea (325)). The council condemned Arius and two Libyan bishops who stood by him (Council of Nicaea (325) synodal letter), and the emperor exiled Arius (Socrates, Church History 1.8).

The bishops also agreed that all churches should keep Easter on the same day and no longer follow the Jewish reckoning (Council of Nicaea (325) synodal letter) (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.18–19). Of their twenty canons, the fourth requires a bishop to be appointed by the bishops of his province, at least three being present and the rest consenting in writing, with confirmation left to the metropolitan (Council of Nicaea (325) canon 4). The sixth lets "the ancient customs" stand by which the bishop of Alexandria has authority over Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis, "since the like is customary for the Bishop of Rome also", and keeps the privileges of Antioch and the other provinces (Council of Nicaea (325) canon 6). The seventh gives the bishop of Jerusalem a place of honour by ancient custom, saving the rights of the metropolis (Council of Nicaea (325) canon 7), and the twentieth has prayer said standing on Sundays and in the days of Pentecost (Council of Nicaea (325) canon 20).

The creed did not end the dispute: Athanasius records a series of rival formulas issued by later councils (Athanasius, On the Councils 21–30). The longer creed recited today is linked with the First Council of Constantinople of 381 (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed). Chalcedon reaffirmed the creed of Nicaea (Definition of Chalcedon). The main traditions appeal to Nicaea in their own documents: the Catholic Church (Catechism of the Catholic Church 465), the Eastern and Oriental Orthodox (Orthodox–Oriental Orthodox Agreed Statement (1990) 8), the Church of the East (Common Christological Declaration (1994)), and the churches of the Reformation in their confessions (Augsburg Confession article 1) (Thirty-Nine Articles article 8).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Socrates says that he found the date in the heading of the council's record: 20 May in the consulship of Paulinus and Julian, which is 325 (Socrates, Church History 1.13). Eusebius says that the emperor completed the twentieth year of his reign about the time the council ended, and feasted the bishops (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.15). The day comes from Socrates, who wrote more than a century later, so the timeline gives only the month.

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
1.5–6; 1.7; 1.13; 1.8

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
1.4; 1.7

Life of Constantine Eusebius of Caesarea · AD 337–339
3.6–7; 3.8; 3.10–14; 3.18–19; 3.15

Defence of the Nicene Definition (De Decretis) Athanasius of Alexandria · Between AD 346 and 356
3; 19–20

Letter to the Bishops of Africa (Ad Afros) Athanasius and the bishops of Egypt and Libya · c. AD 369
2

The Creed of Nicaea The Council of Nicaea · AD 325
ccel.org

The Council of Nicaea (325), canons and synodal letter The Council of Nicaea · AD 325
synodal letter; canon 4; canon 6; canon 7; canon 20

On the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia (De Synodis) Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 359, with additions after 361
21–30

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

The Definition of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · AD 451
ccel.org

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
465

Second Agreed Statement of the Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches · 28 September 1990
8

Common Christological Declaration between the Catholic Church and the Assyrian Church of the East Pope John Paul II and Mar Dinkha IV · 11 November 1994
vatican.va

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
article 1

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nicaea
Who Constantine, Arius, Alexander of Alexandria, Athanasius, Hosius of Cordoba, Eusebius of Caesarea
Threads Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572
The Council of Jerusalem c. AD 49 407

LEADS TO

The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia AD 359–360 610
Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619
The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623
The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628
The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632
The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon 1 February AD 410 656
The Churches Mark 1,700 Years since Nicaea 28 November 2025 1510

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles Before · AD 314 576
The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia After · AD 359–360 610

CHURCH AND STATE

The Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles Before · AD 314 576
The Conversion of Georgia After · c. AD 326–337 589

← Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism Earlier · c. AD 320
→ The Conversion of Georgia Later · c. AD 326–337

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Conversion of Georgia

c. AD 326–337 · Estimated date

Rufinus, about 402, tells how a captive Christian woman brought the king and queen of the Iberians to the faith and how they asked Constantine for clergy. Georgian tradition names her Nino and the king Mirian and sets the story at Mtskheta.

The oldest of the accounts cited here was written in Latin by Rufinus about 402. About the time of the mission of Frumentius (see the conversion of Aksum), he says, the Iberians, a people living towards the Black Sea, received the faith through a captive woman. She prayed day and night, and when they asked why, she said that this was how she worshipped Christ as God. A mother brought her a sick child; she laid it on her hair-cloth, prayed, and gave it back healed (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), col. 480). The queen, who was gravely ill, had herself carried to the woman's cell and was healed in the same way (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), col. 480) (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), cols. 481–482).

The king, Rufinus continues, put off his wife's urging until one day, hunting in the forest, he was caught in a darkness so thick that he lost his companions. He vowed in his mind to worship the Christ of whom the captive had spoken, and no other, if he were freed, and the daylight returned at once. Though not yet initiated himself, he preached to his people. When a church was begun, no machine could raise its third column; the captive prayed there all night, and in the morning the king found it hanging a foot above its base, onto which it settled while all looked on. On her advice an embassy went to the emperor Constantine to ask for priests, and he sent them. Rufinus says that he heard all this at Jerusalem from Bacurius, whom he calls king of that people and who was then commanding the frontier troops of Palestine (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), cols. 481–482). He names neither the woman, the king, the queen nor their city (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), col. 480) (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), cols. 481–482). Socrates repeats the account, citing Rufinus by name, and says that the embassy also asked for an alliance with the Romans (Socrates, Church History 1.20). Sozomen and Theodoret tell it in much the same form, also without the names (Sozomen, Church History 2.7) (Theodoret, Church History 1.23).

The names come from Georgian texts. Their translators, Marjory and J. O. Wardrop, dated the oldest manuscript they used to the ninth or tenth century (Life of Nino translators' preface, p. 3). A short chronicle, The Conversion of Kartli, says that a captive woman called Nino fled with Hripsime and Gayane into the Armenia of King Trdat, where they were martyred (their story is told under the conversion of Armenia), and that Nino escaped northward over the mountains (Conversion of Kartli Wardrop, pp. 61–62). She came to Mtskheta, "a great city, the royal residence", and prayed there for three years in a bramble thicket outside the walls, before a cross of vine stems. In her sixth year she brought the king's wife, Nana, to believe, and in the seventh the king was converted "by a miracle". He built a church in the royal garden and sent to Constantine for priests, and when Bishop Ioane came with two priests and a deacon, King Mirean, the queen and their household were baptised (Conversion of Kartli Wardrop, p. 62).

The longer Life of Nino presents itself as her own story, told at her death to Salome of Ujarma, King Mirian's daughter-in-law (Life of Nino p. 7). It has the episodes that Rufinus tells, with names and places: the healing of Queen Nana, whom Nino touches with her cross (Life of Nino p. 32); the darkness that falls on King Mirian while he hunts on Mount Tkhoti, and his vow to the God of Nino (Life of Nino pp. 36–37); and the great cedar pillar that no one could raise until, towards dawn, a youth clothed in light set it upright (Life of Nino pp. 38–40). In the Life too Constantine sends the bishop Ioane (Life of Nino p. 42), and Nino is buried at the village of Budi in Kakheti, which the translators' heading calls Bodbe (Life of Nino p. 56). It calls her an apostle and the "enlightener of all Georgia" and gives 14 January as her feast (Life of Nino p. 7).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

None of the four Latin and Greek accounts cited here gives a year. Rufinus sets the story about the time of the mission of Frumentius (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), col. 480) and has the Iberians send their embassy to the emperor Constantine (Rufinus, Church History 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), cols. 481–482), and Socrates places the conversion "during the days of Constantine" (Socrates, Church History 1.20). Constantine died on 22 May in the consulship of Felician and Tatian, which is 337 (Socrates, Church History 1.40). That is the later limit.

The Conversion of Kartli counts by the years of Nino's stay and puts her death in the fifteenth of them, 338 years "from the ascension of Christ" (Conversion of Kartli Wardrop, p. 64). Such figures have been converted in different ways. Marjory and J. O. Wardrop, in the preface to their translation (Life of St. Nino, 1900), list the years 317, 327, 328 and 338 as given by others and themselves put the baptism of Mirian in 332 (Life of Nino translators' preface, p. 5). M. Gigolashvili, R. Kiladze, G. Ramishvili and V. Kukhianidze, "New evidence for determining of the date of adoption of Christianity as a state religion in Georgia" (2011, arXiv:1102.3381), report that the conversion is at present put in about 326; these astronomers themselves argue that the darkness of the king's hunt was the total solar eclipse of 6 May 319. The timeline shows the span from that conventional year to the death of Constantine.

Primary sources

Church History Rufinus of Aquileia · c. AD 401–403
10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), col. 480; 10.11 (book 1, chapter 10 in Migne), cols. 481–482

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
1.20; 1.40

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
2.7

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
1.23

The Life of St. Nino Georgian; oldest manuscript used by the translators of the ninth or tenth century translators' preface, p. 3; p. 7; p. 32; pp. 36–37; pp. 38–40; p. 42; p. 56; translators' preface, p. 5

The Conversion of Kartli (Moktsevay Kartlisay) Georgian; in a manuscript of the ninth or tenth century, from older material
Wardrop, pp. 61–62; Wardrop, p. 62; Wardrop, p. 64

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mtskheta
Who Nino, Mirian III
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Armenia Adopts Christianity AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Armenia Adopts Christianity Before · AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian After · c. AD 330–356 598

CHURCH AND STATE

The First Council of Nicaea Before · May AD 325 584

Constantine Dedicates Constantinople After · 11 May AD 330

← The First Council of Nicaea Earlier · May AD 325
→ Constantine Dedicates Constantinople Later · 11 May AD 330

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Constantine Dedicates Constantinople

11 May AD 330 · Firm date

Constantine rebuilds Byzantium on the Bosphorus as a new imperial city, names it after himself and dedicates it on 11 May 330. He means it to equal Rome and calls it New Rome, and in 381 its bishop is ranked next after the bishop of Rome.

Constantine besieged his rival Licinius in Byzantium, the old Greek city on the European shore of the Bosphorus, and defeated him across the strait at Chrysopolis (Origo Constantini 5.25–28). An anonymous Latin account of his reign says that he renamed Byzantium after himself in memory of that victory, adorned it as if it were his native city, wished to make it equal to Rome, brought in new citizens from every quarter and gave it a senate (Origo Constantini 6.30).

Socrates, writing in the city a century later, says that Constantine enlarged it, surrounded it with great walls and decreed by a law, inscribed on a pillar in a public square, that it should be called New Rome (Socrates, Church History

1.16). The Chronicon Paschale dates the ceremony. On 11 May 330 the emperor named the city Constantinople, held chariot races at which he wore a diadem of pearls and precious stones, and ordered the day to be kept each year as the city's birthday. On that day a gilded statue of Constantine holding the Fortune of the city was to be drawn into the hippodrome with an escort of soldiers carrying candles, and the reigning emperor was to rise and do it reverence (Chronicon Paschale year 330 (Dindorf pp. 529–530)).

The writers describe the religion of the new city in different ways. Eusebius says that Constantine filled it with churches and shrines of the martyrs and allowed no images to be worshipped in temples, no altars and no sacrifices. He mentions fountains with figures of the Good Shepherd and of Daniel, and a jewelled cross set in the ceiling of the palace (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.48–49). Socrates names two churches the emperor built, Irene and the Apostles, and adds that he brought the statues of the gods out of their temples to decorate the streets and set up the tripods of Delphi in the hippodrome (Socrates, Church History 1.16). Jerome notes that the city was dedicated "by denuding nearly every other city" (Jerome, Chronicle year 330).

Constantine was buried in Constantinople (Origo Constantini 6.35). The city's standing in the state became standing in the church: the council that met there in 381 ruled that its bishop should have "the prerogative of honour after the Bishop of Rome; because Constantinople is New Rome" (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 3). See the First Council of Constantinople.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The day comes from the Chronicon Paschale, a Greek chronicle compiled in the seventh century, three hundred years after the event. Under the consuls Gallicanus and Symmachus, which is 330, it says that Constantine named the city on the fifth day before the Ides of May, a Monday, and ordered its birthday to be kept every year on that day, the eleventh of the month (Chronicon Paschale year 330 (Dindorf pp. 529–530)). 11 May 330 was in fact a Monday, which supports the entry. Jerome's Chronicle, written about fifty years after the event, puts the dedication in the same year (Jerome, Chronicle year 330).

Primary sources

The Origin of the Emperor Constantine Anonymous (the Anonymus Valesianus, first part) · Fourth century, perhaps c. AD 390
5.25–28; 6.30; 6.35

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
1.16

Chronicon Paschale (The Easter Chronicle) c. AD 630 year 330 (Dindorf pp. 529–530)

Life of Constantine Eusebius of Caesarea · AD 337–339
3.48–49

Chronicle Jerome, translating and continuing Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 380
year 330

Canons and Letters of the Council of Constantinople (381) The Council of Constantinople · AD 381–382
canon 3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Constantine
Threads Church and State, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572

LEADS TO

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia 27 December AD 537 708

The Fall of Constantinople 29 May 1453 979

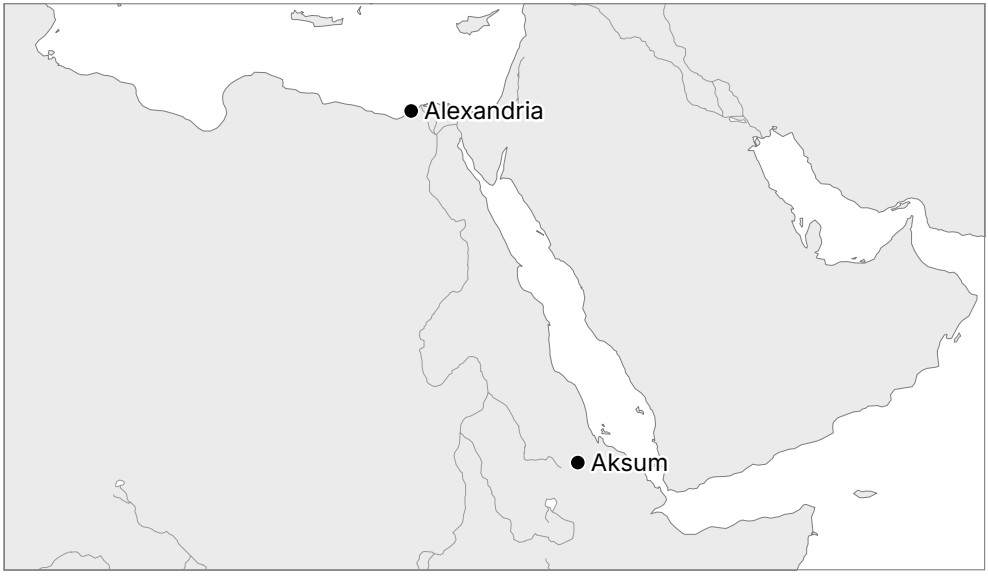
CHURCH AND STATE

The Conversion of Georgia Before · c. AD 326–337 589

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian After · c. AD 330–356 598

EAST AND WEST

The First Council of Constantinople After · May AD 381 632



← The Conversion of Georgia Earlier · c. AD 326–337
→ King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian Later · c. AD 330–356

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian

c. AD 330–356 · Estimated date

Ezana, king of Aksum in the Ethiopian highlands, sets up an inscription that opens in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. A letter of the emperor Constantius II names Frumentius, ordained by Athanasius of Alexandria, as bishop of Aksum.

The evidence from Aksum itself is the king's own. In a long inscription cut in Greek and, in two different scripts, in Ge'ez, Ezana calls himself king of the Aksumites, the Himyarites and other peoples, "king of kings" and son of the unconquered god Ares, and ends by dedicating statues to Ares in thanks for a victory (Inscription of Ezana, RIÉ 270 Greek text, lines 1–9 and 28–31). A second Greek inscription of the same king records a campaign against the Noba (Inscription of Ezana, RIÉ 271 Greek text, lines 22–26). It begins differently: with the faith of God and the power of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, and with Jesus Christ as the king's helper (Inscription of Ezana, RIÉ 271 opening lines, in the translation quoted by A. M. Butts (2025), p. 9). The online record of the stone does not transcribe these opening lines; they are given here from the translation quoted by Aaron Butts. The same king thus appears both as son of Ares and as a Christian.

The story of how the faith reached his court comes from outside. Rufinus, writing in Italy about 402, says he had it from Aedesius, one of the two men concerned, who was by then a priest at Tyre. A philosopher of Tyre sailed to "India" with two boys he was educating, Aedesius and Frumentius. On the way home the ship put in at a port and the crew were killed. The boys were spared and taken to the king, who made Aedesius his cupbearer and put Frumentius in charge of his accounts and records. When the king died, the queen asked them to help govern until her son grew up. Frumentius sought out Christians among the Roman merchants and encouraged them to build places of prayer (Rufinus, Church History 10.9 (book 1, chapter 9 in Migne)).

When the prince came of age the two left. Frumentius went to Alexandria and urged the bishop to send a bishop to the Christians there. Athanasius ordained Frumentius himself and sent him back, and, Rufinus says, a great number were converted (Rufinus, Church History 10.9–10 (book 1, chapter 9 in Migne)). Rufinus names neither the kingdom nor its king. Socrates repeats his account a generation later (Socrates, Church History 1.19).

Athanasius supplies the names. Writing in 356–357, while in hiding, he reports that the emperor Constantius II had written to the rulers of Aksum demanding that Frumentius, "Bishop of Auxumis", be sent to Egypt (Athanasius, Defence before Constantius 29). He quotes the letter. It is addressed to Aezanes and Sazanes, says that Frumentius was ordained by Athanasius, and requires him to be sent to Egypt and examined by Bishop George (Athanasius, Defence before Constantius 31). The inscription to Ares names among the king's brothers a Saiazana, a name close to the Sazanes of the letter (Inscription of Ezana, RIÉ 270 Greek text, lines 1–9 and 28–31).

The church of Aksum thus began with a bishop ordained at Alexandria, and within a generation of Constantine a Roman emperor was writing to its rulers about the doctrine to be taught in their churches (Athanasius, Defence before Constantius 31).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The sources cited here give no date for Ezana's conversion. Two fixed points frame it. Rufinus says that when Frumentius came to Alexandria to ask for a bishop, Athanasius had "recently" entered on his office (Rufinus, Church History 10.9–10 (book 1, chapter 9 in Migne)); Athanasius became bishop in 328 (Athanasius, Festal Letter Festal Index 1). The letter of the emperor Constantius to Aezanes and Sazanes, which treats Frumentius as bishop of Aksum already, is quoted in a work Athanasius finished in 356–357 (Athanasius, Defence before Constantius 31). The conversion therefore falls between about 330 and 356.

The two witnesses are hard to reconcile, since the letter reads as if the ordination were recent. Some scholars think Rufinus placed it too early; others take his "recently" to mean one of Athanasius's returns from exile, in 338 or 346. Ezana's inscriptions and coins show both pre-Christian and Christian forms: some coin issues carry the disc and crescent, others the cross. See Aaron Michael Butts, "Ezana of Aksum: The First Christian African King", Aethiopica 28 (2025), pp. 7–38, who sets out the evidence and the earlier literature and argues for a more cautious reading of Rufinus than has been usual.

Primary sources

Inscription of Ezana in Greek, Sabaean script and Ge'ez (RIÉ 185 and 270)
Set up in the name of Ezana, king of Aksum · Mid-fourth century AD
Greek text, lines 1–9 and 28–31

Greek inscription of Ezana with a Trinitarian opening (RIÉ 271) Set up in the name of Ezana, king of Aksum · Mid-fourth century AD
Greek text, lines 22–26; opening lines, in the translation quoted by A. M. Butts (2025), p. 9

Church History Rufinus of Aquileia · c. AD 401–403
10.9 (book 1, chapter 9 in Migne); 10.9–10 (book 1, chapter 9 in Migne)

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
1.19

Defence before Constantius (Apologia ad Constantium) Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 356–357
29; 31

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
Festal Index 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Aksum, Alexandria
Who Ezana, Frumentius, Athanasius
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

The Martyrs of Najran AD 523 (or 518) 699
The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms c. AD 543–580 717
The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela c. 1200 878
Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church 1622–1632 1167

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Conversion of Georgia Before · c. AD 326–337 589
Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths After · c. AD 341 606

CHURCH AND STATE

Constantine Dedicates Constantinople Before · 11 May AD 330 594
The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia After · AD 359–360 610

← Constantine Dedicates Constantinople Earlier · 11 May AD 330
→ The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated Later · AD 335

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated

AD 335 · Firm date

Constantine has a temple cleared from the site in Jerusalem where a rock tomb is uncovered, and builds a great basilica beside it. Bishops from across the East dedicate it in 335. Later writers add that his mother Helena found the cross there.

Eusebius, the bishop of nearby Caesarea, tells the story as a contemporary. The place of the resurrection in Jerusalem, he says, had long before been buried under a mound of earth, paved over and crowned with a shrine of Venus. Constantine ordered the shrine pulled down and the soil carted away, and when the old ground level was reached a cave tomb appeared, "contrary to all expectation" (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.25–28). The emperor wrote to the bishop, Macarius of Jerusalem, that a church finer than any other should be built there. The governors were to supply workmen, and Macarius was to report what columns and marble were needed and whether he wanted a panelled ceiling, which could be gilded (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.29–32).

A pilgrim from Bordeaux who came in 333 saw the little hill of Golgotha, the tomb a stone's throw from it, and a basilica "of wondrous beauty" built there by Constantine's order (Bordeaux Itinerary Jerusalem, Golgotha and the basilica (pp. 23–24 of the translation)). Eusebius describes the finished complex: the tomb itself adorned with columns, an open court with colonnades, and to the east a tall basilica with a gilded ceiling, colonnades on either side and a hemisphere ringed by twelve columns (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.33–40).

In 335 the emperor summoned the bishops who were meeting at Tyre to go on to Jerusalem for the dedication. Eusebius, who preached there, names bishops from Macedonia to Persia and sets the feast in the thirtieth year of Constantine's reign (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 4.41–47). Socrates adds that the same gathering received Arius back into communion (Socrates, Church History 1.33).

Eusebius also reports that the emperor's mother, Helena, visited Palestine in old age and founded churches at Bethlehem and on the Mount of Olives (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 3.41–43). In these chapters he does not connect her with the tomb or mention a cross. About 350 Cyril, preaching in the new basilica, could say that pieces of the wood of the cross had filled the whole world (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical Lectures 4.10), and in the 380s the pilgrim Egeria was told that the church had been dedicated on the day the cross was found (Egeria, Itinerary 48–49). Neither passage names Helena. The story that she found it is told at the end of the century. Ambrose, in 395, has her dig at Golgotha, uncover three crosses and know Christ's by its title (Ambrose, On the Death of Theodosius 43–47). Rufinus, a few years later, says that Bishop Macarius identified it when its touch healed a dying woman (Rufinus, Church History 10.7–8 (book 1, chapters 7–8 in Migne)).

The buildings fixed the place where Christians have since kept the memory of the death and resurrection of Jesus. In Egeria's time the anniversary of the dedication was an eight-day feast that drew monks and lay people from Mesopotamia, Syria and Egypt (Egeria, Itinerary 48–49).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Eusebius, who was present, says that the church was dedicated in the thirtieth year of Constantine's reign and that the bishops came to Jerusalem straight from a council at Tyre (Eusebius, Life of Constantine 4.41–47). Constantine was proclaimed emperor on his father's death on 25 July 306 (Socrates, Church History 1.2), so his thirtieth year began in July 335, and the ancient index to the letters of Athanasius has him set out for the council of Tyre on 11 July and reach Constantinople on 30 October, in the months before the Easter of 336 (Athanasius, Festal Letter Festal Index 8). The dedication therefore fell in the late summer or autumn of 335. The translators of Egeria note that an old Armenian lectionary places the feast of the dedication on 23 September (Egeria, Itinerary 48–49); Eusebius does not give the day.

Primary sources

Life of Constantine Eusebius of Caesarea · AD 337–339
3.25–28; 3.29–32; 3.33–40; 4.41–47; 3.41–43

Itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem An anonymous pilgrim from Bordeaux · AD 333
Jerusalem, Golgotha and the basilica (pp. 23–24 of the translation)

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
1.33; 1.2

Catechetical Lectures Cyril of Jerusalem · c. AD 350
4.10

Itinerary (The Pilgrimage of Egeria) Egeria · c. AD 381–384
48–49

On the Death of Theodosius (De obitu Theodosii) Ambrose of Milan · AD 395
43–47

Church History Rufinus of Aquileia · c. AD 401–403
10.7–8 (book 1, chapters 7–8 in Migne)

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
Festal Index 8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Constantine, Macarius of Jerusalem, Helena

Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Bar Kokhba Revolt and Aelia Capitolina AD 132–135 492

The Burial and Resurrection AD 30 or 33 364

LEADS TO

Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar AD 637/638 743

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Justin Martyr Defends the Faith and Describes Its Worship Before · c. AD 155–165 500

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia After · 27 December AD 537 708

← King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian Earlier · c. AD 330–356
→ Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths Later · c. AD 341

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths

c. AD 341 · Estimated date

Ulfilas, bishop of the Christian Goths for forty years, is credited by ancient historians with an alphabet for Gothic and a translation of the Scriptures. He held the Homoian creed, which Nicene writers called Arian. A sixth-century copy of the Gothic Gospels survives at Uppsala.

Philostorgius, a fifth-century church historian who admired Ulfilas and whose work survives in a later summary, says that his forebears were Cappadocians carried off in a Gothic raid in the time of the emperors Valerian and Gallienus, and that such captives had first brought Christianity to their captors (Philostorgius, Church History 2.5). His pupil Auxentius says that he was a lector before he was made bishop for the Goths at the age of thirty (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his ordination and flight). Philostorgius adds that he had come to the imperial court on an embassy and was ordained by Eusebius and the bishops with him (Philostorgius, Church History 2.5).

Auxentius relates that after seven years a Gothic ruler began to persecute the Christians, and that Ulfilas led a large body of them across the Danube; the emperor Constantius II received them (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his ordination and flight), and Philostorgius says that they were settled in Moesia (Philostorgius, Church History 2.5). Two centuries later Jordanes knew their descendants, the "Lesser Goths", as a poor and peaceful people living around Nicopolis ad Istrum at the foot of Mount Haemus (Jordanes, Getica 51.267).

Philostorgius says that Ulfilas gave the Gothic language a written form and translated all the Scriptures except the books of Kings, which he left out because the Goths were warlike enough already (Philostorgius, Church History 2.5). Socrates likewise credits him with inventing the Gothic letters and translating the Scriptures (Socrates, Church History 4.33). Auxentius does not mention the translation, but says that he preached and wrote in Greek, Latin and Gothic (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his teaching and his creed). The longest surviving Gothic text is the Codex Argenteus at Uppsala, a copy of the four Gospels in Gothic written in silver and gold ink on purple parchment in Italy in the early sixth century (Codex Argenteus).

Socrates notes that Ulfilas assented to the creed of Constantinople of 360, which says that the Son is like the Father as the Scriptures teach and forbids speaking of substance at all (Socrates, Church History 2.41). Historians call this position Homoian, from the Greek word for "like". Auxentius records that he opposed both the Nicene "of one substance" and the compromise "of like substance", and taught that the Son is God but second to the Father and obedient to him, and the Holy Spirit subject to the Son; he quotes the creed Ulfilas left at his death (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his teaching and his creed). Nicene writers such as Socrates and Theodoret call this teaching Arian (Socrates, Church History 4.33) (Theodoret, Church History 4.33).

He died at Constantinople, aged seventy, after forty years as bishop (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his death at Constantinople). Theodoret, in the next century, says that the Goths still held that the Father is greater than the Son (Theodoret, Church History 4.33). For the later history of this teaching among the Visigoths see the Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The translation cannot be dated; the sources say only that Ulfilas made it as bishop. His episcopate is fixed by his pupil Auxentius: he was ordained at thirty, served seven years beyond the Danube and thirty-three on Roman soil, and died at Constantinople, where he had gone at the emperor's summons (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his ordination and flight) (Auxentius, Letter on Ulfilas sections on his death at Constantinople). The document that quotes Auxentius places that journey under Theodosius I, which puts his death in the early 380s and his ordination forty years earlier. Philostorgius says he was ordained by "Eusebius and the other prelates that were with him" while on an embassy to the emperor, whom the surviving summary names as Constantine (Philostorgius, Church History 2.5).

Scholars give either 341 or 336 for the ordination. T. D. Barnes, "The Consecration of Ulfila", Journal of Theological Studies 41 (1990), pp. 541–545, reports that most connect it with the council of Antioch in 341 and treat the name Constantine as a slip, and himself argues for the earlier date. The sources are translated and discussed in Peter Heather and John Matthews, The Goths in the Fourth Century (1991), chapter 5. The timeline places the event at the start of his episcopate, at the later of the two dates.

Primary sources

Church History (epitome by Photius) Philostorgius · First half of the fifth century; summarised in the ninth
2.5

Letter on the Faith, Life and Death of Ulfilas Auxentius of Durostorum · c. AD 383–400 sections on his ordination and flight; sections on his teaching and his creed; sections on his death at Constantinople

The Origin and Deeds of the Goths (Getica) Jordanes · c. AD 551
51.267

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
4.33; 2.41

Codex Argenteus (the Silver Bible) Early sixth century AD
uu.se

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
4.33

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nicopolis ad Istrum
Who Ulfilas
Threads Scripture and Canon, Mission and Expansion

In context

LEADS TO

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo 8 May AD 589 728

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Origen and the School of Alexandria Before · c. AD 203–254 536

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament After · AD 367 619

MISSION AND EXPANSION

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian Before · c. AD 330–356 598

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon After · 1 February AD 410 656

← The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated Earlier · AD 335
→ The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia Later · AD 359–360

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia

AD 359–360 · Firm date

The emperor Constantius II summons the western bishops to Rimini and the eastern to Seleucia. Under imperial pressure the delegates of both accept a creed that calls the Son like the Father and forbids the Nicene language of substance.

A generation after the council of Nicaea, its creed and its word homoousios, "of one substance", were still in dispute. Socrates lists nine creeds put out after that of Nicaea, down to the one adopted at the end of these councils (Socrates, Church History 2.41). The emperor Constantius II decided to call a general council to bring the bishops to agreement and, because of the distances, divided it in two. The western bishops were to meet at Ariminum in Italy and the eastern at Nicomedia (Socrates, Church History 2.37); after an earthquake there and two more changes of plan the easterners met at Seleucia in Isauria (Socrates, Church History 2.39). Athanasius, who wrote while the council was still the talk of the day, held that its real purpose was to set Nicaea aside (Athanasius, On the Councils 1).

More than four hundred bishops came to Ariminum (Athanasius, On the Councils 8) (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.41). Valens, Ursacius and four others produced a creed drawn up at Sirmium in the emperor's presence and headed with the date. It called the Son "like the Father in all things" and asked that the word "essence" (ousia), as one the Scriptures do not use of Father and Son, should never again be used of God (Athanasius, On the Councils 8). The council refused it, declared that Nicaea was enough, deposed the six, and wrote to Constantius asking that nothing be changed (Athanasius, On the Councils 9–11). The emperor replied that he had not yet been able to receive its envoys and that the bishops must await their return (Athanasius, On the Councils 55).

What followed is told by Sulpicius Severus, a Gaul writing about forty years later. The envoys, he says, were made to accept communion with their opponents and a creed without the word ousia; the prefect Taurus had orders to keep the bishops until all had signed; and in the seventh month, worn down by winter and want, the last twenty yielded, once Valens and Ursacius had agreed that they might add statements of their own condemning Arius (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.43–44). Jerome, who cites the council's acts, says that Valens there anathematised anyone who called the Son "a creature, like other creatures", and afterwards claimed to have denied only the likeness (Jerome, Against the Luciferians 18–19).

At Seleucia about 160 bishops met in September 359 (Athanasius, On the Councils 12) (Socrates, Church History 2.39). The majority accepted Nicaea except for the word homoousios, which they found obscure; a smaller party led by Acacius rejected the Nicene formula (Athanasius, On the Councils 12). Acacius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, offered a creed that set aside both homoousion and homoiousion, condemned "unlike", and confessed the Son as like the Father (Socrates, Church History 2.40). The majority deposed him and his allies and reported to the emperor (Athanasius, On the Councils 12). Hilary of Poitiers, exiled from Gaul to Phrygia, had been brought to the council with the rest, and Sulpicius says that he was received into communion there (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.42).

At Constantinople, Sulpicius continues, the delegates of Seleucia were forced to follow the westerners, and those who refused were deposed and exiled (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.45). A synod there confirmed the creed read at Ariminum, with changes. It says that the Son is "like the Father, as the divine Scriptures say and teach", without the words "in all things"; it abolishes the word ousia and adds that "subsistence" (hypostasis) too is not to be named of Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Athanasius, On the Councils 30) (Socrates, Church History 2.41). Jerome wrote some twenty years later that "the whole world groaned, and was astonished to find itself Arian"; the bishops who had signed, he says, protested afterwards that they had been deceived (Jerome, Against the Luciferians 19). Constantius died late in 361 (Socrates, Church History 2.47). Athanasius, in his work on the two councils, wrote that those who accepted everything of Nicaea and doubted only its one word were not enemies but brothers, who meant the same and disputed only about the word (Athanasius, On the Councils 41). The council of 381 (The First Council of Constantinople) decreed that the faith of Nicaea should stand (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 1).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The creed laid before the bishops at Ariminum carries its own date: the consulship of Eusebius and Hypatius, the eleventh day before the Kalends of June (Athanasius, On the Councils 8). That consulship is 359 and the day is 22 May; the copy of the creed in Socrates, in the translation linked here, reads 23 May (Socrates, Church History 2.37). Athanasius says that the bishops at Seleucia assembled in September, on the sixteenth of the Egyptian month Thoth, which his editor converts to 14 September (Athanasius, On the Councils 12); Socrates puts their first session on 27 September in the same consulship (Socrates, Church History 2.39). Sulpicius says that the bishops at Ariminum were in their seventh month in the city, in winter, when the last of them gave way (Sulpicius Severus, Chronicle 2.43–44). The synod at Constantinople is not dated in the sources cited here; Socrates places the consecration of the Great Church, under the bishop whom that synod's leaders installed, on 15 February in the tenth consulship of Constantius and the third of Julian, which is 360 (Socrates, Church History 2.43).

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
2.41; 2.37; 2.39; 2.40; 2.47; 2.43

On the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia (De Synodis) Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 359, with additions after 361
1; 8; 9–11; 55; 12; 30; 41

Chronicle (Sacred History) Sulpicius Severus · c. AD 400–404
2.41; 2.43–44; 2.42; 2.45

Dialogue against the Luciferians Jerome · c. AD 379
18–19; 19

Canons and Letters of the Council of Constantinople (381) The Council of Constantinople · AD 381–382
canon 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rimini, Seleucia in Isauria, Constantinople
Who Constantius II, Hilary of Poitiers, Athanasius
Threads Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584

LEADS TO

The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The First Council of Nicaea Before · May AD 325 584
The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity After · c. AD 370–381 623

CHURCH AND STATE

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian Before · c. AD 330–356 598
Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion After · AD 361–363 615

← Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths Earlier · c. AD 341
→ Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion Later · AD 361–363

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion

AD 361–363 · Firm date

Julian, a nephew of Constantine, renounces the Christianity in which he was raised, reopens the temples and bars Christians from teaching the classics. He dies on campaign in Persia after less than two years as sole ruler.

Julian was a nephew of Constantine (Socrates, Church History 3.1). After Constantine's death, Socrates says, the soldiers killed the emperor's brother Dalmatius, and the lives of Julian and his brother Gallus were in danger; Julian, then eight years old, was spared. He was brought up as a Christian and served as a reader in the church of Nicomedia (Socrates, Church History 3.1). Ammianus Marcellinus, a pagan officer who served under him and admired him, says that he had been drawn to the old gods from boyhood and practised their rites in secret (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.5.1–4). Even after the army in Gaul had proclaimed him emperor, he attended church at Epiphany to conceal it (Ammianus Marcellinus 21.2.4–5).

On the death of his cousin Constantius II he became sole emperor (Socrates, Church History 3.1) and entered Constantinople in December 361 (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.2.4). He then ordered, in Ammianus's words, "the temples to be opened, victims brought to the altars, and the worship of the gods restored". He called the quarrelling Christian bishops to the palace and told each to follow his own belief without fear. Ammianus thought he expected freedom to deepen their divisions (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.5.1–4). Julian himself wrote that he had recalled those exiled under his predecessor and restored their property, and that he allowed no one to be dragged to the altars against his will (Julian, Letter 41). Among those who came home was Athanasius (Athanasius, Festal Letter Festal Index 34).

In June 362 a law required teachers to be approved by their city councils and by the emperor (Theodosian Code 13.3.5). A rescript explained the purpose: those who expound Homer and Hesiod must honour the gods those poets honoured, and anyone who thinks them mistaken should "betake themselves to the churches of the Galilaeans to expound Matthew and Luke" (Julian, Letter 36). Ammianus called the ban on Christian teachers "inhumane" (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.10.7). Julian also urged the pagan priests to match the Christians in works of charity. He told the high priest of Galatia to found hostels for strangers, since "the impious Galilaeans support not only their own poor but ours as well" (Julian, Letter 22).

In 362 he moved to Antioch to prepare a war against Persia (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.9.2; 22.12.1). When the temple of Apollo at Daphne burned, he suspected the Christians and closed the city's great church (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.13.1–2). He gave orders to rebuild the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem; the work was abandoned when, Ammianus reports, balls of fire burst out near the foundations (Ammianus Marcellinus 23.1.2–3). Socrates, a Christian historian, tells it as a series of miracles (Socrates, Church History 3.20).

In June 363, on the march in Persia, Julian was struck by a spear in a skirmish and died that night, talking with philosophers about the soul, by Ammianus's account (Ammianus Marcellinus 25.3.6–23). Theodoret, some ninety years later, repeats a story that he cried "Thou hast won, O Galilean" (Theodoret, Church History 3.20). A later Latin writer noted that every emperor from Constantine to his own day had been a Christian except Julian (Origo Constantini 6.33).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Socrates dates the death of Constantius II to 3 November in the consulship of Taurus and Florentius, 361 (Socrates, Church History 3.1), and Ammianus puts Julian's entry into Constantinople on 11 December (Ammianus Marcellinus 22.2.4). The law on teachers is dated 17 June in the consulship of Mamertinus and Nevitta, 362 (Theodosian Code 13.3.5). Ammianus says that Julian was wounded and died at midnight (Ammianus Marcellinus 25.3.6–23) and that the next dawn was that of 27 June (Ammianus Marcellinus 25.5.1); Socrates gives 26 June, in his fourth consulship, 363 (Socrates, Church History 3.21).

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
3.1; 3.20; 3.21

Res Gestae (History) Ammianus Marcellinus · c. AD 380–395
22.5.1–4; 21.2.4–5; 22.2.4; 22.10.7; 22.9.2; 22.12.1; 22.13.1–2; 23.1.2–3; 25.3.6–23; 25.5.1

Letters The emperor Julian · c. AD 355–363
41; 36; 22

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
Festal Index 34

The Theodosian Code Compiled by order of Theodosius II · Compiled AD 429–438
13.3.5

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
3.20

The Origin of the Emperor Constantine Anonymous (the Anonymus Valesianus, first part) · Fourth century, perhaps c. AD 390
6.33

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Antioch
Who Julian
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Milan AD 313 572

LEADS TO

The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628

CHURCH AND STATE

The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia Before · AD 359–360 610

The Edict of Thessalonica After · 27 February AD 380 628

← The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia Earlier · AD 359–360
→ Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament Later · AD 367

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament

AD 367 · Firm date

In his Easter letter for 367 the bishop of Alexandria sets out which books are Scripture. His New Testament names twenty-seven books, the same that the Council of Trent later listed. He adds a second group of books that are read but are not in the canon.

Each year the bishop of Alexandria wrote to the churches of Egypt to announce the date of Easter (Athanasius, Festal Letter Festal Index 39). In the letter for 367, his thirty-ninth, Athanasius took up the question of which books are Scripture. Some people, he says, were mixing books "termed apocryphal" with the inspired writings and misleading the simple by the likeness of their titles. He would therefore set down the books "included in the Canon, and handed down, and accredited as Divine" (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.2–3).

He counts twenty-two books of the Old Testament, the number, he has heard, of the Hebrew letters. Baruch and the Letter of Jeremiah are counted with Jeremiah, and Esther is not on the list (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.4). The New Testament is the four Gospels, Acts, seven letters called catholic (James, two of Peter, three of John, Jude), fourteen letters of Paul, among them Hebrews, and the Revelation of John (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.5). That makes twenty-seven. "These are fountains of salvation", he writes. "Let no man add to these, neither let him take ought from these" (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.6).

Athanasius then names a second group, not in the canon but "appointed by the Fathers to be read" by new converts: the Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Esther, Judith, Tobit, the Teaching of the Apostles and the Shepherd. Apocryphal writings he rejects altogether as the invention of heretics (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.7).

A generation earlier Eusebius had listed James, Jude, 2 Peter and 2 and 3 John as disputed and was unsure where to place Revelation (Eusebius, Church History 3.25.1–4). Athanasius wrote as one bishop to his own province, not as a council. For the lists drawn up by councils in Africa soon afterwards see African Councils List the Books of Scripture.

The same twenty-seven books are the New Testament listed by the Council of Trent (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and the Church of England's Articles receive the books of the New Testament "as they are commonly received" (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6). On the Old Testament the documents cited here do not all agree, and none of them follows his list exactly. The Council of Trent counts Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach and the books of Maccabees as canonical (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures), and the Orthodox Confession of Dositheus does the same for the books it names (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). The Church of England's Articles put those books in a second class, read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not used to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6), which is close to the distinction Athanasius drew.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The letter was written for the Easter of the year in which Lupicinus and Jovinus were consuls, 367. The ancient index to the Festal Letters records under that year that Athanasius wrote "forming a Canon of the Holy Scriptures" (Athanasius, Festal Letter Festal Index 39).

Primary sources

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
Festal Index 39; 39.2–3; 39.4; 39.5; 39.6; 39.7

Church History Eusebius of Caesarea · c. AD 311–325, in successive editions
3.25.1–4

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Alexandria
Who Athanasius
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Muratorian List of New Testament Books c. AD 170–200 520
The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584

LEADS TO

African Councils List the Books of Scripture AD 393–397 648
Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus 1844–1859 1293
The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found c. December 1945 1390

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths Before · c. AD 341 606

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate After · c. 382–405 636

← Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion Earlier · AD 361–363
→ The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity Later · c. AD 370–381

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity

c. AD 370–381 · Estimated date

Basil of Caesarea, his friend Gregory of Nazianzus and his brother Gregory of Nyssa speak of one divine essence in three persons and defend the deity of the Holy Spirit. The creed of 381 uses kindred language. Basil and his sister Macrina foster monastic life.

Basil of Caesarea and his brother Gregory of Nyssa came from a large family with property in three provinces (Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Macrina pp. 26–29 (PG 46.966–968)). Gregory writes that when Basil came home from his studies, proud of his rhetoric, their elder sister Macrina won him to the ascetic life, and that she then made the family household a community in which mistress and servants lived alike (Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Macrina pp. 26–29 (PG 46.966–968)). Basil had studied at Athens with his friend Gregory of Nazianzus (Socrates, Church History 4.26). He travelled to see the monks of Egypt, Palestine, Syria and Mesopotamia (Basil, Letter 223.2), founded monasteries in his own country (Socrates, Church History 4.26), and as bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia built a hospice for travellers and the sick, with physicians and attendants (Basil, Letter 94). Gregory of Nazianzus called it "the new city" (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 43.63).

The emperor Valens held a creed opposed to that of Nicaea and had Basil brought before his prefect (Socrates, Church History 4.26). Gregory of Nazianzus describes Basil before the prefect, answering threats of confiscation, exile and death by saying that none of them could touch a man who owned nothing (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 43.48–49).

They sought words for what Nicaea had confessed. Basil distinguished ousia, essence, from hypostasis as the general from the particular: one essence in God, and three hypostases, Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Basil, Letter 236.6). When he was attacked for praising the Father "with the Son together with the Holy Ghost" (Basil, On the Holy Spirit 1.3), he wrote On the Holy Spirit to show that the Spirit shares the glory of Father and Son and that this does not make a second God (Basil, On the Holy Spirit 18.45–47). Gregory of Nazianzus says that Basil, under the pressure of the times, avoided calling the Spirit God in so many words and left that to him (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 43.68–69). Gregory did so: "Is the Spirit God? Most certainly" (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 31.10). He explained that the Old Testament proclaimed the Father openly and the Son more obscurely, that the New revealed the Son and hinted at the deity of the Spirit, and that the Spirit now gives a clearer proof of himself (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 31.26). Gregory of Nyssa answered the charge of teaching three gods: every act of God comes from the Father through the Son in the Spirit, and the three are distinguished only as cause and caused (Gregory of Nyssa, On Not Three Gods).

Basil died before the outcome (Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Macrina pp. 39–41 (PG 46.973–976)). In 381 a council met at Constantinople, where Gregory of Nazianzus was briefly bishop before resigning (Socrates, Church History 5.6–8), and a law of Theodosius named Gregory of Nyssa among the bishops whose communion marked the true faith (Theodosian Code 16.1.3). The creed linked with that council confesses the Spirit as one "who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed), and the bishops' letter of the next year speaks of one Godhead, power and substance of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit in "three perfect persons" (Theodoret, Church History 5.9). See the First Council of Constantinople.

Basil's rules for monastic communities were also read in the West: the Rule of Benedict commends "the rule of our holy Father, Basil" (Rule of Benedict 73).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The span runs from Basil's election as bishop of Caesarea to the council of Constantinople. Gregory of Nyssa says that Basil died eight years after he became bishop, and that a synod at Antioch met about nine months after his death (Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Macrina pp. 39–41 (PG 46.973–976)). W. K. Lowther Clarke, in the introduction to his translation of the Life (1916), places that synod in September 379 and Basil's death on 1 January 379, which gives about 370 for the election. The law of Theodosius that names Gregory of Nyssa is dated 30 July 381 (Theodosian Code 16.1.3). Basil's On the Holy Spirit and the five Theological Orations of Gregory of Nazianzus carry no dates; the translators in the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers connect the first with a request made by Amphilochius of Iconium in 374 and put the second between 379 and 381, at Constantinople.

Primary sources

Life of Macrina Gregory of Nyssa · c. AD 380–383
pp. 26–29 (PG 46.966–968); pp. 39–41 (PG 46.973–976)

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
4.26; 5.6–8

Letters Basil of Caesarea · c. AD 357–378
223.2; 94; 236.6

Orations Gregory of Nazianzus · c. AD 362–383
43.63; 43.48–49; 43.68–69; 31.10; 31.26

On the Holy Spirit (De Spiritu Sancto) Basil of Caesarea · c. AD 375
1.3; 18.45–47

On Not Three Gods, to Ablabius Gregory of Nyssa · Last quarter of the fourth century
newadvent.org

The Theodosian Code Compiled by order of Theodosius II · Compiled AD 429–438
16.1.3

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
5.9

The Rule of Saint Benedict Benedict of Nursia · c. AD 530–550
73

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Caesarea in Cappadocia, Constantinople
Who Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Macrina Threads Creeds and Councils, Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584
Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism c. AD 320 580

LEADS TO

The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632
Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704
The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos AD 963–972 814

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia Before · AD 359–360 610
The First Council of Constantinople After · May AD 381 632

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism Before · c. AD 320 580
Benedict Writes His Rule After · c. AD 530–550 704

← Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament Earlier · AD 367
→ The Edict of Thessalonica Later · 27 February AD 380

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Edict of Thessalonica

27 February AD 380 · Firm date

By an edict issued at Thessalonica, the emperor Theodosius orders all his peoples to hold the faith of the bishops of Rome and Alexandria in the one deity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Christians who believe otherwise are declared heretics.

In January 379 the western emperor Gratian proclaimed the Spanish general Theodosius I his colleague and shared with him the war against the barbarians (Socrates, Church History 5.2). In Constantinople, the eastern capital, the churches had by the count of the historian Socrates been for forty years in the hands of bishops who rejected the creed of Nicaea (Socrates, Church History 5.7).

On 27 February 380 an edict was issued at Thessalonica in the names of the three reigning emperors, Gratian, Valentinian II and Theodosius, and addressed to the people of Constantinople. All the peoples under the emperors' rule are to live in the religion that the apostle Peter delivered to the Romans and that Damasus I, bishop of Rome, and Peter, bishop of Alexandria, now follow: belief in the one deity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, in equal majesty and a holy Trinity. Those who keep this law are to take the name of Catholic Christians. The rest are judged to be out of their minds, are to bear the infamy of heresy, and may not call their meeting places churches. They are to be punished first by divine vengeance and then by the emperors (Theodosian Code 16.1.2).

The church historian Sozomen, writing some sixty years later, ties the law to the emperor's baptism. Theodosius, he says, fell ill at Thessalonica, was instructed and baptised by its bishop Ascholius, learned that the East and above all Constantinople were divided among many parties, and issued the law to make his own belief known, having it published in the capital so that it would spread from there (Sozomen, Church History 7.4).

The edict named a faith and threatened punishment only in general terms. Enforcement followed. Theodosius entered Constantinople on 24 November 380 (Socrates, Church History 5.6). He asked the bishop Demophilus to accept the Nicene creed, and when he refused ordered him out of the churches; two days later Demophilus began to hold his services outside the walls (Socrates, Church History 5.7). A law of 10 January 381 forbade heretics to assemble inside towns and ordered the churches everywhere restored to bishops who held the Nicene faith (Theodosian Code 16.5.6). A law of 30 July, after the First Council of Constantinople, named the bishops with whom the holders of churches had to be in communion (Theodosian Code 16.1.3).

The edict of 380 speaks of Christians only. It does not mention the old cults or the Jews (Theodosian Code 16.1.2). Laws against sacrifice came later in the reign: in 391 sacrifice and visits to the temples were forbidden, and in November 392 the ban was extended to incense, lamps and wine offered to the household gods (Theodosian Code 16.10.10–12). In it the emperors defined right belief by the teaching of named bishops and treated departure from it as an offence (Theodosian Code 16.1.2).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The law carries its own date and place: "III kal. mar. Thessalonicae", in the fifth consulship of Gratian and the first of Theodosius, which the edition cited converts to 27 February 380 (Theodosian Code 16.1.2). The year 380 was a leap year, and by strict Roman reckoning the third day before the Kalends of March then fell on 28 February; the conventional date is kept here.

The order of the edict and the emperor's baptism is less clear. Sozomen puts the baptism first and makes it the occasion of the law (Sozomen, Church History 7.4). Socrates does not mention the law and tells of the illness and baptism just before Theodosius reached Constantinople on 24 November 380, which would put them after it (Socrates, Church History 5.6).

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
5.2; 5.7; 5.6

The Theodosian Code Compiled by order of Theodosius II · Compiled AD 429–438
16.1.2; 16.5.6; 16.1.3; 16.10.10–12

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
7.4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Thessalonica, Constantinople
Who Theodosius I, Gratian
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584
Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion AD 361–363 615

LEADS TO

The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632
Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance AD 390 644
The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God August AD 410 660

CHURCH AND STATE

Julian Tries to Restore the Old Religion Before · AD 361–363 615

Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance After · AD 390 644

← The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity Earlier · c. AD 370–381
→ The First Council of Constantinople Later · May AD 381

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The First Council of Constantinople

May AD 381 · Firm date

About 150 eastern bishops, summoned by Theodosius, confirm the faith of Nicaea, condemn those who deny the full deity of the Son or of the Spirit, and rank the bishop of Constantinople next after Rome. The creed now recited in most churches bears this council's name.

After taking the churches of Constantinople from the opponents of Nicaea, Theodosius I summoned the bishops of his own, eastern, part of the empire to confirm the Nicene faith and to give the capital a bishop (Socrates, Church History 5.8) (Theodoret, Church History 5.7). About 150 came. Thirty-six bishops of the Macedonian party, who would not call the Son of one substance with the Father, were invited as well; they refused the Nicene creed and went home (Socrates, Church History 5.8).

The council met in May 381. Gregory of Nazianzus, who had gathered the Nicene congregation in the city, was confirmed as its bishop, and Meletius of Antioch died while the council sat (Theodoret, Church History 5.8) (Socrates, Church History 5.9). Sozomen says that Gregory gave up the see when the Egyptian bishops and others objected (Sozomen, Church History 7.7); Socrates has him resign before the council met (Socrates, Church History 5.7). His farewell address to the 150 bishops survives (Gregory of Nazianzus, Orations 42.20–27). In Sozomen's account the emperor then chose Nectarius, a senator not yet baptised, from a list drawn up by the bishops (Sozomen, Church History 7.8); in Socrates's the people seized on him (Socrates, Church History 5.8).

The bishops reported to Theodosius that they had ratified the faith of Nicaea, condemned the heresies opposed to it and drawn up canons, and they asked him to confirm their work (Council of Constantinople (381) letter to Theodosius). The first canon declares that the faith of the 318 fathers of Nicaea shall stand and anathematises, among others, the Arians, the Pneumatomachi or "fighters against the Spirit", and the Apollinarians (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 1). The second forbids bishops to intervene in churches outside their own region (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 2). The third gives the bishop of Constantinople "the prerogative of honour after the Bishop of Rome; because Constantinople is New Rome" (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 3).

The canons and the letter contain no creed, and the council's minutes are lost. The creed that carries its name is known from the Council of Chalcedon in 451, which set "the Creed of the one hundred and fifty holy Fathers who were assembled at Constantinople" beside that of Nicaea (Definition of Chalcedon). It is not the text of 325. That creed said only "And in the Holy Ghost" and ended with anathemas (Creed of Nicaea (325)). This one has no anathemas and confesses the Spirit as "the Lord and Giver-of-Life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed). The bishops who met again in 382 summed up the same faith for Damasus of Rome and other western bishops as one Godhead, power and substance of Father, Son and Holy Spirit in three perfect hypostases (Council of Constantinople (381) synodical letter of 382).

Under the name of the Nicene Creed this text became the common confession; the Catholic catechism of 1992 says that it remains common to all the great churches of East and West (Catechism of the Catholic Church 195). One clause is not common to all. In the West the words “and the Son” were added to the statement that the Spirit proceeds from the Father; they are absent from the Greek text (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Latin form).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Socrates says the bishops assembled in May, in the consulship of Eucherius and Evagrius, which is 381 (Socrates, Church History 5.8). The heading of the canons in the Greek collections dates them to the seventh day before the Ides of July in the same consulship, 9 July 381 (Council of Constantinople (381) canon 1), and the emperor’s law naming the bishops with whom the churches were to be in communion is dated 30 July (Theodosian Code 16.1.3). The council therefore sat from May into July. No minutes survive to give the dates of individual sessions.

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
5.8; 5.9; 5.7

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
5.7; 5.8

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
7.7; 7.8

Orations Gregory of Nazianzus · c. AD 362–383
42.20–27

Canons and Letters of the Council of Constantinople (381) The Council of Constantinople · AD 381–382 letter to Theodosius; canon 1; canon 2; canon 3; synodical letter of 382

The Definition of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · AD 451
ccel.org

The Creed of Nicaea The Council of Nicaea · AD 325
ccel.org

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org; Latin form

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
195

The Theodosian Code Compiled by order of Theodosius II · Compiled AD 429–438
16.1.3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Theodosius I, Gregory of Nazianzus
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623
The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584
The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628
The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia AD 359–360 610

LEADS TO

The Council of Ephesus June AD 431 668
The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo 8 May AD 589 728

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity Before · c. AD 370–381 623
African Councils List the Books of Scripture After · AD 393–397 648

EAST AND WEST

Constantine Dedicates Constantinople Before · 11 May AD 330 594
The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon After · 1 February AD 410 656

← The Edict of Thessalonica Earlier · 27 February AD 380
→ Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate Later · c. 382–405

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate

c. 382–405 · Estimated date

At the request of Pope Damasus, Jerome revises the Latin Gospels against the Greek. At Bethlehem he then translates the Old Testament from Hebrew, book by book, over more than a decade. His version became the common Bible of the Latin West.

In the fourth century the Latin churches read the Old Testament in a version made from the Greek Septuagint (Augustine, City of God 18.43), and their copies of the Gospels differed widely from one another (Jerome, Preface to the Four Gospels). Jerome, already known as a student of Scripture, came to Rome with two eastern bishops and stayed to help its bishop, Damasus I, with his correspondence (Jerome, Letter 127.7) (Jerome, Letter 123.10). Damasus asked him to revise the Latin Gospels. In the preface Jerome says that there were "almost as many forms of texts as there are copies", that he compared old Greek manuscripts, and that he changed the familiar wording only where the sense was wrong. He expected to be called a forger (Jerome, Preface to the Four Gospels), and he was soon answering critics who charged him with correcting the Gospels against the authority of the ancients (Jerome, Letter 27.1).

After Damasus died Jerome left Rome (Jerome, Letter 45.3, 45.6). He settled at Bethlehem with the Roman widow Paula, who founded monasteries there, and her daughter Eustochium; both women learned Hebrew (Jerome, Letter 108.20, 108.27). He first revised Old Testament books from the Septuagint and then began to translate from the Hebrew, appealing to what he called the "Hebrew verity" (Jerome, Letter 71.5). The preface to Samuel and Kings, addressed to Paula and Eustochium, was meant as a "helmeted" introduction to the whole undertaking. It lists the twenty-two books of the Hebrew canon and says that Wisdom, Sirach, Judith, Tobit and the Shepherd "are not in the canon" (Jerome, Preface to Samuel and Kings). He translated Tobit and Judith all the same, from "Chaldean", that is Aramaic: Tobit in a single day at the request of two bishops, Judith in one night's work (Jerome, Preface to Tobit) (Jerome, Preface to Judith). The books from Joshua to Ruth, with Esther, followed the Pentateuch and were issued after Paula's death (Jerome, Preface to Joshua), which Jerome dates to January 404 (Jerome, Letter 108.35).

Jerome described his usual method as rendering "sense for sense and not word for word", but made an exception for Scripture, "where even the order of the words is a mystery" (Jerome, Letter 57.5).

The new version was not welcomed everywhere. Augustine of Hippo wrote to Jerome that he would rather have a Latin translation of the Septuagint, the version the apostles used and the Greek churches read, and told him of a congregation at Oea in Africa that rose in protest when its bishop read Jonah in Jerome's wording (Augustine, Letter 71.3–6). Years later Augustine praised Jerome as a man skilled in three languages and still held that no single translator should be preferred to the Seventy (Augustine, City of God 18.43).

Jerome's version nonetheless became the common text of the Latin church, and "vulgate" means the common edition. In 1546 the Council of Trent spoke of "the said old and vulgate edition" as approved by the usage of many years and declared it authentic for public reading, disputation and preaching (Council of Trent session 4, decree on the edition and use of the sacred books).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Jerome does not date his prefaces, and the years are worked out from his letters. He came to Rome with the bishops Paulinus and Epiphanius (Jerome, Letter 127.7), who had been summoned to a council there (Jerome, Letter 108.6); the eastern bishops' reply to the same summons was written in 382 (Theodoret, Church History 5.9). The preface to the Gospels is addressed to Damasus, who was dead when Jerome left the city (Jerome, Letter 45.3, 45.6). Paula, with whom he settled at Bethlehem, died in January 404 after twenty years there (Jerome, Letter 108.35), which puts the move in the middle of the 380s and the Gospel revision between 382 and then.

For the Old Testament the fixed points are these. In the list of his works drawn up in the fourteenth year of Theodosius (392–393) Jerome already speaks of translating the Old Testament from the Hebrew (Jerome, On Illustrious Men 135). A later letter, which the editors of the translation place in 398, says that everything is done except the first eight books (Jerome, Letter 71.5). The preface to Joshua reports the Pentateuch finished and was written after Paula's death (Jerome, Preface to Joshua), which Jerome dates to 26 January in the sixth consulship of Honorius, AD 404 (Jerome, Letter 108.35). The work therefore ended in 404 or 405.

Primary sources

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
18.43

Prefaces to the Latin Bible and to his Commentaries Jerome · c. AD 383–405 to the Four Gospels; to Samuel and Kings; to Tobit; to Judith; to Joshua

Letters Jerome · c. AD 370–419
127.7; 123.10; 27.1; 45.3, 45.6; 108.20, 108.27; 71.5; 108.35; 57.5; 108.6

Letters Augustine of Hippo · AD 386–430
71.3–6

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
session 4, decree on the edition and use of the sacred books

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
5.9

On Illustrious Men Jerome · AD 392–393
135

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Bethlehem
Who Jerome, Damasus I, Paula
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Hebrew Scriptures Are Translated into Greek c. 250 BC 244

Origen and the School of Alexandria c. AD 203–254 536

LEADS TO

African Councils List the Books of Scripture AD 393–397 648

Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950

Gutenberg Prints the Bible c. 1454–1455 983

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament Before · AD 367 619

African Councils List the Books of Scripture After · AD 393–397 648

← The First Council of Constantinople Earlier · May AD 381
→ The Conversion of Augustine Later · AD 386

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Conversion of Augustine

AD 386 · Firm date

In a garden at Milan the African teacher of rhetoric Augustine, after years of hesitation, reads a sentence of Paul and resolves to seek baptism. He tells the story himself in the Confessions. Ambrose baptises him the following Easter.

Augustine of Hippo was an African from Thagaste (Possidius, Life of Augustine 1) who taught rhetoric and for nine years followed the Manichaean religion (Augustine, Confessions 4.1.1). The prefect of Rome sent him to Milan, where the emperor's court then sat, as the city's professor of rhetoric (Augustine, Confessions 5.13.23) (Possidius, Life of Augustine 1). There he went to hear the bishop, Ambrose, at first for the style of his preaching and not for its content (Augustine, Confessions 5.13.23). His mother Monica, a Christian, followed him from Africa (Augustine, Confessions 6.1.1).

By his own account he became convinced that the church's teaching was true well before he could bring himself to act on it, held back by what he calls the chain of his own will (Augustine, Confessions 8.5.10–12). Two stories moved him. Simplicianus, whom Ambrose loved as a father, told him how Victorinus, a celebrated teacher of rhetoric at Rome, had made public profession of the faith (Augustine, Confessions 8.2.3–5). Then Ponticianus, a fellow African serving at court, told him and his friend Alypius about Antony of Egypt, and about two imperial agents at Trier who had given up their careers on reading Antony's life (Augustine, Confessions 8.6.14–15). Augustine reckons that some twelve years had then passed since his nineteenth year, when a book of Cicero first stirred him to seek wisdom (Augustine, Confessions 8.7.17).

Augustine went out into the garden of the house where he lodged (Augustine, Confessions 8.8.19). Weeping under a fig tree, he heard from a neighbouring house a child's voice repeating "Take up and read". He remembered that Antony had taken a Gospel reading as spoken to himself, went back to the book of Paul's letters that he had left beside Alypius, and read the first words he saw (Romans 13:13–14). He writes that all his doubt vanished at once. Alypius resolved to join him, and they went in and told Monica (Augustine, Confessions 8.12.28–30).

A few days later the vintage holiday began. Augustine resigned his post and withdrew with his mother, his son and his friends to a country house, where he wrote several books (Augustine, Confessions 9.2.2) (Augustine, Confessions 9.4.7). They returned to Milan to enrol for baptism, and he was baptised with Alypius and his fifteen-year-old son Adeodatus (Augustine, Confessions 9.6.14). His friend Possidius adds that it was at Easter and at the hands of Ambrose (Possidius, Life of Augustine 1). On the way home to Africa Monica died at Ostia (Augustine, Confessions 9.8.17) (Augustine, Confessions 9.11.28).

Augustine became a presbyter and then bishop of Hippo Regius (Possidius, Life of Augustine 4, 8), and wrote this account about ten years after the event, as a bishop interpreting his own past. Near the end of his life he pointed to it himself as evidence that God by grace turns wills that are set against him (Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 20.53), which was the point at issue in his dispute with Pelagius.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Augustine gives no calendar date. He says that the scene in the garden fell a few days before the vintage holiday (Augustine, Confessions 9.2.2), and that his mother died, after his baptism, in the thirty-third year of his age (Augustine, Confessions 9.11.28). Possidius puts the baptism at Easter and says that Augustine lived seventy-six years (Possidius, Life of Augustine 1) (Possidius, Life of Augustine 31). The chronicle of Prosper, a contemporary, dates his death to 28 August in the consulship of Theodosius for the thirteenth time and Valentinian for the third, which is 430 (Prosper, Chronicle 1304 (AD 430)). That puts his birth in 354, his thirty-third year in 386–387, the baptism at Easter 387 and the garden in the late summer of 386.

Primary sources

Scripture

Romans 13:13–14

Life of Augustine Possidius of Calama · c. AD 431–439
1; 4, 8; 31

Confessions Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 397–400
4.1.1; 5.13.23; 6.1.1; 8.5.10–12; 8.2.3–5; 8.6.14–15; 8.7.17; 8.8.19; 8.12.28–30; 9.2.2; 9.4.7; 9.6.14; 9.8.17; 9.11.28

On the Gift of Perseverance Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 428–429
20.53

Chronicle Prosper of Aquitaine · c. AD 433–455
1304 (AD 430)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Milan
Who Augustine of Hippo, Ambrose, Monica

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Antony Withdraws to the Desert c. AD 270–285 549

LEADS TO

The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God August AD 410 660

Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace AD 411–418 664

← Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate Earlier · c. 382–405

→ Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance Later · AD 390

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance

AD 390 · Estimated date

After Theodosius orders a massacre at Thessalonica, Ambrose of Milan writes that he cannot celebrate the eucharist in the emperor's presence until he repents. Theodosius does public penance. Later writers add a confrontation at the church door that is not in the letter.

While Theodosius I was in Italy, the people of Thessalonica rioted. According to Sozomen the trouble began when Butheric, the general commanding in Illyricum, imprisoned a popular charioteer; the crowd demanded his release for the races and killed the general (Sozomen, Church History 7.25). The emperor ordered reprisals, and soldiers killed inhabitants and visitors alike, without trial (Sozomen, Church History 7.25) (Theodoret, Church History 5.17). Theodoret, writing sixty years later, says that seven thousand were reported killed (Theodoret, Church History 5.17).

A contemporary account survives in a letter of Ambrose, bishop of Milan, to the emperor. Ambrose says that he had pleaded against the order beforehand, that Theodosius himself tried too late to revoke it, and that a synod of bishops then meeting had deplored it. He had left the city before the emperor returned, giving illness as his reason, and he wrote with his own hand a letter "which you alone may read". In it he sets before Theodosius the example of King David, who said "I have sinned against the Lord", and tells him: "Sin is not done away but by tears and penitence." Then he states what he will do: "I dare not offer the sacrifice if you intend to be present." He ends by asking pardon for putting God before his emperor (Ambrose, Letter 51).

Theodosius submitted. Augustine of Hippo, writing some twenty-five years later, says that the emperor had promised the bishops to pardon the city, was pushed by men around him to take vengeance, and then did penance under the discipline of the church in such a way that the people wept to see their emperor prostrate (Augustine, City of God 5.26). Sozomen adds that he confessed his sin publicly in church, laid aside the imperial ornaments for the time of his penance, and made a law that death sentences should wait thirty days before being carried out (Sozomen, Church History 7.25). A law to that effect stands in the Theodosian Code (Theodosian Code 9.40.13).

Theodoret tells a more dramatic story. In his account Ambrose meets the emperor at the porch of the church and forbids him to cross the threshold; Theodosius weeps in his palace for eight months; at Christmas Ambrose admits him only after he has issued the thirty-day law; and when the emperor lingers inside the sanctuary Ambrose sends him out with the words "purple can make emperors, but not priests" (Theodoret, Church History 5.17). Sozomen, too, has Ambrose stop the emperor at the church gates (Sozomen, Church History 7.25). None of this is in Ambrose's letter, which shows a bishop avoiding a meeting and writing in private.

The letter states the demand and the later accounts the outcome: a Christian emperor accepted that a bishop could withhold the eucharist from him until he had repented in public.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No source gives the year. Ambrose's letter is undated (Ambrose, Letter 51). Theodosius was in Italy from the defeat of Maximus in August 388 until he returned to Constantinople in November 391 (Socrates, Church History 5.14) (Socrates, Church History 5.18), and the massacre and the penance fall within that stay. Theodoret says that eight months passed before the emperor was readmitted at Christmas (Theodoret, Church History 5.17), which would put the massacre in the spring.

The usual year, 390, rests on the law suspending death sentences for thirty days. It is dated 18 August at Verona, but the manuscripts give the consuls of 382 (Theodosian Code 9.40.13). Because Sozomen and Theodoret connect such a law with the penance, historians correct the year to 390; see James J. O'Donnell, "The Career of Virius Nicomachus Flavianus", Phoenix 32 (1978), pp. 129–143. Sozomen sets the whole episode after the defeat of Eugenius (Sozomen, Church History 7.25). That is hard to accept: Eugenius fell in September 394 and Theodosius died the following January (Socrates, Church History 5.25–26).

Primary sources

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
7.25

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
5.17

Letters Ambrose of Milan · c. AD 379–396
51

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
5.26

The Theodosian Code Compiled by order of Theodosius II · Compiled AD 429–438
9.40.13

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
5.14; 5.18; 5.25–26

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Milan, Thessalonica

Who Ambrose, Theodosius I
Threads Church and State

In context

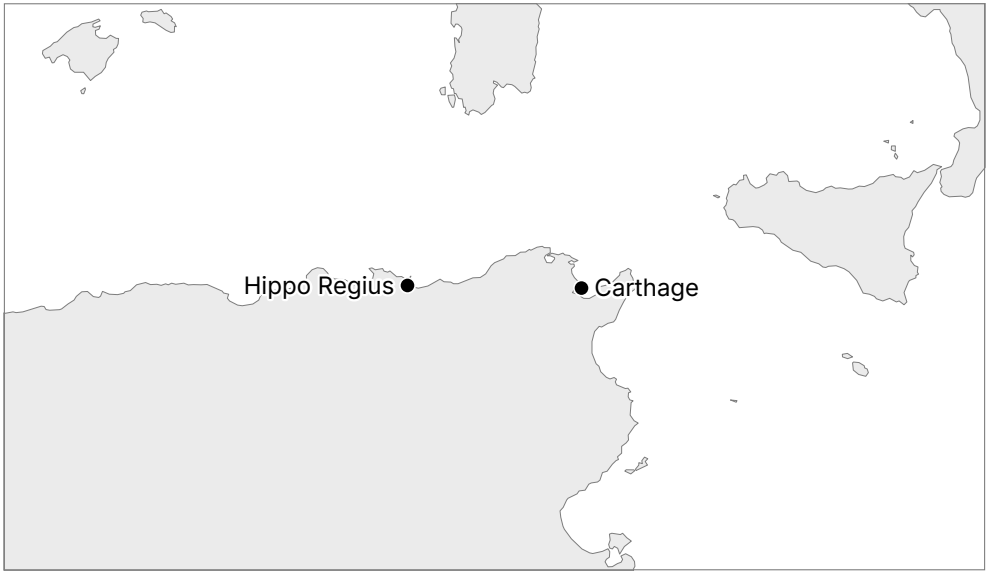
GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628

CHURCH AND STATE

The Edict of Thessalonica Before · 27 February AD 380 628

John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile After · AD 398–407 652



← The Conversion of Augustine Earlier · AD 386
→ African Councils List the Books of Scripture Later · AD 393–397

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

African Councils List the Books of Scripture

AD 393–397 · Firm date

The bishops of Roman Africa, meeting at Hippo in 393 and Carthage in 397, rule that only canonical Scripture may be read in church and list its books: a New Testament of twenty-seven books and an Old Testament that includes Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach and Maccabees.

On 8 October 393 the bishops of the African provinces met in council at Hippo Regius (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, notice of the council of Hippo), where Augustine of Hippo, then a presbyter, addressed them on the creed (Augustine, Retractations 1.17). Their decisions survive in a summary that was read and confirmed at Carthage on 28 August 397, at a council presided over by Aurelius of Carthage and signed by Augustine, by then a bishop (Council of Carthage (397) Breviarium Hipponense, preface and subscriptions) (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, canon 34).

One canon rules that "besides the Canonical Scriptures nothing be read in church under the name of divine Scripture" (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, canon 24), and lists them. Of the Old Testament: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, four books of Kingdoms, two of Chronicles, Job, the Psalter, five books of Solomon, the twelve prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Tobit, Judith, Esther, two books of Ezra and two of Maccabees. Of the New: four Gospels, Acts, thirteen letters of Paul and one "of the same" to the Hebrews, two of Peter, three of John, one of James, one of Jude, and the Apocalypse of John. The accounts of the martyrs may also be read on their anniversaries (Council of Carthage (397) canon 47). Some manuscripts end the canon with a direction to consult the churches across the sea (Council of Carthage (397) canon 47, with variant readings).

The New Testament is the twenty-seven books that Athanasius had named in 367 (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.4–7). The Old Testament is longer than his, for he set Wisdom, Sirach, Esther, Judith and Tobit outside the canon as books to be read by beginners (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.4–7). Augustine, in a list that matches the council's, counts Wisdom and Sirach with the three books of Solomon as ascribed to him (Augustine, On Christian Doctrine 2.8.12–13). Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach and Maccabees are not among the twenty-two books of the Hebrew canon as Jerome lists them (Jerome, Preface to Samuel and Kings). They are among the books that Protestants call the Apocrypha.

Jerome, translating from the Hebrew in the same years, drew the line differently. Wisdom, Sirach, Judith and Tobit, he wrote, "are not in the canon" (Jerome, Preface to Samuel and Kings). In another preface he says that the church reads Judith, Tobit and Maccabees "but does not admit them among the canonical Scriptures", and Wisdom and Sirach may be read "for the edification of the people, not to give authority to doctrines of the Church" (Jerome, Preface to the books of Solomon).

The council of 419 repeated the list, counting fourteen letters of Paul, and asked that it be sent to Boniface, bishop of Rome, for confirmation (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, canon 24). The Catholic Church at Trent in 1546 named Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach, Baruch and Maccabees among the books to be received as sacred and canonical (Council of Trent session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures). The Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem in 1672 declared Wisdom, Judith, Tobit, Maccabees and Sirach genuine parts of Scripture (Confession of Dositheus question 3 (p. 155)). The Church of England's Articles of 1571, a Protestant statement, list the books of the Hebrew canon and say, citing Jerome, that the others are read "for example of life and instruction of manners" but not to establish doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles article 6).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Both councils are dated by consuls in the African collections. The council of Hippo met on the eighth day before the Ides of October in the consulship of Theodosius for the third time and Abundantius, 8 October 393 (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, notice of the council of Hippo). The summary of its decisions was read at Carthage on the fifth day before the Kalends of September in the consulship of Caesarius and Atticus, 28 August 397 (Council of Carthage (397) Breviarium Hipponense, preface and subscriptions). The council that repeated the canon met on 25 May 419 and is dated in the same way (Council of Carthage (397) African Code, opening).

Primary sources

Canons of the Council of Carthage (397), with the Summary of Hippo (393)
Councils of the African bishops · AD 393–397
African Code, notice of the council of Hippo; Breviarium Hipponense, preface and subscriptions; African Code, canon 34; African Code, canon 24; canon 47; canon 47, with variant readings; African Code, opening

Retractations Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 426–427
1.17

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
39.4–7

On Christian Doctrine Augustine of Hippo · Begun c. AD 396–397, finished c. 426–427
2.8.12–13

Prefaces to the Latin Bible and to his Commentaries Jerome · c. AD 383–405 to Samuel and Kings; to the books of Solomon

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
session 4, decree on the canonical Scriptures

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
question 3 (p. 155)

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Hippo Regius, Carthage
Who Augustine of Hippo, Aurelius of Carthage
Threads Scripture and Canon, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636

LEADS TO

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate Before · c. 382–405 636

Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History After · AD 731 763

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The First Council of Constantinople Before · May AD 381 632

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon After · 1 February AD 410 656

← Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance Earlier · AD 390
→ John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile Later · AD 398–407

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile

AD 398–407 · Firm date

John, a presbyter of Antioch known for his preaching, is made bishop of Constantinople in 398. His reforms and his plain speaking make enemies among the clergy and at court. A synod deposes him, the emperor banishes him twice, and he dies in exile in 407.

John Chrysostom was born at Antioch, studied under the rhetorician Libanius, lived for some years as a monk, and was ordained there (Socrates, Church History 6.3) (Palladius, Dialogue 5). In 387 a crowd protesting a new tax pulled down the imperial statues, and the city waited for the punishment of Theodosius I (Theodoret, Church History 5.19). While the bishop went to plead with the emperor, John preached through Lent to a frightened congregation, until the bishop returned before Easter with a pardon (Chrysostom, Homilies on the Statues 2.1–4) (Chrysostom, Homilies on the Statues 21.1–4).

When the bishop of Constantinople died in 397, the court sent for John, and he was ordained on 26 February 398 (Socrates, Church History 6.2). His supporter Palladius describes what he did with the office: he disciplined clergy who kept women in their houses, cut the bishop's household expenses and gave the money to hospitals, reformed the order of widows, held night services for working people, and preached against the greed of the rich (Palladius, Dialogue 5). Socrates says that his severity and freedom of speech offended many, and that people who did not know him found him haughty (Socrates, Church History 6.3).

Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, then came to the capital with a party of bishops. The empress Eudoxia, angered by a sermon against women that was taken as aimed at her, backed him (Socrates, Church History 6.15). A synod of thirty-six bishops met at a place called the Oak, outside Chalcedon, and summoned John to answer a list of charges. He refused to be judged by his declared enemies and asked for a general council; the synod deposed him for not appearing and sent the emperor a charge of treason, that he had called the empress Jezebel (Palladius, Dialogue 8) (Socrates, Church History 6.15). He was sent away, and the anger of the people soon forced the court to bring him back (Socrates, Church History 6.16).

When games were held around a silver statue of Eudoxia set up near his church, John denounced them; Socrates reports that he preached a sermon beginning "Again Herodias raves". A second gathering of bishops ruled that he had resumed his see unlawfully (Socrates, Church History 6.18). John's own letter to Innocent, bishop of Rome, tells how soldiers broke into the churches on Easter eve and drove out those about to be baptised, and asks the western bishops to declare the proceedings void (Chrysostom, Letters to Innocent 1–4). On 20 June 404 he was taken into exile (Socrates, Church History 6.18). Eudoxia died that October (Socrates, Church History 6.19).

He was held first at Cucusus in Armenia, then moved; ordered on to Pityus on the Black Sea, he died on the road at Comana on 14 September 407. Palladius gives his last words as "Glory to God for all things" (Palladius, Dialogue 11) (Socrates, Church History 6.21). In 438 his body was brought back to Constantinople and those who had left the church on his account returned to it (Socrates, Church History 7.45).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Socrates, who lived in Constantinople through these years, dates the main events by consuls. John was ordained bishop on 26 February in the consulship of Honorius and Eutychian, AD 398 (Socrates, Church History 6.2). He left the city for his final exile on 20 June in the sixth consulship of Honorius, 404 (Socrates, Church History 6.18), and died at Comana on 14 September in the seventh consulship of Honorius and the second of Theodosius, 407 (Socrates, Church History 6.21). Socrates gives no date for the synod of the Oak. He places John's second condemnation between Christmas and the Easter before the exile of June 404 (Socrates, Church History 6.18), so the synod and the first banishment belong to 403 at the latest.

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
6.3; 6.2; 6.15; 6.16; 6.18; 6.19; 6.21; 7.45

Dialogue on the Life of John Chrysostom Palladius of Helenopolis · c. AD 408
5; 8; 11

Church History Theodoret of Cyrrhus · c. AD 449–450
5.19

Homilies on the Statues John Chrysostom · AD 387
2.1–4; 21.1–4

Letters from Exile John Chrysostom · AD 404–407
to Innocent 1–4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Antioch
Who John Chrysostom, Eudoxia
Threads Church and State

In context

CHURCH AND STATE

Ambrose Calls an Emperor to Penance Before · AD 390 644

The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God After · August AD 410 660

← African Councils List the Books of Scripture Earlier · AD 393–397
→ The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon Later · 1 February AD 410

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon

1 February AD 410 · Firm date

With the leave of the Persian king Yazdegerd I, forty bishops of his empire meet in the capital under Isaac, bishop of Seleucia-Ctesiphon. They accept the creed and canons of Nicaea and set their church in order under one head, the catholicos.

The Christians of the Persian empire lived under the Sasanian kings, beyond the Roman frontier. The acts of this synod call it the first assembly of bishops ever held in the land of the Persians, and they recall the years before it as a time of great persecution, when Christians went about in secret. Under Yazdegerd I, the acts say, the churches destroyed by earlier kings were ordered rebuilt, those imprisoned for their faith were released, and the clergy could move freely (Synodicon Orientale pp. 253–254) (Synodicon Orientale pp. 260–261).

Marutha of Maypherkat, a bishop from the Roman side of the border, had come to the Persian court as an envoy of the emperor and had won the king's regard (Socrates, Church History 7.8). He carried a letter from the bishops of Antioch, Aleppo, Edessa, Tella and Amida. He and Isaac of Seleucia, bishop of the royal capital Seleucia-Ctesiphon, had it translated from Greek into Persian and read to the king, who ordered his governors to send the bishops of the provinces to the capital. Forty were named. They arrived at Epiphany, and on Tuesday 1 February 410 they met in the great church of the city (Synodicon Orientale pp. 255–257) (Synodicon Orientale pp. 257–260).

The letter from the West asked three things: that there be one bishop only in each city, ordained by at least three others; that the feasts of the Nativity and Epiphany, the forty days' fast and Easter be kept by all at the same time; and that the canons of Nicaea, which Marutha had brought, be received. The canons were read out. Isaac declared anathema on anyone who would not accept them, and all the bishops agreed to sign (Synodicon Orientale pp. 257–260). The acts then give the creed of the 318 fathers of Nicaea in Syriac, with its closing anathemas (Synodicon Orientale pp. 262–263).

Twenty-one canons followed. A new bishop must be ordained by three bishops and confirmed by the bishop of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, whom the canons call catholicos and "grand metropolitan" (Synodicon Orientale canon 1, p. 263). All bishops, of their own will and by the king's order, are to obey him and his successors (Synodicon Orientale canons 12–13, p. 266). A synod is to meet at the capital every two years (Synodicon Orientale canon 6, p. 264). Below the catholicos stand five metropolitans, at Beth Lapat, Nisibis, Prat of Maishan, Arbela and Karka of Beth Slokh, each with his bishops (Synodicon Orientale canon 21, pp. 271–273). Two of the king's high officials told the bishops that whoever opposed Isaac and Marutha would be reported to the king and punished (Synodicon Orientale pp. 260–261).

The synod gave the church of the Persian empire a single head, a settled hierarchy and a common rule, received from the bishops of the Roman world but enacted by its own bishops under its own king. Its acts stand first in the collection of the synods of the Church of the East (Synodicon Orientale pp. 253–254).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The acts date the synod to the eleventh year of Yazdegerd, say that the bishops reached the capital at Epiphany, and put the first session on Tuesday the first of the month Shebat, that is February (Synodicon Orientale pp. 253–254) (Synodicon Orientale pp. 257–260). Chabot, following Theodor Nöldeke's chronology of the Sasanian kings, counts the reign from August 399, which gives the year 410 (J.-B. Chabot, Synodicon orientale, 1902, p. 254 n. 2 and p. 257 n. 6). The weekday agrees: 1 February fell on a Tuesday in 410.

Primary sources

Synodicon Orientale The synods of the Church of the East · Acts of AD 410–775, collected after 775

pp. 253–254; pp. 260–261; pp. 255–257; pp. 257–260; pp. 262–263; canon 1, p. 263; canons 12–13, p. 266; canon 6, p. 264; canon 21, pp. 271–273

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443

7.8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Seleucia-Ctesiphon
Who Isaac of Seleucia, Yazdegerd I, Marutha of Maypherkat Threads Creeds and Councils, Mission and Expansion, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Christianity Takes Root in Edessa c. AD 201 528

The First Council of Nicaea May AD 325 584

LEADS TO

The Church of the East Reaches China AD 635 739

Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed 1973–1994 1445

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

African Councils List the Books of Scripture Before · AD 393–397 648

Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace After · AD 411–418 664

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths Before · c. AD 341 606

Patrick's Mission to Ireland After · c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional) 672

EAST AND WEST

The First Council of Constantinople Before · May AD 381 632

The Council of Ephesus After · June AD 431 668

← John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile Earlier · AD 398–407
→ The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God Later · August AD 410

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God

August AD 410 · Firm date

Alaric's Goths take and plunder Rome in August 410. Pagans blame the disaster on the abandonment of the old gods. Augustine answers with the City of God, twenty-two books on the two cities, the earthly and the heavenly, written over a number of years.

Alaric, king of the Goths, had fought for the emperor Theodosius and afterwards turned against the empire (Socrates, Church History 7.10). He was a Christian, as Orosius stresses (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.37.17); Sozomen links him with the Arian party among the Goths (Sozomen, Church History 9.9). He besieged Rome more than once: Jerome, at Bethlehem, heard that the citizens had first bought their lives with gold and had then been besieged again, until famine drove them to eat human flesh (Jerome, Letter 127.12).

In August 410 the Goths entered the city, plundered it, and left on the third day (Prosper, Chronicle 1240 (AD 410)) (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.39).

Two Christian writers, both arguing against pagan critics, stress their restraint. Orosius says that Alaric ordered those who took refuge in holy places, above all the basilicas of Peter and Paul, to be left unharmed, and tells how church plate found by a Goth was carried back to St Peter's in procession under guard (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.39). Augustine of Hippo likewise says that the churches of the apostles sheltered Christians and pagans alike, while granting that there was slaughter, burning and looting as in any captured city (Augustine, City of God 1.1) (Augustine, City of God 1.7). Jerome's account of the aged widow Marcella shows both sides: soldiers beat her for gold she did not have, then took her to the basilica of Paul; she died a few days later (Jerome, Letter 127.13–14). Socrates adds that many senators were killed and great buildings burned (Socrates, Church History 7.10).

The shock was felt far away. "The City which had taken the whole world was itself taken," Jerome wrote, and again that "the whole world perished in one city"; refugees who had been rich arrived destitute at his monastery (Jerome, Letter 127.12) (Jerome, Preface to the Commentary on Ezekiel, books 1, 3 and 7).

Augustine, bishop of Hippo Regius, met a different response. In his own later account, worshippers of the many gods blamed the fall of Rome on the Christian religion and blasphemed the true God more bitterly than before, and for that reason he began to write the City of God. The work occupied him for years and grew to twenty-two books: ten against those who hold that the gods must be worshipped for the sake of this life or the next, and twelve on the origin, course and appointed ends of two cities (Augustine, Retractations 2.43). He defines the two by what they love: "the earthly by the love of self, even to the contempt of God; the heavenly by the love of God, even to the contempt of self" (Augustine, City of God 14.28).

His answer starts from that distinction. The city of God, he writes in the preface, sojourns in this world as a stranger, while the earthly city, though mistress of the nations, is itself ruled by its lust for rule (Augustine, City of God 1, preface).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Prosper's chronicle enters the capture of Rome by the Goths under Alaric in the consulship of Varanes, which is 410, and one branch of its manuscripts adds the day, the ninth before the Kalends of September, 24 August (Prosper, Chronicle 1240 (AD 410)). Orosius gives the year as 1164 from the founding of the city and says that the Goths left on the third day (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.40.1) (Orosius, History against the Pagans 7.39). The day, and with it the month, rest on that addition to Prosper.

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
7.10

Seven Books of History against the Pagans Paulus Orosius · c. AD 417
7.37.17; 7.39; 7.40.1

Church History Sozomen · c. AD 439–450
9.9

Letters Jerome · c. AD 370–419
127.12; 127.13–14

Chronicle Prosper of Aquitaine · c. AD 433–455
1240 (AD 410)

The City of God Augustine of Hippo · AD 413–426
1.1; 1.7; 14.28; 1, preface

Prefaces to the Latin Bible and to his Commentaries Jerome · c. AD 383–405 to the Commentary on Ezekiel, books 1, 3 and 7

Retractations Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 426–427
2.43

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Hippo Regius
Who Alaric, Augustine of Hippo
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Conversion of Augustine AD 386 640

The Edict of Thessalonica 27 February AD 380 628

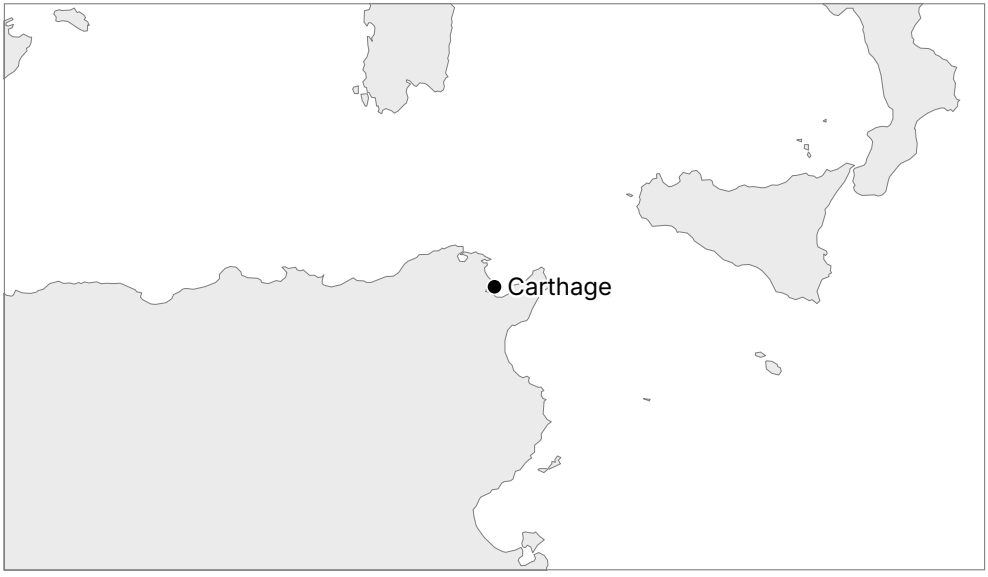
LEADS TO

The End of the Western Roman Empire AD 476 686

CHURCH AND STATE

John Chrysostom, Preacher and Exile Before · AD 398–407 652

The End of the Western Roman Empire After · AD 476 686



← The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon Earlier · 1 February AD 410
→ Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace Later · AD 411–418

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace

AD 411–418 · Estimated date

The monk Pelagius teaches that God made human nature able to choose the good and commands nothing impossible. Augustine answers that fallen nature can do no good without the grace of Christ. African councils and the bishops of Rome condemn Pelagius's teaching in 418.

Pelagius was a monk from Britain who lived at Rome, where, Augustine says, he was spoken of with great praise (Prosper, Chronicle 1252 (AD 413)) (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 44, 62) (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 46). In his letter to the noblewoman Demetrias he says that he always begins by showing what human nature can do: God made it good and gave it the power to choose either good or evil (Pelagius, Letter to Demetrias 2–3). What makes goodness hard is the long habit of sinning (Pelagius, Letter to Demetrias 8). Those who plead that the commandments are too hard for mere human beings accuse God of not knowing what he made, and a just God has commanded nothing impossible (Pelagius, Letter to Demetrias 16). In another work, as Augustine quotes it, he distinguished three things: the ability to do good, which is from God, and the will and the deed, which are our own (Augustine, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin 1.5). Augustine of Hippo reports that Pelagius was angered at Rome by a prayer in the Confessions: "Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt" (Augustine, Confessions 10.29.40) (Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance 20.53).

Pelagius passed through Africa and sailed on (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 46). His disciple Caelestius was tried at Carthage before bishop Aurelius of Carthage. Accused of teaching that Adam's sin harmed Adam alone and that infants are born as Adam was before he sinned, he would not condemn those statements, and the bishops condemned him (Augustine, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin 2.2–4) (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 23).

Augustine then wrote against the teaching, at first without naming Pelagius. Human nature, he argued, was created sound, but as it is now born from Adam it "wants the Physician, because it is not sound"; the grace of Christ that heals it is not a reward for merit but is given freely (Augustine, On Nature and Grace 3–4).

A few years later a synod of fourteen bishops in Palestine heard Pelagius and, on his answers, declared him to be in the communion of the church (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 44, 62). The African bishops wrote to Innocent of Rome, who replied that Pelagius had evaded the charges (Augustine, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin 2.10). Innocent's successor Zosimus at first gave Caelestius a hearing and time to clear himself (Augustine, On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin 2.7–8). On 1 May 418 a council at Carthage under Aurelius issued canons against anyone who says that Adam would have died even without sin, that infants have no original sin to be remitted in baptism, that grace only forgives past sins or only teaches what is commanded, or that the commandments could be kept without grace, though less easily (Council of Carthage (418) canons 109–113). Zosimus accepted the decrees, the emperor Honorius legislated against the Pelagians, and Prosper could write that the heresy was condemned throughout the world (Prosper, Chronicle 1266 (AD 418)) (Possidius, Life of Augustine 18).

In 431 the Council of Ephesus named the teaching of Caelestius beside that of Nestorius (Council of Ephesus (431) canon 4). The argument did not end there:

in his last years Augustine was still writing on predestination for Christians who accepted original sin and the need of grace but could not follow him further (Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance companion book, On the Predestination of the Saints 1–2).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The end of the range is fixed. The canons of Carthage are dated to the Kalends of May in the consulship of Honorius for the twelfth time and Theodosius for the eighth, 1 May 418 (Council of Carthage (418) heading), and Prosper enters the general condemnation under the same year (Prosper, Chronicle 1266 (AD 418)).

The beginning is less exact. Augustine says that Pelagius passed through Africa while he himself was preparing for the conference with the Donatists, and that the trial of Caelestius at Carthage followed (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 46). That conference met in 411 (see the Donatist Schism and the Council of Arles), so the trial belongs to 411 or 412. Prosper enters the rise of Pelagius's teaching under 413 (Prosper, Chronicle 1252 (AD 413)). Augustine places the acquittal of Pelagius in Palestine "a few years" after the trial of Caelestius (Augustine, On the Proceedings of Pelagius 44, 62).

Primary sources

Chronicle Prosper of Aquitaine · c. AD 433–455
1252 (AD 413); 1266 (AD 418)

On the Proceedings of Pelagius Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 417
44, 62; 46; 23

Letter to Demetrias Pelagius · c. AD 413–414
2–3; 8; 16

On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin Augustine of Hippo · AD 418
1.5; 2.2–4; 2.10; 2.7–8

Confessions Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 397–400
10.29.40

On the Gift of Perseverance Augustine of Hippo · c. AD 428–429
20.53; companion book, On the Predestination of the Saints 1–2

On Nature and Grace Augustine of Hippo · AD 415
3–4

Canons of the Council of Carthage (418) The Council of Carthage · 1 May 418 canons 109–113; heading

Life of Augustine Possidius of Calama · c. AD 431–439
18

Acts and Documents of the Council of Ephesus (431) The Council of Ephesus · AD 430–433
canon 4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Carthage
Who Augustine of Hippo, Pelagius, Aurelius of Carthage Threads Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Conversion of Augustine AD 386 640

LEADS TO

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus 1653–1713 1191

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon Before · 1 February AD 410 656

The Council of Ephesus After · June AD 431 668

← The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God Earlier · August AD 410
→ The Council of Ephesus Later · June AD 431

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Council of Ephesus

June AD 431 · Firm date

A council led by Cyril of Alexandria deposes Nestorius of Constantinople and upholds the title Theotokos, God-bearer, for Mary. The bishops of Antioch dissent until 433. The council long divides the Church of the East, beyond the Roman frontier, from the churches that receive it.

In April 428 Nestorius, a preacher from Antioch, was made bishop of Constantinople (Socrates, Church History 7.29). One of his presbyters preached that Mary should not be called Theotokos, "God-bearer", because God cannot be born of a woman, and Nestorius defended him. The historian Socrates, who read his sermons, concluded that Nestorius did not deny that Christ is God but was frightened by a word (Socrates, Church History 7.32).

Cyril of Alexandria wrote to correct him. The Word of God, he says, "having personally united to himself flesh animated by a rational soul", became man; the natures remain distinct, but "the two natures being brought together in a true union, there is of both one Christ and one Son". Because the body that was born and suffered was the Word's own, the Word himself is said to have been born and to have suffered, and the fathers rightly called the Virgin Mother of God (Council of Ephesus (431) Cyril, second letter to Nestorius).

Nestorius replied that the creed first names the Lord Jesus Christ, titles common to the godhead and the manhood, and only then speaks of birth and suffering. Scripture, he wrote, assigns these to Christ's humanity and never to the godhead, so that Mary is more exactly called mother of Christ than mother of God. The body is the temple of the deity; to make the divine Word himself the subject of birth and death is the error of Apollinarius and Arius (Council of Ephesus (431) Nestorius, second letter to Cyril).

The emperor Theodosius II summoned the bishops to Ephesus. Cyril and his supporters opened the council before John of Antioch and the Syrian bishops had arrived. Nestorius refused to appear and was deposed "with many tears" (Socrates, Church History 7.34) (Council of Ephesus (431) decree against Nestorius). The legates of the bishop of Rome came later and confirmed the sentence (Council of Ephesus (431) session 3). Nestorius's supporters, joined by John, declared Cyril deposed in turn, but the sentence against Nestorius stood and he was exiled (Socrates, Church History 7.34).

In 433 Cyril and John made peace on a statement that Christ is perfect God and perfect man, of one substance with the Father in his divinity and with us in his humanity, "for there became a union of two natures", and that the Virgin is therefore Mother of God (Council of Ephesus (431) Cyril to John of Antioch (433)). The Council of Chalcedon in 451 received Cyril's synodical letters to Nestorius and to the eastern bishops (Definition of Chalcedon).

The church of the Persian empire, with its own catholicos and synods (see the Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon), lay beyond the Roman frontier. Its descendant, the Assyrian Church of the East, prays to Mary as the Mother of Christ, our God and Saviour (Common Christological Declaration (1994)). In 1994 its Catholicos-Patriarch and the pope confessed a common faith in Christ, recognised that title and Mother of God as legitimate expressions of it, and said that the divisions which followed the old controversies and anathemas were due in large part to misunderstandings (Common Christological Declaration (1994)). The joint commission of the two churches wrote in 2017 that this ended an age-old controversy over the Christological implications and consequences of the Council of Ephesus (Catholic–Assyrian Common Statement on Sacramental Life (2017) introduction).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Socrates, a contemporary living in Constantinople, places the council after Easter in the consulship of Bassus and Antiochus, which is 431, and dates its outcome to 28 June (Socrates, Church History 7.34). The minutes of the session that deposed Nestorius are dated 22 June in the editions of the acts; that heading is not in the public-domain extracts cited here, and the day is taken from the introduction to Norman P. Tanner (ed.), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils (1990). The same introduction dates the peace between Cyril and John of Antioch to April 433.

Primary sources

Church History Socrates of Constantinople · c. AD 439–443
7.29; 7.32; 7.34

Acts and Documents of the Council of Ephesus (431) The Council of Ephesus · AD 430–433
Cyril, second letter to Nestorius; Nestorius, second letter to Cyril; decree against Nestorius; session 3; Cyril to John of Antioch (433)

The Definition of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · AD 451
ccel.org

Common Christological Declaration between the Catholic Church and the Assyrian Church of the East Pope John Paul II and Mar Dinkha IV · 11 November 1994
vatican.va

Common Statement on “Sacramental Life” Joint Committee for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Assyrian Church of the East · 24 November 2017
introduction

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Ephesus
Who Cyril of Alexandria, Nestorius, Theodosius II
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632

LEADS TO

The Second Council of Ephesus August AD 449 676

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception 8 December 1854 1305

The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary 1 November 1950 1414

Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed 1973–1994 1445

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

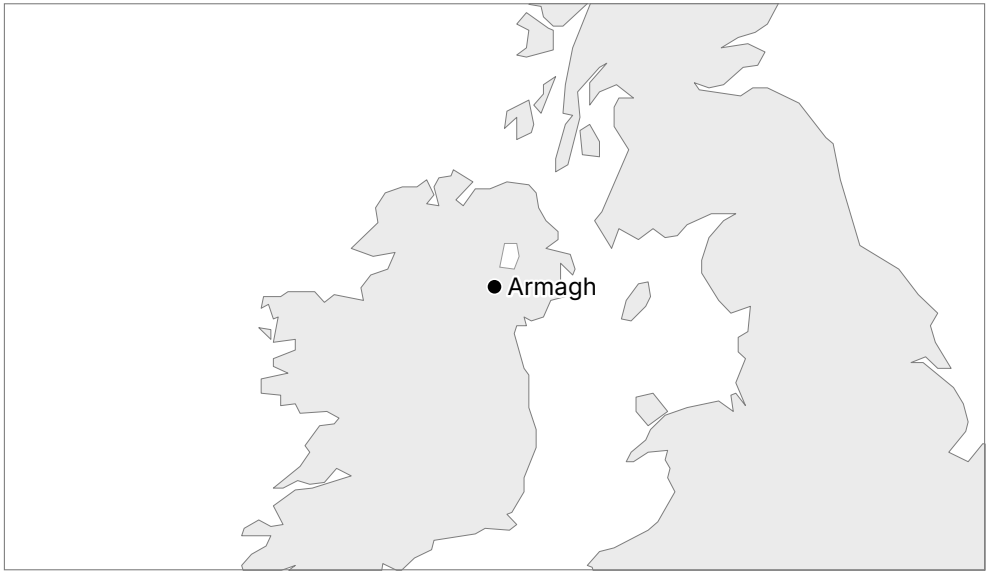
Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace Before · AD 411–418 664

The Second Council of Ephesus After · August AD 449 676

EAST AND WEST

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon Before · 1 February AD 410 656

The Second Council of Ephesus After · August AD 449 676



← Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace Earlier · AD 411–418
→ Patrick's Mission to Ireland Later · c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional)

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Patrick's Mission to Ireland

c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional) · Traditional date

Patrick, a Briton once enslaved in Ireland, returns there as a bishop and stays for life, baptising and ordaining clergy. Almost all that is known of him comes from his own two writings; his dates rest on annals compiled much later.

Almost everything that can be known about Patrick comes from two short Latin texts he wrote himself: a Confession composed in old age (Patrick, Confession 10) and an open letter to the soldiers of a ruler called Coroticus (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 1–3).

He was a Briton: he writes of his parents and his home country in Britain (Patrick, Confession 23) (Patrick, Confession 43). He was the son of a deacon named Calpornius and grandson of a priest, from a village he calls Bannavem Taburniae; his father also held the civic rank of decurion (Patrick, Confession 1) (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 10). At about sixteen he was carried off to Ireland as a captive, with thousands of others (Patrick, Confession 1). For six years he herded animals, and he writes that in those years he began to pray, by day and by night. A voice in his sleep told him that a ship was ready; he walked some two hundred miles to find it and got away (Patrick, Confession 16–19).

Some years later, at home in Britain, he saw in a dream a man called Victoricus carrying letters from Ireland. As he read one he seemed to hear the people who lived beside the wood of Voclut, near the western sea, calling him to come and walk among them again (Patrick, Confession 23). He went back as a bishop (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 1–3). He writes that he baptised thousands, ordained clergy, travelled to places where no one had yet come to baptise, gave gifts to kings and judges, and was once robbed and held in irons for fourteen days (Patrick, Confession 50–53). Sons and daughters of Irish rulers became monks and virgins of Christ, and so did women held in slavery, who suffered most for it (Patrick, Confession 41–42).

His mission had critics. At a hearing held in his absence his seniors brought up a sin of his boyhood, confessed before he was made deacon and disclosed by a close friend (Patrick, Confession 26–27, 32). The Confession is his answer. He wished to visit Britain and Gaul but believed himself bound to stay in Ireland for life (Patrick, Confession 43), and he calls the work a gift of God (Patrick, Confession 62). When the soldiers of Coroticus killed some of his newly baptised converts and carried off others, he told Christians not to eat or drink with them or take their alms until they did penance and freed the captives (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 1–3) (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 7).

Patrick was not the only bishop sent to Ireland. Bede and the Irish annals both record that Pope Celestine sent Palladius as first bishop to the Irish, and Bede's notice speaks of Irish who already believed in Christ (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.13) (Annals of Ulster 431–432). Nor does Patrick name any church he founded. The link with Armagh is found some two centuries later, in the Life by Muirchú, where a local lord gives him the hill on which the church stands (Muirchú, Life of Patrick 1.24). In the sixth century Columba, a monk from Ireland, crossed to Britain to preach to the northern Picts (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.4) (Columba Founds Iona).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

Patrick's two writings give no date, name no ruler whose dates are known and mention no datable event. He says only that he writes in old age (Patrick, Confession 10) and that the Franks are still pagans (Patrick, Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus 14), which points to the fifth century.

The years on the timeline come from the Irish annals, compiled centuries later. The Annals of Ulster put the sending of Palladius in 431 and Patrick's arrival in 432 (Annals of Ulster 431–432). They then enter his death three times: under 457 for "the elder Patrick", under 461 with the words "here some record", and under 492 and 493, where he is said to have died in the sixtieth year after he came (Annals of Ulster 457, 461, 492–493). The annalists record more than one tradition, and historians remain divided between a death about 461 and one about 493. J. B. Bury, The Life of St. Patrick and His Place in History (1905), argued for 461; the essays in David N. Dumville and others, Saint Patrick, A.D. 493–1993 (1993), collect the evidence and favour 493. The annal for 432 itself appeals to the reckoning of later chroniclers, Bede, Marcellinus and Isidore (Annals of Ulster 431–432).

Primary sources

Confession Patrick · Fifth century, in Patrick's old age
10; 23; 43; 1; 16–19; 50–53; 41–42; 26–27, 32; 62

Letter to the Soldiers of Coroticus Patrick · Fifth century
1–3; 10; 7; 14

Ecclesiastical History of the English People Bede · AD 731
1.13; 3.4

The Annals of Ulster Manuscripts of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, compiled from older annals
431–432; 457, 461, 492–493

Life of Saint Patrick Muirchú moccu Machthéni · Late seventh century, before AD 700
1.24

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Armagh
Who Patrick
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

LEADS TO

Columba Founds Iona AD 563 725

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon Before · 1 February AD 410 656

The Baptism of Clovis After · c. AD 496–508 695

← The Council of Ephesus Earlier · June AD 431
→ The Second Council of Ephesus Later · August AD 449

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Second Council of Ephesus

August AD 449 · Firm date

A council under Dioscorus of Alexandria restores the monk Eutyches and deposes Flavian of Constantinople and other bishops as followers of Nestorius. The emperor confirms it; Leo of Rome rejects it as a meeting of robbers. Chalcedon overturns it two years later.

A synod at Constantinople under its bishop Flavian of Constantinople, acting on a charge brought by Eusebius of Dorylaeum, had deposed the archimandrite Eutyches, who confessed that Christ was from two natures before the union but allowed only one nature after it (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 1.9–10). Leo I of Rome, in the letter to Flavian known as the Tome, called that statement absurd (Leo, Letters 28.6 (the Tome)). The emperor Theodosius II summoned a council to meet at Ephesus on 1 August 449 to end the controversy (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 6–7). Evagrius, who accepted Chalcedon, says that Dioscorus of Alexandria was made president through Chrysaphius, a court official hostile to Flavian, and that those who had judged Eutyches were to attend without a vote (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 1.10).

The first session is described by both sides. Flavian wrote to Leo that Dioscorus had the statement of Eutyches read, declared him orthodox and restored him, and then moved the condemnation of Flavian and of Eusebius; that Leo's letters were not read; and that when he appealed to the Roman see soldiers surrounded him (Flavian, Appeal to Leo). Leo learned from his deacon Hilarus, who had escaped, that his legates had protested in the council (Leo, Letters 44.1–3). When the minutes were read at Chalcedon in 451 they showed that Leo's letter had not been read. Dioscorus said that he had twice proposed it, and bishops who had signed said that they had done so under compulsion, with soldiers around them (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.18). The Syriac chronicle that goes under the name of Zachariah, written by opponents of Chalcedon, says that the acts of the trial of Eutyches were examined, that Flavian and Eusebius were removed, and that Eutyches was received because he presented a recantation and confessed the true faith (Zachariah, Chronicle 2.3).

The minutes of a later session survive in Syriac. On 22 August, in the church called Mary, the council heard that the Roman envoys would not attend, since their commission covered only the case of Eutyches, and that Domnus of Antioch was ill (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 13–14) (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 21–26). It deposed Ibas of Edessa (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 134–145); Theodoret of Cyrrhus, whom Dioscorus charged with writing against Cyril of Alexandria (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 251–254); and Domnus himself, as opposed to Cyril and to the council of 431 and a follower of Nestorius (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 359–362).

Theodosius confirmed the council by an edict, which says that Flavian and Eusebius had revived the error of Nestorius and that they, Domnus and Theodoret had been deposed as unworthy of their office (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts p. 366). In the letters that follow it he speaks of two holy and ecumenical synods held by his will and orders all bishops to subscribe (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 369–370). Leo, with a synod at Rome, asked him to leave everything as it had been until a larger council could meet in Italy (Leo, Letters 44.1–3). In July 451 Leo wrote to the empress Pulcheria of "that meeting, not of judges but of robbers, at Ephesus" (Leo, Letters 95.2); his Latin word is latrocinium (Leo, Letters 95.2, the Latin as quoted by T. H. Bindley, The Oecumenical Documents of the Faith (1906), p. 220). The name "Robber Council", or Latrocinium, which the English editor of the acts of Chalcedon uses in his summaries (Council of Chalcedon session 1), is therefore Leo's; the council's own minutes call it holy and ecumenical (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 21–26). At Chalcedon the presiding officials ruled that Flavian had been unjustly deposed, and the bishops deposed Dioscorus (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.18).

Those who did not receive Chalcedon wrote of the council differently. The Syriac chronicle from their side counts it as the second synod of Ephesus (Zachariah, Chronicle 2.3), and the Syriac copy of its acts, made in 535, ends by naming "the holy and God-loving Dioscorus" (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 376–377). The Coptic Synaxarium, the book of commemorations read in the liturgy of the Coptic Orthodox Church, keeps his day on 7 Tout and calls him "the great champion of Orthodoxy" (Coptic Synaxarium 7 Tout). The same tradition rejected the teaching ascribed to Eutyches: the chronicle says that he rejected the truth of the body taken from the Virgin (Zachariah, Chronicle 2.2). In 1990 a joint commission of the Eastern Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox churches condemned the Eutychian heresy together and recommended that each side lift its condemnations of the other's councils and fathers (Orthodox–Oriental Orthodox Agreed Statement (1990) 1, 10).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The emperor's letter of 30 March summoned the bishops to Ephesus for 1 August (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 6–7). The Syriac acts date the session they record to 29 Mesori in the year after the consulship of Zeno and Postumianus (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts pp. 13–14), which is 22 August 449. For the opening session Flavian's appeal names a Monday in August, "the sixth" in the text as it stands (Flavian, Appeal to Leo); S. G. F. Perry, in a note to his translation of the acts (The Second Synod of Ephesus, 1881), puts formalities on 8 August and the start of the council's proper work on the 10th (Second Council of Ephesus, Syriac acts p. 20, translator's note); 8 August 449 was a Monday. Leo's protest to the emperor is dated 13 October in the consulship of Asturius and Protogenes, which is 449 (Leo, Letters 44.1–3).

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
1.9–10; 1.10; 2.18

Letters Leo I, bishop of Rome · AD 440–461
28.6 (the Tome); 44.1–3; 95.2; 95.2, the Latin as quoted by T. H. Bindley, The Oecumenical Documents of the Faith (1906), p. 220

Syriac Acts of the Second Council of Ephesus (449) The Second Council of Ephesus · August AD 449; Syriac manuscript dated AD 535
pp. 6–7; pp. 13–14; pp. 21–26; pp. 134–145; pp. 251–254; pp. 359–362; p. 366; pp. 369–370; pp. 376–377; p. 20, translator's note

Appeal to Leo (Appellatio Flaviani) Flavian, bishop of Constantinople · August AD 449 earlychurchtexts.com

The Syriac Chronicle Known as That of Zachariah of Mitylene Zachariah the Rhetor, in an anonymous Syriac compilation · Greek original between AD 491 and 518; Syriac compilation completed AD 569
2.3; 2.2

Acts and Canons of the Council of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · October–November AD 451
session 1

Coptic Synaxarium
7 Tout

Second Agreed Statement of the Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches · 28 September 1990
1, 10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Ephesus
Who Dioscorus of Alexandria, Flavian of Constantinople, Eutyches, Leo I, Theodosius II
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Ephesus June AD 431 668

LEADS TO

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed 1973–1994 1445

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Ephesus Before · June AD 431 668

The Council of Chalcedon After · October AD 451 681

EAST AND WEST

The Council of Ephesus Before · June AD 431 668

The Council of Chalcedon After · October AD 451 681

← Patrick's Mission to Ireland Earlier · c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional)
→ The Council of Chalcedon Later · October AD 451

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Council of Chalcedon

October AD 451 · Firm date

A council called by the emperor Marcian confesses Christ as one person in two natures, divine and human, and ranks Constantinople next after Rome. The Greek and Latin churches receive it; the Coptic, Syriac Orthodox, Armenian and Ethiopian churches do not.

A synod at Constantinople under its bishop Flavian had condemned the monk Eutyches, who confessed two natures in Christ before the union and only one after it (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 1.9). Leo I of Rome supported Flavian in his Tome, which teaches that each nature keeps its own properties and that both meet in one person (Leo, Letters 28.3–5 (the Tome)). In 449 a council at Ephesus under Dioscorus of Alexandria restored Eutyches and deposed Flavian (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 1.10) (Leo, Letters 44.1). Leo called it a meeting "not of judges but of robbers" (Leo, Letters 95.2). The next emperor, Marcian, who owed his throne to the empress Pulcheria and married her, summoned a new council (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.1–2).

It met in October 451 in the church of the martyr Euphemia at Chalcedon (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.3) (Council of Chalcedon session 3, sentence on Dioscorus). Leo's legates objected that Dioscorus had come to be judged and must not sit as a judge; he was seated in the middle, and the minutes of Ephesus were read; Dioscorus said that he accepted "of two" natures but not "two" (Council of Chalcedon session 1). He did not answer three summonses and was deposed for disregarding the canons and disobeying the council (Council of Chalcedon session 3, sentence on Dioscorus).

The bishops at first refused to write a new statement of faith (Council of Chalcedon session 2). When the Tome was read they cried out that Peter had spoken through Leo and that Leo and Cyril taught the same (Council of Chalcedon session 2, after the Tome). A first draft did not satisfy the Roman legates, who threatened to leave; the emperor's officials asked whether the bishops followed Dioscorus or Leo, and a committee wrote a new text (Council of Chalcedon session 5). This Definition confesses one and the same Christ, perfect in Godhead and in manhood, "in two natures, unconfusedly, immutably, indivisibly, inseparably", the property of each nature being preserved and united in one person and subsistence (Definition of Chalcedon). Marcian attended the session that followed (Council of Chalcedon session 6).

Canon 28 gave the see of Constantinople, as the imperial city, privileges equal to those of old Rome and the rank next after it (Council of Chalcedon canon 28). The Roman legates, absent when it was voted, protested (Council of Chalcedon session 16). Leo welcomed the council's judgment on the faith but annulled this canon as contrary to those of Nicaea: a city could be royal, he wrote, without being an apostolic see (Leo, Letters 104.1–3) (Leo, Letters 105.2–3). The Eastern churches kept the canon and renewed it in 692 (Council in Trullo canon 36).

The Greek and Latin churches received the Definition; Gregory the Great later wrote that he revered the four councils like the four Gospels (Gregory the Great, Letters 1.25). Many in Egypt and Palestine refused it; Alexandria rose against the bishop appointed in place of Dioscorus, and he was later killed (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.5, 2.8). A historian of that side honours Dioscorus as a confessor and confesses Christ as one nature from two (Zachariah, Chronicle 3.1–2); Cyril had written that the incarnate nature of the Word is, after the union, conceived of as one (Cyril, Against Nestorius 2, preface). The Coptic, Syriac, Armenian and Ethiopian churches, with others, form the Oriental Orthodox family (Catholic–Oriental Orthodox Commission, Report (2016)). They condemn the teaching of Eutyches, receive the first three councils and keep Cyril's wording (Orthodox–Oriental Orthodox Agreed Statement (1990) 1, 7–8). Modern agreements are told under Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The council's own records fix the date. The sentence on Dioscorus says that he was deposed on 13 October (Council of Chalcedon session 3, sentence on Dioscorus), and the letters around the council are dated by consuls: Leo's protest against the council of Ephesus on 13 October in the consulship of Asturius and Protogenes, which is 449 (Leo, Letters 44.1); his letter to the empress about the coming council on 20 July in the consulship of Adelfius, which is 451 (Leo, Letters 95.2); and his replies about canon 28 on 22 May in the consulship of Herculanus, which is 452 (Leo, Letters 104.1–3). The complete acts date each session by day; the extracts translated by Percival leave those headings out.

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
1.9; 1.10; 2.1–2; 2.3; 2.5, 2.8

Letters Leo I, bishop of Rome · AD 440–461
28.3–5 (the Tome); 44.1; 95.2; 104.1–3; 105.2–3

Acts and Canons of the Council of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · October–November AD 451
session 3, sentence on Dioscorus; session 1; session 2; session 2, after the Tome; session 5; session 6; canon 28; session 16

The Definition of Chalcedon The Council of Chalcedon · AD 451
ccel.org

Canons of the Council in Trullo The Council in Trullo (Quinisext Council) · AD 692
canon 36

Register of Letters Gregory the Great · AD 590–604
1.25

The Syriac Chronicle Known as That of Zachariah of Mitylene Zachariah the Rhetor, in an anonymous Syriac compilation · Greek original between AD 491 and 518; Syriac compilation completed AD 569
3.1–2

Five Tomes Against Nestorius Cyril of Alexandria · c. AD 430
2, preface

Report of the Thirteenth Meeting of the International Joint Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches International Joint Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches · 6 February 2016
christianunity.va

Second Agreed Statement of the Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches · 28 September 1990
1, 7–8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Chalcedon
Who Leo I, Marcian, Pulcheria, Dioscorus of Alexandria
Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Ephesus June AD 431 668

The Second Council of Ephesus August AD 449 676

LEADS TO

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism AD 482–519 690

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church c. AD 542–578 712

The Second Council of Constantinople AD 553 721

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English AD 590–604 733

The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed 1973–1994 1445

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Second Council of Ephesus Before · August AD 449 676

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism After · AD 482–519 690

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Cyprian on the Unity of the Church Before · AD 251–258 544

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church After · c. AD 542–578 712

EAST AND WEST

The Second Council of Ephesus Before · August AD 449 676

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism After · AD 482–519 690

← The Second Council of Ephesus Earlier · August AD 449
→ The End of the Western Roman Empire Later · AD 476

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The End of the Western Roman Empire

AD 476 · Firm date

The general Odoacer deposes the boy emperor Romulus Augustulus at Ravenna and rules Italy as king. No Western emperor follows, and the bishops of Rome begin to deal with distant emperors and with kings of another confession.

In 475 the general Orestes drove the emperor Nepos out of Italy and set his own young son on the throne. The boy's name was Romulus (Anonymus Valesianus 8.37–38); because of his age the Romans called him Augustulus, "the little Augustus" (Anonymus Valesianus 7.36) (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 475) (Procopius, Wars 5.1.2–8).

Procopius, writing some seventy years later, says that the barbarian troops in Roman service demanded a third of the land of Italy and that Orestes refused (Procopius, Wars 5.1.2–8). Odoacer, at the head of a force of Sciri, killed Orestes at Placentia, entered Ravenna and deposed the emperor. Because the boy was so young he spared his life, gave him an income of six thousand gold pieces and sent him to live with his relatives in Campania (Anonymus Valesianus 8.37–38). Odoacer then ruled Italy as king (Anonymus Valesianus 10.45–48).

Sources of the following decades do not agree on what had happened. Marcellinus, a chronicler in the East, writes under the year 476 that the Western empire of the Roman people, begun by Augustus, perished with this Augustulus, and that Gothic kings held Rome from then on (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 476). Others describe a change of ruler inside an empire that continued. Procopius treats Odoacer as a soldier who seized power (Procopius, Wars 5.1.2–8). The Anonymus Valesianus says that Theoderic the Ostrogoth, who overthrew Odoacer, was sent by the emperor Zeno to hold Italy for him until he should come himself (Anonymus Valesianus 11.49), and a letter written in Theoderic's name calls his kingdom a copy of the only empire (Cassiodorus, Variae 1.1). On the Danube frontier Eugippius, writing in 511, speaks of Roman rule as a thing of the past: the soldiers' pay stopped coming and the garrisons dissolved (Eugippius, Life of Severinus 20).

For the church the new situation was that Italy's rulers were Arian Christians, though the Anonymus says that Theoderic did nothing against the Catholic religion (Anonymus Valesianus 10.45–48) (Anonymus Valesianus 12.60), while the emperor lived far away in Constantinople. In 494 Pope Gelasius I wrote to the emperor Anastasius that the world is ruled by two powers, the "sacred authority of the priests" and the "royal power"; that the priests bear the heavier charge, since they must answer to God for kings as well; and that in divine things the emperor should obey the bishops, as they obey his laws in public affairs (Gelasius, Letter to Anastasius). The distinction between the two powers runs through the later history of Church and State.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Marcellinus, whose Latin chronicle is paraphrased here, enters the deposition under the consulship of Basiliscus and Armatus, which is 476 (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 476). The narrative sources used here give no day. The year is not disputed; what is debated is how much it meant. The same chronicler had already written, under 454, that the Western realm fell with the murder of Aetius (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 454), and the deposed emperor Nepos lived on in Dalmatia for some years after 476 (Anonymus Valesianus 7.36).

Primary sources

Anonymus Valesianus, Latter Part (Chronica Theodericiana) c. AD 550
8.37–38; 7.36; 10.45–48; 11.49; 12.60

Chronicle Marcellinus Comes · First edition to AD 518, continued by the author to 534 and by another hand to 548 under the year 475; under the year 476; under the year 454

History of the Wars Procopius of Caesarea · Mid sixth century, c. AD 550–554
5.1.2–8

Variae Cassiodorus · Letters of the early sixth century, to about AD 538
1.1

Life of Saint Severinus Eugippius · AD 511
20

Letter to the Emperor Anastasius (Duo sunt) Gelasius I, bishop of Rome · AD 494
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Ravenna
Who Romulus Augustulus, Odoacer, Gelasius I
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God August AD 410 660

LEADS TO

The Baptism of Clovis c. AD 496–508 695

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor 25 December AD 800 778

CHURCH AND STATE

The Sack of Rome and Augustine's City of God Before · August AD 410 660

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism After · AD 482–519 690

← The Council of Chalcedon Earlier · October AD 451

→ The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism Later · AD 482–519

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism

AD 482–519 · Firm date

The emperor Zeno tries to reunite the supporters and opponents of Chalcedon with a statement of faith that neither adopts nor expressly condemns the council. Rome answers by declaring Acacius of Constantinople deposed, and the two sees stay out of communion for thirty-five years.

After Chalcedon the people of Alexandria were divided between those who wanted Dioscorus back and those who upheld Proterius, the bishop appointed in his place (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 2.5). A generation later, when the see fell vacant, the emperor Zeno expelled John, who had obtained it, and restored Peter, surnamed Mongus, on condition that he sign a statement which the emperor addressed to the Alexandrians and that he admit the party of Proterius to communion (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.11–12). Evagrius and the Syriac chronicle of Zachariah both say that the statement was framed on the advice of Acacius of Constantinople, bishop of Constantinople (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.13) (Zachariah, Chronicle 5.7–8). It is known as the Henotikon, the instrument of union.

The Henotikon declares that the only creed is that of the 318 fathers of Nicaea, confirmed by the 150 at Constantinople and followed at Ephesus. It anathematises Nestorius and Eutyches alike, receives the twelve chapters of Cyril of Alexandria, and confesses Christ as consubstantial with the Father in his Godhead and with us in his manhood, "one and not two", whose miracles and sufferings are those of a single person. It does not use the language of one nature or of two. Of Chalcedon it says only that anyone who has held another opinion, "whether at Chalcedon or in any synod whatever", is anathematised (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.14).

Peter signed (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.13), and so did Peter the Fuller, restored to the see of Antioch (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.16). The chronicle of Zachariah, written from the side opposed to Chalcedon, reports that clergy and monks in Egypt broke with Peter because neither the Henotikon nor the bishops' letters contained a clear anathema of the council and of Leo's Tome (Zachariah, Chronicle 6.1). Under the next emperor, Anastasius, Evagrius says, Chalcedon was neither openly proclaimed nor rejected by all: some bishops held to every word of it, some anathematised it, others kept to the Henotikon, and the emperor removed those who disturbed the practice of their region in either direction (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.30).

Rome refused the arrangement. Pope Simplicius protested in July 482 against giving Alexandria to Peter, whom he called a companion of heretics (Simplicius, Letters 18.2–3 (Thiel, pp. 208–212)). His successor Felix sent two bishops to Constantinople to demand that Chalcedon be upheld and Peter expelled; they held communion with Peter's party instead and were deposed on their return (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.18–21). On 28 July 484 Felix declared Acacius removed from his office and from catholic communion, charging him among other things with supporting Peter, whom Acacius had himself once reported to Rome as condemned (Felix III, Letters 6 (Thiel, pp. 243–246)) (Felix III, Letters 6, subscription (Thiel, p. 247)). Acacius, Evagrius reports from Zachariah, did not accept the sentence (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.18–21). In 494 Gelasius I wrote to Anastasius that there are two powers by which this world is chiefly ruled, "the sacred authority of the priests and the royal power", and that in things divine the emperor bows his head before the leaders of the clergy (Gelasius, Letter to Anastasius).

Embassies from Pope Hormisdas to Anastasius achieved nothing; the Liber Pontificalis has the emperor answer that he wished to give commands, not to receive them (Liber Pontificalis 54 (Hormisdas), Loomis pp. 125–127). Justin, who succeeded Anastasius (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.1), asked Rome for legates (Liber Pontificalis 54 (Hormisdas), Loomis pp. 127–129). On 28 March 519 John, bishop of Constantinople, signed the profession they brought (Formula of Hormisdas Collectio Avellana 159.8 (CSEL 35, p. 610)). It accepts the four councils and the letters of Leo, anathematises Acacius by name along with Dioscorus, Timothy Aelurus and the two Peters, and promises that those separated from the communion of the apostolic see shall not be named at the liturgy (Formula of Hormisdas Collectio Avellana 159.2–6 (CSEL 35, pp. 608–609)). The Roman account says that there was then harmony from East to West (Liber Pontificalis 54 (Hormisdas), Loomis pp. 127–129). Evagrius says that in the first year of Justin, Severus of Antioch, who anathematised Chalcedon daily, was ordered to be arrested and fled his see (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.4); what followed is told under Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The text of the Henotikon as Evagrius gives it carries no date (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.14). He ties it to the emperor's decision to give the see of Alexandria to Peter (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 3.11–12), and a letter of Pope Simplicius that already protests against that decision is dated on the Ides of July in the consulship of Severinus, which is 15 July 482 (Simplicius, Letters 18, subscription (Thiel, p. 212)). The sentence of Felix against Acacius is dated on the fifth day before the Kalends of August in the consulship of Venantius, 28 July 484 (Felix III, Letters 6, subscription (Thiel, p. 247)). The profession signed by John of Constantinople is dated 28 March in the consulship of Justin and Eutharic, which is 519 (Formula of Hormisdas Collectio Avellana 159.8 (CSEL 35, p. 610)).

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
2.5; 3.11–12; 3.13; 3.14; 3.16; 3.30; 3.18–21; 4.1; 4.4

The Syriac Chronicle Known as That of Zachariah of Mitylene Zachariah the Rhetor, in an anonymous Syriac compilation · Greek original between AD 491 and 518; Syriac compilation completed AD 569
5.7–8; 6.1

Letters Simplicius, bishop of Rome · AD 468–483
18.2–3 (Thiel, pp. 208–212); 18, subscription (Thiel, p. 212)

Letters Felix III, bishop of Rome · c. AD 483–492
6 (Thiel, pp. 243–246); 6, subscription (Thiel, p. 247)

Letter to the Emperor Anastasius (Duo sunt) Gelasius I, bishop of Rome · AD 494
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
54 (Hormisdas), Loomis pp. 125–127; 54 (Hormisdas), Loomis pp. 127–129

Formula of Hormisdas (the libellus signed by John of Constantinople) Signed at Constantinople, 28 March AD 519
Collectio Avellana 159.8 (CSEL 35, p. 610); Collectio Avellana 159.2–6 (CSEL 35, pp. 608–609)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Alexandria, Rome
Who Zeno, Acacius of Constantinople, Gelasius I, Hormisdas Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

LEADS TO

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church c. AD 542–578 712

The Second Council of Constantinople AD 553 721

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Chalcedon Before · October AD 451 681

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church After · c. AD 542–578 712

EAST AND WEST

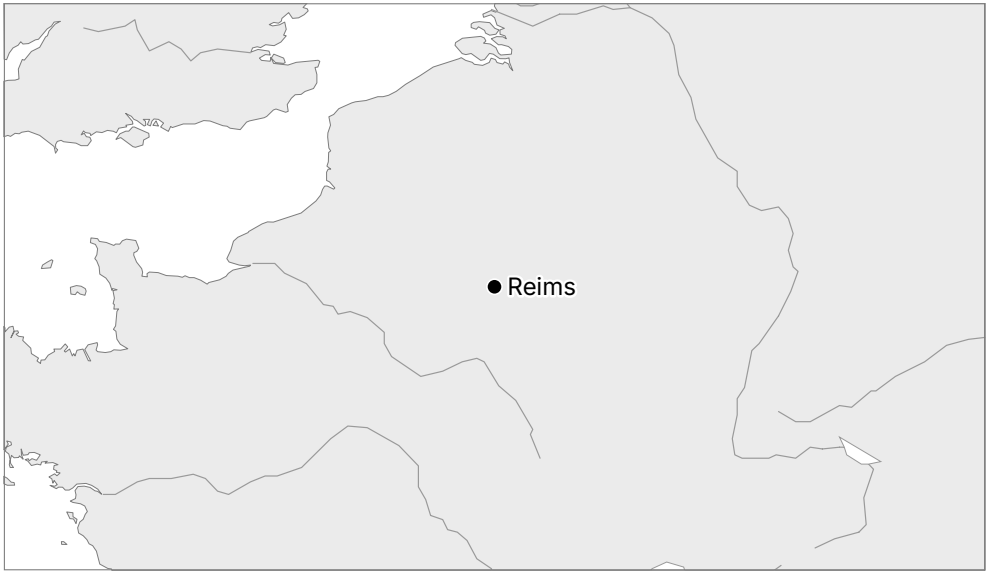
The Council of Chalcedon Before · October AD 451 681

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church After · c. AD 542–578 712

CHURCH AND STATE

The End of the Western Roman Empire Before · AD 476 686

The Baptism of Clovis After · c. AD 496–508 695



← The End of the Western Roman Empire Earlier · AD 476
→ The Baptism of Clovis Later · c. AD 496–508

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Baptism of Clovis

c. AD 496–508 · Estimated date

Clovis, king of the Franks, is baptised a Catholic Christian by Bishop Remigius of Reims, with many of his warriors. Unlike the Burgundian and Visigothic kings, who were Arians, he shares the faith of his Gallo-Roman subjects and their bishops.

When Clovis became king of the Franks he was a pagan, and the other Germanic kings who ruled in Gaul, the Burgundians and the Visigoths, were Arian Christians (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.27, 2.32, 2.37). Two accounts of his baptism are followed here: a letter written to him at the time by Bishop Avitus of Vienne, and the narrative of Gregory of Tours, composed some eighty years later.

Gregory tells the story through the queen. Clovis married Clotilde, a Burgundian princess and a Catholic. She had their first son baptised; the child died in his baptismal robes, and the king blamed her God. A second son was baptised, fell ill and recovered (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.28–29). Then, in a battle against the Alamanni which was going against him, Clovis called on "Jesus Christ, whom Clotilda asserts to be the son of the living God", and promised to be baptised if he won. The Alamanni broke and fled (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.30).

The queen sent for Remigius, bishop of Reims, who instructed the king in secret. Clovis feared that his people would not give up their gods, but when he met them they declared themselves ready to follow the God whom Remigius preached. The churches were hung with white curtains and the baptistery was filled with incense. Gregory calls the king "another Constantine" and gives the bishop the words: "worship what you burned; burn what you worshipped." More than three thousand of his army were baptised with him, and his sister Lanthechild, who had been an Arian, was received into the Catholic church (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.31).

The letter of Avitus is shorter and different in emphasis. Avitus says nothing of a battle or of the queen. He writes that the followers of various sects had tried to cloud the king's judgment, that Clovis in choosing for himself has judged for all, and that the king's faith is "our victory". The baptism took place at Christmas, before a large gathering of bishops; Avitus himself was not there. He urges the king to send envoys to spread the faith among pagan peoples further away (Avitus, Letter 46).

Gregory presents what followed as a religious war: Clovis marched against the Arian Visigoths saying that he could not bear to see them hold part of Gaul, and killed their king Alaric at Vouillé (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.27, 2.32, 2.37). By this baptism the king of the Franks came to share the creed of the bishops of Gaul, which the Arian kings around him did not (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.31). The later alliance of their successors with the bishops of Rome is told under the Donation of Pepin and the Papal States and Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No source gives a year. Gregory of Tours counts by the king's reign: the war with the Alamanni, and the vow that led to the baptism, fall in the fifteenth year (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.30), the battle of Vouillé in the twenty-fifth, and Clovis's death in the fifth year after Vouillé, after thirty years as king (Gregory of Tours, Histories 2.37, 2.43). With Vouillé placed in 507, this gives 496 or 497, the traditional date. But Gregory wrote some eighty years later, and his dates for the reign fall at intervals of five years.

The one contemporary witness, the letter of Avitus, gives the day, Christmas, and no year (Avitus, Letter 46). The letter is in Latin and is paraphrased here from Peiper's edition. Danuta Shanzer, "Dating the baptism of Clovis: the bishop of Vienne vs the bishop of Tours", Early Medieval Europe 7 (1998), pp. 29–57, argues from the letter that the baptism followed the war of 507 against the Visigoths and took place at Christmas 508. The timeline places the event at 496 and shows the range between the two.

Primary sources

Histories (History of the Franks) Gregory of Tours · c. AD 575–594
2.27, 2.32, 2.37; 2.28–29; 2.30; 2.31; 2.37, 2.43

Letter to King Clovis (Letter 46) Avitus of Vienne · Soon after the baptism, between c. AD 496 and 508
archive.org

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Reims
Who Clovis, Clotilde, Remigius
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The End of the Western Roman Empire AD 476 686

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Patrick's Mission to Ireland Before · c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional) 672

The Martyrs of Najran After · AD 523 (or 518) 699

CHURCH AND STATE

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism Before · AD 482–519 690

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia After · 27 December AD 537

← The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism Earlier · AD 482–519
→ The Martyrs of Najran Later · AD 523 (or 518)

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Martyrs of Najran

AD 523 (or 518) · Estimated date

Yusuf, the Jewish king of Himyar in south Arabia, makes war on the Christian town of Najran. Syriac writers report that he put its leading men, with their chief Harith (Arethas), and many women to death. Kaleb, king of Aksum, then crosses the sea and overthrows him.

A rock inscription at Bir Hima in south-western Arabia was cut for a commander of Yusuf As'ar Yath'ar, whom it calls king of all the tribes; the Syriac writers call him king of the Himyarites (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)). The inscription asks the blessing of the God of heaven and earth on the king and ends by invoking the Lord of the Jews. It says that the king burned the church and killed the Abyssinians at Zafar, made war on four other peoples and moved against Najran, and that the writer stood guard against Najran while the king held the coast against the Abyssinians. It counts more than twelve thousand killed and eleven thousand prisoners in the campaign (Ja 1028 lines 1–12). The commentary on the inscription notes that Arabic tradition remembers this king as Dhu Nuwas (Ja 1028 commentary of N. Nebes on lines 1 and 10–11).

What was done inside Najran is told by Christian writers in Syriac. Simeon of Beth Arsham, a bishop and envoy of the Christians of the Persian empire, wrote that he was in the camp of Mundhir, a king of the Saracens, when an envoy arrived with a letter from the king of the Himyarites. In the letter, as Simeon reports it, the king said that he had seized the throne on the death of the king whom the Ethiopians had set up, had killed 280 priests and the Ethiopians who guarded their church, and had turned it into a synagogue. He had then besieged "Nagrin", sworn safe conduct to its chiefs, and broken his oath. He burned the church with those who had taken refuge in it and the bones of the bishop, Paul, and called on the people to deny Christ and become Jews. When they would not, he put the leading men to death and then their wives (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)).

Simeon adds what a messenger sent to Najran reported: 340 leading men were killed. Their chief, the aged Harith son of Khanab, told the king that he would not deny Christ; he was beheaded with his companions in a wadi (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)). In Greek he is Arethas (Book of the Himyarites introduction, pp. xxiv–xxvi). The Book of the Himyarites, a Syriac work that survives in fragments, calls the king Masruq, tells in its chapter headings of the burning of the church of Najran with its clergy and of the deaths of men, women and children (Book of the Himyarites index of chapters 7–27 (Moberg, pp. cii–ciii)), and puts the martyrdom of Harith on a Sunday, 25 November (Book of the Himyarites chapter 19 (Moberg, p. cxv)).

Simeon closed by asking that the patriarch of Alexandria write to the king of the Ethiopians to come to the help of the Himyarites (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)). The Book of the Himyarites told how a Himyarite Christian brought the news to Kaleb, king of Abyssinia, and how Kaleb crossed with his army and appointed a king in the land (Book of the Himyarites index of chapters 38–49 (Moberg, p. civ)). Moberg identifies Kaleb with the king whom Greek writers call Elesbaas (Book of the Himyarites introduction, p. xlii). Cosmas, a merchant who visited the port of Adulis, speaks of Elesbaan, king of the Aksumites (the people of Aksum), preparing an expedition against the Himyarites (Cosmas, Christian Topography 2 (McCrindle pp. 55–56)). Procopius gives the outcome in a few lines: Hellestheaeus, the Christian king of the Ethiopians, sailed against the Himyarites because they were oppressing the Christians there, defeated them, killed their king and set up a Christian Himyarite, Esimiphaeus, who was to pay tribute (Procopius, Wars 1.20.1). A Himyarite inscription dated seven years after Yusuf's was set up by nobles who had fortified a stronghold when the Abyssinians killed the king of Himyar; the first of them is named Sumyafa' Ashwa', a name close to the Esimiphaeus of Procopius (CIH 621 lines 1, 6–10).

Simeon says that he wrote so that the bishops might "celebrate the memory of the illustrious martyrs" (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)). Moberg notes that the Ethiopian calendar keeps the day of the martyrs of Najran on 26 Hedar (Book of the Himyarites introduction, p. lviii).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The year is disputed between 523 and 518, and the evidence is of three kinds.

The Syriac letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham stands in the chronicle under the year 835 of the Greeks, the sixth year of the emperor Justin, and Simeon says that he set out on 20 January of that year and learned of the massacre on the journey (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham)). The year 835 of the Seleucid era runs from October 523 to September 524, so the letter puts the killings in the months before January 524. The Book of the Himyarites dates the death of Harith to Sunday, 25 November (Book of the Himyarites chapter 19 (Moberg, p. cxv)). Its editor, Axel Moberg (The Book of the Himyarites, 1924), held to 523 and supposed the day of the month to be one too low, but he pointed out that 25 November 523 was a Saturday and that the nearest years in which it fell on a Sunday were 518 and 529 (Book of the Himyarites introduction, p. lviii). He also records that the letter had been judged authentic by some scholars and a forgery by another (Book of the Himyarites introduction, pp. xxiv–xxvi).

The inscription of the king's officer near Najran is dated in the month dhu-Madhra'an of year 633 of the Himyarite era (Ja 1028 lines 1–12). Its conversion depends on where that era begins. Norbert Nebes, in the commentary reproduced with the inscription, counts from 110 BC, following J. Beaucamp, F.

Briquel-Chatonnet and C. Robin, "La persécution des chrétiens de Nagrān et la chronologie ḥimyarite", Aram 11–12 (1999–2000), and so dates it to July 523 (Ja 1028 commentary of N. Nebes on lines 1 and 10–11); an era beginning five years earlier would give 518. The inscription from Husn al-Ghurab that mentions the killing of the king of Himyar is dated seven years later, in 640 (CIH 621 lines 1, 6–10).

Cosmas, finally, says that the king of Aksum was preparing an expedition against the Himyarites when he visited Adulis "at the beginning of the reign" of Justin, about twenty-five years before he wrote (Cosmas, Christian Topography 2 (McCrindle pp. 55–56)). Justin became emperor in July of the year 829 of the Greeks, which is 518 (Zachariah, Chronicle 8.1). Whether that was the expedition that followed the massacre or an earlier one is part of the dispute; the chapter headings of the Book of the Himyarites speak of a first departure of the Abyssinians before the persecution and of Kaleb's arrival after it (Book of the Himyarites index of chapters 7–27 (Moberg, pp. cii–ciii)) (Book of the Himyarites index of chapters 38–49 (Moberg, p. civ)). The timeline shows 523 and gives both years.

Primary sources

The Syriac Chronicle Known as That of Zachariah of Mitylene Zachariah the Rhetor, in an anonymous Syriac compilation · Greek original between AD 491 and 518; Syriac compilation completed AD 569
8.3 (letter of Simeon of Beth Arsham); 8.1

Inscription of Sharah'il Yaqbal at Bir Hima (Ja 1028) Set up by Sharah'il Yaqbal dhu-Yaz'an, an officer of King Yusuf As'ar Yath'ar · Dated dhu-Madhra'an 633 of the Himyarite era: July AD 523, or 518 on another reckoning lines 1–12; commentary of N. Nebes on lines 1 and 10–11

The Book of the Himyarites Soon after AD 525, by its editor's judgment; manuscript dated AD 932
introduction, pp. xxiv–xxvi; index of chapters 7–27 (Moberg, pp. cii–ciii); chapter 19 (Moberg, p. cxv); index of chapters 38–49 (Moberg, p. civ); introduction, p. xlii; introduction, p. lviii

Christian Topography Cosmas Indicopleustes · c. AD 547
2 (McCrindle pp. 55–56)

History of the Wars Procopius of Caesarea · Mid sixth century, c. AD 550–554
1.20.1

Inscription of Sumyafa' Ashwa' at Husn al-Ghurab (CIH 621) Set up by Sumyafa' Ashwa' and his sons · Dated dhu-Hillatan 640 of the Himyarite era: February AD 530 on the usual reckoning
lines 1, 6–10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Najran, Aksum
Who Arethas of Najran, Dhu Nuwas, Kaleb of Aksum Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian c. AD 330–356 598

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Great Persecution under Diocletian Before · AD 303–311 557

The Murder of Thomas Becket After · 29 December 1170 866

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Baptism of Clovis Before · c. AD 496–508 695

The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms After · c. AD 543–580 717

← The Baptism of Clovis Earlier · c. AD 496–508
→ Benedict Writes His Rule Later · c. AD 530–550

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Benedict Writes His Rule

c. AD 530–550 · Estimated date

Benedict of Nursia, abbot of Monte Cassino, writes a rule for monks living in community under an abbot, with a day divided between common prayer, reading and manual work. It later becomes the standard rule of Western monasteries.

Almost all that is known of Benedict of Nursia comes from the second book of the Dialogues of Pope Gregory the Great, written about 593 from the reports of four of Benedict's disciples. Gregory says that he was born in the district of Nursia, was sent to Rome to study, and left his books to live alone in a cave at Subiaco (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2, prologue and 1). Disciples gathered, and he set up twelve small monasteries there, each with twelve monks (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.3).

Driven out by the envy of a local priest, Benedict moved with a few monks to the hill above Cassino. There he broke the idol of Apollo, to whom the country people still sacrificed, and built oratories of Saint Martin and Saint John in its place (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.8). This became the monastery of Monte Cassino. The Gothic king Totila came to see him there (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.14–15). His sister Scholastica, dedicated to God from childhood, visited him once a year; Gregory tells how at their last meeting her prayer brought a storm that kept him talking with her through the night, and how three days later he saw her soul rise to heaven like a dove (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.33–34). Benedict died in the oratory, held upright by his monks at prayer, and was buried beside her (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.33–34) (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.37).

Gregory adds that Benedict wrote a rule for monks, "excellent for discretion" (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.36). The Rule calls the monastery "a school of the Lord's service" in which the author hopes to lay down "nothing harsh or burdensome" (Rule of Benedict prologue). It is written for cenobites, monks who live together under a rule and an abbot (Rule of Benedict 1). The abbot holds the place of Christ and will answer to God for his monks, and he is to call the whole community to counsel on weighty matters (Rule of Benedict 2–3). A newcomer promises stability, conversion of morals and obedience (Rule of Benedict 58), and no monk may own anything (Rule of Benedict 33). The day turns on the "Work of God", seven offices by day and one at night (Rule of Benedict 16), with fixed hours for manual labour and for reading, because "idleness is the enemy of the soul" (Rule of Benedict 48). A long chapter sets out twelve degrees of humility (Rule of Benedict 7), and guests are to be received as Christ (Rule of Benedict 53).

The Rule ends by calling itself a beginning and sends the monk on to the teachers before it, among them "our holy Father, Basil" (Rule of Benedict 73) (The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity). Its later spread through the West is told under Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning and the Founding of Cluny.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Rule carries no date and names no person or place. Gregory the Great says that Benedict wrote a rule for his monks (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.36) and tells of it after the move to Monte Cassino (Gregory the Great, Dialogues

2.8), but he gives no years either. A fixed point is the visit of King Totila, which Gregory tells among the events at Cassino (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 2.14–15): the continuation of Marcellinus, paraphrased here from the Latin, enters Totila's accession under 542 (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle continuation, under the year 542), so Benedict was alive and an abbot in the 540s. The years often given for the founding of Monte Cassino (about 529) and for Benedict's death (about 547) are not in Gregory and rest on later tradition. The Rule is therefore placed between about 530 and 550.

Primary sources

Dialogues Gregory the Great · c. AD 593
2, prologue and 1; 2.3; 2.8; 2.14–15; 2.33–34; 2.37; 2.36

The Rule of Saint Benedict Benedict of Nursia · c. AD 530–550
prologue; 1; 2–3; 58; 33; 16; 48; 7; 53; 73

Chronicle Marcellinus Comes · First edition to AD 518, continued by the author to 534 and by another hand to 548
continuation, under the year 542

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Monte Cassino
Who Benedict of Nursia, Scholastica
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Pachomius Founds Communal Monasticism c. AD 320 580
The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623

LEADS TO

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English AD 590–604 733
The Founding of Cluny 11 September AD 910 807
The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux 1098–1115 854

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity Before · c. AD 370–381 623

Columba Founds Iona After · AD 563 725

← The Martyrs of Najran Earlier · AD 523 (or 518)

→ Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia Later · 27 December AD 537

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia

27 December AD 537 · Firm date

After rioters burn the cathedral of Constantinople in 532, the emperor Justinian rebuilds it as a vast domed church, dedicated on 27 December 537. In the same years he sets out in law his view of priesthood and empire as two gifts of God.

In January 532 the circus factions of Constantinople joined forces against the emperor Justinian I. Their watchword was Nika, "Conquer". For five days they burned the centre of the city, and with it the cathedral, which the people called Sophia, "Wisdom" (Procopius, Wars 1.24.7–10) (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 532) (Procopius, Buildings 1.1.20–26). Procopius says that the court debated whether to flee by sea and that the empress Theodora spoke against it, ending with the old saying that "royalty is a good burial-shroud" (Procopius, Wars 1.24.32–38). The generals Belisarius and Mundus then attacked the crowd in the hippodrome, and more than thirty thousand people died that day (Procopius, Wars 1.24.50–54).

Justinian began to rebuild the church soon afterwards, sparing no expense and gathering craftsmen from everywhere. Procopius names the master builders, Anthemius of Tralles and Isidore of Miletus (Procopius, Buildings 1.1.20–26). He describes a building that rises above the whole city: four great piers carry four arches, and on them rests a dome that seems, he says, to hang from heaven; the interior is so full of light that the radiance seems to be born inside it (Procopius, Buildings 1.1.27–47). The columns and marbles were of many colours, like a meadow in flower, and the sanctuary was adorned with forty thousand pounds of silver. Whoever enters to pray, Procopius writes, feels that God cannot be far away (Procopius, Buildings 1.1.59–65).

The church was dedicated on 27 December 537 (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle continuation, under the year 537). Part of the dome later fell in an earthquake and was rebuilt, as the poem that Paul the Silentiary wrote for the reopening relates (Paul the Silentiary, Description of Hagia Sophia part 1, on the earthquake and the rebuilding (Lethaby and Swainson, pp. 35–36)); the poem describes the new dome with a cross at its crown, the marbles of the walls and the lamps that made night as bright as day (Paul the Silentiary, Description of Hagia Sophia).

Justinian also legislated for the church. The preface to a law of 535 on the ordination of clergy calls the priesthood and the empire the two greatest gifts of God, the one serving divine things and the other directing human affairs, and says that the emperor's first care must be the honour of the priests (Justinian, Novels 6, preface). He acted on questions of doctrine as well. Evagrius says that he upheld the Council of Chalcedon while Theodora protected its opponents (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.10), and he later summoned a council of his own (The Second Council of Constantinople).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The continuation of the chronicle of Marcellinus, paraphrased here from the Latin, which ends in 548 and so was written within about ten years of the event, says under the year 537 that the Great Church of Constantinople built by Justinian was dedicated on the sixth day before the Kalends of January, which is 27 December (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle continuation, under the year 537). The same chronicle dates the riot and the fire to the Ides of January 532 and the days after, and says that rebuilding began at once (Marcellinus Comes, Chronicle under the year 532).

Primary sources

History of the Wars Procopius of Caesarea · Mid sixth century, c. AD 550–554
1.24.7–10; 1.24.32–38; 1.24.50–54

Chronicle Marcellinus Comes · First edition to AD 518, continued by the author to 534 and by another hand to 548
under the year 532; continuation, under the year 537

Buildings Procopius of Caesarea · c. AD 550–560
1.1.20–26; 1.1.27–47; 1.1.59–65

Description of Hagia Sophia Paul the Silentiary · c. AD 563 part 1, on the earthquake and the rebuilding (Lethaby and Swainson, pp. 35–36); sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Novels (New Constitutions) Justinian I · AD 535–565
6, preface

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
4.10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Justinian I, Theodora
Threads Church and State, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Constantine Dedicates Constantinople 11 May AD 330 594

CHURCH AND STATE

The Baptism of Clovis Before · c. AD 496–508 695
Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar After · AD 637/638 743

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated Before · AD 335 602

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins After · AD 726–730 759

← Benedict Writes His Rule Earlier · c. AD 530–550

→ Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church Later · c. AD 542–578

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church

c. AD 542–578 · Estimated date

When the opponents of Chalcedon are short of bishops, the empress Theodora has the monk Jacob consecrated. John of Ephesus, his admirer, tells how he travelled the East for over thirty years, hunted by the emperor's agents, ordaining clergy and bishops for a separate church.

Evagrius, a supporter of Chalcedon, says that in the first year of the emperor Justin, Severus of Antioch, the patriarch of Antioch, who daily anathematised the council, was ordered to be arrested and fled his see, and that his successor had orders to proclaim it (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.4). John of Ephesus says that Severus withdrew to Alexandria and the deserts of Egypt (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 48 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, p. 685)). Evagrius adds that a later constitution of Justinian anathematised Severus and laid the heaviest penalties on those who held his doctrines, so that the council was proclaimed in all the churches (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.11). He also says that the empress Theodora took the part of those who confessed one nature and cared for them (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.10). John of Ephesus, who belonged to that party and is the main witness for what follows, says that by the early 540s it was short of priests and above all of bishops (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 153–154)).

In the sixteenth year of Justinian, John writes, Harith bar Gabala, king of the Saracens, asked Theodora to have two or three bishops consecrated for Syria. At her order two men were chosen: Theodore for the camp of the Saracens and James, that is Jacob, for the city of Edessa (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 153–154)). Jacob came from Tella and the monastery of Fsiltha. He had gone up to Constantinople on business of the faith, had been given a house by the queen, and had lived there some fifteen years as a recluse, dressed in half of a coarse cloak cut in two. From that garment, his editor explains, came the nickname Burd'ana (Baradaeus), "the man of the patchwork garment" (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 49 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, pp. 690–692)).

John describes the years that followed in the language of a saint's life. Jacob went on foot from the Persian frontier to Constantinople and Alexandria, finished his work in a place in a night and a day and was thirty or forty miles away the next night, while the bishops of the other side and the emperor, who paid men to catch him, hunted for him in vain. John claims that he ordained a hundred thousand clergy (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 49 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, pp. 692–697)). Because the canons require three bishops to make a bishop, Jacob took two monks to Alexandria and had them consecrated there. With them he ordained, by John's count, twenty-seven bishops and two successive patriarchs of Antioch, Sergius and then Paul. One of the bishops was John himself, for Ephesus, and he says that many of the ordinations took place in his presence (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 154–158)).

His last years were troubled by a quarrel inside his own church, which John tells in his Ecclesiastical History. The patriarch Paul was declared deposed at Alexandria. Jacob, whom John calls a simple old man led by those around him, was persuaded to agree, and Syria and the neighbouring provinces divided into "Paulites" and "Jacobites" (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.14–20) (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.35). Jacob set out for Alexandria and died on the way, in the monastery of Cassian on the border of Egypt, within days of several of his companions (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.33–34). John rejects as a slander the rumour that Paul's partisans had beaten him (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.33–34), and leaves open another, that he had first been shipwrecked (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.58).

By John's account the bishops and patriarchs he ordained gave the opponents of Chalcedon a hierarchy of their own (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 154–158)). The heading of a later Life of him in one manuscript, which John's editor prints as spurious, calls him bishop "of all the orthodox" and says that "on account of whom also we were termed Jacobites" (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints notes in manuscripts of the later, spurious Life, quoted by Brooks (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 228–229)). The Antiochian Syrian Orthodox Church (the Syriac Orthodox Church) is today one of the Oriental Orthodox churches (Catholic–Oriental Orthodox Commission, Report (2016)).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

John of Ephesus dates the consecration to the sixteenth year of Justinian (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 153–154)), which ran from April 542 to April 543; his editor E. W. Brooks notes "542" on the passage. For the death John gives no year in his narrative (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.33–34). He shows Jacob alive during the embassy to Persia of the year 888 of the Greeks, which is 576–577 (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.35), and speaks of Jacob's clergy acting after his death in the year 892, which is 580–581 (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.45). A marginal note in one manuscript of a later Life of Jacob, which Brooks prints as spurious, says that he died in the year 889, which is 577–578 (John of Ephesus, Lives of the Eastern Saints notes in manuscripts of the later, spurious Life, quoted by Brooks (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 228–229)). The end date shown is therefore approximate.

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
4.4; 4.11; 4.10

Lives of the Eastern Saints John of Ephesus · Soon after AD 565
48 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, p. 685); 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 153–154); 49 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, pp. 690–692); 49 (Patrologia Orientalis 18, pp. 692–697); 50 (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 154–158); notes in manuscripts of the later, spurious Life, quoted by Brooks (Patrologia Orientalis 19, pp. 228–229)

Ecclesiastical History, Part Three John of Ephesus · c. AD 585
3.4.14–20; 3.4.35; 3.4.33–34; 3.4.58; 3.4.45

Report of the Thirteenth Meeting of the International Joint Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches International Joint Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches · 6 February 2016
christianunity.va

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Edessa
Who Jacob Baradaeus, Theodora, Severus of Antioch Threads Papacy and Church Order, Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism AD 482–519 690

LEADS TO

The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms c. AD 543–580 717

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Council of Chalcedon Before · October AD 451 681

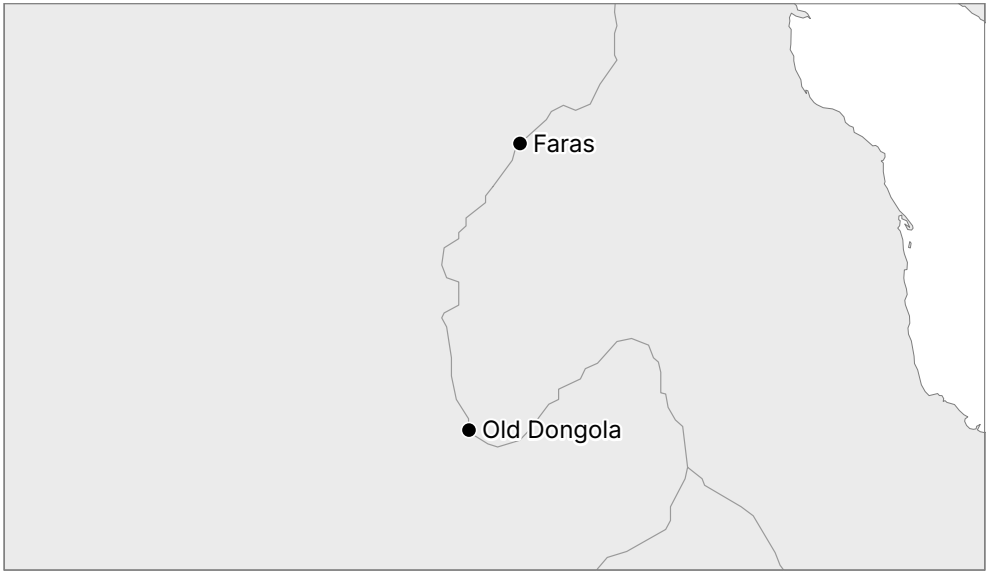
Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English After · AD 590–604 733

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism Before · AD 482–519 690
The Second Council of Constantinople After · AD 553 721

EAST AND WEST

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism Before · AD 482–519 690
The Second Council of Constantinople After · AD 553 721



← Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia Earlier · 27 December AD 537
→ The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms Later · c. AD 543–580

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms

c. AD 543–580 · Estimated date

John of Ephesus tells how the empress Theodora sent the priest Julian to the Nobadae on the Nile south of Egypt ahead of her husband's envoys, so that they were baptised into the church that rejected Chalcedon, and how the bishop Longinus later baptised the king of Alodia.

Beyond the Thebaid, outside the Roman empire, John of Ephesus knows three peoples: the Nobadae on the border of Egypt, the Alodaei beyond them, and the Makoritae in between (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.6) (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.50–51). He tells how the first and the last became Christian. John was a bishop of the party that rejected Chalcedon; he was at Constantinople and met the Nubian envoys there (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.8), and he writes as a partisan of that side.

As John tells it, Julian, an old priest in the household of Theodosius, the exiled patriarch of Alexandria, wished to convert the Nobadae and told the empress Theodora. She told Justinian I, who, on learning that Julian opposed the council, sent an embassy of his own with gold and baptismal robes. Theodora then wrote to the duke of the Thebaid that he would answer with his head if the emperor's envoy arrived before hers. The duke kept the emperor's man waiting for transport until Julian had passed (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.6). The king of the Nobadae, John continues, received Julian, and he and his nobles renounced their old worship. When the emperor's envoy arrived they accepted his gifts and refused his faith, saying that they would follow Theodosius. Julian stayed two years, baptised the king, his nobles and many people, and left them in the care of Theodore, the aged bishop of Philae (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.7) (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.49).

About eighteen years later, John says, the bishop Longinus reached them (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.49). Theodora and Theodosius had chosen him for the Nobadae and he was consecrated at the patriarch's death, but the emperor of the day had him held for three years, until he escaped in disguise. He taught the Nobadae afresh, built a church and ordained clergy. Their envoy told the court, in John's hearing, that they had not known what Christianity was until Longinus came (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.8).

The king of the Alodaei, John goes on, then asked for him. Rival bishops sent from Alexandria were turned away, and the king of the Makoritae set watchers on the roads to stop him (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.50–51). Longinus got through, and in a letter that John quotes he reports that he baptised the king, his nobles and his household. The king of the Alodaei wrote to thank the king of the Nobadae, and John dates these things to the year 891 of the Greeks, which is 579–580 (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.52–53).

In the chapters cited here John does not tell of the conversion of the middle kingdom. A notice from the other end of the Mediterranean may concern it. The Latin chronicler John of Biclaro notes under the third year of Justin II that the people of the "Maccurritae" received the faith of Christ, and four years later that their envoys brought elephant tusks and a giraffe to Constantinople (John of Biclaro, Chronicle third year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 212)) (John of Biclaro, Chronicle seventh year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 213)). He does not say where they lived. The name is close to that of the Makoritae of John of Ephesus; Mommsen, who edited the chronicle, took them instead for a people in Mauretania (John of Biclaro, Chronicle third year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 212)). The Pleiades gazetteer gives Old Dongola as the capital of the Nubian kingdom of Makuria (Pleiades 865674318). At Faras, a large town of Nobadia, excavators found a cathedral of the eighth century with its wall paintings (Faras Gallery, National Museum in Warsaw).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

John of Ephesus gives one year: the conversion of the Alodaei took place in the year 891 of the Greeks, which is 579–580 (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.52–53). Everything earlier is reckoned in intervals. Julian was sent while Theodora was alive (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.6); she died after twenty-one years and three months as empress (Procopius, Wars 7.30.4), which places her death in 548. He stayed two years (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.7). John then counts about eighteen years to the coming of Longinus and six years for his stay (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.49); Longinus had been consecrated on the death of the patriarch Theodosius, who lived rather more than thirty-one years after his deposition, and had been kept from leaving for three years (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4.8) (John of Ephesus, Ecclesiastical History 3.4, translator's summary of the lost chapters 1–5). The figures are approximate, as John's "more or less" admits, and do not fix the year; with Theodora's death as the limit they put Julian's mission in the 540s. The National Museum in Warsaw, which holds the paintings from Faras, dates the conversion of the rulers of Nobadia to about 548 (Faras Gallery, National Museum in Warsaw). John of Biclaro's notice of the "Maccurritae" stands under the third year of Justin II, which his editor Mommsen marks "569?" (John of Biclaro, Chronicle third year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 212)).

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History, Part Three John of Ephesus · c. AD 585
3.4.6; 3.4.50–51; 3.4.8; 3.4.7; 3.4.49; 3.4.52–53; 3.4, translator's summary of the lost chapters 1–5

Chronicle John of Biclaro · c. AD 590 third year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 212); seventh year of Justin (Mommsen, p. 213)

Wall Paintings from the Cathedral of Faras Eighth to fourteenth centuries AD mnw.art.pl

History of the Wars Procopius of Caesarea · Mid sixth century, c. AD 550–554
7.30.4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Faras, Old Dongola
Who Julian the Missionary, Longinus of Nubia, Theodora, Justinian I
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian c. AD 330–356 598

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church c. AD 542–578 712

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Martyrs of Najran Before · AD 523 (or 518) 699

Columba Founds Iona After · AD 563 725

← Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church Earlier · c. AD 542–578
→ The Second Council of Constantinople Later · AD 553

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Second Council of Constantinople

AD 553 · Firm date

A council called by the emperor Justinian condemns the "Three Chapters", writings of three theologians linked with Nestorius, and restates the faith of Chalcedon in fourteen anathemas. Pope Vigilius first refuses and then accepts; parts of the West resist for decades.

A century after the Council of Chalcedon the churches of the East were still divided over that council. The emperor Justinian I told the bishops that he held it his chief task to reunite the churches and bring the four councils to general acceptance. Nestorians, he wrote, were bringing in their teaching through three things: the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, what Theodoret had written against Cyril of Alexandria and the first council of Ephesus, and a letter attributed to Ibas, which they claimed Chalcedon had accepted (Council of Constantinople (553) session 1, letter of Justinian). These were the "Three Chapters".

Pope Vigilius, whom officers of the court had taken from Rome and brought to Constantinople (Liber Pontificalis 61 (Vigilius)), had condemned the Three Chapters more than once but would not do so together with the council (Council of Constantinople (553) session 7). When the council met in 553, with the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria and Antioch among the bishops whom the emperor addressed (Council of Constantinople (553) session 1, letter of Justinian), he stayed away (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.38). He sent word that he had written his own judgment for the emperor. Justinian ordered his name removed from the prayers of the churches, and the bishops agreed while declaring that they kept unity with the apostolic see (Council of Constantinople (553) session 7).

The council's sentence professes the faith of the four earlier councils and then condemns Theodore and his writings, the writings of Theodoret against Cyril and against the council of Ephesus, and the letter said to be by Ibas, together with anyone who defends them in the name of Chalcedon (Council of Constantinople (553) sentence). Fourteen capitula follow. They teach one person or hypostasis in Christ, allow both the phrase "in two natures" and Cyril's phrase about the one incarnate nature of God the Word if each is rightly understood, call the crucified Christ "one of the Holy Trinity", and name Origen among the heretics (Council of Constantinople (553) capitula 5–11). Evagrius adds that the council examined and condemned the teachings of Origen's followers (Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History 4.38).

On 8 December 553 Vigilius wrote to Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople, that further study had shown him his error, and he anathematized the Three Chapters and annulled what he had written in their defence (Council of Constantinople (553) letter of Vigilius to Eutychius). He died at Syracuse on his way home (Liber Pontificalis 61 (Vigilius)). In the West the decision was resisted. Some forty years on, Gregory the Great was still writing to bishops who remained in schism over it, assuring them that the council had changed nothing in the faith and had judged only persons (Gregory the Great, Letters 2.51), and he told the Eastern patriarchs that he venerated the fifth council with the four (Gregory the Great, Letters 1.25).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The emperor's letter read at the first session is dated 4 May in the twelfth year after the consulship of Basil, which is 553 (Council of Constantinople (553) session 1, letter of Justinian), and the letter in which Vigilius accepted the council is dated 8 December in the same year (Council of Constantinople (553) letter of Vigilius to Eutychius). Percival's introduction to the council (1900), quoting Hefele's History of the Councils, gives 5 May 553 for the opening session; the extracts he translates do not reproduce the session headings.

Primary sources

Acts, Sentence and Capitula of the Second Council of Constantinople The Second Council of Constantinople · AD 553 session 1, letter of Justinian; session 7; sentence; capitula 5–11; letter of Vigilius to Eutychius

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
61 (Vigilius); 61 (Vigilius)

Ecclesiastical History Evagrius Scholasticus · c. AD 593–594
4.38

Register of Letters Gregory the Great · AD 590–604
2.51; 1.25

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Justinian I, Vigilius
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

The Henotikon and the Acacian Schism AD 482–519 690

LEADS TO

The Third Council of Constantinople AD 680–681 751

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church Before · c. AD 542–578 712

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo After · 8 May AD 589 728

EAST AND WEST

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church Before · c. AD 542–578 712

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo After · 8 May AD 589 728

← The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms Earlier · c. AD 543–580
→ Columba Founds Iona Later · AD 563

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Columba Founds Iona

AD 563 · Estimated date

The Irish priest and abbot Columba crosses to Britain and founds a monastery on the island of Iona. From it he preaches among the Picts, and it becomes the mother house of a family of monasteries in Ireland and Britain.

Columba, called Colum Cille in Irish, was a priest and abbot who had already founded the monastery of Durrow in Ireland (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.4). About two years after the battle of Cúl Dreimne, which the annals say was won through his prayers, he sailed from Ireland to Britain (Adomnán, Life of Columba 1.7) (Annals of Ulster 561). The Irish annals put the voyage in 563, when he was in his forty-second year (Annals of Ulster 563).

He settled on Iona, a small island off the west coast of what is now Scotland. The sources disagree about who gave it to him. Bede says that Columba came to preach to the northern Picts, converted them, and received the island from them (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.4). The Annals of Ulster say that it was granted by Conall son of Comgall (Annals of Ulster 574), and Adomnán shows Columba staying in Britain with this King Conall soon after he arrived (Adomnán, Life of Columba 1.7).

Adomnán, ninth abbot of Iona, wrote Columba's Life about a century later. He tells of Columba's first journey to the fortress of the Pictish king Bridei, where the barred gates opened at the sign of the cross (Adomnán, Life of Columba 2.36), and of Columba ordaining Áedán as king on Iona at the command of an angel (Adomnán, Life of Columba 3.6). The Life closes with Columba's last day: he copied a psalter until he reached the end of a page, went to the church at midnight, and died before the altar while raising his hand to bless his monks (Adomnán, Life of Columba 3.24).

Bede notes what made Iona unusual. It was ruled by an abbot who was a priest and not a bishop, and the bishops of the whole province were subject to him; and its monks reckoned the date of Easter differently from the Roman church (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.4). In the next century King Oswald of Northumbria, who had been baptised among the Irish, asked their elders for a bishop and received Aidan, a monk of Iona (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.3). The difference over Easter came to a head at the Synod of Whitby.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Annals of Ulster enter Columba's voyage to Iona under 563, in the forty-second year of his age (Annals of Ulster 563), and the battle of Cúl Dreimne under 561 (Annals of Ulster 561); Adomnán says that he sailed about two years after that battle (Adomnán, Life of Columba 1.7). Bede, writing in 731, gives 565 and the ninth year of the Pictish king Bridei (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.4). The timeline follows the annals.

The same sources bear on his death. Adomnán gives him thirty-four years in Britain (Adomnán, Life of Columba 3.23) and says that he died at midnight as Sunday began (Adomnán, Life of Columba 3.24); the annals give the day as 9 June but enter it under 595 (Annals of Ulster 595). Counting thirty-four years from 563 gives 597, and 9 June fell on a Sunday in that year, which is why 597 is the date usually given.

Primary sources

Ecclesiastical History of the English People Bede · AD 731
3.4; 3.3

Life of Saint Columba Adomnán of Iona · c. AD 690–704
1.7; 2.36; 3.6; 3.24; 3.23

The Annals of Ulster Manuscripts of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, compiled from older annals
561; 563; 574; 595

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Iona
Who Columba
Threads Mission and Expansion, Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Patrick's Mission to Ireland c. AD 432–461 or 493 (traditional) 672

LEADS TO

The Synod of Whitby AD 664 747

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Conversion of the Nubian Kingdoms Before · c. AD 543–580 717

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English After · AD 590–604 733

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Benedict Writes His Rule Before · c. AD 530–550 704

The Founding of Cluny After · 11 September AD 910 807

← The Second Council of Constantinople Earlier · AD 553
→ The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo Later · 8 May AD 589

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo

8 May AD 589 · Firm date

At Toledo in 589 King Reccared and the Gothic bishops and nobles renounce Arianism for the Nicene faith. The king's profession says that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, and the council orders the creed recited at every mass.

The Visigoths who ruled Spain had been Arian Christians since their conversion in the fourth century (Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths) (Isidore, History of the Goths 7–8), beside a Catholic church that held the faith of Nicaea (Council of Toledo (589) tomus of Reccared). Gregory the Great, who knew Bishop Leander of Seville personally, relates that Leander brought the king's son Hermenegild to the Catholic faith, that the Arian king Leovigild had Hermenegild put to death, and that on his deathbed Leovigild commended his other son, Reccared I, to Leander's guidance (Gregory the Great, Dialogues 3.31). Reccared became king in 586 and adopted the Catholic faith at the very start of his reign (Isidore, History of the Goths 52–53). Gregory of Tours says that he first made the bishops of both sides debate before him (Gregory of Tours, Histories 9.15).

On 8 May 589 the king met the bishops of Spain and Gaul at Toledo (Council of Toledo (589) opening and royal address). A written statement of his faith was read out. It confesses the Son as equal and coeternal with the Father and says that the Holy Spirit is to be confessed and preached as proceeding from the Father and the Son. The king presented the Goths, and the Sueves now subject to his kingdom, as an offering to God, accepted the four general councils, and set out the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople and the definition of Chalcedon. He and Queen Baddo signed (Council of Toledo (589) tomus of Reccared). Gothic bishops, clergy and nobles then abjured Arianism in a series of anathemas, the third of which condemns anyone who does not believe that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Council of Toledo (589) profession of the Gothic bishops, anathemas).

The second canon ordered that in every church of Spain, Gaul and Galicia the creed of Constantinople should be recited aloud at mass before the Lord's Prayer, after the custom of the Eastern churches (Council of Toledo (589) canon 2). Another canon forbade Jews to have Christian wives or concubines, to buy Christian slaves, or to hold public offices that gave them power to punish Christians (Council of Toledo (589) canon 14). Pope Gregory wrote to Leander of his joy at the king's conversion (Gregory the Great, Letters 1.43).

The creed of 381 says that the Spirit "proceedeth from the Father" (Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed). The king's profession adds the Son, and a joint Orthodox and Catholic statement of 2003 calls it the earliest use of such language in a creed-like text; it adds that no clear record exists of how the word Filioque came to be inserted in the creed itself (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) part 2, Historical Considerations). From Spain, the statement says, the creed with the addition spread through Gaul (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) part 2, Historical Considerations). The same statement describes the clause as part of the ordinary teaching of the church for Catholics and most Protestants, and as an offence to Eastern Christians both for its theology and because it was added to the creed of an ecumenical council without ecumenical agreement (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) introduction). The later quarrel is told under the Photian Schism and the Schism of 1054.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The acts date the council to the eighth day before the Ides of May in the fourth year of Reccared and the year 627 of the Spanish era (Council of Toledo (589) opening and royal address). The Spanish era runs 38 years ahead of the Christian era, so the day is 8 May 589. The acts and Isidore's history are paraphrased here from the Latin.

What is debated is the wording of the creed, not the date. The king's profession and the third anathema teach that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (Council of Toledo (589) tomus of Reccared) (Council of Toledo (589) profession of the Gothic bishops, anathemas). In the creed of Constantinople as the council recited it, the copies of the acts divide. The copy read here, a ninth-century manuscript from Corbie that holds a Frankish revision of the Spanish collection of canons, transcribed for the Monumenta Germaniae Historica, has "from the Father" only, both times the creed is given (Council of Toledo (589) creed of Constantinople, in the king's tomus and again in the bishops' profession). Alberto Ferreiro, "Toletum III / Toledo III", in the online Lexikon der Konzilien (konziliengeschichte.org, January 2025), reports that the edition of J. Vives prints "from the Father and the Son", that the critical edition of the Hispana treats those words as a later interpolation in the acts, and that some scholars place their first appearance in the creed at the Eighth Council of Toledo in 653. Ferreiro himself argues that the bishops of 589 had every reason to use them. The same entry notes that the complete acts carry the signature of Leander of Seville, fourth among the bishops, and a sermon he preached for the occasion. The manuscript read here names only the first bishop to sign, Masona of Mérida, and omits the sermon (Council of Toledo (589) signatures after the royal edict).

Primary sources

History of the Kings of the Goths, Vandals and Sueves Isidore of Seville · Soon after AD 621

7–8; 52–53

Acts of the Third Council of Toledo The Third Council of Toledo · 8 May AD 589 tomus of Reccared; opening and royal address; profession of the Gothic bishops, anathemas; canon 2; canon 14; creed of Constantinople, in the king's tomus and again in the bishops' profession; signatures after the royal edict

Dialogues Gregory the Great · c. AD 593
3.31

Histories (History of the Franks) Gregory of Tours · c. AD 575–594
9.15

Register of Letters Gregory the Great · AD 590–604
1.43

The Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed Attributed to the Council of Constantinople · AD 381
ccel.org

The Filioque: A Church-Dividing Issue? North American Orthodox-Catholic Theological Consultation · 25 October 2003
part 2, Historical Considerations; introduction

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Toledo
Who Reccared I, Leander of Seville
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Council of Constantinople May AD 381 632
Ulfilas Translates the Bible for the Goths c. AD 341 606

LEADS TO

The Photian Schism AD 863–867 794
The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

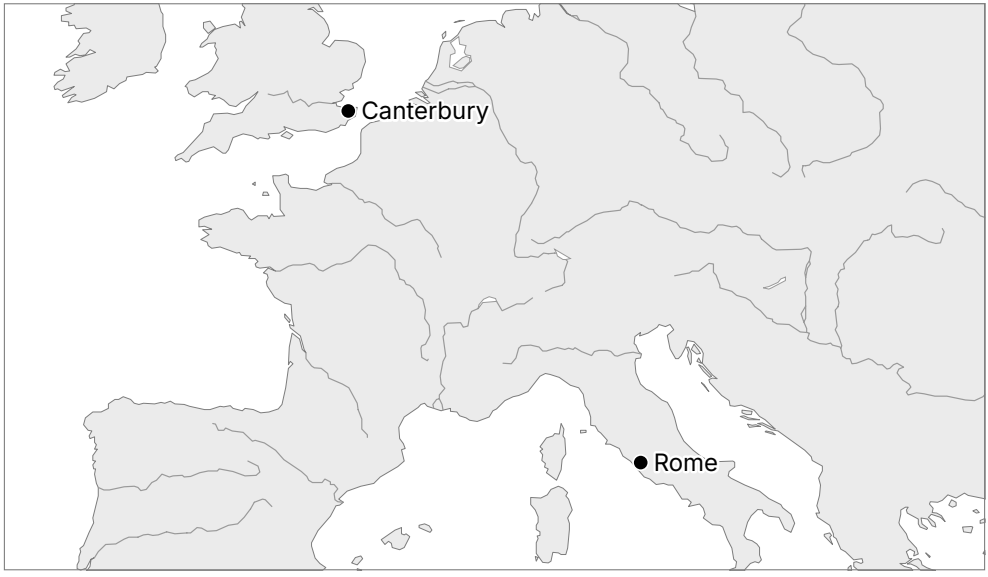
CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Second Council of Constantinople Before · AD 553 721

The Synod of Whitby After · AD 664 747

EAST AND WEST

The Second Council of Constantinople Before · AD 553 721
The Iconoclast Controversy Begins After · AD 726–730 759



← Columba Founds Iona Earlier · AD 563
→ Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English Later · AD 590–604

COUNCILS AND THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English

AD 590–604 · Firm date

Gregory I, a monk made pope against his will, governs the Roman church from 590 to 604, writes the Pastoral Rule, refuses the title of universal bishop and sends the monk Augustine to convert the English of Kent.

In 590 a plague killed the bishop of Rome, and the people chose the deacon Gregory to succeed him. Gregory I came from a senatorial family, had used his wealth to found six monasteries in Sicily and a seventh in Rome, and had served as the pope's representative at Constantinople. He wrote to the emperor asking not to be confirmed, and was seized and consecrated when he tried to hide (Gregory of Tours, Histories 10.1) (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 2.1). In his letters he mourns the quiet he has lost (Gregory the Great, Letters 1.5).

At the start of his episcopate he wrote the Pastoral Rule (Gregory the Great, Letters 5.49), on who should take up the care of souls, how a pastor should live and how he should teach. It calls the government of souls "the art of arts" (Gregory the Great, Pastoral Rule introduction and 1.1). When the bishop of Constantinople used the title "universal", Gregory protested that no bishop should claim it (Gregory the Great, Letters 5.18), and he refused it for himself when the bishop of Alexandria addressed him as "Universal Pope": "my honour is the honour of the universal Church" (Gregory the Great, Letters 8.30). He styled himself instead "servant of the servants of God", as at the head of his letter to the missionaries (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.23).

Bede relates, as a tradition, that Gregory once saw English boys for sale in Rome and wished to go to their people himself (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 2.1). What his own letters show is an order, sent about 595 to his agent in Gaul, to buy English boys to be raised in monasteries (Gregory the Great, Letters 6.7). In 596 he sent Augustine of Canterbury, a monk of his own monastery, with a party of monks. They lost heart on the way, and Gregory wrote urging them on (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.23) (Gregory the Great, Letters 8.30). They landed on the Isle of Thanet. Aethelberht of Kent, king of Kent, whose Frankish wife Bertha was a Christian, heard them in the open air, allowed them to preach and gave them a house at Canterbury (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.25). The king was later baptised (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.26). Gregory told the bishop of Alexandria that more than ten thousand English had been baptised at one Christmas (Gregory the Great, Letters 8.30).

In 601 Gregory sent more helpers, the pallium for Augustine and a plan for two provinces of twelve bishops each (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.29). He urged the king to suppress idols and overthrow temples (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.32). After the party had left he sent different advice: the temples should be kept and turned into churches, and the old feasts replaced with Christian ones, since whoever climbs to the highest place "rises by degrees or steps, and not by leaps" (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.30). Augustine set his see in an old Roman church at Canterbury (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.33).

Gregory died in March 604. Bede, whose text gives the year as 605, calls him the apostle of the English (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 2.1). The later history of the church he founded is taken up under the Synod of Whitby.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Gregory of Tours, whose deacon was in Rome and saw the consecration, tells of the plague, the death of Pope Pelagius and Gregory's election under the fifteenth year of King Childebert, which is 590 (Gregory of Tours, Histories 10.1). Bede gives Gregory thirteen years, six months and ten days as pope, has him buried on 12 March in the second year of the emperor Phocas, and names the year as 605 (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 2.1); counted from 590 his own figures lead to March 604, which is the date generally accepted. The mission is dated by Gregory's letter to the monks, written on 23 July in the fourteenth year of the emperor Maurice and the fourteenth indiction, which is 596 (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.23), and by Bede's summary, which puts their arrival in 597 (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.24).

Primary sources

Histories (History of the Franks) Gregory of Tours · c. AD 575–594
10.1

Ecclesiastical History of the English People Bede · AD 731
2.1; 1.23; 1.25; 1.26; 1.29; 1.32; 1.30; 1.33; 5.24

Register of Letters Gregory the Great · AD 590–604
1.5; 5.49; 5.18; 8.30; 6.7

Pastoral Rule Gregory the Great · c. AD 590–591 introduction and 1.1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Canterbury
Who Gregory I, Augustine of Canterbury, Aethelberht of Kent Threads Papacy and Church Order, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704

The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

LEADS TO

The Synod of Whitby AD 664 747

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans AD 719–754 755

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Jacob Baradaeus and the Syriac Orthodox Church Before · c. AD 542–578 712

The Synod of Whitby After · AD 664 747

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Columba Founds Iona Before · AD 563 725

The Church of the East Reaches China After · AD 635 739

← The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo Earlier · 8 May AD 589
→ The Church of the East Reaches China Later · AD 635
TIMELINE

The Early Middle Ages

AD 600–1054

The Mediterranean world breaks apart. Islam rises, missionaries carry the faith to northern and eastern Europe and to China, and Greek East and Latin West drift toward schism.

Monasteries preserve learning and send out missionaries: Boniface to Germany, Ansgar to Scandinavia, Cyril and Methodius to the Slavs. The Church of the East reaches China. In Byzantium the controversy over icons is settled; in the West the papacy allies with the Franks. The mutual excommunications of 1054 mark the estrangement of Rome and Constantinople.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Chang'an, Whitby, Jarrow, Birka, Thingvellir

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Church of the East Reaches China AD 635 739

Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar AD 637/638 743

The Synod of Whitby AD 664 747
The Third Council of Constantinople AD 680–681 751
Boniface, Apostle to the Germans AD 719–754 755
The Iconoclast Controversy Begins AD 726–730 759
Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History AD 731 763
The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States AD 754–756 766
The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons AD 787 770
Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning AD 789 774
Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor 25 December AD 800 778
Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia AD 829–831 782
The Triumph of Orthodoxy 11 March AD 843 786
Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs AD 863–885 790
The Photian Schism AD 863–867 794
The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria AD 864–866 798
The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius November AD 879 – March 880 802
The Founding of Cluny 11 September AD 910 807
Otto I Is Crowned Emperor February AD 962 810
The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos AD 963–972 814
The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland AD 966 817
The Baptism of Rus' AD 988/989 821
Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law AD 999/1000 825
Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary AD 1000 or 1001 828
The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Church of the East Reaches China

AD 635 · Estimated date

A monk named Aluoben (Alopen) brings Christian scriptures to the Tang capital Chang'an. In 638 the emperor Taizong licenses the teaching and has a monastery built. A stele of 781 tells the story.

The story of how the Church of the East, the church of the Persian empire (see the Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon), came to China is told on a stone slab that its clergy set up in 781 (Xi'an Stele, date line and Syriac text). The slab calls their teaching Jingjiao, the "luminous religion" (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, opening section).

According to the stele, a "most-virtuous" man named Aluoben, in older books Alopen or Olopun, came from the land it calls Da Qin, carrying sacred books. He reached Chang'an, the Tang capital, in 635. The emperor Taizong sent his minister Fang Xuanling out to the west to meet him and bring him in. The books were translated in the imperial library, and the emperor inquired into the teaching of Aluoben in his private rooms (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, on the year 635).

In the seventh month of 638 the emperor issued an edict, which the stele quotes. It begins:

> Right principles have no invariable name, holy men have no invariable station.

It says that Aluoben has brought books and images to the capital, that the teaching has been examined and found good for living things and for people, and that it is to be practised throughout the empire. A monastery was to be built in the Yining ward of the capital, with twenty-one monks (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, edict of 638). A collection of Tang state documents completed in 961 preserves the same edict under the same date, in slightly different words. There Aluoben is a "Persian monk", and a further edict of 745 orders the "Persian monasteries" renamed after Da Qin, because the teaching had come from there in the first place (Tang Huiyao 49, Da Qin monasteries).

The stele opens with a summary of the faith: one God, three in one, who made the world; a Messiah born of a virgin in Da Qin; twenty-seven sacred books; baptism with water; the sign of the cross; prayer facing east, seven times a day (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, opening section). It goes on to say that under the next emperor monasteries were founded in every prefecture, that Buddhists spoke against the teaching in 699 and that it was mocked in the capital in 713, and that the emperor Xuanzong restored it to favour (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, reigns of Gaozong to Xuanzong).

The stone is dated twice: in Chinese to the second year of Jianzhong, 781, and in Syriac to the year 1092 of the Greeks, in the time of the patriarch of the Church of the East. The priest who set it up was the son of a priest from Balkh (Xi'an Stele, date line and Syriac text). It shows a church that had come to China from Persia, not from Rome or Constantinople, and that lived there under imperial licence for a century and a half.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The stele dates Aluoben's arrival to the ninth year of the Zhenguan era, which is AD 635, and the emperor's edict to the seventh month of the twelfth year, 638 (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, on the year 635) (Xi'an Stele, Chinese text, edict of 638). The stele was cut in 781, 146 years after the arrival, and the year 635 rests on it alone. The year of the edict does not: a collection of Tang state documents, completed in 961 from compilations made under the Tang, gives the same edict under the same month and year (Tang Huiyao 49, Da Qin monasteries). That edict says that Aluoben had already come to the capital, so the arrival falls in 638 at the latest.

Primary sources

The Xi'an Stele Text composed by the monk Jingjing (Adam) · AD 781 date line and Syriac text; Chinese text, opening section; Chinese text, on the year 635; Chinese text, edict of 638; Chinese text, reigns of Gaozong to Xuanzong

Tang Huiyao (Institutional History of the Tang) Compiled by Wang Pu · Presented AD 961, from two earlier compilations made under the Tang
49, Da Qin monasteries

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Chang'an
Who Alopen, Taizong
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church of the East Organises at Seleucia-Ctesiphon 1 February AD 410 656

LEADS TO

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq 1245–1307 907
Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris 1287–1288 921
Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English Before · AD 590–604 733
Boniface, Apostle to the Germans After · AD 719–754 755

← Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English Earlier · AD 590–604
→ Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar Later · AD 637/638

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar

AD 637/638 · Estimated date

Later Christian and Muslim historians tell how Jerusalem, after a siege, was yielded on terms to the caliph Umar; the Christian account names the patriarch Sophronius. One Muslim historian quotes the written guarantee given to its people and churches.

At Christmas 634 Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, could not lead his people to Bethlehem for the feast. He preached inside the city instead, and the sermon survives. The congregation, he said, was held at home not by chains but by fear of the Saracens. They were like Adam shut out of paradise, except that the sword barring the way was a Saracen one. The "godless Saracens" held Bethlehem and threatened death to anyone who left the walls. He told his hearers that the invaders were a punishment for sin, and that if they mended their lives they would see the "Ishmaelite sword" blunted (Sophronius, Christmas Sermon pp. 506–508, 514–515).

The surrender itself is described here from later writers. Theophanes, a Byzantine monk writing about 810, says that Umar besieged the holy city for two years and took it by agreement, Sophronius receiving a pledge of safety for all Palestine. Umar entered in dirty garments of camel hair and asked for the site of Solomon's temple, to make it a place of prayer. Sophronius, in this account, quoted the Gospel's words about the "abomination of desolation" standing in the holy place (Matthew 24:15), and persuaded the caliph to wear a garment he offered until his own was washed. The patriarch died soon afterwards (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6127 (p. 339)).

The Muslim accounts were written down later still. Al-Baladhuri, who died in 892, reports that the people of the city asked to capitulate on the same terms as the cities of Syria, on condition that Umar make the agreement in person; Umar came, confirmed the terms and "gave them a written statement" (al-Baladhuri, Conquest of the Lands pp. 213–214). Al-Tabari, who died in 923, quotes such a document. In it Umar, as Commander of the Faithful, grants the people of Aelia (the Roman name of Jerusalem) safety for themselves, their property, their churches and their crosses. The churches are not to be occupied or pulled down, and no one is to be forced in matters of religion. No Jew is to live in the city with them. They are to pay the poll tax as other cities do and to expel the Byzantines, and those who wish to leave with the Byzantines may go in safety. Four witnesses are named (al-Tabari, History I, pp. 2405–2406).

This text is known as the assurance or covenant of Umar. It comes down through al-Tabari, nearly three centuries after the event; he gives it on the word of two earlier transmitters, Khalid and Ubada (al-Tabari, History I, pp. 2405–2406). The Christian and Muslim accounts agree that the city was not stormed but yielded on terms. Of the three, it is the document in al-Tabari that says the churches were to be left to the Christians.

Jerusalem thus passed out of the rule of a Christian emperor, three centuries after Constantine had built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre there.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

None of the sources cited here for the surrender was written at the time, and they disagree. Theophanes puts the whole story under the year of the world 6127 (AD 634/635) but says that the siege lasted two years (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6127 (p. 339)). The document quoted by al-Tabari is dated to year 15 of the Hijra (AD 636/637), and he adds another report that puts the conquest in the fourth month of year 16, the spring of 637 (al-Tabari, History I, pp. 2406–2408). Al-Baladhuri has the siege under way in year 16 and the surrender in year 17, AD 638 (al-Baladhuri, Conquest of the Lands pp. 213–214).

Sophronius's Christmas sermon shows the city cut off from Bethlehem (Sophronius, Christmas Sermon pp. 506–508, 514–515). Its editor accepted the date 25 December 634, which M. J. de Goeje had proposed, because the sermon's heading says the feast fell on a Sunday, and he placed the sermon before the siege of the city (H. Usener, "Weihnachtspredigt des Sophronios", Rheinisches Museum für Philologie 41, 1886, pp. 500–501). The Muslim dates put the surrender between 636 and 638; this entry gives 637/638.

Primary sources

Scripture
Matthew 24:15

Christmas Sermon of 634 Sophronius of Jerusalem · 25 December AD 634
pp. 506–508, 514–515

Chronicle (Chronographia) Theophanes the Confessor · c. AD 810–814
AM 6127 (p. 339)

The Conquest of the Lands (Futuh al-Buldan) al-Baladhuri · Before AD 892
pp. 213–214

History of the Prophets and Kings al-Tabari · Completed c. AD 915
I, pp. 2405–2406; I, pp. 2406–2408

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem
Who Sophronius, Umar
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church of the Holy Sepulchre Is Dedicated AD 335 602

LEADS TO

The First Crusade 1095–1099 849

CHURCH AND STATE

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia Before · 27 December AD 537 708

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins After · AD 726–730 759

← The Church of the East Reaches China Earlier · AD 635
→ The Synod of Whitby Later · AD 664

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Synod of Whitby

AD 664 · Firm date

At Hilda's monastery of Whitby, King Oswiu of Northumbria hears the Irish and the Roman parties argue over the date of Easter and decides for Rome, citing Peter's keys. Bishop Colman and his followers leave for Iona and Ireland.

For thirty years the bishops of the Northumbrians had been Irish (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26); Aidan, the first of them, and Colman, the third, had been sent from Iona (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.22) (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 4.4). They reckoned Easter differently from Rome and from the church of Kent at Canterbury. Bede says that King Oswiu, taught by the Irish, kept one Easter while his queen Eanfled, brought up in Kent, kept another, so that in some years the king had finished the fast and was feasting while the queen was still keeping Palm Sunday. Under Bishop Colman the dispute sharpened, and it extended to the shape of the clerical tonsure (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.25).

A synod was called at Streanaeshalch, the monastery ruled by Abbess Hilda, which is identified with Whitby. Oswiu and his son Alchfrid attended. For the Irish usage stood Colman and his clergy, with Hilda and her community and Bishop Cedd, who interpreted. For the Roman stood Agilbert, bishop of the West Saxons, his priest Agatho, the deacon James, and Wilfrid, abbot of Ripon, who spoke for Agilbert because he could do so in English (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.25).

Bede gives the speeches at length. Oswiu opened by saying that those who serve one God should keep one rule. Colman said that he kept the Easter he had received from his elders, that it went back to the apostle John, and that Columba and his successors had kept it. Wilfrid answered that the Easter he kept was observed at Rome, where Peter and Paul were buried, and throughout the world, and that only the Irish, the Picts and the Britons stood against it. He ended with the words of Christ to Peter (Matthew 16:18–19). The king asked Colman whether those words had truly been spoken to Peter and whether anything like them had been said to Columba. On Colman's answer he declared that he would not oppose the keeper of the keys, > lest haply when I come to the gates of the kingdom of Heaven, there should be none to open them.

All present gave their assent (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.25). Stephen of Ripon, writing in Wilfrid's own monastery, tells it more briefly: Wilfrid appeals to the council of Nicaea and its nineteen-year cycle, and the king, smiling, asks who is greater in the kingdom of heaven, Columba or Peter (Stephen of Ripon, Life of Wilfrid 10).

Colman would not change. He left with the Irish monks of Lindisfarne and about thirty English ones, went first to Iona and then founded monasteries in the west of Ireland (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26) (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 4.4). Tuda, who followed him as bishop of the Northumbrians, kept the Roman Easter and tonsure (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26). Bede, who took the Roman side and still wrote warmly of the Irish teachers' poverty and zeal, records that Iona itself adopted the Roman reckoning in 716 (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26) (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.22). The decision aligned the Northumbrian church with Rome and with the churches of southern England.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Bede gives the year: the debate took place in AD 664, the twenty-second year of King Oswiu and the thirtieth year since Irish bishops had first come to the Northumbrians (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26). Neither Bede nor Stephen gives the month (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.25) (Stephen of Ripon, Life of Wilfrid 10). Stephen wrote in the years after Wilfrid's death in 709, and Bede finished his History in 731, so that the two accounts were written about fifty and nearly seventy years after the synod.

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 16:18–19

Ecclesiastical History of the English People Bede · AD 731
3.26; 5.22; 4.4; 3.25

Life of Bishop Wilfrid Stephen of Ripon (Eddius Stephanus) · c. AD 710–720 10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Whitby
Who Hilda of Whitby, Wilfrid, Colman of Lindisfarne, Oswiu
Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English AD 590–604 733
Columba Founds Iona AD 563 725

LEADS TO

Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History AD 731 763

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo Before · 8 May AD 589 728

The Third Council of Constantinople After · AD 680–681 751

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English Before · AD 590–604 733

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans After · AD 719–754 755

← Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar Earlier · AD 637/638
→ The Third Council of Constantinople Later · AD 680–681

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Third Council of Constantinople

AD 680–681 · Firm date

A council called by the emperor Constantine IV defines that Christ has two wills and two operations, divine and human, never opposed. It condemns the teaching of one will and those who had upheld it, among them four patriarchs of Constantinople and Pope Honorius.

The Council of Chalcedon had taught that Christ is one person in two natures. In the seventh century a further question divided the churches of the empire: whether Christ had one will and one "operation", or two. At the opening session the Roman legates said that for some forty-six years bishops of Constantinople, Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paul and Peter, with Cyrus of Alexandria, had taught one will and one operation; their opponents answered that they had this teaching from the councils and the fathers, from those same bishops, and from Honorius, a former pope of Rome (Council of Constantinople (680–681), session 1).

The teaching had been resisted before. Theophanes relates that the monk Maximus debated the deposed patriarch Pyrrhus in Africa and then went to Rome, where he urged Pope Martin to hold a synod; it affirmed two wills in Christ. The emperor Constans II had Martin and Maximus brought to Constantinople and exiled, and had Maximus's tongue cut out and his hand cut off (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6121 (pp. 331–332)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6160 (pp. 351–352)).

Constans's son Constantine IV changed course and asked Rome to send delegates (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6160 (pp. 351–352)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6171–6172 (pp. 359–360)) (Liber Pontificalis Agatho (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 350–354)). Pope Agatho sent bishops, priests and monks with two letters, his own and one from a Roman synod of 125 bishops (Council of Constantinople (680–681), session 1) (Liber Pontificalis Agatho (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 350–354)). His letter sets out the doctrine of "two natural wills, and two natural operations" and claims that the Roman church "has never erred from the path of the apostolic tradition" (Council of Constantinople (680–681), letter of Agatho). The legates reached the capital in November 680. The council sat in the hall of the palace called the Trullus, with the emperor presiding. Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, who would not give up the doctrine of one will, was deposed (Liber Pontificalis Agatho (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 350–354)).

At its thirteenth session the council condemned Sergius, Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Paul, Peter and Theodore of Pharan, and with them Honorius, "because of what we found written by him to Sergius, that in all respects he followed his view" (Council of Constantinople (680–681), session 13). Its definition repeats the faith of Chalcedon and adds that there are in Christ > two natural wills and two natural operations indivisibly, inconvertibly, inseparably, inconfusedly.

The human will is not opposed to the divine but follows it, as in the saying "not to do my own will, but the will of him who sent me" (John 6:38) (Council of Constantinople (680–681), definition of faith). The bishops told the emperor that "Peter spoke through Agatho", and addressed the pope as bishop of "the first see of the Universal Church" (Council of Constantinople (680–681), address to the emperor) (Council of Constantinople (680–681), letter to Agatho).

Theophanes counts 289 bishops and calls this the sixth ecumenical council (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6171–6172 (pp. 359–360)). Both the Greek East and the Latin West received it as such: a council at Constantinople in 692 confirmed its faith (Council in Trullo canon 1), and the Catholic Church cites it under the same title (Catechism of the Catholic Church 475).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Scripture

John 6:38

Acts of the Third Council of Constantinople The Third Council of Constantinople · November AD 680 – September 681 session 1; letter of Agatho; session 13; definition of faith; address to the emperor; letter to Agatho

Chronicle (Chronographia) Theophanes the Confessor · c. AD 810–814
AM 6121 (pp. 331–332); AM 6160 (pp. 351–352); AM 6171–6172 (pp. 359–360)

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Agatho (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 350–354)

Canons of the Council in Trullo The Council in Trullo (Quinisext Council) · AD 692
canon 1

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
475

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Maximus the Confessor, Agatho, Constantine IV
Threads Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Council of Constantinople AD 553 721

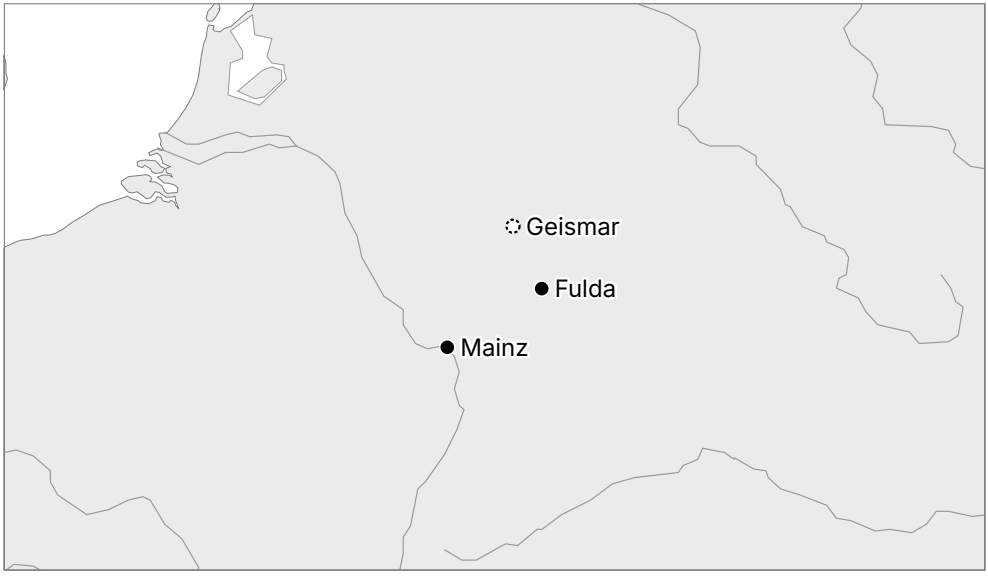
LEADS TO

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons AD 787 770

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Synod of Whitby Before · AD 664 747

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons After · AD 787 770



← The Synod of Whitby Earlier · AD 664
→ Boniface, Apostle to the Germans Later · AD 719–754

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans

AD 719–754 · Estimated date

The English monk Winfrid, renamed Boniface, is sent by Pope Gregory II to preach east of the Rhine. He fells the sacred oak at Geismar, founds bishoprics and the abbey of Fulda, reforms the Frankish church under Roman authority, and is killed in Frisia.

Winfrid, as Willibald says he was first called, was an English monk of the monastery of Nursling, near Winchester (Willibald, Life of Boniface 2 (p. 33)) (Willibald, Life of Boniface 5–6 (pp. 47–57)). He travelled to Rome (Willibald, Life of Boniface 5–6 (pp. 47–57)), and on 15 May 719 Pope Gregory II gave him a written commission to preach to the peoples still held by paganism and to baptize by the Roman rite (Boniface, Letters Tangl 12). The letter already calls him Boniface. Willibald, who wrote his Life within a few years of his death, says that he worked first in Thuringia, then for three years under Willibrord in Frisia, then in Hesse (Willibald, Life of Boniface 5–6 (pp. 47–57)).

In 722 the pope called him back and consecrated him bishop on 30 November (Willibald, Life of Boniface 6 (pp. 60–62)). Boniface swore on the tomb of Peter to uphold the Catholic faith and its unity, to be loyal in all things to Peter, to the pope and to the good of his church, to have no communion with bishops who lived against the rules of the fathers, and to correct them or report them to the pope (Boniface, Letters Tangl 16). Gregory commended him to the Frankish ruler Charles Martel, under whose protection he returned to Hesse (Willibald, Life of Boniface 6 (pp. 60–62)).

There, Willibald says, many still sacrificed to trees and springs. At Geismar Boniface set about felling an oak of great size which the pagans called by the name of Jupiter. A crowd stood by cursing him. When he had cut only a little way, the tree crashed down as if blown from above and broke into four pieces, and those who had cursed believed. From the timber he built an oratory dedicated to Peter (Willibald, Life of Boniface 6 (pp. 63–64)). The papal chronicle of the time says in a single sentence that Gregory, through Bishop Boniface, preached the word of salvation in Germany and turned that people to Christ (Liber Pontificalis Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, p. 397)).

Pope Gregory III sent him the pallium of an archbishop. He divided Bavaria into four dioceses (Willibald, Life of Boniface 6–7 (pp. 67–71)), and in 742 reported to Pope Zacharias that he had founded three more sees and that the Franks had held no synod for more than eighty years (Boniface, Letters Tangl 50). Under Charles's sons Carloman and Pepin he held synods to restore the canons, and he was given the see of Mainz (Willibald, Life of Boniface 8 (pp. 74–78)). In 751 he told the pope of a monastery he had founded in the forest by the river Fulda, under the Rule of Benedict, where he wished to be buried (Boniface, Letters Tangl 86 and 89).

In old age he appointed his disciple Lul to succeed him and went back to Frisia. On the morning he had set for confirming the newly baptized, an armed band attacked his camp by the river Bordne, the Boorne in Friesland. He forbade his companions to fight, and they were killed with him. The attackers broke open his chests looking for gold and found books (Willibald, Life of Boniface 8 (pp. 74–78)) (Willibald, Life of Boniface 8 (pp. 82–85)). His body was taken by way of Utrecht and Mainz to Fulda (Willibald, Life of Boniface 8 (pp. 88–91)).

His oath and his letters to four popes bound the churches he founded, and the Frankish church he helped to reform, to the see of Rome.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The mission begins with the letter of Gregory II, dated 15 May in the third year of the emperor Leo and the second indiction, which is 719 (Boniface, Letters Tangl 12). The oath of consecration is dated to Leo's sixth year and the sixth indiction, 722 (Boniface, Letters Tangl 16), and Willibald gives the day, 30 November (Willibald, Life of Boniface 6 (pp. 60–62)). Willibald does not date the felling of the oak; he places it after Boniface's return to Hesse, so in 723 or soon after.

For the death Willibald gives 5 June in the year of the incarnation 755, the eighth indiction (Willibald, Life of Boniface 8 (pp. 88–91)). The tradition of Fulda gives 754, and the Royal Frankish Annals also enter the martyrdom under 754 (Royal Frankish Annals, year 754). G. W. Robinson, in the notes to his translation (The Life of Saint Boniface by Willibald, 1916, p. 91), records that M. Tangl's arguments for 754 had won very general acceptance, though he himself was not convinced. This entry follows the majority.

Primary sources

Life of Saint Boniface Willibald · c. AD 755–768
2 (p. 33); 5–6 (pp. 47–57); 6 (pp. 60–62); 6 (pp. 63–64); 6–7 (pp. 67–71); 8 (pp. 74–78); 8 (pp. 82–85); 8 (pp. 88–91)

Letters of Boniface Boniface and his correspondents · AD 716–754
Tangl 12; Tangl 16; Tangl 50; Tangl 86 and 89

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, p. 397)

Royal Frankish Annals c. AD 787–829
year 754

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Geismar, Fulda, Mainz

Who Boniface, Gregory II
Threads Mission and Expansion, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Gregory the Great and the Mission to the English AD 590–604 733

LEADS TO

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning AD 789 774

Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia AD 829–831 782

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Church of the East Reaches China Before · AD 635 739

Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia After · AD 829–831 782

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Synod of Whitby Before · AD 664 747

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States After · AD 754–756 766

← The Third Council of Constantinople Earlier · AD 680–681
→ The Iconoclast Controversy Begins Later · AD 726–730

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins

AD 726–730 · Estimated date

The emperor Leo III moves against religious images, and the patriarch Germanus resigns rather than consent. John of Damascus writes in their defence from outside the empire. In 754 a council under Leo's son condemns images as contrary to the doctrine of Christ.

Nearly everything known about the first moves against images comes from their defenders. The fullest narrative used here, by the monk Theophanes, was written about 810. The Roman Liber Pontificalis is closer in time but far from the capital. The iconoclasts' own case is given here from the definition of their council of 754, which survives because the council of 787 had it read out in order to refute it (Council of Nicaea (787), session 6).

According to Theophanes, the emperor Leo III began to speak of removing the holy icons about 725. When an eruption threw up a new island in the sea between Thera and Therasia in the summer of 726, Leo took it as a sign in his own favour and pressed harder. When his officers took down the image of Christ above the great Chalke gate in Constantinople, a crowd killed some of them, and many were punished with mutilation, flogging and exile (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6217–6218 (pp. 404–405)). The Roman account says that Leo ordered that no image of any saint, martyr or angel be kept, that Pope Gregory II refused, and that in the capital images were burned and those who resisted were executed or maimed (Liber Pontificalis Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 404–405)) (Liber Pontificalis Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, p. 409)).

On 7 January 730 Leo called the patriarch Germanus before a council of state and asked him to sign against the icons. Germanus answered that he could make no change in the faith without an ecumenical council, laid down his vestment of office and withdrew. His assistant Anastasius replaced him on 22 January (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6221 (pp. 407–409)).

John of Damascus, a monk whom Theophanes places at Damascus in Syria (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6221 (pp. 407–409)), a land that had passed under Arab rule a century before (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6127 (p. 339)), wrote three treatises in reply. Before the incarnation, he argued, God could not be depicted; now that God has been seen in the flesh, he may be. "I do not worship matter, I worship the God of matter, who became matter for my sake." Worship in the full sense, latreia, belongs to God alone; the honour paid to an image is of another kind (John of Damascus, On the Divine Images 1 (pp. 9–10, 15–16)). He added that "kings have no call to make laws in the Church" (John of Damascus, On the Divine Images 2 (pp. 69–70)).

In 754 Leo's son Constantine V gathered 338 bishops at the palace of Hieria. No one came from Rome, Alexandria, Antioch or Jerusalem (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6245 (pp. 427–428)). The council called itself the seventh ecumenical. It reasoned that a picture of Christ must either claim to show his divinity, which cannot be drawn, or show his humanity alone and so divide him; the only true image he left was the bread and wine of the Eucharist. It ordered images removed from the churches, upheld the intercession of Mary and the saints, and forbade officials to seize church vessels on the pretext of destroying images. It ended by cursing Germanus and "Mansur", John of Damascus (Council of Hieria (754), definition).

The decision of 754 was reversed at the Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons, and the question was finally closed at the Triumph of Orthodoxy.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Theophanes says that Leo "began to speak" of removing the icons in the year of the world 6217 (AD 724/725). He puts the volcanic eruption that hardened the emperor's mind in the summer of the ninth indiction, which is 726, and the meeting at which Germanus resigned on 7 January of the thirteenth indiction, which is 730 (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6217–6218 (pp. 404–405)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6221 (pp. 407–409)). The Roman Life of Gregory II speaks of imperial orders against images reaching Italy but gives them no date (Liber Pontificalis Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 404–405)).

The two fixed points are therefore 726 and January 730. These sources do not preserve the text of any edict, and whether Leo issued a formal decree in 726 or only acted publicly in 730 cannot be settled from them.

Primary sources

Acts of the Second Council of Nicaea The Second Council of Nicaea · Autumn AD 787
session 6

Chronicle (Chronographia) Theophanes the Confessor · c. AD 810–814
AM 6217–6218 (pp. 404–405); AM 6221 (pp. 407–409); AM 6127 (p. 339); AM 6245 (pp. 427–428)

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 404–405); Gregory II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, p. 409)

Three Treatises on the Divine Images John of Damascus · c. AD 730
1 (pp. 9–10, 15–16); 2 (pp. 69–70)

Definition of the Council of Hieria The Council of Hieria · AD 754
definition

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Leo III the Isaurian, John of Damascus, Germanus I Threads Temple and Worship, Church and State, East and West

In context

LEADS TO

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States AD 754–756 766

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons AD 787 770

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Justinian Builds Hagia Sophia Before · 27 December AD 537 708

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons After · AD 787 770

CHURCH AND STATE

Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar Before · AD 637/638 743

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States After · AD 754–756 766

EAST AND WEST

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo Before · 8 May AD 589 728

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor After · 25 December AD 800 778

← Boniface, Apostle to the Germans Earlier · AD 719–754
→ Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History Later · AD 731

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History

AD 731 · Firm date

At Wearmouth-Jarrow the monk Bede finishes a history of the English church in five books, dated by years from the birth of Christ and built on named sources. He lists his other works, mostly on Scripture, and dies four years later while translating John's Gospel.

Bede tells his own story in a few lines at the end of his History. He was born on the lands of the twin monastery of Wearmouth and Jarrow in Northumbria, given to it at the age of seven, ordained deacon at nineteen and priest at thirty, and spent his whole life there. "I always took delight in learning, or teaching, or writing" (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.24).

In 731 he finished the Ecclesiastical History of the English People in five books, from the Roman invasions to his own day (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.23) (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.24). The preface, addressed to King Ceolwulf of Northumbria, names his informants so that readers may know what he rests on.

Abbot Albinus, who had been trained at Canterbury, supplied what was known of Kent. The priest Nothelm searched the archives of the Roman church and brought back letters of Pope Gregory. Bishop Daniel wrote from Wessex, and monks of several houses supplied more. Bede asks that if anything is found untrue the blame not be laid on him, since he has set down what common report gave him (Bede, Ecclesiastical History preface). He dates events by the year of the Lord's incarnation, as when he places the Synod of Whitby in 664 (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.26).

The History is one item in a long list. Bede appends a catalogue of what he had written since becoming a priest, and most of it is commentary on Scripture drawn from the fathers: on Genesis, Samuel, Kings, Proverbs, the Song of Songs, Ezra and Nehemiah, Mark, Luke, Acts, the Catholic Epistles and Revelation. There are also homilies, lives of saints, a history of his abbots, hymns, and books on the reckoning of time (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.24).

His pupil Cuthbert describes his death. Short of breath from before Easter, Bede went on teaching and dictating. He was turning the Gospel of John into English "for the benefit of the Church of God" and had reached the sixth chapter (John 6:9). On the eve of the Ascension the boy who was writing for him said that one sentence remained. Bede dictated it, and when the boy said it was written he answered, "thou hast said truly, it is finished". He died on the floor of his cell, singing the Gloria Patri (Cuthbert, Letter on the Death of Bede pp. xl–xliii).

The History is a principal narrative source for the conversion of the English and for the church in Britain in the seventh century, and its author's care in naming where his information came from is one reason it can still be weighed.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Bede closes his narrative with the state of Britain "in the 731st year of our Lord" (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.23), and says in the note on his own life that he has written down to his fifty-ninth year (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 5.24). The dedication shows that an earlier draft had already been sent to King Ceolwulf (Bede, Ecclesiastical History preface).

For his death Cuthbert gives the eve of the Ascension and says that the feast fell on 26 May (Cuthbert, Letter on the Death of Bede pp. xl–xliii). That was so in 735, the year usually given; the letter itself does not state the year.

Primary sources

Scripture
John 6:9

Ecclesiastical History of the English People Bede · AD 731
5.24; 5.23; preface; 3.26

Letter on the Death of Bede Cuthbert, monk of Jarrow · c. AD 735
pp. xl–xliii

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jarrow
Who Bede
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Synod of Whitby AD 664 747

LEADS TO

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning AD 789 774

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

African Councils List the Books of Scripture Before · AD 393–397 648

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning After · AD 789 774

← The Iconoclast Controversy Begins Earlier · AD 726–730
→ The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States Later · AD 754–756

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States

AD 754–756 · Firm date

Threatened by the Lombards and unaided by the emperor, Pope Stephen II crosses the Alps to the Frankish king Pepin. Pepin defeats the Lombards and gives Ravenna and its cities not to the emperor but to St Peter, making the pope a ruler of territory.

When Stephen II became pope in 752 the Lombard king Aistulf held Ravenna, the centre of the emperor's province in Italy, and was pressing on Rome. Stephen's Roman biographer says that Aistulf demanded a yearly tax of one gold coin a head from the Romans. An envoy came from the emperor at Constantinople with orders for Aistulf, and nothing followed; Stephen wrote to the emperor again, asking him to come and free Italy. Seeing that no help would come from the empire, Stephen wrote in secret to Pepin, king of the Franks (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 441–444)).

In October 753 the pope left Rome, and on 6 January 754 Pepin met him near the royal estate of Ponthion. The king dismounted, bowed to the ground and walked beside the pope's horse like a groom. Stephen begged him in tears to take up the cause of St Peter and of the Roman state, and Pepin swore to restore the exarchate of Ravenna and the rights and places of that state (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (Duchesne 1, pp. 447–448; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 44)). At Saint-Denis the pope anointed Pepin and his two sons as kings of the Franks, and at Quierzy the Frankish nobles agreed to the campaign (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 445–448)) (Royal Frankish Annals, years 754–755).

Pepin forced the Alpine passes and shut Aistulf up in Pavia. Aistulf swore to hand back Ravenna and other cities, then broke his word and besieged Rome for three months. Pepin came again in 756 (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 450–453)) (Royal Frankish Annals, year 756). An envoy of the emperor reached him near Pavia and asked that Ravenna and the cities of the exarchate be returned to imperial rule. Pepin refused. He had gone to war, he swore, for no man's favour but for love of St Peter and the pardon of his sins (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 452–453)).

Aistulf yielded. Pepin issued a written donation of the cities to St Peter, the Roman church and all future popes, which the biographer says was still kept in the church's archive (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 452–453)). Abbot Fulrad collected the keys of the cities and laid them with the deed at the tomb of Peter. The list runs from Ravenna, Rimini, Pesaro and Fano to Urbino, Gubbio and Comacchio (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (Duchesne 1, pp. 453–454; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 45)). The Frankish annals agree: Pepin took Ravenna with the Pentapolis and the whole exarchate and handed it over to St Peter (Royal Frankish Annals, year 756). Neither source gives the text of the deed. Charlemagne renewed his father's promise at Rome in 774 (Liber Pontificalis Hadrian I (Duchesne 1, p. 498; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 46)).

With this grant the bishop of Rome became the ruler of a territory in central Italy, and the papacy looked to the Frankish kings, not to the emperors, for protection. It is a different thing from the "Donation of Constantine", a text in which Constantine is made to give Pope Silvester "the city of Rome and all the provinces, districts and cities of Italy or of the western regions" (Donation of Constantine grant of Rome and the West). That document is a forgery made centuries after Constantine, as Lorenzo Valla showed in 1440 (Valla, On the Donation of Constantine pp. 84–85).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Roman Life of Stephen II dates the pope's departure from Rome to 14 October of the seventh indiction, which is 753, and his meeting with Pepin at Ponthion to 6 January, 754 (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 445–448)). It places the first treaty with the Lombard king in the eighth indiction, September 754 to August 755 (Liber Pontificalis Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 452–453)). The Royal Frankish Annals enter the anointing under 754, the first Italian campaign under 755 and the second, with the handing over of Ravenna, under 756 (Royal Frankish Annals, years 754–755) (Royal Frankish Annals, year 756).

On the forged Donation of Constantine: C. B. Coleman, The Treatise of Lorenzo Valla on the Donation of Constantine (1922), places its composition probably not long after the middle of the eighth century.

Primary sources

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 441–444); Stephen II (Duchesne 1, pp. 447–448; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 44); Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 445–448); Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 450–453); Stephen II (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 452–453); Stephen II (Duchesne 1, pp. 453–454; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 45); Hadrian I (Duchesne 1, p. 498; English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 46)

Royal Frankish Annals c. AD 787–829
years 754–755; year 756

The Donation of Constantine (Constitutum Constantini) Unknown forger, writing in the name of the emperor Constantine · Second half of the eighth century or first half of the ninth grant of Rome and the West

Discourse on the Forgery of the Alleged Donation of Constantine Lorenzo Valla · AD 1440
pp. 84–85

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Ravenna
Who Pepin the Short, Stephen II
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins AD 726–730 759

LEADS TO

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor 25 December AD 800 778

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City 11 February 1929 1371

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans Before · AD 719–754 755

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor After · 25 December AD 800 778

CHURCH AND STATE

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins Before · AD 726–730 759

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor After · 25 December AD 800 778

← Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History Earlier · AD 731
→ The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons Later · AD 787

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons

AD 787 · Firm date

A council called by the empress Irene and led by the patriarch Tarasius, with legates of Pope Hadrian I, overturns the iconoclast council of 754. It decrees that images are to be set up and honoured, and that worship in the full sense belongs to God alone.

In 784 the empress Irene, who reigned with her young son Constantine VI, chose as patriarch of Constantinople a layman, the imperial secretary Tarasius. Theophanes reports that he accepted on condition that a general council be held to end the division over images. He was consecrated on 25 December 784 and wrote to Rome, and Irene asked Pope Hadrian I to send letters and representatives (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6277 (pp. 458–460)).

A first attempt failed. When the bishops sat down in the church of the Holy Apostles in the capital in August 786, soldiers of the guard regiments, who held to the teaching of the iconoclast emperor Constantine V, came at them with drawn swords, and the meeting was abandoned. Irene sent those regiments out of the city on a pretext and disarmed them, and in May 787 she summoned the bishops to Nicaea instead (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6278–6279 (pp. 461–462)).

About 350 bishops met there in the autumn (Liber Pontificalis Hadrian I (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 511–512)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6280 (pp. 462–463)), with two Roman legates and one envoy each from Antioch and Alexandria (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6277 (pp. 458–460)). Hadrian's letter, read at the second session, promised the rulers the fame of a new Constantine and a new Helena if the images were restored, and set out the authority of Peter's see (Council of Nicaea (787), session 2, letter of Hadrian). Bishops who had supported iconoclasm read recantations and were received back (Council of Nicaea (787), session 1). At the sixth session the definition of the council of 754 was read out section by section and answered (Council of Nicaea (787), session 6).

The council then issued its decree. As the cross is set up, it says, so images of Christ, of his mother, of the angels and of the saints are to be placed in churches, on vessels and vestments, in houses and by the roads. They are to receive "due salutation and honourable reverence", but not "that true worship of faith", latreia, "which pertains alone to the divine nature".

> For the honour which is paid to the image passes on to that which the image represents.

Those who reject images are to be deposed if clergy and excommunicated if lay (Council of Nicaea (787), decree).

The Roman church had the acts translated into Latin (Liber Pontificalis Hadrian I (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 511–512)). At the court of Charlemagne the translation was read as commanding the adoration of images. A treatise written in the king's name answered that images are for ornament and remembrance, that God alone is adored, and that the Franks would neither break images with the council of 754 nor adore them with that of 787 (Libri Carolini preface (pp. 3–6)). In 794 a Frankish synod at Frankfurt, with papal legates present, rejected what it called the new synod of the Greeks (Synod of Frankfurt (794), chapter 2) (Royal Frankish Annals, year 794).

The Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches receive Nicaea II as the seventh ecumenical council (Confession of Dositheus question 4 (pp. 160–161)) (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2131–2132). The Reformer John Calvin did not: citing the Frankish treatise, he rejected its decree (Calvin, Institutes 1.11.14).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The decree names the rulers, Constantine and his mother Irene, and the place, the church of Holy Wisdom at Nicaea (Council of Nicaea (787), decree). Theophanes puts the council in the year of the world 6280, the eleventh indiction, which began in September 787; he dates its opening to 11 October and the closing session in the palace at Constantinople to November (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6280 (pp. 462–463)). The days of the individual sessions are given in the full minutes, which the translation cited here does not reproduce. The year is not in doubt.

Primary sources

Chronicle (Chronographia) Theophanes the Confessor · c. AD 810–814
AM 6277 (pp. 458–460); AM 6278–6279 (pp. 461–462); AM 6280 (pp. 462–463)

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Hadrian I (ed. Duchesne, vol. 1, pp. 511–512)

Acts of the Second Council of Nicaea The Second Council of Nicaea · Autumn AD 787 session 2, letter of Hadrian; session 1; session 6; decree

Libri Carolini (Opus Caroli regis contra synodum) Written in the name of Charlemagne · c. AD 790–793 preface (pp. 3–6)

Capitulary of the Synod of Frankfurt The Synod of Frankfurt under Charlemagne · June AD 794
chapter 2

Royal Frankish Annals c. AD 787–829
year 794

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672 question 4 (pp. 160–161)

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
2131–2132

Institutes of the Christian Religion John Calvin · First edition 1536; final Latin edition 1559
1.11.14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nicaea
Who Irene of Athens, Tarasius, Hadrian I Threads Creeds and Councils, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins AD 726–730 759

The Third Council of Constantinople AD 680–681 751

LEADS TO

The Triumph of Orthodoxy 11 March AD 843 786

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Third Council of Constantinople Before · AD 680–681 751

The Triumph of Orthodoxy After · 11 March AD 843 786

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins Before · AD 726–730 759

The Triumph of Orthodoxy After · 11 March AD 843 786

← The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States Earlier · AD 754–756
→ Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning Later · AD 789

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning

AD 789 · Firm date

In the General Admonition of 789 Charlemagne orders the clergy of his kingdom to keep the canons, preach the faith, sing the Roman chant, open schools and copy books correctly. With Alcuin and other scholars he has the text of the Bible revised.

On 23 March 789, at his palace at Aachen, Charlemagne issued a long capitulary addressed to the clergy and the lay powers of his kingdom (Admonitio generalis date clause of the accompanying edict (p. 62)). In the preface he calls himself the defender and helper of the church. He is sending envoys, he says, to correct with the bishops whatever needs correcting, and no one should think this presumptuous: the book of Kings tells how Josiah went through his kingdom, correcting and admonishing, to call it back to the worship of the true God (2 Kings 23:1–25) (Admonitio generalis preface (pp. 53–54)).

The first part of the text repeats canons of the old councils. The second gives the king's own orders. Bishops are to see that their priests hold the right faith, baptize correctly, and understand the prayers of the mass and the Lord's Prayer (Admonitio generalis 70 (p. 59)). Schools are to be set up where boys can learn to read. In every monastery and bishop's house the psalms, the chant, the reckoning of the calendar and grammar are to be taught, and the church's books carefully corrected, because people who wish to pray well often pray badly from faulty books (Admonitio generalis 72 (pp. 59–60)). The clergy are to learn the Roman chant, as King Pepin had ordered for the sake of unity with the apostolic see. Sunday work is forbidden. Preachers are to teach the Trinity, the incarnation and the judgment, and nothing of their own invention (Admonitio generalis 80–82 (pp. 61–62)).

Two undated letters give the reason. Letters from monasteries had shown the king sound thoughts in uncouth language, and he feared that men who wrote badly would understand the Scriptures badly; so bishoprics and monasteries were to teach letters to all who could learn (Charlemagne, De litteris colendis whole letter). To the clergy he wrote that he had set himself to repair the knowledge of letters, that the books of the Old and New Testament, corrupted by the ignorance of copyists, had been corrected, and that he was sending out a collection of sermons from the fathers compiled by Paul the Deacon (Charlemagne, Epistola generalis whole letter).

Einhard names two of the scholars at court: the deacon Peter of Pisa, who taught the king grammar, and the Englishman Alcuin, "the greatest scholar of the day", who taught him rhetoric, logic and astronomy. He adds that the king took great pains over church reading and singing (Einhard, Life of Charlemagne 25) (Einhard, Life of Charlemagne 26). Alcuin later described his own teaching at Tours and asked leave to fetch books from York (Alcuin, Letters 78 (pp. 345–346)). In 800 he wrote that the king's command to correct the Old and New Testament was keeping him from other work (Alcuin, Letters 136 (p. 529)).

The programme joined the reform of the Frankish church that Boniface had begun to the learning of the English schools from which Bede and Alcuin came.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The edict for the royal envoys that was issued together with the General Admonition is dated to the year of the incarnation 789, the twenty-first year of the reign, at the palace of Aachen, on the tenth day before the Kalends of April, which is 23 March (Admonitio generalis date clause of the accompanying edict (p. 62)). The two letters on learning carry no date. Their editor in the Monumenta Germaniae Historica, A. Boretius (Capitularia regum Francorum 1, 1883), placed the letter to Baugulf between 780 and 800 and the general letter between 786 and 800: both use the royal title that Charles bore before he became emperor, Baugulf became abbot in 780, and the general letter was written after Paul the Deacon had gone back to Monte Cassino.

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Kings 23:1–25

Admonitio generalis (General Admonition) Issued in the name of Charlemagne · 23 March AD 789

date clause of the accompanying edict (p. 62); preface (pp. 53–54); 70 (p. 59); 72 (pp. 59–60); 80–82 (pp. 61–62)

Letter on the Cultivation of Learning (De litteris colendis) Issued in the name of Charlemagne · Between AD 780 and 800

whole letter

General Letter (Epistola generalis) Issued in the name of Charlemagne · Between AD 786 and 800

whole letter

Life of Charlemagne (Vita Karoli Magni) Einhard · After AD 814, in the reign of Louis the Pious

25; 26

Letters of Alcuin Alcuin · Late eighth century to AD 804

78 (pp. 345–346); 136 (p. 529)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Aachen
Who Charlemagne, Alcuin

Threads Scripture and Canon, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans AD 719–754 755

Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History AD 731 763

LEADS TO

The Schools Become Universities c. 1150–1215 862

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Bede Completes His Ecclesiastical History Before · AD 731 763

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs After · AD 863–885 790

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Founding of Cluny After · 11 September AD 910 807

← The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons Earlier · AD 787
→ Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor Later · 25 December AD 800

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor

25 December AD 800 · Firm date

On Christmas Day 800, in St Peter's at Rome, Pope Leo III sets a crown on the head of the Frankish king Charles and the Romans acclaim him emperor. The sources of the time disagree about who planned it and whether the king wished it.

Pope Leo III had looked to the Frankish king from the start of his pontificate, when he sent him the keys of St Peter's tomb and the banner of the city of Rome (Royal Frankish Annals, year 796). On 25 April 799 a party led by two officials of the papal court attacked him during a procession, tried to put out his eyes and cut out his tongue, and shut him in a monastery. He escaped to the king in Saxony, who sent him home under escort, while his enemies sent accusations after him (Liber Pontificalis Leo III (ed. Duchesne, vol. 2, pp. 4–6)) (Royal Frankish Annals, year 799).

Charlemagne reached Rome on 24 November 800. According to the Roman account the bishops assembled in St Peter's declared that they did not dare to judge the apostolic see, which is judged by no one. Leo then swore on the Gospels that he was innocent (Liber Pontificalis Leo III (Duchesne 2, p. 7; partly in English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 8)) (Royal Frankish Annals, year 800).

At the Christmas mass he crowned the king. Five accounts are set side by side here, and they do not tell the same story.

- The Frankish court annals say that as the king rose from prayer before the tomb of Peter, Leo set a crown on his head and the Roman people acclaimed him as Augustus, crowned by God, emperor of the Romans. The pope then paid him the reverence shown to the emperors of old (Royal Frankish Annals, year 801).
- The Roman Liber Pontificalis says that the pope crowned him "with his own hands", that the Romans, seeing his love for the Roman church, acclaimed him three times by the will of God and of St Peter, and that "he was made emperor of the Romans by all". It adds that the pope at once anointed the king's son Charles, and it does not mention the pope's act of reverence (Liber Pontificalis Leo III (Duchesne 2, p. 7; partly in English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 8)).
- The Annals of Lorsch present a decision taken in council. Because the name of emperor was vacant among the Greeks, who were ruled by a woman, the pope, the bishops and the Christian people judged that Charles, who held Rome and the other seats of the Caesars, ought to bear it; and the king was unwilling to refuse their request (Annals of Lorsch, years 800–801 (p. 38)).
- Einhard, who knew the king and wrote after his death, says that Charles so disliked the titles at first that he declared he would not have entered the church that day, great feast though it was, "if he could have foreseen the design of the Pope" (Einhard, Life of Charlemagne 28).
- The Byzantine chronicler Theophanes says that Leo crowned Charles in return for restoring him, and that Charles afterwards sought to marry the empress Irene and so unite East and West (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6289 (pp. 472–473)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6293–6294 (p. 475)).

Whether the plan was the pope's, the king's or that of an assembly cannot be settled from these texts. What followed is clearer. There were again two emperors among Christians, one of them made in a ceremony performed by a pope. Einhard says that the emperors at Constantinople took the title very ill and that Charles answered with embassies and letters in which he called them brothers (Einhard, Life of Charlemagne 28).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Frankish court annals, the Annals of Lorsch, the Liber Pontificalis and Theophanes all give Christmas Day (Royal Frankish Annals, year 801) (Annals of Lorsch, years 800–801 (p. 38)) (Liber Pontificalis Leo III (Duchesne 2, p. 7; partly in English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 8)) (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6293–6294 (p. 475)); Einhard says only that it was a great feast (Einhard, Life of Charlemagne 28). The Royal Frankish Annals enter the coronation under 801 because their year began at Christmas: the entry for 800 ends by saying that the number of the years changed, and the next begins with the most holy day of the Lord's nativity (Royal Frankish Annals, year 801). By the modern reckoning the day is 25 December 800. Theophanes gives the same day in the ninth indiction, which also falls in 800 (Theophanes, Chronicle AM 6293–6294 (p. 475)).

Primary sources

Royal Frankish Annals c. AD 787–829
year 796; year 799; year 800; year 801

Liber Pontificalis (The Book of the Popes) First compiled c. AD 530; continued to the late ninth century
Leo III (ed. Duchesne, vol. 2, pp. 4–6); Leo III (Duchesne 2, p. 7; partly in English in Thatcher and McNeal, no. 8)

Annals of Lorsch (Annales Laureshamenses) Ends with AD 803
years 800–801 (p. 38)

Life of Charlemagne (Vita Karoli Magni) Einhard · After AD 814, in the reign of Louis the Pious
28

Chronicle (Chronographia) Theophanes the Confessor · c. AD 810–814
AM 6289 (pp. 472–473); AM 6293–6294 (p. 475)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Charlemagne, Leo III
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States AD 754–756 766
The End of the Western Roman Empire AD 476 686

LEADS TO

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor February AD 962 810
The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

CHURCH AND STATE

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States Before · AD 754–756 766
Otto I Is Crowned Emperor After · February AD 962 810

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States Before · AD 754–756 766
The Photian Schism After · AD 863–867 794

EAST AND WEST

The Iconoclast Controversy Begins Before · AD 726–730 759
Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs After · AD 863–885 790

← Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning Earlier · AD 789
→ Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia Later · AD 829–831

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia

AD 829–831 · Estimated date

The monk Ansgar is sent from the Frankish court to the Danes and then to the Swedish trading town of Birka, and becomes the first archbishop of Hamburg. His churches are few and fragile, and depend on the leave of kings.

Ansgar was a monk of Corbie in northern Francia, sent to teach at its new daughter house of Corvey in Saxony. When the Danish king Harald, driven from his kingdom, was baptized at the court of the emperor Louis the Pious, the emperor looked for a monk to go home with him, and Abbot Wala proposed Ansgar. He went with one companion and began a school for a dozen or more boys (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 6–8). The court annals record Harald's baptism at Mainz with his wife and a large following (Royal Frankish Annals, year 826).

Rimbert tells next of Swedish envoys who told Louis that many of their people wished to become Christians and that their king would allow priests to live among them. Ansgar set out with the monk Witmar. Pirates took the merchant ships they travelled in, with the emperor's gifts and nearly forty books, and they finished the journey largely on foot. At Birka King Björn consulted his men and gave them leave to preach. Christian captives in the town could receive the sacraments again, and the town's prefect, Herigar, was baptized and built a church on his own land (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 9–11).

On their return Louis founded an archbishopric at Hamburg, beyond the Elbe, as a base for the northern mission. Ansgar was consecrated to it, and Pope Gregory IV gave him the pallium and named him legate to the Swedes, Danes and Slavs. A bishop, Gautbert, was sent to the Swedes (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 12–14).

Little of this held. Raiders from the sea burned Hamburg with its church, monastery and books, and among the Swedes a crowd killed one of Gautbert's companions and drove the bishop out (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 16–17). Ansgar was given the vacant see of Bremen to live from, won leave from the Danish king Horik to build a church at Schleswig (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 22–24), and went a second time to Birka. There, Rimbert says, lots were cast and the king put the matter to the assembly: an old man argued that the Christians' God had often helped Swedes in danger at sea, and the people agreed that priests might stay (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 26–28).

Ansgar died on 3 February, the day after the feast of the Purification; in his last illness, Rimbert says, he had grieved that he was not to die a martyr (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 40–41). What Rimbert, his pupil, describes is not the conversion of kingdoms but congregations in trading places, existing by leave of the kings (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 22–24) (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 26–28). In his last weeks Ansgar had the papal privileges for the mission copied and sent to the bishops and to the king, so that the work would not be forgotten (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 40–41).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Rimbert gives no years. The Royal Frankish Annals put the baptism of the Danish king Harald at Mainz in 826 (Royal Frankish Annals, year 826). Rimbert says that Ansgar and his companion had worked for two years or more among the Danes when the companion fell ill (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 6–8), and tells next of the Swedish envoys who came to the emperor (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 9–11), which points to about 829 for the journey to Birka. He says that Ansgar's last illness began in the sixty-fourth year of his life, the thirty-fourth of his episcopate (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 40–41).

On this basis the translator, C. H. Robinson, dates the stay at Birka to 829–831, the consecration at Hamburg to 831, the sack of Hamburg to 845, the second visit to Birka to 852 or 853 and Ansgar's death to 3 February 865. Rimbert gives the day of his death as the one after the feast of the Purification (Rimbert, Life of Anskar 40–41); the year depends on annals not read for this entry.

Primary sources

Life of Anskar Rimbert · c. AD 865–876
6–8; 9–11; 12–14; 16–17; 22–24; 26–28; 40–41

Royal Frankish Annals c. AD 787–829
year 826

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Birka, Hamburg
Who Ansgar
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans AD 719–754 755

LEADS TO

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law AD 999/1000 825

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Boniface, Apostle to the Germans Before · AD 719–754 755

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs After · AD 863–885 790

← Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor Earlier · 25 December AD 800
→ The Triumph of Orthodoxy Later · 11 March AD 843

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Triumph of Orthodoxy

11 March AD 843 · Estimated date

After the death of the iconoclast emperor Theophilus, his widow Theodora and the new patriarch Methodios restore the veneration of icons at Constantinople. The day is kept each year on the first Sunday of Lent.

The council of 787 had restored the veneration of images (The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons), but a later generation of emperors forbade it again; the Synodikon counts thirty years of this second attack (Synodikon of Orthodoxy, preamble). This entry depends chiefly on a history compiled at the Byzantine court about a hundred years later, which tells the story as the winners remembered it.

When Theophilus died, his son Michael III was a small child. Power lay with his mother Theodora the Empress and three regents: the eunuch Theoktistos, her brother Bardas and her uncle Manuel. According to the Continuator, monks of the Stoudios monastery promised the sick Manuel recovery if he would restore the images; he recovered and won over the others. Theodora answered that she had always wished it and had been held back by the number of senators and bishops attached to the other side, the patriarch above all (Theophanes Continuatus 4.1–2).

The patriarch, John the Grammarian, was told to accept the images or withdraw until a council met. The Continuator says that he wounded himself and let the rumour run that the empress had sent men to kill him, that Bardas exposed the trick, and that he was removed. In his place came Methodios I, whom the Continuator calls the church's defender and who had come through a long imprisonment (Theophanes Continuatus 4.2–3). Theodora asked the assembled clergy to pardon her dead husband. They replied that they could not absolve a man who had died unrepentant; she swore that at the end he had asked for the icons and kissed them, and they gave her a written promise to pray for him (Theophanes Continuatus 4.4–6).

On the first Sunday of Lent, after a night vigil in the church of the Mother of God at Blachernae, the empress, the patriarch and the clergy went in procession to Hagia Sophia in Constantinople and celebrated the liturgy there (Theophanes Continuatus 4.6). The thanksgiving composed for the occasion, the Synodikon, declares that the church honours Christ and his saints in word, in writing, in thought, in sacrifice, in churches and in icons. It wishes eternal memory to the patriarchs Germanos, Tarasios, Nikephoros and Methodios and to other defenders of the images, and pronounces anathema on the iconoclast patriarchs by name (Synodikon of Orthodoxy, acclamations and anathemas).

The Synodikon says that the church owes this thanksgiving every year on this day. With names and condemnations added by later generations, as the translator's preface notes, it is still printed in the service books of the Orthodox Church for the first Sunday of Lent, the Sunday of Orthodoxy (Synodikon of Orthodoxy, preamble).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The sources give the day in the church's calendar and not the year. The Continuator of Theophanes says that the procession took place on the first Sunday of Lent, after Methodios had been made patriarch, in the regency for the child Michael III (Theophanes Continuatus 4.6). The Synodikon speaks of deliverance after "thirty years" (Synodikon of Orthodoxy, preamble), a round figure that fits the years since iconoclasm was renewed under Leo V in 815.

Modern accounts place the event in 843, when the first Sunday of Lent fell on 11 March. The same Sunday in 842 fell on 19 February, and Theophilus's death is put in January of that year, which leaves little room for the negotiations and the change of patriarch that the Continuator describes. The year therefore rests on inference from these narratives and not on a dated document.

Primary sources

Synodikon of Orthodoxy AD 843, with later additions preamble; acclamations and anathemas

Chronographia (Theophanes Continuatus) Anonymous continuators of Theophanes · c. AD 950
4.1–2; 4.2–3; 4.4–6; 4.6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Theodora the Empress, Methodios I Threads Temple and Worship, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons AD 787 770

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons Before · AD 787 770

The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela After · c. 1200 878

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Second Council of Nicaea Restores Icons Before · AD 787 770

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius After · November AD 879 – March 880 802

← Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia Earlier · AD 829–831
→ Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Later · AD 863–885

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs

AD 863–885 · Estimated date

Two brothers from Thessalonica, sent from Constantinople to Moravia, give the Slavs an alphabet, the Scriptures and the liturgy in their own language. Rome's attitude to the Slavonic liturgy shifts from approval to prohibition and back, and ends in a ban.

In the early 860s Rastislav, ruler of the Moravians, sent to the emperor Michael III at Constantinople. His people, he said, had given up paganism and kept the Christian law, but had no teacher to explain the faith in their own language (Life of Constantine 14). The emperor chose Constantine, called the Philosopher, and his brother Methodius, natives of Thessalonica, where, the Life of Methodius has him say, everyone spoke good Slavonic (Life of Methodius 5–6). Constantine, known by his later monastic name as Cyril, devised letters for the language, and the Life says that the first words he wrote in them were the opening of John's Gospel (Life of Constantine 14).

In Great Moravia the brothers trained pupils and translated the services of the church. Latin clergy objected that God might be praised only in Hebrew, Greek and Latin. Constantine called them followers of Pilate, who had written the title on the cross in those languages (Life of Constantine 15); the Life calls their view the heresy of the three tongues (Life of Constantine 16). At Venice he asked his critics whether the rain does not fall on all alike, and quoted Paul on the uselessness of prayer that the hearers cannot understand (Life of Constantine 16) (1 Corinthians 14:14–19).

They went on to Rome, bringing relics believed to be those of Clement of Rome. Pope Hadrian II came out to meet them, laid the Slavonic books in the church of St Mary and had their pupils ordained, and the liturgy was sung in Slavonic in St Peter's (Life of Constantine 17). Constantine fell ill there, became a monk under the name Cyril and died in February 869 (Life of Constantine 18).

Methodius was sent back to the Slavs and, at the request of the prince Kocel, made bishop for Pannonia (Life of Methodius 8). The Life of Methodius gives a letter of Hadrian allowing the liturgy in Slavonic provided that the Epistle and Gospel were first read in Latin; no Latin text of it survives, and the editor of the translation cited here marks it as spurious (Life of Methodius 8). The Frankish king's bishops accused him of teaching in their territory and held him in Swabia for two and a half years, until the pope forced his release (Life of Methodius 9–10). Pope John VIII's own letters show Rome's hesitation. In 879 he summoned Methodius and reminded him that he had already been forbidden to sing mass in Slavonic, which the letter calls a barbarous tongue, though he might preach in it (John VIII, Letters, 201 (879)). In 880, having examined him, he declared him orthodox, praised the letters devised by Constantine and permitted mass and the offices in Slavonic, with the Gospel read first in Latin (John VIII, Letters, 255, Industriae tuae (June 880), pp. 223–224).

Methodius finished translating the Scriptures (Life of Methodius 15) and died in 885 (Life of Methodius 17). A letter in the name of Stephen V then forbade the Slavonic liturgy under anathema (Stephen V, Letter to Svatopluk p. 357). The work outlived the ban elsewhere: the chronicle of Kyiv, more than two centuries later, says that the books first written for the Moravians were those in use in Rus' and among the Bulgarians (Primary Chronicle, years 888–898).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Both Lives were written in Slavonic. They are paraphrased here from nineteenth-century Latin translations, that of F. Miklosich for the Life of Constantine (1870) and the one printed by J. A. Ginzel for the Life of Methodius (1861), which are the pages linked.

Neither Life dates the arrival in Moravia. The fixed points are at the end: Constantine died at Rome on 14 February in the second indiction, the year 6377 from creation, that is AD 869 (Life of Constantine 18), and Methodius on 6 April in the third indiction (Life of Methodius 17). The Latin translation linked here prints the year from creation as the 1393rd, a slip for the 6393 of the Slavonic text, that is AD 885; the third indiction ran from September 884. The brothers were received at Rome by Hadrian II (Life of Constantine 17), who succeeded Nicholas I at the end of 867.

Counting back, the Life of Constantine gives forty months in Moravia (Life of Constantine 15) and the Life of Methodius three years (Life of Methodius 5–6), followed by a stay in Pannonia and the journey through Venice. That puts the arrival in 863 or 864; 863 is the year usually given. The papal letters are dated by month and indiction (John VIII, Letters, 255, Industriae tuae (June 880), pp. 223–224).

Primary sources

Scripture

1 Corinthians 14:14–19

Life of Constantine the Philosopher (Cyril) after AD 869
14; 15; 16; 17; 18

Life of Methodius soon after AD 885
5–6; 8; 9–10; 15; 17

Letters (Register) John VIII · AD 872–882
201 (879); 255, Industriae tuae (June 880), pp. 223–224

Letter to Svatopluk Stephen V · late AD 885
p. 357

Primary Chronicle (Tale of Bygone Years) c. AD 1113–1116 years 888–898

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Great Moravia, Rome, Thessalonica
Who Cyril, Methodius, Rastislav, Hadrian II
Threads Mission and Expansion, Scripture and Canon, East and West

In context

LEADS TO

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria AD 864–866 798
The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland AD 966 817
The Baptism of Rus' AD 988/989 821

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia Before · AD 829–831 782
The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria After · AD 864–866 798

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning Before · AD 789 774
Wycliffe and the First English Bible After · c. 1382 950

EAST AND WEST

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor Before · 25 December AD 800 778
The Photian Schism After · AD 863–867 794

← The Triumph of Orthodoxy Earlier · 11 March AD 843
→ The Photian Schism Later · AD 863–867

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Photian Schism

AD 863–867 · Estimated date

Pope Nicholas I refuses to recognize Photius as patriarch of Constantinople and declares him deposed; Photius denounces Latin teaching in Bulgaria, the filioque above all, and his council condemns the pope. The breach is healed, but its arguments return.

In the late 850s the patriarch Ignatius of Constantinople lost his see, and Photius, a layman in the imperial service, was made patriarch of Constantinople in his place. How Ignatius came to leave office was disputed from the start. The account preserved in the pope's letters is that of Ignatius's supporters: Photius was tonsured and consecrated in haste, by a bishop already under censure, while the lawful patriarch was still alive (Nicholas I, Letters, 91, chapter 1 (13 November 866), pp. 519–520).

Pope Nicholas I sent legates to inquire. At Constantinople they sided with Photius, and Nicholas disowned them. A synod at Rome deposed one of the legates, declared Photius stripped of every priestly office and threatened him with anathema if he continued to occupy the see or to hinder Ignatius (Nicholas I, Letters, 91 (13 November 866), pp. 517–518) (Nicholas I, Letters, 91, chapter 1 (13 November 866), pp. 519–520). The pope claimed, in effect, the right to judge who was patriarch of Constantinople.

The quarrel widened when the Bulgarian ruler Boris, baptized from Constantinople, turned to Rome. In 866 Nicholas answered his questions, held out the prospect of an archbishop, and told him that Constantinople ranked as a patriarchate by the favour of emperors and not by apostolic foundation (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars 72; 92). Latin clergy began to work in Bulgaria. In 867 Photius wrote to the eastern patriarchs denouncing what they taught there, among other things fasting on Saturdays, the rejection of married priests, a second anointing by bishops, and the addition to the creed that the Holy Spirit proceeds also from the Son, which he held to bring two sources into the Trinity. He asked the patriarchs to send representatives to a council (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 4–9; 34). Nicholas, for his part, listed the same Greek charges in a letter to the Frankish bishops (Nicholas I, Letters, 100 (23 October 867)). Photius's council, according to the council that afterwards condemned it and burnt its records, pronounced the pope deposed and anathematized (Council of Constantinople (869–870), introduction; definition; canons 2, 4 and 6).

Neither sentence stood. A new emperor, Basil I, removed Photius and recalled Ignatius, and a council at Constantinople in 869–870, with legates of Pope Hadrian II, anathematized Photius, declared his ordinations void and burnt the records of his council (Council of Constantinople (869–870), introduction; definition; canons 2, 4 and 6). Within ten years Photius was patriarch again, and Pope John VIII was writing to the emperors that the Roman see may loose what a synod has bound, as it had for Athanasius and John Chrysostom (John VIII, Letters, 207 (879)).

The two churches remembered the affair differently. Rome in 1053 still recalled Nicholas's stand against the "neophyte" Photius (Leo IX, Letter to Michael Cerularius (In terra pax) 22). The Orthodox Church commemorates Ignatius and Photius together among its holy patriarchs (Synodikon of Orthodoxy, acclamations). The dispute had joined three questions that would return in the Schism of 1054: the pope's authority over other patriarchs, the control of newly converted peoples, and the wording of the creed.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The limits are conventional. The earlier is the Roman synod at which Nicholas I pronounced against Photius. Its decrees are known from the pope's letter of 13 November 866 (Nicholas I, Letters, 91, chapter 1 (13 November 866), pp. 519–520), which does not date it. The editor of the letters, E. Perels, places it in 863 and the later synod that dealt with the legate Radoald in 864, in his notes on that letter (Nicholas I, Letters, 91 (13 November 866), pp. 517–518). The later limit is 867, the year to which Photius's encyclical, itself undated, is assigned (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 4–9; 34), and the year of the pope's letter of 23 October answering the Greek charges (Nicholas I, Letters, 100 (23 October 867)). Photius had been patriarch since the late 850s, and the council that condemned him sat from October 869 to February 870 (Council of Constantinople (869–870), introduction; definition; canons 2, 4 and 6).

Primary sources

Letters Nicholas I · AD 858–867
91, chapter 1 (13 November 866), pp. 519–520; 91 (13 November 866), pp. 517–518; 100 (23 October 867)

Responses to the Questions of the Bulgars Nicholas I · AD 866
72; 92

Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs Photius · AD 867
4–9; 34

Acts of the Council of Constantinople (869–870) The Council of Constantinople of 869–870 · October AD 869 – February 870
introduction; definition; canons 2, 4 and 6

Letters (Register) John VIII · AD 872–882
207 (879)

Letter to Michael Cerularius and Leo of Ohrid (In terra pax) Leo IX · AD 1053
22

Synodikon of Orthodoxy AD 843, with later additions
acclamations

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Rome
Who Photius, Nicholas I, Ignatius of Constantinople
Threads East and West, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo 8 May AD 589 728

LEADS TO

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria AD 864–866 798

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius November AD 879 – March 880 802

The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

EAST AND WEST

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Before · AD 863–885 790

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria After · AD 864–866 798

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor Before · 25 December AD 800 778

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor After · February AD 962 810

← Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Earlier · AD 863–885
→ The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria Later · AD 864–866

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria

AD 864–866 · Estimated date

Boris, ruler of the Bulgars, accepts baptism from Constantinople and takes the name Michael. He puts down a revolt of his nobles, then asks the pope for bishops, and his country becomes a prize in the quarrel between Rome and Constantinople.

In 864, a Frankish annalist records, King Louis the German marched to meet the khagan of the Bulgars, who had promised that he wished to become a Christian (Annals of St Bertin, year 864, p. 72). When the baptism came, it came from Constantinople. A Byzantine court history compiled in the next century tells that the sister of Boris had become a Christian as a captive in the imperial city and pressed the faith on him after her return, that a famine made him call on the God of the Christians, and that he was baptized by a bishop sent from the capital and named Michael after the emperor (Theophanes Continuatus 4.13–14, pp. 162–163). It adds, as something people tell, that a monk and painter named Methodius painted the Last Judgment for him, and that the sight led him to be baptized at dead of night (Theophanes Continuatus 4.15, pp. 163–164).

Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, wrote to the convert as to a spiritual son. His letter recites the creed, describes the seven general councils one by one, likens what Michael had done to the deeds of Constantine the Great, and continues with counsels for a Christian ruler (Photius, Letter to Michael of Bulgaria 1, 4–25).

The annalist reports that the Bulgar nobles, angered by the baptism, raised the people to kill their king. He went out against them with forty-eight men, seven clerics with burning candles appeared before him, and the rebels fell to the ground in terror; he put fifty-two of the nobles to death and let the rest go unharmed (Annals of St Bertin, year 866, pp. 85–86). Boris's own account survives in the reply of Pope Nicholas I, who repeats it to him: the leaders were put to the sword with all their children. To have killed children who had no part in the plot, the pope answers, was a sin, and the captured parents should have been spared as well; Boris is to do penance (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars 17).

Boris then looked west. He asked Louis the German for a bishop and priests, and sent his son and many nobles to Rome with gifts, questions about the faith and a request for clergy (Annals of St Bertin, year 866, pp. 85–86). Nicholas answered in 106 chapters. Several deal with what Greeks had told the Bulgars: that they must not bathe on Wednesdays and Fridays, must stand in church with their hands held to the breast, must not take communion without a belt. Boris had told him that Greeks, Armenians and others were teaching different things in his country (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars 6, 54–55, 106). Those who refused Christianity and kept to their idols, the pope wrote, were to be reasoned with and shunned, but not forced to believe (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars 41). Asked whether the Bulgars might have a patriarch, he offered a bishop consecrated at Rome and in time an archbishop (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars 72–73).

Photius protested to the eastern patriarchs that men from the West had fallen on a people Christian for less than two years (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 3–4), and Bulgaria became part of his quarrel with Rome. By 878 it was Rome that complained. In April of that year Pope John VIII wrote to Boris that he grieved to see him deceived, urged him not to follow the Greeks and asked him to return to Saint Peter (John VIII, Letters, 66 (16 April 878), pp. 58–59). He told the Greek bishops and clergy in Bulgaria, whom he called invaders, to leave within thirty days or lose their office (John VIII, Letters, 71 (April 878), p. 66).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

No source read for this entry gives the day or the year of the baptism. The Annals of St Bertin say under 864 that the Bulgar ruler had promised to become a Christian (Annals of St Bertin, year 864, p. 72). Under 866 they say that he, who had thought of becoming a Christian in the year before, received baptism, and they go on in the same entry to the revolt and the embassies (Annals of St Bertin, year 866, pp. 85–86). Photius, in a letter assigned to 867, writes that the Bulgars had held the Christian faith for less than two years when clergy from the West arrived (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 3–4). The Byzantine history that tells the story gives no year and sets it among the events of the regency of the empress Theodora (Theophanes Continuatus 4.13–14, pp. 162–163).

Together these put the baptism between 864 and 866. G. Waitz, editing the annals in 1883, notes that it took place "as it seems" in 864 (Annals of St Bertin, year 866, pp. 85–86), and the editor of John VIII's letters gives the same year (John VIII, Letters, 66 (16 April 878), pp. 58–59). The pope's answer to Boris is headed AD 866 in the translation used here (Nicholas I, Responses to the Bulgars title).

Nor does any of them name the place. The annalist speaks of the king's palace and of the gates of a city (Annals of St Bertin, year 866, pp. 85–86). The timeline sets the event at Pliska by convention.

Primary sources

Annals of St Bertin Prudentius of Troyes and Hincmar of Reims · AD 830–882 year 864, p. 72; year 866, pp. 85–86; year 866, pp. 85–86

Chronographia (Theophanes Continuatus) Anonymous continuators of Theophanes · c. AD 950
4.13–14, pp. 162–163; 4.15, pp. 163–164

Letter to Michael, Prince of Bulgaria Photius · c. AD 865
1, 4–25

Responses to the Questions of the Bulgars Nicholas I · AD 866
17; 6, 54–55, 106; 41; 72–73; title

Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs Photius · AD 867
3–4

Letters (Register) John VIII · AD 872–882
66 (16 April 878), pp. 58–59; 71 (April 878), p. 66

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Pliska, Constantinople, Rome
Who Boris I, Photius, Nicholas I
Threads Mission and Expansion, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs AD 863–885 790

The Photian Schism AD 863–867 794

LEADS TO

The Baptism of Rus' AD 988/989 821

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Before · AD 863–885 790

The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland After · AD 966 817

EAST AND WEST

The Photian Schism Before · AD 863–867 794

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius After · November AD 879 – March 880 802

← The Photian Schism Earlier · AD 863–867
→ The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius Later · November AD 879 – March 880

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius

November AD 879 – March 880 · Firm date

A council at Constantinople, with legates of Pope John VIII, recognizes Photius as patriarch, rejects the council that had condemned him ten years earlier and forbids any change to the creed. Orthodox documents count it among the councils of universal authority.

The council of 869–870 had anathematized Photius (the Photian schism) (Council of Constantinople (869–870), definition). After the death of Ignatius, Photius became patriarch again (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) II. Historical Considerations). In August 879 Pope John VIII wrote to the emperor Basil I and his sons that he received Photius as a brother and fellow bishop, on his asking for mercy before a synod, and released him and his followers from the sentences passed on them. He set conditions: no layman was again to be made patriarch, and Photius was to claim no authority over the church of Bulgaria (John VIII, Letters, 207 (August 879), pp. 169–176).

At its second session the council sat in the Great Church of Constantinople under Photius, with three legates of the pope and envoys of the patriarchs of Jerusalem and Alexandria (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 2, Mansi 17, cols 393–394). Its first canon provides that Italian clergy, laymen or bishops whom Pope John has deposed, excommunicated or anathematized are to be held so by Photius, and those whom Photius has so sentenced by the pope, the privileges of the Roman see remaining unchanged (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 5, canon 1, Mansi 17, cols 497–498). The legate Paul, bishop of Ancona, signed that he received Photius as lawful patriarch, that he rejected and anathematized the council held against him in the time of Pope Hadrian and did not count it among the councils, and that he reckoned the second council of Nicaea as the seventh (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 5, subscription of the legate Paul, Mansi 17, col. 507).

On 3 March 880 a sixth session met in the palace, the emperors presiding (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 6, Mansi 17, cols 511–514). A definition was read. It recites the creed and declares that the council holds to it with nothing taken away, nothing added and nothing changed; a cleric who composes another creed, or corrupts this one by additions or omissions, is to be deposed, and a layman anathematized. It speaks of additions in general and does not quote the Latin words "and from the Son" (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 6, definition, Mansi 17, cols 515–518). Basil signed, confirming the seventh council, the promotion of Photius and the annulment of all that had been written or said against him (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 6, the emperor's subscription, Mansi 17, col. 518).

In a letter that its editor assigns to August 880 and takes to be addressed to Photius, John VIII wrote that he wondered why much of what he had laid down had been altered. He accepted what had been done at Constantinople for the patriarch's restoration, and refused whatever his legates might have done against their instructions (John VIII, Letters, 258 (dated by its editor to August 880), pp. 226–228). A letter in his name that survives only in Greek tells Photius that Rome keeps the creed as it was handed down and counts those who first added to it as transgressors; the editor, E. Caspar, judges it, "as it seems", wholly invented (John VIII, Letters, 258a, with the editor's note, pp. 226–228).

The four Orthodox patriarchs, writing in 1848, called this "the eighth Ecumenical Council" and said that it anathematized the addition to the creed (Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs (1848) 5 (xi)); the council of Orthodox churches held on Crete in 2016 named it among later councils "of universal authority" (Holy and Great Council, Encyclical I.3). The First Vatican Council cited the "Fourth Council of Constantinople", the council of 869–870, among the ecumenical councils (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus chapter 4). No Catholic document that pronounces on the council of 879–880 was found for this entry. The heading "Pseudo-synodus Photiana", under which the collection of councils named after G. D. Mansi prints its acts, is an eighteenth-century editor's and not a decree of the church (Council of Constantinople (879–880), heading, Mansi 17, col. 373). A joint Orthodox and Catholic statement of 2003 says that the council of 869–870 was never recognized as ecumenical in the East, and that the council of 879–880 reaffirmed the creed of 381 without the Filioque (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) II. Historical Considerations).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The acts date the second session to Tuesday 17 November in the thirteenth indiction (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 2, Mansi 17, cols 393–394), the sixth to 3 March (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 6, Mansi 17, cols 511–514) and the seventh to Sunday 13 March in the same indiction (Council of Constantinople (879–880), session 7, Mansi 17, col. 519). The thirteenth indiction ran from September 879 to August 880, and in those years 17 November fell on a Tuesday and 13 March on a Sunday. The first session bears no date in the text as printed. The pope's letter recognizing Photius is dated August of the twelfth indiction, that is 879 (John VIII, Letters, 207 (August 879), pp. 169–176).

The pope's letters to the emperors and to the bishops were read at the second and third sessions in a Greek version that departs from the Latin of his register. E. Caspar, who edited the register (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae 7, 1928), prints the two side by side, heads the Greek Versio Graeca adulterata, a falsified version with Photius as its author, and notes that it almost nowhere follows the Latin word for word (John VIII, Letters, 207–208, editor's headings to the Greek version and note 1, pp. 166 and 176). The introduction printed with the canons of 869–870 in N. P. Tanner (ed.), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils (1990), holds that there is no ground for thinking that Photius altered the passage that annuls that council (Council of Constantinople (869–870), introduction). The narrative gives the pope's terms from the Latin. A note from the margin of the manuscript, printed beside the sixth session, asserts that the sixth and seventh sessions were never held and that Photius composed them (Council of Constantinople (879–880), marginal note on session 6, Mansi 17, cols 511–512).

Primary sources

Acts of the Council of Constantinople (869–870) The Council of Constantinople of 869–870 · October AD 869 – February 870
definition; introduction

The Filioque: A Church-Dividing Issue? North American Orthodox-Catholic Theological Consultation · 25 October 2003
II. Historical Considerations

Letters (Register) John VIII · AD 872–882
207 (August 879), pp. 169–176; 258 (dated by its editor to August 880), pp. 226–228; 258a, with the editor's note, pp. 226–228; 207–208, editor's headings to the Greek version and note 1, pp. 166 and 176

Acts of the Council of Constantinople (879–880) The Council of Constantinople of 879–880 · November AD 879 – March 880 session 2, Mansi 17, cols 393–394; session 5, canon 1, Mansi 17, cols 497–498; session 5, subscription of the legate Paul, Mansi 17, col. 507; session 6, Mansi 17, cols 511–514; session 6, definition, Mansi 17, cols 515–518; session 6, the emperor's subscription, Mansi 17, col. 518; heading, Mansi 17, col. 373; session 7, Mansi 17, col. 519; marginal note on session 6, Mansi 17, cols 511–512

Encyclical of the Eastern Patriarchs The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem with their synods · May 1848
5 (xi)

Encyclical of the Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church · Pentecost 2016
I.3

Pastor Aeternus The First Vatican Council · 18 July 1870
chapter 4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Photius, John VIII, Basil I
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Photian Schism AD 863–867 794

LEADS TO

The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Triumph of Orthodoxy Before · 11 March AD 843 786

Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding After · c. 1078–1098 845

EAST AND WEST

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria Before · AD 864–866 798

The Baptism of Rus' After · AD 988/989 821

← The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria Earlier · AD 864–866
→ The Founding of Cluny Later · 11 September AD 910

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Founding of Cluny

11 September AD 910 · Estimated date

Duke William of Aquitaine gives his estate at Cluny for a monastery under the Rule of Benedict and renounces every right over it, placing it under the apostles Peter and Paul and the protection of the pope.

William I of Aquitaine, who styles himself "count and duke by the grace of God", explains his gift in the charter's opening lines. Wealth, he says, can be used to earn an eternal reward. He cannot himself despise the world, but he can support at his own cost those who do, and so share in their reward (Foundation Charter of Cluny).

He therefore hands over to the apostles Peter and Paul his estate of Cluny in the county of Mâcon, with its church, its dependants, vineyards, fields, woods, waters and mills. The gift is made for the souls of his lord King Odo, of his parents, of himself and his wife Ingelberga, of the Ava who had left him the property, and of all the faithful. A monastery is to be built there in honour of Peter and Paul, and its monks are to live by the Rule of Benedict (Foundation Charter of Cluny).

The conditions are what set the charter apart. Berno of Cluny is to be abbot for life; after him the monks are to choose their abbot freely, according to the Rule (Rule of Benedict 64), without interference from William's family or anyone else. Every five years they are to pay ten shillings to the church of the apostles at Rome for its lights, and they are to have the protection of the apostles and the defence of the pope. They are to care daily for the poor, strangers and pilgrims. From that day they are to be subject neither to William nor to his kin, nor to the king, nor to any earthly power; and no prince, count or bishop, not even the bishop of Rome, may seize their property, give it away or set a superior over them against their will. Anyone who tries is threatened with the fate of Dathan, Abiram and Judas and with a fine of a hundred pounds of gold. The act was done publicly at Bourges (Foundation Charter of Cluny).

William thus gave up, for himself and his kin, the lordship over the house he had founded, and placed it under a distant protector (Foundation Charter of Cluny). The charter says nothing about how the monks would use this freedom. Its two provisions, free election of the abbot and freedom from every outside lord, are what it is remembered for; free election was a demand of the reformers of the following century (The Investiture Controversy and Canossa).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The charter is dated on the third day before the Ides of September, that is 11 September, in the eleventh year of the reign of King Charles and the thirteenth indiction, with no year of the Incarnation (Foundation Charter of Cluny dating clause). The thirteenth indiction is the year 910 where the indiction was changed in late September or at the new year, and the twelve months from September 909 where it was changed on 1 September, so the indiction allows 11 September of either year. The regnal year decides nothing: counted from the death of King Odo in January 898, Charles's eleventh year would be 908. A note in the margin of the abbey's cartulary gives 910, and so does the editor of the charters, A. Bruel, Recueil des chartes de l'abbaye de Cluny, vol. 1 (1876), no. 112; the timeline follows them.

Primary sources

Foundation Charter of Cluny William I of Aquitaine · 11 September AD 910 (or 909) sourcebooks.fordham.edu; dating clause

The Rule of Saint Benedict Benedict of Nursia · c. AD 530–550
64

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Cluny
Who William I of Aquitaine, Berno of Cluny
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704

LEADS TO

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa 1075–1077 840

The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux 1098–1115 854

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Columba Founds Iona Before · AD 563 725

The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos After · AD 963–972 814

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning Before · AD 789 774

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa After · 1075–1077 840

← The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius Earlier · November AD 879 – March 880
→ Otto I Is Crowned Emperor Later · February AD 962

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor

February AD 962 · Firm date

Called into Italy by Pope John XII, the German king Otto I is crowned emperor at Rome and confirms the papal territories, while requiring each new pope to make a promise before the emperor's envoys. Within two years he has the pope deposed.

In 960 Italy was in the hands of King Berengar and his son Adalbert, and Pope John XII, hard pressed by them, sent a deacon and a secretary across the Alps to ask the German king Otto I to come and free the Roman church (Continuator of Regino, year 960) (Liudprand, Deeds of Otto 1–3). Otto had his young son made king and entered Italy. Berengar and his family shut themselves up in their castles (Continuator of Regino, year 961).

He kept Christmas at Pavia and went on to Rome. There, says a chronicler close to his court, he was received with the acclamation of the whole Roman clergy and people and was named and consecrated emperor and Augustus by Pope John (Continuator of Regino, year 962). Liudprand of Cremona, who served Otto, adds that he was anointed by the pope, restored the church's property and gave rich gifts, and that the pope and the leading Romans swore on the body of St Peter never to help Berengar and Adalbert (Liudprand, Deeds of Otto 1–3).

On 13 February Otto issued a privilege for the Roman church (Privilegium Ottonianum dating clause). It confirms to St Peter and to his vicar John the city and duchy of Rome, the lands of Ravenna and the other territories granted by Pippin and Charlemagne (Privilegium Ottonianum 1–14). It also reserves the emperor's authority. The clergy and nobles of Rome are to swear that papal elections will be canonical; the man elected is not to be consecrated until he has made a promise before the emperor's envoys; and envoys of pope and emperor are to report each year on how justice is done (Privilegium Ottonianum 15–19).

The alliance did not last. According to Liudprand, John soon turned to Adalbert, and Otto came back to Rome (Liudprand, Deeds of Otto 4–8). A synod in St Peter's, with the emperor present, heard the Roman clergy accuse the pope of perjury, simony, adultery and much else; when John refused to appear he was declared deposed, and Leo, the chief notary of the Roman church, was chosen in his place (Liudprand, Deeds of Otto 9–16). The Romans rose against Otto and brought John back, and he died soon afterwards (Liudprand, Deeds of Otto 17–20). Liudprand writes as the emperor's advocate, and John's side of the story is not heard in his account.

The coronation renewed in the West the imperial title first given to Charlemagne (Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor), now held by the German kings. Its terms also gave the emperor a say in who became pope, which the reformers of the next century set out to end (The Investiture Controversy and Canossa).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The year is fixed by two contemporary documents. The continuator of Regino's chronicle says that Otto kept Christmas at Pavia, went on to Rome and was there made emperor, and enters this under 962 (Continuator of Regino, year 962). The privilege for the Roman church, in which Otto already styles himself emperor, is dated 13 February 962, in the fifth indiction (Privilegium Ottonianum dating clause).

The day usually given for the coronation is 2 February, the feast of the Purification. Neither Liudprand nor the continuator names the day; the editor of the continuation prints it in the margin, in brackets, as his own addition (Continuator of Regino, year 962). The source for it was not read for this entry, so the timeline gives the month only.

Primary sources

Continuation of Regino's Chronicle Adalbert of Magdeburg (attributed) · AD 960s year 960; year 961; year 962

Deeds of Otto (Liber de rebus gestis Ottonis) Liudprand of Cremona · c. AD 964–965
1–3; 4–8; 9–16; 17–20

Privilegium Ottonianum Otto I · 13 February AD 962 dating clause; 1–14; 15–19

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Otto I, John XII
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor 25 December AD 800 778

LEADS TO

The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland AD 966 817
Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary AD 1000 or 1001 828
The Investiture Controversy and Canossa 1075–1077 840

CHURCH AND STATE

Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor Before · 25 December AD 800 778
The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland After · AD 966 817

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Photian Schism Before · AD 863–867 794

The Schism of 1054 After · 16 July 1054 832

← The Founding of Cluny Earlier · 11 September AD 910

→ The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos Later · AD 963–972

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos

AD 963–972 · Estimated date

With the backing of the general and emperor Nikephoros Phokas, the monk Athanasius builds the Great Lavra on Mount Athos as a self-governing monastery. A few years later an imperial charter gives all the monks of the Mountain a common rule.

Monks were living on Mount Athos before the Lavra was built. When Athanasius the Athonite came there from Mount Kyminas, it was the protos, the first among the monks, and the elders who assigned him a place for his cell, as their custom was (Athanasius, Typikon 6–8).

Athanasius tells the story of the foundation himself, some ten years later. The general Nikephoros II Phokas, whom he had known at Kyminas, wished to become a monk. While commanding the campaign against Crete he summoned Athanasius to the island and pressed him to build a lavra beside his cell on Athos, where the general would join him when the war was over. Athanasius, who wanted solitude, resisted (Athanasius, Typikon 2–5). After the victory Nikephoros sent a monk with a letter and six pounds (litrai) of gold. Cells were built for him and a church was begun (Athanasius, Typikon 6–8).

Less than four months later Nikephoros was proclaimed emperor. Athanasius left the church half built, went to the capital and reproached him. The emperor swore that he still meant to keep his vow and told him to finish the work, and he paid part of the cost (Athanasius, Typikon 6–8). Athanasius describes the labour of clearing rock and forest on a headland with no harbour, a hundred miles from the mainland by his reckoning (Athanasius, Typikon 8; 10). By the emperor's charter, which he quotes, the Lavra was to have eighty monks with Athanasius as superior; once the emperor too was dead the monks were to choose their own superior from among themselves; and the house was never to be given to any person or made subject to another monastery, but to remain "free and self-governing" (Athanasius, Typikon 12).

A large endowed community among hermits brought conflict. After Nikephoros's death the protos and another monk went to the emperor John Tzimiskes with complaints against Athanasius. The emperor sent Euthymios, a monk of the Stoudios monastery, who sat for a week with all the superiors, found both parties blameless and then drew up rules for the whole Mountain (Tragos (Typikon of John Tzimiskes) preface; closing clause). Among them: monks are not to trade in land for profit, wine is not to be sold to laymen, and boys and eunuchs are not to be admitted. The charter was signed by the emperor, the protos, Athanasius and the other superiors (Tragos (Typikon of John Tzimiskes) 13–16; 28 and signatures).

Between them the two documents show a self-governing monastery under the emperor's protection, hermits beside it, and a yearly assembly of the superiors with the protos (Athanasius, Typikon 12) (Tragos (Typikon of John Tzimiskes) preface; closing clause).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Athanasius gives no year. He says that the church of the Lavra had been under construction for less than four months when news came that Nikephoros Phokas had been proclaimed emperor (Athanasius, Typikon 6–8). The translators of the typikon put that accession in 963, the year by which the foundation is usually dated, and note that the saint's Lives place the building somewhat differently. They date the charter of John Tzimiskes to 971–972 and Athanasius's own typikon to 973–975.

Primary sources

Typikon for the Great Lavra Athanasius the Athonite · AD 973–975
6–8; 2–5; 8; 10; 12

Typikon of John Tzimiskes (the Tragos) Issued in the name of John I Tzimiskes · AD 971–972 preface; closing clause; 13–16; 28 and signatures

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mount Athos
Who Athanasius the Athonite, Nikephoros II Phokas
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Cappadocians and the Doctrine of the Trinity c. AD 370–381 623

LEADS TO

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery c. 1337–1345 933

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils 1341–1351 937

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Founding of Cluny Before · 11 September AD 910 807

The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux After · 1098–1115 854

← Otto I Is Crowned Emperor Earlier · February AD 962
→ The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland Later · AD 966

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland

AD 966 · Estimated date

Mieszko, duke of the Poles, marries the Bohemian princess Dobrawa and is baptized, and his people follow him. The annals of the Kraków chapter date the baptism to 966. In 1000 the emperor Otto III founds an archbishopric at Gniezno.

Thietmar, bishop of Merseburg in Saxony, writing about fifty years later, tells that Mieszko I, duke of the Poles, took a noble wife from Bohemia, the sister of Boleslav the elder. Her name, Dobrawa, he says, means “good” in the Slav tongue, and she, a Christian, set herself to win her pagan husband for the faith. In the first Lent after the wedding she gave way when he asked her to break her fast, so that he might listen to her more readily another time; some said she ate meat in one Lent, others in three (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.55–56, pp. 194–196). At her repeated urging, Thietmar goes on, Mieszko cast off the unbelief he was born into and was baptized. His people followed their lord, and Jordan, their first bishop, laboured hard among them. Dobrawa then bore a son, Boleslav (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.56, p. 196).

A chronicle of the Polish dukes, composed in the early twelfth century, tells it differently. Mieszko, it says, had seven wives. Dubrovka refused to marry him unless he gave up that custom and promised to become a Christian. She came to Poland with a great following of clergy and laymen, and did not share his bed until he had renounced paganism and joined the church. So, the chronicler concludes, the first duke of the Poles came to the grace of baptism through his faithful wife (Gallus Anonymus, Deeds of the Princes of the Poles 1.5–6, p. 428).

Neither writer gives a year. The annals of the Kraków chapter enter Dubrovka's coming under 965 and the baptism under 966 (Annals of the Kraków Chapter, years 965–966, p. 585).

A note made at Rome in the 1080s records a document from the time of Pope John XV, by which a "judge Dagome", his wife Ote and their sons Misica and Lambert gave to Saint Peter a city called Schinesghe with its territory, bounded by the sea, Prussia, Rus', Kraków and the Oder. The cardinal who made the note did not know who they were (Dagome iudex (Deusdedit, Collection of Canons 3.199) p. 359). One manuscript of the note reads "Schinesne of the province of the Poles" (Dagome iudex (Deusdedit, Collection of Canons 3.199) p. 359). Thietmar says that Mieszko's second wife was named Oda, that she bore him a son Miseco, and that he died in 992 (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.57–58, pp. 196–198). On these grounds the document is read as Mieszko's gift of his land to the Roman see.

In 1000 the emperor Otto III came to Gniezno to pray to the martyr Adalbert, whose body, the Polish chronicle says, Mieszko's son Boleslav had bought from the Prussians and laid there (Gallus Anonymus, Deeds of the Princes of the Poles 1.5–6, p. 428). He entered the town barefoot, Thietmar says, and at once founded an archbishopric there, which he gave to the martyr's brother Radim, with the bishops of Kolberg, Kraków and Wrocław under him. Thietmar hopes that this was lawfully done; it was done, he adds, without the consent of the bishop of Poznań, to whose diocese the whole region belonged (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.44–45, pp. 182–184). A generation after the baptism the Polish church had its own metropolitan.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Neither Thietmar nor Gallus gives a year. The year comes from Polish annals that survive in later copies. The annals of the Kraków chapter read: 965, Dubrovka came to Mieszko; 966, Mieszko, duke of Poland, is baptized. A later compilation printed beside them puts the marriage and the baptism together under 966 (Annals of the Kraków Chapter, years 965–966, p. 585). The Old Kraków Annals, in a manuscript that their editors date to 1122, give 966 for the marriage and 967 for the baptism; the editors note that this manuscript's year numbers from 948 to 1000 run one ahead of the chapter's (Old Kraków Annals, years 966–967 and preface, p. 577).

R. Holtzmann, editing Thietmar in 1935, prints 965 and 966 in his margins (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.55–56, pp. 194–196) and remarks that the Polish annals mostly place the baptism in the year after the marriage (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.56, p. 196). No source read for this entry gives the day or names the place of the baptism. The timeline sets the event at Gniezno, where the archbishopric was founded in 1000; the year 1000 for the emperor's journey is the editor's, from charters that the emperor issued on the way (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.44–45, pp. 182–184).

Primary sources

Chronicle Thietmar of Merseburg · AD 1012–1018
4.55–56, pp. 194–196; 4.56, p. 196; 4.57–58, pp. 196–198; 4.44–45, pp. 182–184

Deeds of the Princes of the Poles Anonymous, known as Gallus · c. AD 1115
1.5–6, p. 428

Annals of the Kraków Chapter twelfth and thirteenth centuries
years 965–966, p. 585

Dagome iudex Summarized by Cardinal Deusdedit · summary of c. AD 1087 of a document issued under Pope John XV (985–996)
p. 359

Old Kraków Annals manuscript of AD 1122 years 966–967 and preface, p. 577

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Gniezno
Who Mieszko I, Dobrawa
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs AD 863–885 790

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor February AD 962 810

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria Before · AD 864–866 798

The Baptism of Rus' After · AD 988/989 821

CHURCH AND STATE

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor Before · February AD 962 810

The Baptism of Rus' After · AD 988/989 821

← The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos Earlier · AD 963–972
→ The Baptism of Rus' Later · AD 988/989

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Baptism of Rus'

AD 988/989 · Estimated date

Vladimir, prince of Kyiv, accepts baptism from Constantinople and marries the emperor's sister. The chronicle of Kyiv tells of a choice among faiths and of his people baptized in the Dnieper; Greek and Arabic writers tell of an alliance.

Christianity had reached the Rus' before Vladimir the Great. In 867 Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, wrote that they had accepted a bishop and pastor (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 35). Olga of Kyiv, whom the chronicle calls Vladimir's grandmother (Primary Chronicle, year 987), was baptized at Constantinople; the Primary Chronicle tells it as a tale in which she outwits the emperor (Primary Chronicle, years 948–955), and a German annalist records under 959 that envoys of Helena, queen of the Rus', who had been baptized at Constantinople, asked King Otto for a bishop (Continuator of Regino, year 959). Her son and her people stayed pagan (Primary Chronicle, years 948–955).

The chronicle of Kyiv, written over a century after the event, tells Vladimir's conversion as a deliberate choice. In 986, it says, he was visited in turn by Muslim Bulgars, by Germans sent by the pope, by Jewish Khazars and by a Greek scholar, and questioned each about their faith (Primary Chronicle, year 986). The next year he sent ten men to see how each people worshipped. Those who came back from Constantinople said that in the Greeks' church they had not known whether they were in heaven or on earth (Primary Chronicle, year 987).

In 988, the chronicle continues, Vladimir besieged the Greek city of Chersonesus on the Black Sea and took it by cutting its water supply. He demanded the emperors' sister Anna in marriage; they answered that she could not marry a pagan. She came with priests, and Vladimir, who had been struck with blindness, was baptized by the bishop of Cherson, recovered his sight and married her. The chronicler notes that others placed the baptism at Kyiv or at Vasil'ev (Primary Chronicle, year 988). Back in Kyiv he had the idols destroyed and the image of Perun dragged to the river, and summoned the whole city to the Dnieper, where the people were baptized by the priests from Cherson and those of the princess. He built churches where the idols had stood and sent the children of leading families to be taught letters (Primary Chronicle, year 988).

Writers closer to the events tell of politics. Yahya of Antioch says that Basil II, threatened by the revolt of Bardas Phokas, asked the king of the Rus' for help; the king married the emperor's sister on condition that he and his people be baptized, and the emperor sent metropolitans and bishops who baptized them (Yahya of Antioch, History, pp. 423–424). Psellus mentions the "Scythian" troops who then fought for Basil (Psellus, Chronographia 1.13), and Leo the Deacon, after telling of the rebel's death, names the capture of Cherson among disasters foretold by signs in the sky (Leo the Deacon, History 10.10). As the translators of the chronicle reconstruct it from these writers, the alliance came first and the attack on Cherson later, the reverse of the chronicle's order.

Rus' thus took its bishops from Constantinople and its books in Slavonic, the legacy of Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs (Primary Chronicle, years 888–898). The chronicle itself, written after the Schism of 1054, has the Greek teacher warn Vladimir against the Latins (Primary Chronicle, year 986).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Primary Chronicle places the capture of Cherson, the baptism and the baptism of Kyiv in the year 6496 from creation, AD 988 (Primary Chronicle, year 988). It was compiled more than a century later, and its years for this period have to be checked against writers outside Rus'.

Yahya of Antioch dates the proclamation of the rebel Bardas Phokas to 14 September 987 and puts the agreement with the Rus', including the promise of baptism, and the arrival of their troops after it (Yahya of Antioch, History, pp. 423–424); he dates the rebel's death in battle at Abydos to 13 April 989 (Yahya of Antioch, History, pp. 425–426). Leo the Deacon, after telling of Phokas's death, says that the fall of Cherson to the Rus' was foretold by pillars of fire in the northern sky, and goes on to a comet and an earthquake (Leo the Deacon, History 10.10). S. H. Cross and O. P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text (1953), notes 93–94, following V. G. Vasil'evsky, match these signs with ones that Yahya dates to April and July 989. They place the agreement in the winter of 987–988, the fall of Cherson between April and July 989, and Vladimir's baptism after it, in 989 or 990. Yahya's order of telling, in which the bishops are sent before the troops arrive, would put the baptism in 988. The timeline shows the chronicle's year and the year of the fall of Cherson. Where Vladimir was baptized remains open; the chronicler knew of at least three places.

Primary sources

Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs Photius · AD 867
35

Primary Chronicle (Tale of Bygone Years) c. AD 1113–1116
year 987; years 948–955; year 986; year 988; year 988; years 888–898

Continuation of Regino's Chronicle Adalbert of Magdeburg (attributed) · AD 960s
year 959

History Yahya of Antioch · early eleventh century
pp. 423–424; pp. 425–426

Chronographia Michael Psellus · c. AD 1060–1078
1.13

History Leo the Deacon · c. AD 995
10.10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Kyiv, Chersonesus
Who Vladimir the Great, Olga of Kyiv, Basil II
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs AD 863–885 790

The Baptism of Boris and the Conversion of Bulgaria AD 864–866 798

LEADS TO

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery c. 1337–1345 933

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

Constantinople Grants Autocephaly to the Orthodox Church of Ukraine 6 January 2019 1502

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland Before · AD 966 817

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law After · AD 999/1000 825

CHURCH AND STATE

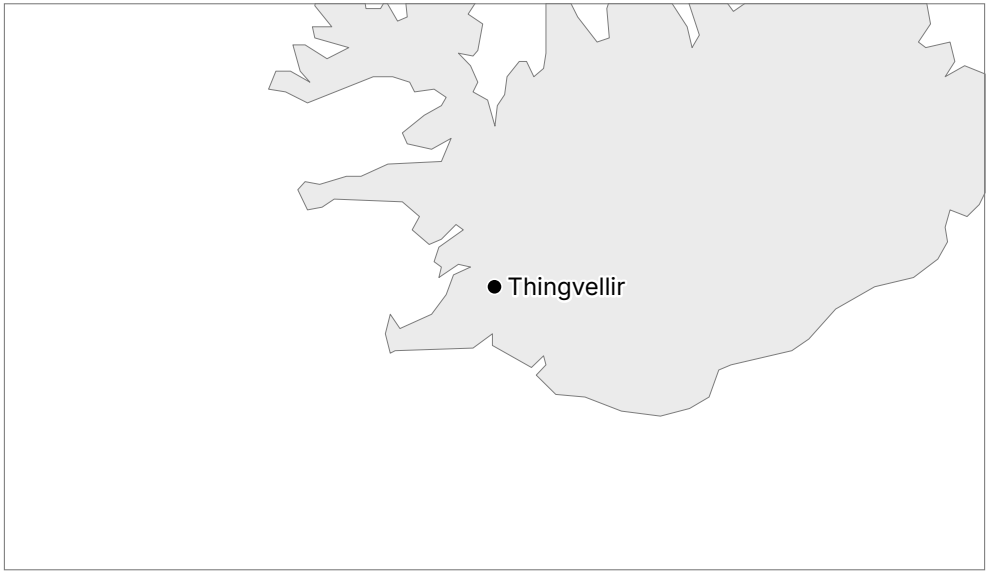
The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland Before · AD 966 817

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law After · AD 999/1000 825

EAST AND WEST

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius Before · November AD 879 – March 880 802

The Schism of 1054 After · 16 July 1054 832



← The Baptism of Mieszko I of Poland Earlier · AD 966
→ Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law Later · AD 999/1000

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law

AD 999/1000 · Estimated date

At the Althing the pagan lawspeaker Thorgeir, asked to settle the dispute between Christians and heathens, rules that all Icelanders shall be baptized and live under one law, with a few old customs allowed for a time.

The account followed here is that of the priest Ari Thorgilsson, written some 120 years later from what he had been told by Teitr, whose grandfather Gizurr the White was one of the Christian leaders (Ari, Íslendingabók 1; 9). According to Ari, King Olaf Tryggvason of Norway sent a priest named Thangbrand to Iceland. He baptized several chieftains, among them Hallr of Síða, Hjalti Skeggjason and Gizurr the White, but most people rejected the new faith, and after killing two or three men who had mocked him he went back and told the king that Iceland would not be converted. Olaf threatened to maim or kill the Icelanders then in Norway. Gizurr and Hjalti obtained their release by promising to try again (Ari, Íslendingabók 7).

The next summer the two men sailed home and rode to the Althing, the general assembly held at Thingvellir. Hjalti had been outlawed there the year before for a verse mocking the goddess Freyja. The heathens gathered in arms, and it came close to a battle. When Gizurr and Hjalti had spoken at the Law-Rock, Christians and heathens each declared that they would no longer live under the same law as the other (Ari, Íslendingabók 7).

The Christians asked Hallr to proclaim a law for them. He arranged instead that the lawspeaker, Thorgeir Thorkelsson, who was still a heathen, should do it. Thorgeir lay down under his cloak for a day and a night without speaking. The next morning he called the people to the Law-Rock and told them that if they did not all keep one law, fighting would follow and the land would be laid waste; a divided law, he said, meant the end of peace. Both sides agreed to accept what he would proclaim. He then declared that all should be Christians and that those not yet baptized should receive baptism. The old law was to stand on the exposure of infants and the eating of horseflesh, and people might sacrifice in secret, though they would be outlawed if witnesses could be brought. A few years later, Ari adds, these exceptions were done away with (Ari, Íslendingabók 7).

In Ari's telling Iceland became Christian by a decision of its own assembly, taken to keep the peace, though under pressure from the Norwegian king. Olaf, he notes, fell in battle the same summer (Ari, Íslendingabók 7).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Ari sets the decision in the summer in which King Olaf Tryggvason fell, 130 years after the killing of King Edmund and 1000 years after the birth of Christ by the common reckoning (Ari, Íslendingabók 7). He wrote between 1122 and 1133, a span the translator fixes from the two bishops named in his prologue, about 120 years after the event, and from the account of his foster-father Teitr (Ari, Íslendingabók 1; 9).

The translator, Siân Grønlie, notes on this passage that Ólafía Einarsdóttir, Studier i kronologisk metode i tidlig islandsk historieskrivning (Bibliotheca Historica Lundensis 13, 1964), argued for 999: if Ari began his year on 1 September, Olaf's death in early September 999 would fall in his year 1000, and the assembly of that summer would likewise belong to what is now counted as 999. The timeline shows both years.

Primary sources

Íslendingabók (Book of the Icelanders) Ari Thorgilsson · AD 1122–1133
1; 9; 7; 7; 7; 7

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Thingvellir
Who Thorgeir Thorkelsson, Olaf Tryggvason
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Ansgar's Mission to Scandinavia AD 829–831 782

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Baptism of Rus' Before · AD 988/989 821

Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary After · AD 1000 or 1001 828

CHURCH AND STATE

The Baptism of Rus' Before · AD 988/989 821

Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary After · AD 1000 or 1001 828

← The Baptism of Rus' Earlier · AD 988/989
→ Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary Later · AD 1000 or 1001

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary

AD 1000 or 1001 · Estimated date

Stephen, ruler of the Hungarians, defeats pagan rebels, founds bishoprics with Esztergom at their head, and is crowned king. A writer of his own day credits the emperor Otto III; a Life written a century later says that the pope sent the crown.

The older Life of King Stephen, written in the later eleventh century, tells that Adalbert, bishop of the Bohemians, came to the prince Géza, that the people were preached to and baptized and churches were set up in many places, and that Adalbert baptized the prince's son, who was given the name Stephen (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 4–5, p. 231). The Life puts Géza's death in 997. The pagan people and their chiefs, it goes on, refused the yoke of the Christian faith and rose against the young ruler. He defeated them under the banners of Saint Martin and Saint George, killed their leaders, and compelled the rest, once baptized, to worship one God (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 5–6, p. 232).

Stephen sent word abroad for clergy, and priests, abbots and monks came. He divided the land into ten bishoprics and made the church of Esztergom their metropolis, with the consent and subscription of the Roman see, the Life says; he founded a monastery of Saint Martin on the Holy Mount (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 7–8, pp. 232–233).

On the crown the sources differ. Thietmar of Merseburg, a contemporary in Saxony, has one sentence: by the favour and urging of the emperor, Otto III, the Hungarian ruler, whom he calls Waic, set up bishoprics in his realm and received crown and blessing (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.59, p. 198). The older Life says that in the fifth year after his father's death letters of apostolic blessing were brought, and Stephen was acclaimed king, anointed and crowned (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 9, pp. 233–234). Hartvic, a bishop who rewrote that Life for King Coloman about a century after the event (Hartvic, Life of King Stephen heading, prologue and editor's preface, p. 223), tells much more. Stephen sent Bishop Ascric to Rome to ask for a blessing, for the confirmation of Esztergom as metropolis and for a crown. The pope had a crown ready for the duke of the Poles; warned in a vision by a messenger of the Lord, he gave it to the Hungarian envoy, with a cross to be carried before the king, and left the ordering of the churches to him. Hartvic does not name the pope (Hartvic, Life of King Stephen addition to chapter 9, pp. 233–234). Thietmar says that Gerbert, who took the name Sylvester, became pope by the emperor's favour and sat until the time of King Henry; his editor dates this from 999 to 1003 (Thietmar, Chronicle 6.100, p. 392).

The laws issued in Stephen's name show the new order at village level. Ten villages are to build a church and endow it; the king provides vestments and altar cloths, the bishop a priest and books (Laws of King Stephen 2.1, p. 321). Whoever works on Sunday loses his ox or his tools, everyone but those who mind the fires must go to church, and eating meat on Fridays or in the Ember fasts is punished by a week's fasting in confinement (Laws of King Stephen 1.8–11, pp. 313–314). A book of advice to his son, written in his name, sets the keeping of the Catholic faith first among a king's duties (Stephen I, Admonitions table of chapters and chapter 1, p. 301) and tells him to welcome foreigners, since a kingdom of one language and one custom is weak (Stephen I, Admonitions 6, pp. 305–306).

Stephen died in 1038 (Annals of Pressburg, years 998, 1000 and 1038, p. 571). One manuscript heads Hartvic's work the Life of Saint Stephen, king of the Hungarians "and their apostle" (Hartvic, Life of King Stephen heading, prologue and editor's preface, p. 223).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Three sources date the coronation and they do not agree. The Annals of Pressburg, which survive in a copy of the early thirteenth century, enter it under 1000, and the death of Stephen's father Géza under 998 (Annals of Pressburg, years 998, 1000 and 1038, p. 571). The older Life of the king, written in the later eleventh century, puts Géza's death in 997 (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 5–6, p. 232) and the coronation "in the fifth year" after it, which its editor W. Wattenbach reckons as 1001 (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 9, pp. 233–234). Hartvic, reworking that Life after 1095, changes the figure to the fourth year for the embassy to Rome (Hartvic, Life of King Stephen addition to chapter 9, pp. 233–234). Thietmar, who lived through these years, gives no date; his editor R. Holtzmann prints 1001 in the margin (Thietmar, Chronicle 4.59, p. 198).

None of these sources gives the day or names the place of the coronation. The timeline sets the event at Esztergom, the church that the older Life names as the head of Stephen's bishoprics (Greater Legend of Saint Stephen 7–8, pp. 232–233).

Primary sources

Greater Legend of Saint Stephen late eleventh century
4–5, p. 231; 5–6, p. 232; 7–8, pp. 232–233; 9, pp. 233–234

Chronicle Thietmar of Merseburg · AD 1012–1018
4.59, p. 198; 6.100, p. 392

Life of King Stephen Hartvic · c. AD 1100–1116 heading, prologue and editor's preface, p. 223; addition to chapter 9, pp. 233–234

Laws of King Stephen I Issued in the name of Stephen I of Hungary · first half of the eleventh century
2.1, p. 321; 1.8–11, pp. 313–314

Admonitions Written in the name of Stephen I of Hungary · before 1031
table of chapters and chapter 1, p. 301; 6, pp. 305–306

Annals of Pressburg manuscript of the early thirteenth century years 998, 1000 and 1038, p. 571

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Esztergom
Who Stephen I of Hungary, Sylvester II
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor February AD 962 810

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law Before · AD 999/1000 825

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq After · 1245–1307 907

CHURCH AND STATE

Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law Before · AD 999/1000 825

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa After · 1075–1077 840

← Iceland Adopts Christianity by Law Earlier · AD 999/1000
→ The Schism of 1054 Later · 16 July 1054

THE EARLY MIDDLE AGES

The Schism of 1054

16 July 1054 · Firm date

Legates of the Roman see excommunicate the patriarch of Constantinople in Hagia Sophia, and his synod anathematizes them in return. The sentences name persons, not churches, but later ages take the day as the breach between East and West.

Greek and Latin Christians had quarrelled before, over the pope's claim to judge a patriarch of Constantinople and over the words "and from the Son" in the creed (The Photian Schism, the Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo). By 1054 the pope was no longer named in the liturgy at Constantinople. The patriarch Michael Cerularius believed this had been so for centuries (Michael Cerularius, Letter to Peter of Antioch 9); Peter, patriarch of Antioch, answered that he had heard the name read there forty-five years earlier (Peter of Antioch, Letter to Michael Cerularius 5).

In 1053 a letter in the name of Pope Leo IX answered Greek attacks on the Latin use of unleavened bread. It declared that the Roman see is judged by no one and cited the Donation of Constantine in proof (Leo IX, Letter to Michael Cerularius (In terra pax) 10–14; 20 (pp. 70–74, 76)). Three legates followed, led by Humbert of Silva Candida. In 1054 the emperor received them; the patriarch would not meet them (Humbert, Brief Account 1–3). Leo had died at Rome that April, before the legates acted (Hermann of Reichenau, Chronicle, year 1054).

On Saturday 16 July the legates laid a document on the altar of Hagia Sophia and walked out, shaking the dust from their feet (Humbert, Brief Account 1–3). The bull finds the city, in its rulers and leading citizens, most Christian and orthodox. It charges Michael and his supporters with a list of heresies, among them rebaptizing Latins, letting priests marry and cutting from the creed the procession of the Spirit from the Son, and pronounces anathema on Michael, on two named associates and on their followers, unless they repent (Bull of excommunication (1054)).

The synod's edict answers in kind. In words borrowed from Photius (Photius, Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs 4), it speaks of men from the darkness of the West who condemned the orthodox for wearing beards, for receiving communion from married priests and for refusing to alter the creed (Synodal edict (1054) preamble, pp. 157–158). It holds that the three were not sent by the pope at all but came on their own, with forged seals (Synodal edict (1054) account of the legates, pp. 160–161). It anathematizes the document and those who wrote it or advised it; the emperor ordered it burnt, and the patriarch kept the original (Synodal edict (1054) emperor's letter and sentence, pp. 166–168).

The synod read the bull as an attack on the whole orthodox church (Synodal edict (1054) preamble, pp. 157–158), but its own sentence fell only on the document, its authors and their helpers (Synodal edict (1054) emperor's letter and sentence, pp. 166–168), whom it held to have acted without the pope (Synodal edict (1054) account of the legates, pp. 160–161). Peter of Antioch, who also rejected the addition to the creed, urged Michael to treat the Latins as brothers, to be lenient where the faith was not at stake (Peter of Antioch, Letter to Michael Cerularius 12–14) and to write to the next pope (Peter of Antioch, Letter to Michael Cerularius 19–21). The estrangement hardened later. After the sack of Constantinople in 1204 Innocent III wrote that the Greek church now had reason to detest the Latins "more than dogs" (The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople) (Innocent III, Letters, to the legate Peter, 12 July 1205). In 1965 the pope and the ecumenical patriarch declared that the censures of 1054 had been aimed at persons, not at the churches, and were not meant to break communion. They removed them from memory, and added that this did not end the differences between the two churches (Rome and Constantinople Lift the Anathemas of 1054) (Joint Catholic–Orthodox Declaration (1965) 2–5).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The legates' own report gives the day as the seventeenth before the Kalends of August, a Saturday, at the third hour: 16 July 1054, which was a Saturday (Humbert, Brief Account 1–3). The synod's edict is dated July of the seventh indiction and puts its anathema on the twentieth of the month, to be repeated before the people on the day on which the acts of the fifth council were read; the older printed text gives that day as the twenty-fourth, a Sunday, which the editor alters to the twentieth (Synodal edict (1054) emperor's letter and sentence, pp. 166–168). Pope Leo IX had died at Rome in April; Hermann of Reichenau gives the sixteenth day before the Kalends of May (Hermann of Reichenau, Chronicle, year 1054).

That 1054 marks the division of the churches is a later judgement. The documents of that year show a quarrel between a patriarch and three legates; the patriarch of Antioch still expected it to be taken up with the next pope (Peter of Antioch, Letter to Michael Cerularius 19–21).

Primary sources

First Letter to Peter of Antioch Michael Cerularius · AD 1054
9

Letter to Michael Cerularius Peter III of Antioch · AD 1054
5; 12–14; 19–21

Letter to Michael Cerularius and Leo of Ohrid (In terra pax) Leo IX · AD 1053
10–14; 20 (pp. 70–74, 76)

Brief and Succinct Account (Brevis et succincta commemoratio) Humbert of Silva Candida (attributed) · AD 1054
1–3

Chronicle Hermann of Reichenau · completed AD 1054
year 1054

Bull of Excommunication against Michael Cerularius The legates Humbert, Peter of Amalfi and Frederick of Lorraine · 16 July AD 1054
archive.org

Encyclical to the Eastern Patriarchs Photius · AD 867
4

Edict (Semeioma) of the Synod of Constantinople Michael Cerularius and the synod of Constantinople · July AD 1054 preamble, pp. 157–158; account of the legates, pp. 160–161; emperor's letter and sentence, pp. 166–168

Letters Innocent III · 1198–1216
to the legate Peter, 12 July 1205

Joint Catholic–Orthodox Declaration of 7 December 1965 Pope Paul VI and Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I · 7 December 1965
2–5

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Humbert of Silva Candida, Michael Cerularius, Leo IX
Threads East and West, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Photian Schism AD 863–867 794
The Visigoths Turn Catholic at Toledo 8 May AD 589 728
Charlemagne Is Crowned Emperor 25 December AD 800 778
The Council of Chalcedon October AD 451 681

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius November AD 879 – March 880 802

LEADS TO

The First Crusade 1095–1099 849

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974

Rome and Constantinople Lift the Anathemas of 1054 7 December 1965 1432

EAST AND WEST

The Baptism of Rus' Before · AD 988/989 821

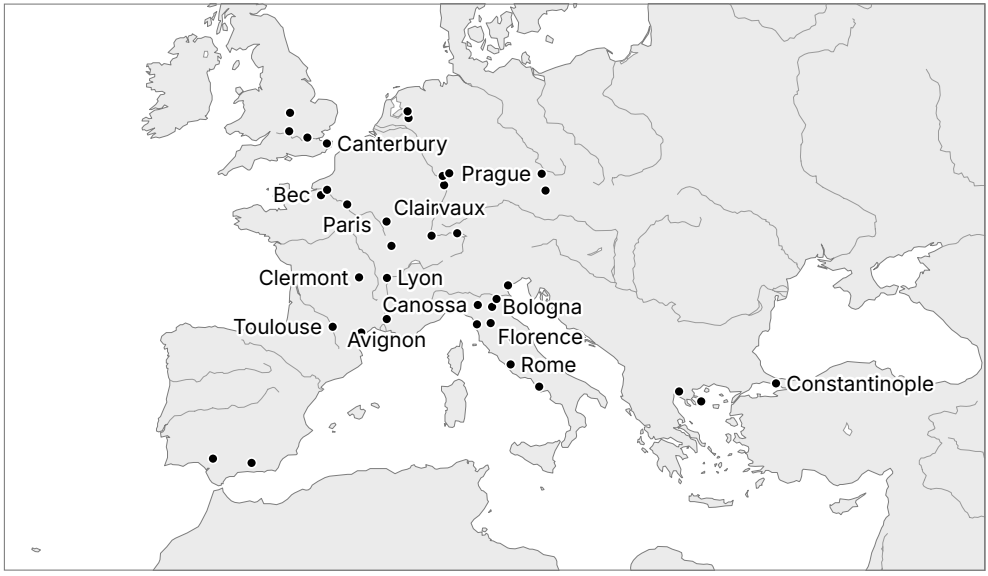
The First Crusade After · 1095–1099 849

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Otto I Is Crowned Emperor Before · February AD 962 810

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa After · 1075–1077 840

← Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary Earlier · AD 1000 or 1001
→ The Investiture Controversy and Canossa Later · 1075–1077
TIMELINE



The High and Late Middle Ages

1054–1500

Papal reform, crusades, universities and friars; then schism, calls for reform, and the fall of Constantinople. Printing puts the Bible into new hands.

The Western church reaches the height of its institutional power and then its deepest crisis, with rival popes and councils. Francis, Dominic and Aquinas, Palamas and Sergius of Radonezh belong to these centuries, as do Wycliffe and Hus. At the end of the era the faith crosses to the Americas and into central Africa.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

Beyond this map: Jerusalem, Lalibela, Karakorum, Beijing, Sergiyev Posad, Mbanza Kongo, La Isabela

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa 1075–1077 840

Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding c. 1078–1098 845

The First Crusade 1095–1099 849
The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux 1098–1115 854
The Concordat of Worms 23 September 1122 858
The Schools Become Universities c. 1150–1215 862
The Murder of Thomas Becket 29 December 1170 866
Waldo and the Poor of Lyon c. 1173 870
The Third Lateran Council March 1179 874
The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela c. 1200 878
The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882
Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886
The Albigensian Crusade 1209–1229 890
The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895
Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899
The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903
Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq 1245–1307 907
Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae c. 1265–1273 912
The Second Council of Lyon May 1274 916
Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris 1287–1288 921
Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam 18 November 1302 925
The Popes at Avignon 1309–1377 929
Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery c. 1337–1345 933
Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils 1341–1351 937
The Black Death 1347–1351 941
The Great Western Schism 1378–1417 946
Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950
The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ 1384–1441 954
The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel 1419–1436 964

The Trial of Joan of Arc 30 May 1431 969
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974
The Fall of Constantinople 29 May 1453 979
Gutenberg Prints the Bible c. 1454–1455 983
The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews 1478–1492 987
The King of Kongo Is Baptised 3 May 1491 992
Christianity Crosses the Atlantic 1493 996

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa

1075–1077 · Firm date

Pope Gregory VII and King Henry IV of Germany break over the appointment of bishops. Deposed and excommunicated in 1076, Henry comes as a barefoot penitent to the castle of Canossa in January 1077 and is absolved. The conflict goes on.

Under the year 1075 the register of Pope Gregory VII holds a list of twenty-seven sentences headed Dictatus papae (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a (Caspar, pp. 201–202, with note 1)). Among them: the pope alone can depose or reinstate bishops, he may depose emperors, he may absolve subjects from their fealty to wicked men, and he himself may be judged by no one (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a). The list as it stands there names no addressee and gives no reason for its making (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a).

In December 1075 Gregory wrote to the German king Henry IV (emperor). He rebuked him for keeping company with excommunicated men and for giving the churches of Fermo and Spoleto to persons unknown to the pope, and held up to him the decrees of that year's Roman synod (Gregory VII, Register 3.10). Henry replied in a letter addressed to "Hildebrand, at present not pope but false monk", which ends by ordering him, in the name of the king and all his bishops, to come down from the apostolic chair (Henry IV, Letters, to Hildebrand (1076)). At his Lenten synod of 1076 in Rome Gregory answered in the form of a prayer to St Peter (Gregory VII, Register 3.10a (Caspar, pp. 268–271)). He withdrew from Henry the rule of the kingdom of the Germans and of Italy, released all Christians from their oaths to him, and bound him with anathema (Gregory VII, Register 3.10a).

The chronicler Lampert of Hersfeld reports that later in 1076 the German princes told Henry that he would lose the kingdom for good unless he was absolved before the anniversary of his excommunication, and that they asked the pope to judge the case at Augsburg in February. Henry, he says, hurried over the Alps in a hard winter; the queen and her women were let down the icy slopes on ox-hides. Gregory, on his way north, turned aside at the urging of Matilda of Tuscany to the fortress of Canossa (Lampert of Hersfeld, Annals 1076 (pp. 281–283)) (Lampert of Hersfeld, Annals 1077 (pp. 286–288)).

Gregory described what followed in a letter to the German princes. Henry came with a few followers, laid aside the trappings of royalty and stood for three days before the castle gate, barefoot and clad in wool, asking with tears for absolution, until all who were present pleaded for him. Gregory then loosed the anathema and received him into communion, taking guarantees from the abbot of Cluny, from Matilda and the countess Adelaide, and from other princes. The whole matter, he adds, is still undecided, and he still means to come to Germany (Gregory VII, Register 4.12). Henry swore to do justice or make peace with the princes as the pope should judge, and to give the pope safe passage (Gregory VII, Register 4.12a). Lampert tells the scene at greater length and with details that Gregory's letter lacks: a castle with three walls, the king fasting from morning until evening, admission on the fourth day, and a condition that Henry use no royal insignia until his case was heard (Lampert of Hersfeld, Annals 1077 (pp. 292–293)).

The conflict went on. Three years later Gregory said that he had restored Henry to communion and not to the kingdom; by then the princes had elected Duke Rudolf king, and Gregory excommunicated Henry a second time (Gregory VII, Register 7.14a). A Roman synod of 1078 forbade any cleric to receive a bishopric, abbey or church from the hand of an emperor, king or any lay person (Gregory VII, Register 6.5b, c. 3). Bernold of Constance, a chronicler on the pope's side, records that in 1084 Henry entered Rome and was crowned at Easter by Guibert of Ravenna, whom excommunicated bishops had ordained as pope, and that Gregory died at Salerno on 25 May 1085 (Bernold of Constance, Chronicle 1084 (p. 440)) (Bernold of Constance, Chronicle 1085 (p. 444)). The agreement on investiture that was reached in 1122 is told in the Concordat of Worms.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The documents date themselves. The Dictatus papae stands in the register after a letter of 3 March 1075, without a number or a date of its own (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a (Caspar, pp. 201–202, with note 1)). Gregory's sentence on Henry stands in the register's record of the Roman Lenten synod of 1076 (Gregory VII, Register 3.10a (Caspar, pp. 268–271)), and Henry's oath is dated at Canossa on 28 January 1077 (Gregory VII, Register 4.12a). Gregory's letter of rebuke carries the date 8 January in the register; its editor Erich Caspar corrects this to 8 December 1075 as a copyist's slip (Gregory VII, Register 3.10 (Caspar, p. 263, note 1)).

The register does not say what the Dictatus papae was written for (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a (Caspar, pp. 201–202, with note 1)). Caspar, in his edition of the register (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, 1920), held that Gregory's authorship is secured by the list's place in the original register and by its agreement with his letters, noted its kinship with the canon-law collections of the time, and wrote that how it was put together can only be guessed at (Gregory VII, Register 2.55a (Caspar, pp. 201–202, with note 1)).

On Canossa the two accounts differ. Gregory speaks of three days before the gate; Lampert has Henry admitted on the fourth day. Oswald Holder-Egger, editing Lampert in 1894, judged that Lampert had read Gregory's letter and that the details he adds to it are his own (Lampert of Hersfeld, Annals 1077 (pp. 292–293)).

Primary sources

Register of Gregory VII Gregory VII · 1073–1083
2.55a (Caspar, pp. 201–202, with note 1); 2.55a; 3.10; 3.10a (Caspar, pp. 268–271); 3.10a; 4.12; 4.12a; 7.14a; 6.5b, c. 3; 3.10 (Caspar, p. 263, note 1)

Letters of Henry IV Henry IV · 1076 to Hildebrand (1076)

Annals Lampert of Hersfeld · c. 1077–1080
1076 (pp. 281–283); 1077 (pp. 286–288); 1077 (pp. 292–293)

Chronicle Bernold of Constance · c. 1073–1100
1084 (p. 440); 1085 (p. 444)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Canossa, Rome
Who Gregory VII, Henry IV (emperor), Matilda of Tuscany Threads Papacy and Church Order, Church and State, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Founding of Cluny 11 September AD 910 807
Otto I Is Crowned Emperor February AD 962 810

LEADS TO

The Concordat of Worms 23 September 1122 858

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Schism of 1054 Before · 16 July 1054 832
The Concordat of Worms After · 23 September 1122 858

CHURCH AND STATE

Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary Before · AD 1000 or 1001 828

The First Crusade After · 1095–1099 849

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Founding of Cluny Before · 11 September AD 910 807
The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux After · 1098–1115 854

← The Schism of 1054 Earlier · 16 July 1054
→ Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding Later · c. 1078–1098

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding

c. 1078–1098 · Estimated date

Anselm, monk of Bec and later archbishop of Canterbury, sets out to understand by reason what he already believes. The Proslogion argues that God cannot be thought not to exist; Cur Deus Homo argues that only a God-man could make satisfaction for sin.

Anselm of Canterbury became a monk at Bec in Normandy in his twenty-seventh year and, three years later, its prior, according to his companion and biographer Eadmer (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.6–7 (Rule, p. 320)). There he wrote a meditation on the grounds of faith, the Monologion, and then looked for something shorter: one argument that would be enough by itself to show that God exists and is what Christians believe him to be (Anselm, Proslogion preface) (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.19 (Rule, pp. 333–334)). He says that the search wore him out and that the argument came to him when he was trying to put it out of his mind (Anselm, Proslogion preface). He called the little book that resulted Faith Seeking Understanding, and later Proslogion (Anselm, Proslogion preface). Eadmer adds that the first draft, written on wax tablets, was lost, and the second found broken on the floor (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.19 (Rule, pp. 333–334)).

The book is a prayer. "I do not seek to understand that I may believe," Anselm writes, "but I believe in order to understand" (Anselm, Proslogion 1). God, he says, is believed to be "a being than which nothing greater can be conceived". Even the fool of the psalm, who says in his heart that there is no God (Psalm 14:1), understands those words, so that such a being exists at least in his understanding. But a being that existed in the understanding alone would be less than one that also existed in reality. So that than which nothing greater can be conceived must exist in reality (Anselm, Proslogion 2), and cannot even be conceived not to exist (Anselm, Proslogion 3).

A monk, Gaunilo, answered on the fool's behalf. By the same reasoning, he wrote, one could prove the existence of a lost island richer than every other land (Gaunilo, On Behalf of the Fool 6). Anselm replied that the reasoning holds for nothing except that than which a greater cannot be conceived (Anselm, Proslogion appendix, reply to Gaunilo 3), and asked that the objection and his answer be copied with the book from then on (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.19 (Rule, pp. 333–334)).

In 1093 King William II gave Anselm, by then abbot of Bec, the archbishopric of Canterbury (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 1093). He left England in 1097, judging that little was done there according to right (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 1097). In exile he finished Cur Deus Homo, "Why God Became Man", a dialogue that sets Christ aside, as if nothing were known of him, and asks by reason alone why God should have become man and died (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo preface) (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.1). To sin, Anselm argues, is to withhold from God the honour that is his due, and the sinner owes satisfaction for it (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.11). It would not be fitting for God simply to remit the debt by mercy (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.12). The satisfaction required is one that none but God can make and none but man ought to make; therefore it must be made by one who is both God and man (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 2.6).

Anselm came back to England in 1100 and died in 1109 (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 1100) (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 1109). Both books follow the procedure their openings announce: not to reach faith by reasoning, but to understand by reasoning what is already believed (Anselm, Proslogion 1) (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo 1.1). The schools of the following century are the subject of the Schools Become Universities.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

Neither book carries a date. Eadmer places the writing of the Proslogion in the years when Anselm was prior of Bec (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.19 (Rule, pp. 333–334)), before the chapter in which he is elected abbot (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 1.26 (Rule, pp. 344–345)); the year 1078 on the timeline stands for those years and is approximate.

The end date is better fixed. Anselm's own preface says that Cur Deus Homo was begun in England and finished in exile (Anselm, Cur Deus Homo preface). The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle puts his departure from England in the autumn of 1097 (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 1097), and Eadmer, who was with him, says that he completed the book in a hilltop village to which he had withdrawn from the summer heat of Rome (Eadmer, Life of Anselm 2.29–30 (Rule, pp. 391–392)). That summer was 1098.

Primary sources

Scripture

Psalm 14:1

Life of Anselm Eadmer of Canterbury · c. 1100–1125
1.6–7 (Rule, p. 320); 1.19 (Rule, pp. 333–334); 1.26 (Rule, pp. 344–345); 2.29–30 (Rule, pp. 391–392)

Proslogion Anselm of Canterbury · c. 1077–1078 preface; 1; 2; 3; appendix, reply to Gaunilo 3

On Behalf of the Fool Gaunilo of Marmoutier · Soon after the Proslogion
6

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle c. 890–1154
1093; 1097; 1100; 1109

Cur Deus Homo Anselm of Canterbury · c. 1094–1098
preface; 1.1; 1.11; 1.12; 2.6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Bec, Canterbury
Who Anselm of Canterbury
Threads Creeds and Councils

In context

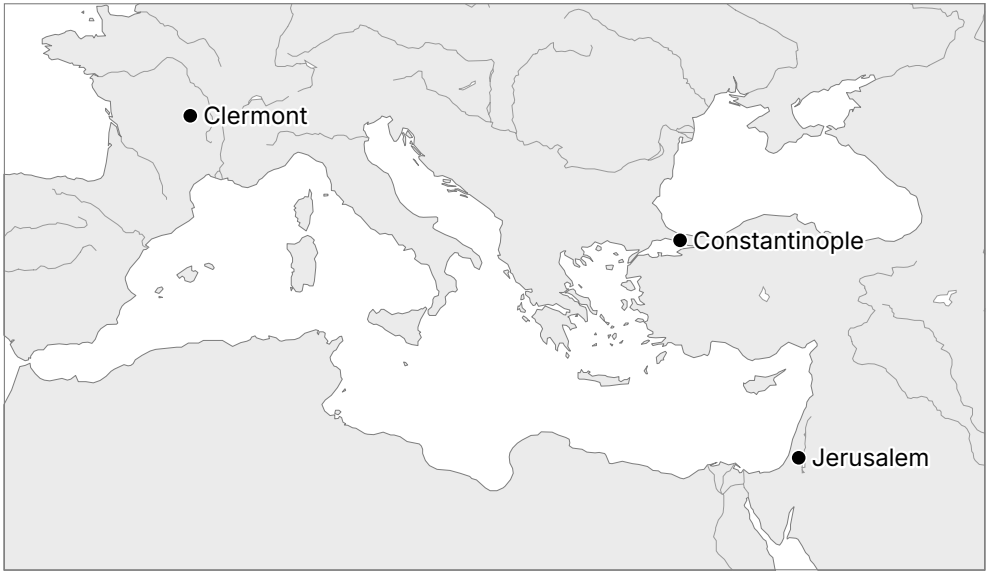
LEADS TO

The Schools Become Universities c. 1150–1215 862

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Constantinople Restores Photius Before · November AD 879 – March 880 802

The Schools Become Universities After · c. 1150–1215 862



← The Investiture Controversy and Canossa Earlier · 1075–1077
→ The First Crusade Later · 1095–1099

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The First Crusade

1095–1099 · Firm date

In 1095 Pope Urban II calls the knights of the West to go east in arms for the remission of their sins. Four years later the armies storm Jerusalem and massacre its defenders and inhabitants, as their own writers report.

In Lent 1095, the chronicler Bernold of Constance records, envoys of the emperor of Constantinople came to a synod that Pope Urban II was holding at Piacenza and begged for help against the pagans, who had overrun the country up to the walls of the city. The pope urged many to promise on oath that they would go (Bernold of Constance, Chronicle 1095 (pp. 461–462)). In November he held a council at Clermont in Auvergne (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.1) (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.6).

Four writers set down what Urban said there, each some years later, and they differ. Fulcher of Chartres has him ask for aid to the Christians of the East against the Turks and promise remission of sins to all who die on the way or in battle (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.2–3). Robert the Monk has him address the Franks, tell of outrages against Christians, name Jerusalem and the Holy Sepulchre as the goal, and be answered with the shout "It is the will of God" (Robert the Monk, History of Jerusalem the sermon at Clermont). Baldric of Dol has him shame the knights who prey on fellow Christians (Baldric of Dol, History of Jerusalem the sermon at Clermont). Guibert of Nogent has him speak of Antichrist and the end of the age (Guibert of Nogent, Deeds of God through the Franks the sermon at Clermont). Urban's own letter to Flanders, written within weeks, says that a barbaric fury had seized the churches of the East and the Holy City, and that he had enjoined an expedition to free those churches, for the remission of sins, under the bishop of Le Puy (Urban II, Letters, to the faithful in Flanders (December 1095)).

The first bands left in the spring of 1096 (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.6). Albert of Aachen, writing some decades later, reports attacks on the Jews of Cologne and Mainz as the bands gathered. At Mainz the men of Count Emicho stormed the bishop's hall, where the Jews had taken refuge, killed about seven hundred and carried off their goods. Albert ascribes it to greed and adds that God compels no one to the faith (Albert of Aachen, History on Emicho and the Jews of the Rhineland).

Anna Komnene, who names herself the daughter of the emperor Alexios I Komnenos (Anna Komnene, Alexiad preface), wrote the history of his reign. Her father, she says, dreaded the coming of the Franks. The simpler among them wished to worship at the Holy Sepulchre; men like Bohemond hoped to seize the capital itself (Anna Komnene, Alexiad 10.5). Alexios made the leaders swear to hand over whatever towns they took that had belonged to the empire, and Godfrey of Bouillon swore only after a fight outside the walls (Anna Komnene, Alexiad 10.9–10).

The army took Nicaea, spent nine months before Antioch and came to Jerusalem (Letter of the crusade leaders to the pope (1099)). On 15 July 1099 it broke in (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)) (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.27–28). The anonymous Gesta Francorum says that in the Temple of Solomon the crusaders waded in blood to their ankles, and that the dead were afterwards heaped outside the gates (Gesta Francorum 10 (the fall of Jerusalem)) (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)). Raymond of Aguilers, who writes as one of the army, tells of blood to the knees and bridle reins and calls it a just judgment of God (Raymond of Aguilers, History the Frankish victory). Fulcher counts almost ten thousand killed in the Temple and says that neither women nor children were spared (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.27–28). The leaders' own report to the pope uses the same image: "our men rode in the blood of the Saracens up to the knees of their horses" (Letter of the crusade leaders to the pope (1099)). The Gesta adds that Count Raymond had the commander of the citadel and his men escorted unharmed to Ascalon (Gesta Francorum 10 (the fall of Jerusalem)) (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)). Then, Fulcher says, clergy and laity went together to pray at the Holy Sepulchre (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.27–28).

Eight days later the leaders chose Godfrey to rule the city, and soon afterwards chose a patriarch, Arnulf (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)). Bernold had called the expedition a journey to free the Christians, of which the pope was the chief author (Bernold of Constance, Chronicle 1096 (p. 464)). It ended with a ruler and a patriarch of the crusaders' choosing in Jerusalem (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)). The later crusade that took Constantinople is told in the Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Bernold, writing year by year, puts the synod of Piacenza in the middle of Lent 1095 (Bernold of Constance, Chronicle 1095 (pp. 461–462)). Fulcher says that Urban held his council in Auvergne in November and that the first crusaders left in March 1096 (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.6). The Gesta Francorum dates the capture of Jerusalem to Friday 15 July (Gesta Francorum 10 (after the capture)), and Fulcher gives the year as 1099 (Fulcher of Chartres, History 1.27–28).

On the four versions of the sermon at Clermont, August C. Krey, The First Crusade: The Accounts of Eye-Witnesses and Participants (1921), judges that all were written several years afterwards, Fulcher's perhaps first, Robert's before 1107, Baldric's after 1107 and Guibert's between 1108 and 1112, and that Robert, Baldric and Guibert each reworked the Gesta Francorum. Krey also notes that Anna Komnene began her history about forty years after the crusaders had passed, and that Albert of Aachen's work was written at some point between 1120 and the middle of the century.

Primary sources

Chronicle Bernold of Constance · c. 1073–1100
1095 (pp. 461–462); 1096 (p. 464)

History of the Expedition to Jerusalem Fulcher of Chartres · c. 1101–1127
1.1; 1.6; 1.2–3; 1.27–28

History of Jerusalem Robert the Monk · By about 1107
the sermon at Clermont

History of Jerusalem Baldric of Dol · After 1107
the sermon at Clermont

The Deeds of God through the Franks Guibert of Nogent · c. 1108–1112
the sermon at Clermont

Letters of Urban II Urban II · December 1095 to the faithful in Flanders (December 1095)

History of the Journey to Jerusalem Albert of Aachen · Between about 1120 and 1150 on Emicho and the Jews of the Rhineland

Alexiad Anna Komnene · c. 1148
preface; 10.5; 10.9–10

Letter of the Crusade Leaders to the Pope Daimbert of Pisa, Godfrey of Bouillon and Raymond of Saint-Gilles · September 1099
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Gesta Francorum c. 1100
10 (after the capture); 10 (the fall of Jerusalem)

History of the Franks Who Captured Jerusalem Raymond of Aguilers · c. 1099–1105
the Frankish victory

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Clermont, Constantinople, Jerusalem
Who Urban II, Alexios I Komnenos, Godfrey of Bouillon

Threads East and West, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jerusalem Surrenders to the Caliph Umar AD 637/638 743

The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

LEADS TO

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882

The Albigensian Crusade 1209–1229 890

EAST AND WEST

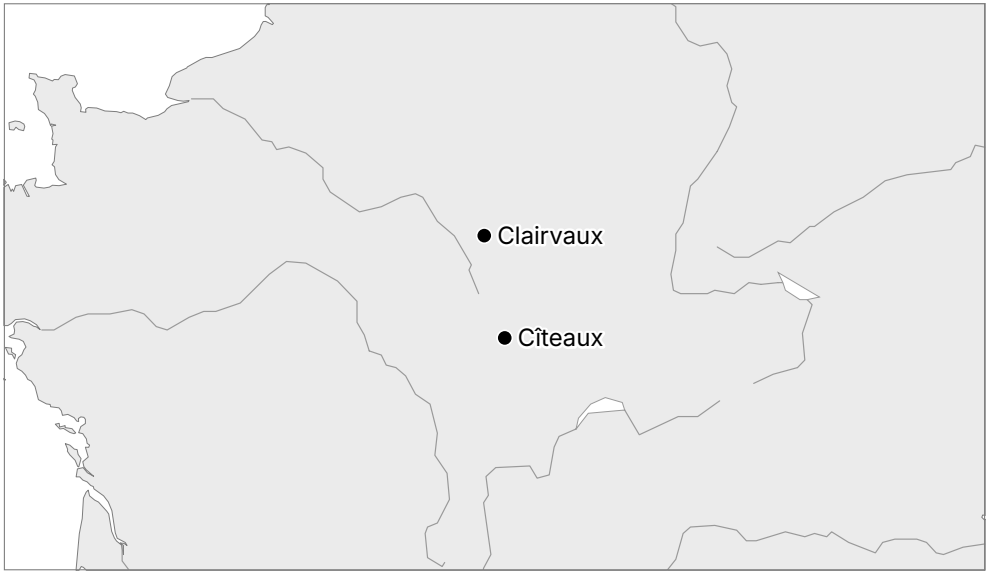
The Schism of 1054 Before · 16 July 1054 832

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople After · April 1204 882

CHURCH AND STATE

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa Before · 1075–1077 840

The Concordat of Worms After · 23 September 1122 858



← Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding Earlier · c. 1078–1098
→ The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux Later · 1098–1115

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux

1098–1115 · Estimated date

In 1098 monks from Molesme found a “New Monastery” at Cîteaux to keep the Rule of Benedict to the letter, in poverty and by their own labour. Bernard joins with some thirty companions and becomes abbot of Clairvaux, and daughter houses multiply.

In 1098, according to the Cistercians’ own account of their origins, Robert of Molesme and some of his monks went to the papal legate, Archbishop Hugh of Lyon, and declared that they wished to keep the Rule of Benedict more strictly than it was kept in their abbey. With his authority twenty-one monks left Molesme for Cîteaux, a wooded and unvisited place in the diocese of Chalon, cleared it and began a wooden monastery, which the duke of Burgundy completed for them. Their documents call it the New Monastery (Exordium Parvum 1–3). The monks of Molesme soon appealed to Pope Urban II; the legate sent Robert back, and the prior, Alberic, became abbot (Exordium Parvum 5–9).

The same account lists what the new community decided. It gave up whatever in dress and diet went beyond the Rule. It refused revenues such as churches, tithes, manors and serfs, on the ground that Benedict had none and that monks should live from their own land and work. To make that possible it took in bearded lay brothers, who were not monks, to run its outlying farms, and it resolved to build only in places far from towns (Exordium Parvum 15). Under Alberic's successor, the Englishman Stephen Harding, the church was stripped to wooden crosses, an iron candlestick and vestments of plain cloth. Recruits were few, and the monks feared they would have no successors (Exordium Parvum 16–17).

Then, the account says, thirty men entered the novitiate together (Exordium Parvum 16–17). William of Saint-Thierry, in his Life of Bernard of Clairvaux, says that Bernard entered Cîteaux in 1113 with more than thirty companions (Vita Prima of Bernard 1.4.19 (PL 185, col. 237)). Some time later Stephen sent out a group of monks to found Clairvaux, in the diocese of Langres, and set Bernard over them as abbot, to their surprise, since he was young and in poor health. The valley, William says, had been called the Valley of Wormwood and was a haunt of robbers; the monks at first ate bread of barley, millet and vetch and cooked beech leaves (Vita Prima of Bernard 1.5.25 (PL 185, col. 241)).

New foundations followed quickly: twelve houses within eight years (Exordium Parvum 18). The Charter of Charity, drawn up by Stephen and his monks (Carta Caritatis prologue), bound them together. The mother house takes no payment from a daughter house. All keep the Rule as it is kept at the New Monastery, with the same books and customs. Each abbot visits his daughter houses once a year, and all the abbots meet once a year at Cîteaux (Carta Caritatis 1–3, 5, 7).

Bernard wrote as well as governed. His treatise On Loving God, written as abbot for a Roman cardinal, answers that God is to be loved for his own sake and without measure, and traces four degrees by which love grows (Bernard, On Loving God dedication) (Bernard, On Loving God 1) (Bernard, On Loving God 15). When he died in 1153, Geoffrey of Auxerre, a monk of Clairvaux, called him the father of more than a hundred and sixty monasteries (Vita Prima of Bernard 5.2.15–18 (PL 185, col. 360–362)).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Exordium Parvum dates the departure from Molesme to 1098 (Exordium Parvum 1–3). William of Saint-Thierry puts Bernard's entry at Cîteaux in 1113, the fifteenth year of the house, when Bernard was about twenty-two or twenty-three (the manuscripts differ) (Vita Prima of Bernard 1.4.19 (PL 185, col. 237)). He gives no year for the founding of Clairvaux (Vita Prima of Bernard 1.5.25 (PL 185, col. 241)). The editorial commentary printed with the Life in Migne's Patrologia Latina (1855) quotes a tablet that hung at Bernard's tomb, which said that he was sent to Clairvaux in June 1115, reports that an earlier scholar argued for June 1114, and prefers 1115 (Vita Prima of Bernard editorial commentary (PL 185, col. 669–670)). The timeline follows that year.

The date of the early Cistercian documents themselves is debated. Constance H. Berman, The Cistercian Evolution: The Invention of a Religious Order in Twelfth-Century Europe (2000), argued that the Exordium Parvum and the Charter of Charity reached their surviving form only in the 1160s and 1170s. They are cited here as the Order's own account of its beginnings.

Primary sources

Exordium Parvum First half of the twelfth century; date debated
1–3; 5–9; 15; 16–17; 18

First Life of Bernard (Vita Prima) William of Saint-Thierry, Arnold of Bonneval and Geoffrey of Auxerre · c. 1147–1156
1.4.19 (PL 185, col. 237); 1.5.25 (PL 185, col. 241); 5.2.15–18 (PL 185, col. 360–362); editorial commentary (PL 185, col. 669–670)

The Charter of Charity Twelfth century, in several stages; date debated
prologue; 1–3, 5, 7

On Loving God Bernard of Clairvaux · Second quarter of the twelfth century dedication; 1; 15

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Cîteaux, Clairvaux
Who Robert of Molesme, Stephen Harding, Bernard of Clairvaux
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Founding of Cluny 11 September AD 910 807

Benedict Writes His Rule c. AD 530–550 704

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos Before · AD 963–972 814

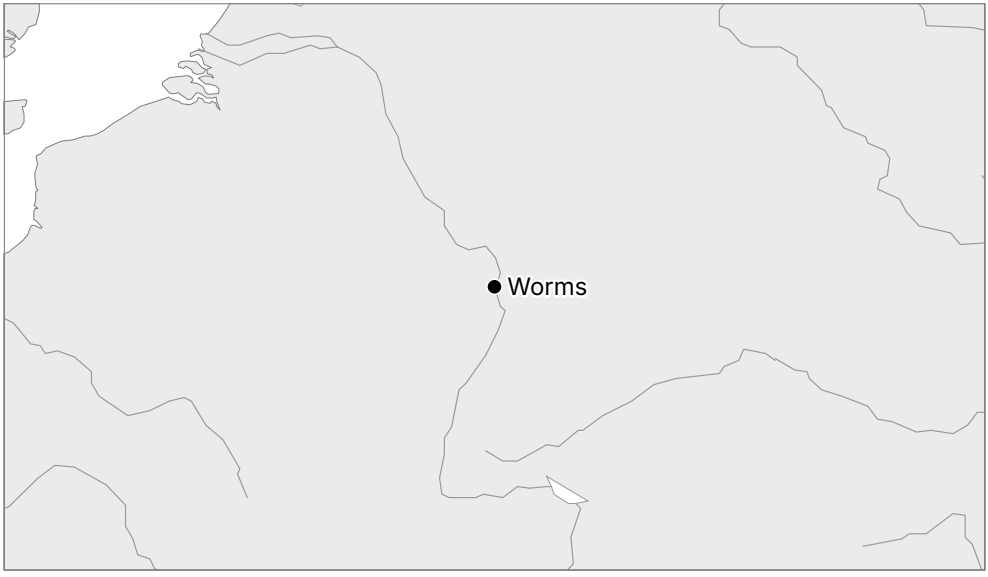
Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor After · c. 1209 886

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa Before · 1075–1077 840

Waldo and the Poor of Lyon After · c. 1173 870

← The First Crusade Earlier · 1095–1099



→ The Concordat of Worms Later · 23 September 1122

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Concordat of Worms

23 September 1122 · Firm date

Pope Callixtus II and Emperor Henry V end the dispute over investiture. The emperor gives up investing bishops with ring and staff and allows free election; the pope lets him be present at elections in Germany and confer the bishop's worldly holdings by the sceptre.

The popes since Gregory VII had condemned the investiture of bishops by lay hands (The Investiture Controversy and Canossa), and yet, as Pope Paschal II wrote in February 1111, a bishop-elect in the German kingdom was not consecrated until the king had invested him (Paschal II, privileges for Henry V (1111) privilege of 12 February). Paschal proposed a way out. Bishops, his privilege says, had become servants of the royal court because they held cities, duchies, counties, mints and tolls from the crown; these were to go back to the king, who would give up investiture (Paschal II, privileges for Henry V (1111) privilege of 12 February) (Ekkehard of Aura, Chronicle 1111 (p. 244)). The chronicler Ekkehard of Aura reports that when the terms were read out in Rome the princes protested furiously at the loss to the churches and to themselves, and that the pope was then kept under guard by the king's men (Ekkehard of Aura, Chronicle 1111 (p. 244)). A second privilege, of April, granted Henry V (emperor) investiture with staff and ring (Paschal II, privileges for Henry V (1111) privilege of 12 April).

The settlement came eleven years later under Pope Callixtus II. Ekkehard describes a general assembly at Worms in September 1122, where the princes worked for a week or more to make peace. The pope's legates, led by the bishop of Ostia, received the emperor and his army back into communion. Two charters were exchanged and read out in a field by the Rhine because of the size of the crowd, and the bishop of Ostia celebrated mass and gave the emperor the kiss of peace and communion (Ekkehard of Aura, Chronicle 1122 (pp. 259–260)).

In his charter Henry gives up "all investiture through ring and staff", grants canonical election and free consecration in all the churches of his kingdom and empire, and promises to restore the possessions of the Roman church and of other churches lost in the conflict (Concordat of Worms edict of the emperor). In return Callixtus grants that the bishops and abbots of the German kingdom shall be elected in the emperor's presence, without simony or violence. If an election is disputed, the emperor is to support the party with the better right, on the advice of the metropolitan and the bishops of the province. The one elected receives the regalia from the emperor by the sceptre and owes him what is due for them. In the other parts of the empire the bishop is consecrated first and receives the regalia within six months (Concordat of Worms privilege of the pope) (Ekkehard of Aura, Chronicle 1122 (p. 260)).

By these terms investiture with ring and staff no longer passes through the ruler's hands (Concordat of Worms edict of the emperor), while the regalia, the cities, counties, tolls and other rights that a bishop holds from the crown, still do (Paschal II, privileges for Henry V (1111) privilege of 12 February) (Concordat of Worms privilege of the pope). The council that Callixtus held at the Lateran in 1123 repeated the rules of the reform: no one is to be ordained for money, no one consecrated bishop without canonical election, and no lay person is to dispose of the church's affairs or goods (First Lateran Council, canons 1, 3, 8).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Ekkehard of Aura copies both charters into his chronicle under 1122 and gives their date as the ninth day before the Kalends of October, 23 September (Ekkehard of Aura, Chronicle 1122 (pp. 259–260)).

Primary sources

Privileges of Paschal II for Henry V Paschal II · February and April 1111 privilege of 12 February; privilege of 12 April

Chronicle Ekkehard of Aura · c. 1105–1125
1111 (p. 244); 1122 (pp. 259–260); 1122 (p. 260)

The Concordat of Worms Callixtus II and Henry V · 23 September 1122 edict of the emperor; privilege of the pope

Canons of the First Lateran Council The First Lateran Council · March 1123 canons 1, 3, 8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Worms
Who Callixtus II, Henry V (emperor)
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa 1075–1077 840

LEADS TO

The Murder of Thomas Becket 29 December 1170 866

The Third Lateran Council March 1179 874

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam 18 November 1302 925

CHURCH AND STATE

The First Crusade Before · 1095–1099 849

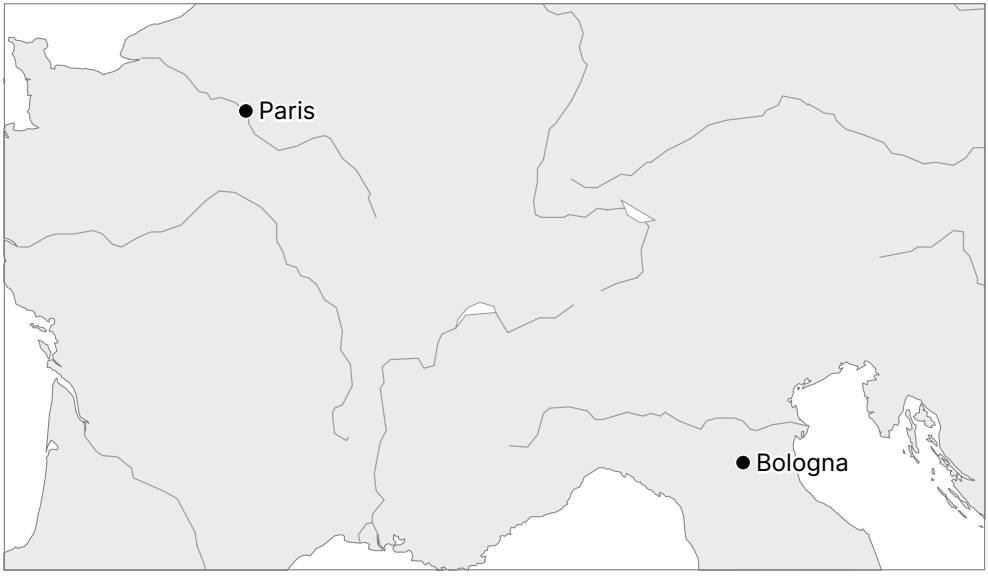
The Murder of Thomas Becket After · 29 December 1170 866

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Investiture Controversy and Canossa Before · 1075–1077 840

The Third Lateran Council After · March 1179 874

← The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux Earlier · 1098–1115



→ The Schools Become Universities Later · c. 1150–1215

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Schools Become Universities

c. 1150–1215 · Estimated date

The schools of twelfth-century Paris grow into a self-governing body of masters and students, and an emperor's law protects travelling scholars. Abelard, Gratian and Peter Lombard supply a method and books; kings and popes grant privileges.

Peter Abelard says that as a young man he went wherever he heard that the study of logic flourished (Abelard, History of My Calamities 1). He came to Paris because the art of dialectic flourished there above all, studied under William of Champeaux, quarrelled with him, and set up his own school on the Mont Sainte-Geneviève outside the city (Abelard, History of My Calamities 2). His students, he writes, wanted reasons they could understand and not mere words. The tract on the Trinity that he wrote for them was condemned at a council at Soissons and burned (Abelard, History of My Calamities 9–10).

In Sic et Non Abelard collected sayings of the Fathers that seem to contradict one another, and in the prologue gave rules for dealing with them: words are used in different senses, copies are faulty, authors change their minds, and where a conflict remains the weightier authority is to be preferred. Scripture alone he placed beyond error. The purpose, he says, is to provoke readers to seek the truth (Abelard, Sic et Non prologue). In J. H. Robinson's abridged rendering of 1904: "By doubting we come to examine, and by examining we reach the truth" (Abelard, Sic et Non prologue (Robinson's abridgement)).

Two other books gather authorities in a similar way, one for law and one for theology. The collection of church law that goes under the name of Gratian (canonist) is titled A Harmony of Discordant Canons and begins by distinguishing natural law from custom (Gratian, Decretum title) (Gratian, Decretum D. 1, opening). Peter Lombard says that he gathered the opinions of the Fathers into one short volume in four books so that the student need not search through many (Peter Lombard, Sentences prologue). His fourth book defines a sacrament as a sign of grace that also causes what it signifies, and lists seven: baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders and marriage (Peter Lombard, Sentences 4.1.2–4) (Peter Lombard, Sentences 4.2.1).

Rulers meanwhile gave scholars a legal standing of their own. In 1158 the emperor Frederick I took under his protection all who travel for the sake of study and allowed them, if sued, to be judged by their own teachers or by the bishop (Frederick I, Authentica Habita Munro, pp. 2–4). Its translator notes that the law is generally said to have been made for Bologna, though it names no city (Frederick I, Authentica Habita Munro's introductory note, p. 2). In 1200, after five people had been killed in Paris, King Philip II ordered that a student arrested by his officers be handed to the church's judge (Philip II, privilege for the scholars of Paris (1200) Munro, pp. 4–7). In 1215 the papal legate Robert of Courçon fixed the age and years of study required of masters of arts and of theology, prescribed Aristotle's logic and forbade lectures on his Metaphysics and natural philosophy, and allowed masters and scholars to bind themselves by sworn agreements. His statutes, in their translation, speak of the masters and scholars together as a "university" (Robert of Courçon, Statutes for Paris (1215)).

In 1231 Pope Gregory IX, calling Paris "the mother of the sciences", granted the masters and students the right to make their own statutes and to suspend lectures if they were wronged, and told the theologians to dispute only on questions that the theological books and the Fathers could settle (Gregory IX, Parens scientiarum).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

A university was not founded on a day, and the dates on the timeline mark documents, not a beginning. The two books belong to the middle of the twelfth century: the editions used here give about 1140 for Gratian and about 1155–1158 for the Sentences, and neither book dates itself. The privileges are dated: Frederick I's at Roncaglia in November 1158 (Frederick I, Authentica Habita Munro, pp. 2–4), Philip II's in 1200 (Philip II, privilege for the scholars of Paris (1200) Munro, pp. 4–7), the statutes of Robert of Courçon in August 1215 (Robert of Courçon, Statutes for Paris (1215)) and Gregory IX's bull on 13 April 1231 (Gregory IX, Parens scientiarum).

Frederick's law does not name a city. Dana C. Munro, introducing his translation in The Mediaeval Student (1895), says that it is generally taken to have been made for Bologna and may have been obtained by the Bolognese doctors, but was granted to scholars in general (Frederick I, Authentica Habita Munro's introductory note, p. 2).

Primary sources

The History of My Calamities Peter Abelard · c. 1132
1; 2; 9–10

Sic et Non Peter Abelard · c. 1120–1135
prologue; prologue (Robinson's abridgement)

Decretum (Concordia discordantium canonum) Gratian · c. 1140 title; D. 1, opening

The Four Books of Sentences Peter Lombard · c. 1155–1158
prologue; 4.1.2–4; 4.2.1

Privilege for Scholars (Authentica Habita) Frederick I Barbarossa · November 1158
Munro, pp. 2–4; Munro's introductory note, p. 2

Privilege for the Scholars of Paris Philip II Augustus · 1200
Munro, pp. 4–7

Statutes for the Masters and Scholars of Paris Robert of Courçon · August 1215
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Parens scientiarum Gregory IX · 13 April 1231
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Paris, Bologna
Who Peter Abelard, Peter Lombard, Gratian (canonist)
Threads Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding c. 1078–1098 845
Charlemagne's Reform of Church and Learning AD 789 774

LEADS TO

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895
Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae c. 1265–1273 912

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Anselm: Faith Seeking Understanding Before · c. 1078–1098 845
The Third Lateran Council After · March 1179 874

← The Concordat of Worms Earlier · 23 September 1122
→ The Murder of Thomas Becket Later · 29 December 1170

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Murder of Thomas Becket

29 December 1170 · Firm date

Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, back from six years of exile for resisting Henry II's claims over the church, is cut down by four knights in his own cathedral. He is venerated as a martyr, and the king does public penance at his tomb.

In 1162 King Henry II of England gave the see of Canterbury to his chancellor, Thomas Becket. Within a year the two were at odds. The king wished clergy accused of theft, murder and other felonies to be tried and punished by lay judges like anyone else; the archbishop held that a cleric must be tried in the church's court, and if convicted be stripped of his orders (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1162–1163).

At Clarendon in January 1164 the king had the "customs" of the realm set down in sixteen articles. An accused cleric was to answer in the king's court, and once convicted the church was not to protect him. No bishop might leave the kingdom without the king's leave. No tenant of the crown might be excommunicated until the king had been consulted. Appeals were to go no further than the archbishop without the king's consent. Bishops were to be elected in the king's chapel with his assent and do him homage before consecration (Constitutions of Clarendon preamble and articles 3, 4, 7, 8, 12). Thomas first promised to observe the customs, then refused to put his seal to them and suspended himself from saying mass for having given way (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1164). After a council at Northampton at which the king pressed him hard, he left by night in disguise, crossed from Sandwich to Flanders and went on to France (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1165).

He was in his sixth year of exile when, in June 1170, Henry had his son Henry crowned by the archbishop of York, a rite that belonged to Canterbury. At Thomas's complaint Pope Alexander III excommunicated or suspended the bishops who had taken part. Peace was then made between king and archbishop, and Thomas returned by Sandwich to a tearful welcome from his monks (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1170).

He had been back less than a month when four knights came to Canterbury (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1171). Edward Grim, a clerk who stood beside him, tells what happened. The knights followed the archbishop into the cathedral with drawn swords while the monks were singing vespers. Thomas forbade the doors to be barred, saying that a church must not be made a fortress. When they shouted for the traitor no one answered; when they called for the archbishop he came down the steps and said that he was there, no traitor to the king but a priest. They demanded that he absolve those he had excommunicated; he refused. They tried to drag him outside and could not move him from a pillar. The first blow cut into his head and through Grim's arm, which was raised to shield him; at the third he fell to his knees, saying that he was ready to die for the name of Jesus and the protection of the church; another stroke took off the crown of his head and broke the sword on the pavement (Edward Grim, Life of Thomas 80–82).

Hoveden reports miracles at the tomb and far beyond it (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1171). In 1172 Henry swore before papal legates at Avranches that he had neither ordered nor wished the death, and promised to allow appeals to Rome and to abolish the customs introduced in his time to the harm of the church (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1172). In July 1174 he walked barefoot to the tomb, was scourged there by bishops and monks, and kept vigil through the night (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1174).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Roger of Hoveden dates the murder to the fifth day of Christmas, the day after the feast of the Holy Innocents, which is 29 December. He enters it under 1171 because he begins the year at Christmas (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle 1171); by the usual reckoning the year is 1170.

Primary sources

Chronicle Roger of Hoveden · c. 1192–1201
1162–1163; 1164; 1165; 1170; 1171; 1172; 1174

The Constitutions of Clarendon Issued in the name of Henry II · January 1164 preamble and articles 3, 4, 7, 8, 12

Life of Saint Thomas Edward Grim · c. 1171–1177
80–82

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Canterbury
Who Thomas Becket, Henry II of England
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Concordat of Worms 23 September 1122 858

LEADS TO

England Breaks with Rome 1534 1055

CHURCH AND STATE

The Concordat of Worms Before · 23 September 1122 858

The Albigensian Crusade After · 1209–1229 890

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrs of Najran Before · AD 523 (or 518) 699

The Albigensian Crusade After · 1209–1229 890

← The Schools Become Universities Earlier · c. 1150–1215
→ Waldo and the Poor of Lyon Later · c. 1173

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Waldo and the Poor of Lyon

c. 1173 · Estimated date

A rich citizen of Lyon gives away his wealth and begins to preach with his followers in voluntary poverty. The pope approves the poverty and restricts the preaching; when they preach on, they are condemned. The early accounts used here all come from critics of the movement.

The Chronicle of Laon, written some forty-five years afterwards, tells the story under the year 1173. Peter Waldo, a citizen of Lyon who had grown rich by lending at interest, heard a minstrel recite the life of Saint Alexis and went next morning to ask a master of theology which was the surest way to God. The master answered with the saying of Jesus to the rich young man (Matthew 19:21). Waldo left his wife the land and houses, made restitution to those he had wronged, gave a large part of his money to his two small daughters, whom he placed in the order of Fontevraud, and spent the greatest part on the poor, feeding all comers three days a week through a famine. He threw money to the poor in the street, crying that no one can serve God and mammon (Matthew 6:24), and then begged his own bread, until his wife appealed to the archbishop (Chronicle of Laon 1173) (Chronicle of Laon 1173 (MGH SS 26, pp. 447–448)).

By 1177, the chronicle goes on, he had companions who gave away their goods as he had done, and they began to rebuke sins, their own and other people's, in private and in public (Chronicle of Laon 1177 (MGH SS 26, p. 449)).

Walter Map, one of the clerics summoned to the Lateran council held by Pope Alexander III, saw some of them there. He calls them simple and unlettered. They gave the pope a book in French containing the Psalter and many books of both Testaments with a gloss, and pressed for the right to preach. Map was set to examine two of their leaders and boasts that he made the assembly laugh at them. He describes them as having no fixed homes, going two by two, barefoot, clad in wool, owning nothing and holding all things in common, and warns that if they are let in the clergy will be driven out (Walter Map, De nugis curialium 1.31 (James, pp. 65–66)). The Chronicle of Laon reports the outcome: the pope embraced Waldo and approved his vow of poverty, but forbade him and his companions to preach unless the priests asked them to. They kept the rule for a short time, the chronicler says, and then disobeyed (Chronicle of Laon 1178 (MGH SS 26, p. 449)).

A decree of Pope Lucius III, issued with the emperor Frederick I beside him, then placed under perpetual anathema those who, in its words, falsely call themselves Humiliati or Poor of Lyon, in one list with the Cathars, and with them all who preached in public or private without authority from the pope or the local bishop. Those found in heresy who did not at once abjure it were to be left to the secular power for punishment (Lucius III, Ad abolendam PL 201, cols. 1297–1298).

Each of these writers was a critic or a judge of the movement. The Waldensian Church of today tells its own beginnings differently. Waldo, it says, sold his goods for the poor and to have Scripture put into the language of the people, and preached with no intention of founding a new church. Its members lived on as a hidden movement in the Alps and elsewhere, visited by travelling preachers, and joined the Reformation, a step it dates from the synod of Chanforan in 1532 (Waldensian Church, Our History Le origini; Adesione alla Riforma protestante).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The only source that dates Waldo's conversion among those used here is the Chronicle of Laon, which puts it in 1173 (Chronicle of Laon 1173 (MGH SS 26, pp. 447–448)), the gathering of companions in 1177 (Chronicle of Laon 1177 (MGH SS 26, p. 449)) and the meeting with the pope at the Lateran council in 1178 (Chronicle of Laon 1178 (MGH SS 26, p. 449)). Its translator, James Harvey Robinson (Readings in European History, 1904), describes the chronicle as written about 1218, so these years are those of a writer some forty-five years on. The council met in March 1179 according to the introduction to its canons in Norman Tanner's edition (Third Lateran Council, introduction). Walter Map, who was at the council, gives no year (Walter Map, De nugis curialium 1.31 (James, pp. 65–66)). The decree Ad abolendam is printed among the letters of Lucius III for 1184, with the place and month marked as uncertain (Lucius III, Ad abolendam PL 201, cols. 1297–1298).

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 19:21; Matthew 6:24

Chronicle of Laon c. 1218
1173; 1173 (MGH SS 26, pp. 447–448); 1177 (MGH SS 26, p. 449); 1178 (MGH SS 26, p. 449)

De nugis curialium (Courtiers' Trifles) Walter Map · c. 1181–1193
1.31 (James, pp. 65–66)

Ad abolendam Lucius III · 1184
PL 201, cols. 1297–1298

The Waldensians: Origins (Chiesa Evangelica Valdese) Chiesa Evangelica Valdese (Union of the Methodist and Waldensian Churches) · Current church website
Le origini; Adesione alla Riforma protestante

Canons of the Third Lateran Council The Third Lateran Council · March 1179
introduction

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Lyon
Who Peter Waldo, Alexander III
Threads Reform and Reformation

In context

LEADS TO

The Third Lateran Council March 1179 874
Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886
The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895
The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux Before · 1098–1115 854
Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor After · c. 1209 886

← The Murder of Thomas Becket Earlier · 29 December 1170
→ The Third Lateran Council Later · March 1179

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Third Lateran Council

March 1179 · Firm date

Alexander III holds a general council at the Lateran at the end of a papal schism. It requires two thirds of the cardinals to elect a pope, orders a schoolmaster for every cathedral, and calls the faithful to arms against heretics and mercenary bands.

The council met at the end of a schism. Its second canon names three rivals of Alexander III: Octavian and Guido, whom it calls heresiarchs, and John of Struma, who followed them. It declares void the ordinations made by them and by those they ordained (Decretals of Gregory IX X 5.8.1 (the Latin of canon 2: ordinationes)). The editor's notes identify them as the antipopes Victor IV, Paschal III and Callistus III, who between them claimed the papacy from 1159 to 1178 (Third Lateran Council, canon 2 and notes 2–4).

Bishops travelled to Rome from as far as Ireland and Scotland; from England, Roger of Hoveden says, only four went, the English bishops insisting that no more were owed (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle year 1179 (Riley, vol. 1, p. 494)). The pope sat with his cardinals in the Lateran church on three days in March 1179, and on the third he enacted the decrees (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle year 1179 (Riley, vol. 1, pp. 494–495)).

The first canon deals with the cause of the schism. If the cardinals cannot agree, the man chosen and received by two thirds of them is pope, and anyone who takes the name on the votes of the remaining third is excommunicated with his supporters. The canon adds that this is not to prejudice other churches, where the judgement of the greater and senior part prevails and a doubt can be settled by a superior; in the Roman church there is none to appeal to (Third Lateran Council, canon 1).

Most of the twenty-seven canons concern discipline. No one is to be chosen bishop before the age of thirty; clergy who keep concubines must dismiss them or lose their posts; the holding of many churches by one man is to be corrected (Third Lateran Council, canons 3, 11 and 14). Every cathedral is to give a benefice to a master who will teach its clerics and poor scholars, and no one may demand payment for a licence to teach (Third Lateran Council, canon 18). Lepers living in community may have their own church, cemetery and priest, and notorious usurers are refused communion and Christian burial (Third Lateran Council, canons 23 and 25). Jews and Saracens may not keep Christian servants, and the testimony of Christians is to be accepted against Jews in every case (Third Lateran Council, canon 26).

The last canon turns to Gascony and the country of Albi and Toulouse, where, it says, the heresy of those called Cathars, Patarenes or Publicani is preached openly. They and those who defend or shelter them are placed under anathema. The canon goes on to the bands of mercenaries, Brabanters, Aragonese, Basques and others, who spare neither churches nor the defenceless, and lays the same sentence on those who hire them. It enjoins the faithful, for the remission of their sins, to protect the Christian people by arms. Those who take up arms against them on the advice of the bishops receive two years' remission of penance, or more at the bishops' discretion for longer service, and those who set out to drive out the heretics are taken under the church's protection like pilgrims to the Lord's sepulchre (Third Lateran Council, canon 27). Walter Map, who was at the council and writes of them with scorn, describes followers of Waldo of Lyon asking the pope there for leave to preach (the Poor of Lyon) (Walter Map, De nugis curialium 1.31).

The first canon and the opening of the last passed into the Decretals of Gregory IX (Decretals of Gregory IX X 1.6.6) (Decretals of Gregory IX X 5.7.8). The council of 1215 extended the full crusading indulgence to those who took the cross against heretics (Fourth Lateran Council) (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 3), by which time the war in the south had begun (the Albigensian Crusade).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Roger of Hoveden, an English royal clerk writing within about twenty years, gives the three days on which the pope sat: the Monday of the third week of Lent, the third day before the Nones of March; the Wednesday of the following week, the second before the Ides; and the Monday before Palm Sunday, the fourteenth before the Kalends of April. He enters them under 1179 (Roger of Hoveden, Chronicle year 1179 (Riley, vol. 1, pp. 494–495)). These are 5, 14 and 19 March, and 5 March 1179 was a Monday. The introduction printed with the canons in N. P. Tanner (ed.), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils (1990), gives the same first and last days, the first on the authority of William of Tyre, and counts about three hundred fathers (Third Lateran Council, introduction).

Primary sources

Decretals of Gregory IX (Liber Extra) Compiled by Raymond of Penyafort for Gregory IX · 1234
X 5.8.1 (the Latin of canon 2: ordinationes); X 1.6.6; X 5.7.8

Canons of the Third Lateran Council The Third Lateran Council · March 1179
canon 2 and notes 2–4; canon 1; canons 3, 11 and 14; canon 18; canons 23 and 25; canon 26; canon 27; introduction

Chronicle Roger of Hoveden · c. 1192–1201
year 1179 (Riley, vol. 1, p. 494); year 1179 (Riley, vol. 1, pp. 494–495)

De nugis curialium (Courtiers' Trifles) Walter Map · c. 1181–1193
1.31

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215
constitution 3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Alexander III
Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Concordat of Worms 23 September 1122 858
Waldo and the Poor of Lyon c. 1173 870

LEADS TO

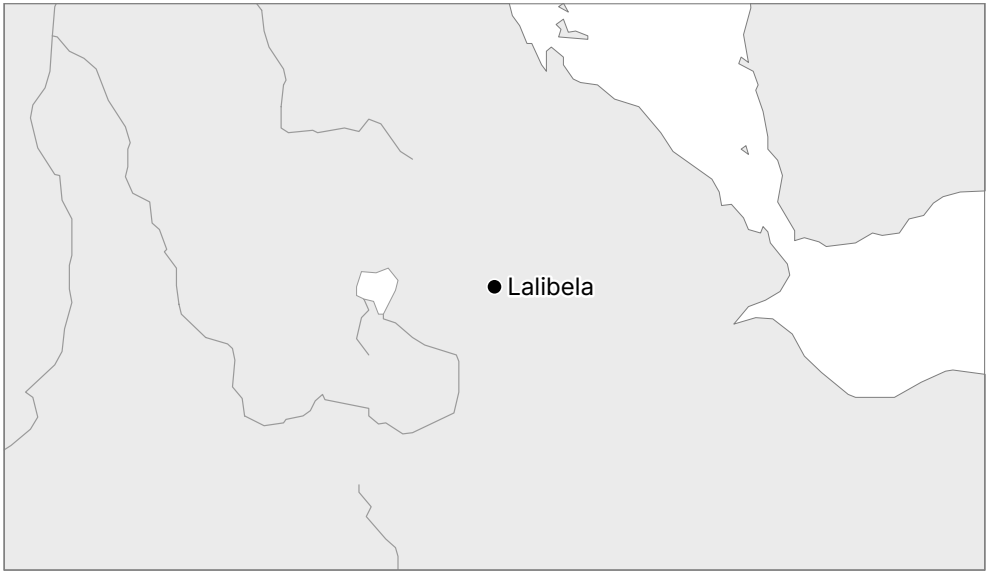
The Albigensian Crusade 1209–1229 890
The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Schools Become Universities Before · c. 1150–1215 862
The Fourth Lateran Council After · November 1215 895

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Concordat of Worms Before · 23 September 1122 858
The Fourth Lateran Council After · November 1215 895



← Waldo and the Poor of Lyon Earlier · c. 1173
→ The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela Later · c. 1200

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela

c. 1200 · Traditional date

In the highlands of Ethiopia a group of churches is cut whole out of the living rock. Ethiopian tradition ascribes them to the saint-king Lalibela, about 1200; the written sources are late, and archaeologists still debate how long the work took.

At Lalibela, in the mountains of northern Ethiopia, stand churches that were not built but cut out of the rock, with their pillars, windows and doors, as Francisco Álvares described them in the 1520s (Álvares, Prester John of the Indies 53 (pp. 122–131)). The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church ascribes them to a king of the same name, Gebre Meskel Lalibela, and venerates him as a saint. Its Synaxarium commemorates him on the twelfth day of the month of Sanê as king of Ethiopia and "seer of the mysteries of heaven", to whom an angel showed in a dream how to build ten churches together, each different from the others (Ethiopian Synaxarium 12 Sanê (Budge, pp. 995–996)).

A longer telling is his Life, a saint's life in Ge'ez, of which its first editor knew a copy that he assigned to the fourteenth century (Life of Lalibela Perruchon's introduction, section IV). It relates that before he was king an angel carried him up through the heavens, where God showed him ten churches, each made of a single stone, and told him that he would be anointed king in order to bring their like out of the earth (Life of Lalibela Perruchon, pp. 86–89). As king, the Life says, he had iron tools forged, asked the workmen to name their own wages and paid them, and bought the ground from its owners. It names the churches: the houses of Mary, of the Cross and of the Virgins, with Debre Sina and Golgotha, cut from one rock; of Gabriel and of Abba Mata; of Mercurius and of Emmanuel; and the house of George, standing alone in the form of a cross. Angels, it says, worked beside the masons by day and alone by night, so that a cubit cut by evening was four by morning (Life of Lalibela Perruchon, pp. 121–125). The Life sets these churches beside Solomon's temple and tells every Ethiopian to go to the holy city of Roha to see them (Life of Lalibela Perruchon, pp. 126–127).

Álvares, a Portuguese priest, came twice. He names ten churches, gives their measurements, and writes that buildings like them, and so many, are in his opinion not to be found elsewhere in the world. Fearing that no one would believe him, he swears that what he has written is true. He was told that King Lalibela had ordered the work, that it was done in twenty-four years and by "Gibetas, that is, white men", that the king was held to be a saint, and that his tomb in the church of Golgotha drew many pilgrims (Álvares, Prester John of the Indies 53 (pp. 122–131)).

These are testimonies of a church about its own holy place and of one visitor of the 1520s. They do not settle when each church was cut; that question is taken up in the dating note.

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

No document from the time of the cutting survives among the sources used here, and the date on the timeline is the traditional one. It rests on three things.

First, the king. Jules Perruchon, in the introduction to his Vie de Lalibala (1892), reproduces Ignazio Guidi's reading of the Arabic History of the Patriarchs of Alexandria, according to which a metropolitan ordained in March 1210 found in Ethiopia a king whose name, corrupted in the manuscript, Guidi read as Lalibala (Life of Lalibela Perruchon's introduction, p. xvi, note). That places his reign in the first years of the thirteenth century.

Second, the tradition that he built the churches. It is told in the Life of Lalibela and in the Synaxarium. Perruchon assigned the oldest copy of the Life known to him to the fourteenth century (Life of Lalibela Perruchon's introduction, section IV); Nafisa Valieva, "The Portrait of a Queen" (Manuscript of the Month 2016.07, Centre for the Study of Manuscript Cultures, Hamburg), says only that it was composed before the fifteenth. Francisco Álvares heard the same tradition on the spot in the 1520s (Álvares, Prester John of the Indies 53 (pp. 122–131)).

Third, the monuments themselves, which carry no dated inscription cited here and have been read in more than one way. David W. Phillipson, Ancient Churches of Ethiopia: Fourth–Fourteenth Centuries (2009), argued that the oldest rock-cut features at the site go back to the seventh or eighth century and were not made as churches, that the finest churches were added around the eleventh or twelfth, and that the last phase may be dated to King Lalibela's reign. F.-X. Fauvelle-Aymar and colleagues, "Rock-cut stratigraphy: sequencing the Lalibela churches", Antiquity 84 (2010), pp. 1135–1150, ask whether the churches belong to one plan or to a centre refashioned over a long time, and set out to read the sequence of construction from the cuts, openings and spoil heaps. The Life counts ten churches; Valieva counts eleven.

Primary sources

The Prester John of the Indies (Narrative of the Portuguese Embassy to Abyssinia) Francisco Álvares · Journey in the 1520s
53 (pp. 122–131)

The Ethiopian Synaxarium
12 Sanê (Budge, pp. 995–996)

Life of Lalibela (Gadla Lalibela) Before the fifteenth century; date of composition unknown
Perruchon's introduction, section IV; Perruchon, pp. 86–89; Perruchon, pp. 121–125; Perruchon, pp. 126–127; Perruchon's introduction, p. xvi, note

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Lalibela
Who Gebre Meskel Lalibela
Threads Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian c. AD 330–356 598

LEADS TO

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church 1622–1632 1167

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Triumph of Orthodoxy Before · 11 March AD 843 786

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg After · 1 October 1529 1042

← The Third Lateran Council Earlier · March 1179
→ The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople Later · April 1204

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople

April 1204 · Firm date

A crusading army, carried by a Venetian fleet it cannot pay for, turns on Constantinople, storms it and plunders its churches. Pope Innocent III condemns the sack, but a Latin emperor is installed and the conquest stands.

Envoys of the French barons who had taken the cross hired a fleet from Venice. The doge, Enrico Dandolo, offered ships and provisions for 85,000 marks, and fifty galleys in return for half of all conquests (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 6–7). Too few crusaders came, and 34,000 marks stayed unpaid. The doge offered to defer the debt if the army helped Venice retake Zara (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 15–16). A Cistercian abbot forbade the attack in the pope's name, because the people of Zara were Christians. The city was taken all the same, and Innocent III afterwards absolved the barons (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 20–21, 26).

At Zara came an offer on behalf of Alexius, son of a dethroned emperor. If the army restored him, he would bring the empire back to obedience to Rome, from which it had long been separated (see the Schism of 1054), pay 200,000 marks and support the crusade (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 22–23). The fleet sailed to Constantinople, and Alexius was crowned beside his father (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 47–48). Then Greeks and crusaders fell out. A courtier, Mourzuphles, seized the throne and strangled Alexius, and the clergy with the army declared the war just, because of the murder and because the Greeks had withdrawn from obedience to Rome (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 55–56). Robert of Clari, a knight in the ranks, reports that the bishops called the Greeks enemies of God and promised absolution, in the pope's name, to all who attacked them (Robert of Clari, Conquest of Constantinople chs. 72–73).

Franks and Venetians agreed beforehand how to divide booty and empire (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople p. 59). On a Monday in April 1204 they scaled the walls. Mourzuphles fled in the night, and men in the crusader camp set a fire that burned through the next day (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 61–64). Villehardouin writes that so much booty had never been won in any city since the creation of the world. It was shared between Franks and Venetians, and Baldwin of Flanders was elected emperor (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 65–68).

The Byzantine historian Niketas Choniates tells what this meant inside the city: icons trampled, relics thrown out, the consecrated bread and wine spilled, the altar of Hagia Sophia broken up and shared out, pack animals led into the sanctuary to carry off its silver, a prostitute seated on the patriarch's throne (Niketas Choniates, History, Reign of Alexios Doukas, 3–4). Innocent III wrote to his legate in July 1205 that the crusaders had spared neither age nor sex, had violated women, nuns among them, and had stripped the churches of altar plate, crosses and relics. The Greek church, he wrote, now detested the Latins "more than dogs", and with reason (Innocent III, Letters, to the legate Peter, 12 July 1205).

The conquest stood. Innocent's council of 1215 spoke of the Greeks as returning to Roman obedience and ranked a patriarch of Constantinople, who was to receive his pallium from the pope, next after Rome (Fourth Lateran Council, constitutions 4–5). In 2004 John Paul II, receiving the Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, named April 1204 among the memories that weigh on the two churches and said he shared Innocent's indignation and sorrow (John Paul II, Address to Bartholomew I (29 June 2004) 3).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Villehardouin, who was with the army, puts the successful assault on a Monday in the weeks before Easter 1204 and the occupation of the city on the Tuesday morning (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 61–64). His translator, Frank Marzials, gives these days as 12 and 13 April 1204 (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 61–64) and that Easter as 25 April (Villehardouin, Conquest of Constantinople pp. 65–68). John Paul II's address speaks likewise of April 1204 (John Paul II, Address to Bartholomew I (29 June 2004) 3).

Primary sources

The Conquest of Constantinople Geoffrey of Villehardouin · After 1207
pp. 6–7; pp. 15–16; pp. 20–21, 26; pp. 22–23; pp. 47–48; pp. 55–56; p. 59; pp. 61–64; pp. 65–68

The Conquest of Constantinople Robert of Clari · In or after 1216
chs. 72–73

History Niketas Choniates · Early thirteenth century
Reign of Alexios Doukas, 3–4

Letters Innocent III · 1198–1216
to the legate Peter, 12 July 1205

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215 constitutions 4–5

Welcome Address to the Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I John Paul II · 29 June 2004
3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Venice
Who Innocent III, Enrico Dandolo
Threads East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Crusade 1095–1099 849
The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832

LEADS TO

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895
The Second Council of Lyon May 1274 916
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974

EAST AND WEST

The First Crusade Before · 1095–1099 849
The Second Council of Lyon After · May 1274 916

← The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela Earlier · c. 1200
→ Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor Later · c. 1209

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor

c. 1209 · Estimated date

Francis of Assisi gives up his property to live by the Gospel in poverty, gathers brothers and wins the approval of Pope Innocent III. Clare founds a sister community, and in 1223 Honorius III confirms the Rule of the Friars Minor.

Near the end of his life Francis of Assisi described his own beginning. When he was “in sin” the sight of lepers was bitter to him; the Lord led him among them, he showed them mercy, and what had been bitter became sweet. Soon afterwards he “left the world” (Francis of Assisi, Testament). His first biographer, Thomas of Celano, writing within three years of his death, tells how he sold cloth and a horse, offered the money to the priest of the ruined church of San Damiano outside Assisi, and, when his father brought him before the bishop, stripped naked and handed back his clothes (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 8–9, 14–15).

He repaired San Damiano and, later, the chapel of Saint Mary at the Portiuncula. There, Celano says, he heard the Gospel in which Christ sends out his disciples without gold, wallet, shoes or a second tunic, and cried out that this was what he wanted. He put on one rough tunic with a cord (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 21–22). Others joined him. Francis writes that no one showed him what to do, but that the Most High revealed to him that he should live "according to the form of the holy Gospel"; he had it written down in a few words, and the pope confirmed it (Francis of Assisi, Testament). Celano adds the detail: Francis went to Rome with his brothers, and Innocent III granted their request, blessed them and sent them to preach repentance (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 32–33). Francis named them the Lesser Brothers, the Friars Minor (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 38).

At San Damiano a community of women began under Clare of Assisi, a noblewoman of Assisi whom Francis had turned to this life (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 18–20).

On 29 November 1223 Honorius III confirmed the brothers' Rule (Rule of the Friars Minor (1223) bull of confirmation). It binds them to observe the Gospel in obedience, without property and in chastity, forbids them to accept money or to make any house or place their own, and promises obedience to the pope (Rule of the Friars Minor (1223) chs. 1, 4, 6).

Celano reports that two years before his death, at the hermitage of La Verna, Francis saw in a vision a man like a seraph fixed to a cross, and that the marks of nails then appeared in his hands and feet and a wound in his side (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 94–95). While ill at San Damiano he composed in Italian the praises of God for brother sun, sister moon and "our sister, the bodily death" (Francis of Assisi, Canticle of the Sun). He died at the Portiuncula in October 1226 (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 88). Gregory IX canonized him at Assisi less than two years later (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 126).

The Rule forbade the brothers to preach in any diocese against its bishop's will, and had them ask the pope for a cardinal to be the order's governor, protector and corrector (Rule of the Friars Minor (1223) chs. 9, 12). In his Testament Francis forbade the brothers to seek privileges from the Roman curia or to add glosses to the Rule (Francis of Assisi, Testament).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The date is that of the journey to Rome, and no early source gives its year. Celano counts by years from Francis's conversion: he finished repairing the Portiuncula in the third year, and twenty years had passed when he died in October 1226 (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 21, 88). That puts the hearing of the Gospel about 1208 or 1209 and the approval by Innocent III soon after.

Editors have chosen between two years. Paschal Robinson, The Writings of Saint Francis of Assisi (1906), p. 25, gives 23 April 1209 and notes that Paul Sabatier's Vie de S. François d'Assise put the event in the summer of 1210. A. G. Ferrers Howell, The Lives of S. Francis of Assisi by Brother Thomas of Celano (1908), p. xxiii, also gives 1210. The later dates are firm: the bull confirming the Rule is dated 29 November in the eighth year of Honorius III, 1223 (Rule of the Friars Minor (1223) bull of confirmation), and Celano dates the death to Sunday 4 October 1226 (Thomas of Celano, First Life of Francis 88).

Primary sources

Writings Francis of Assisi · c. 1209–1226
Testament; Canticle of the Sun

First Life of Saint Francis Thomas of Celano · 1228–1229
8–9, 14–15; 21–22; 32–33; 38; 18–20; 94–95; 88; 126; 21, 88

The Rule of the Friars Minor (Regula bullata) Francis of Assisi; confirmed by Honorius III in the bull Solet annuere · 29 November 1223 bull of confirmation; chs. 1, 4, 6; chs. 9, 12

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Assisi, Rome
Who Francis of Assisi, Clare of Assisi, Innocent III, Honorius III
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Waldo and the Poor of Lyon c. 1173 870

LEADS TO

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq 1245–1307 907

The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ 1384–1441 954

The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Cistercians and Bernard of Clairvaux Before · 1098–1115 854

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers After · 22 December 1216 899

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Waldo and the Poor of Lyon Before · c. 1173 870

Wycliffe and the First English Bible After · c. 1382 950

← The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople Earlier · April 1204
→ The Albigensian Crusade Later · 1209–1229

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Albigensian Crusade

1209–1229 · Firm date

After a papal legate is murdered, Innocent III calls for arms against the count of Toulouse and the heretics of his lands. Crusaders sack Béziers in 1209, and twenty years of war end with the count's heir submitting to the church and the French crown.

In 1179 a council at Rome had placed under anathema the heretics of Gascony, Albi and Toulouse, called Cathars among other names (Third Lateran Council) (Third Lateran Council, canon 27). What they believed is told here only by their enemies. Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, a Cistercian monk and the crusade's historian, says that they held two creators, a good god of things unseen and an evil god of the visible world; that they rejected the Old Testament, baptism, the eucharist and marriage and denied the resurrection of the flesh; that their "perfect", or "good men", wore black, ate no meat, eggs or cheese and would not swear; and that "believers" trusted to be saved by a laying on of hands at death, which they called the consolation (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 2, cols 545–548). Other nations, he notes, called the heretics of the region Albigensians (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians dedication, cols 543–544).

In March 1208 Innocent III wrote to the archbishops of the south that his legate Peter of Castelnau had been run through with a lance on the bank of the Rhône by a retainer of Raymond VI of Toulouse, count of Toulouse, who had threatened him in public. The count, already excommunicate, was presumed guilty. His vassals were to be declared free of their oaths, any Catholic might occupy his land, saving the right of the overlord, and those who took up arms were promised remission of their sins (Innocent III, Letters, 11.26 (March 1208), PL 215, cols 1354–1358).

Raymond submitted. Peter tells that he was led stripped to the church door at Saint-Gilles, swore obedience before a legate, was beaten into the church and took the cross himself (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 12–13, cols 564–565). The army turned on the lands of his nephew, the viscount of Béziers, and on 22 July 1209 reached Béziers (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 16, cols 565–568). The legates, Arnaud Amalric, abbot of Cîteaux, and Milo, reported to the pope that the citizens had refused to give up the heretics or to leave them, that camp servants attacked without orders while the barons were discussing how to free the Catholics in the city, and that it fell within two or three hours. "Our men", they wrote, sparing neither rank, sex nor age, put almost twenty thousand people to the sword; the city was plundered and burnt (Arnaud Amalric and Milo, Report to Innocent III (1209) cols 139–141). Peter says that nearly all were killed, seven thousand in the church of Mary Magdalene (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 16, cols 565–568). The poet William of Tudela says that clergy, women and children were cut down in the church, and that the barons had agreed to put to the sword any town that resisted, to frighten the rest (William of Tudela, Song of the Albigensian Crusade laisse 21 (Meyer, vol. 2, pp. 26–27)).

Caesarius of Heisterbach, a Cistercian in the Rhineland writing a decade or more later, adds a story found in none of these three. Asked how to tell Catholics from heretics, the abbot "is said to have said": Kill them, for the Lord knows who are his (Caesarius of Heisterbach, Dialogue on Miracles 5.21 (Strange, vol. 1, pp. 301–302)). The last words are Scripture (2 Timothy 2:19).

Carcassonne surrendered, and the army chose Simon de Montfort as lord of the conquered land (Arnaud Amalric and Milo, Report to Innocent III (1209) cols 139–141). At Minerve in 1210 a hundred and forty or more of the "perfect" were burnt (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 37, cols 585–587). In 1213 King Peter of Aragon, besieging Muret with the count of Toulouse, was killed in battle against Simon (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 71–72, cols 667–672). At the council of 1215 the pope, with the approval of the greater part of the council, awarded Toulouse and the other conquests to Simon and reserved the count's lands in Provence for his son (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 83, cols 700–701). Toulouse, in Peter's word, apostatized; Simon besieged it from 1217, and after some nine months a stone from a siege engine killed him (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 85–86, cols 708–711).

The war ended in 1229. Raymond's son promised to hunt down heretics in his lands and pay for each one captured, and to fund masters of theology at Toulouse (Treaty of Paris (1229) cols 883–887); by the preliminary articles his daughter was to marry a brother of the French king and have Toulouse after him (Treaty of Paris (1229) preliminary articles, cols 879–880). What followed at Toulouse is told under the papal inquisition.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay puts the gathering of the crusaders at Lyon in 1209, about the feast of John the Baptist (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 14, col. 565), and the legates date the fall of Béziers to the feast of Mary Magdalene, 22 July (Arnaud Amalric and Milo, Report to Innocent III (1209) cols 139–141). The pope's letter is undated in his register (Innocent III, Letters, 11.26 (March 1208), PL 215, cols 1354–1358); the copy in Peter's history is dated 10 March in the pope's eleventh year, 1208 (Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay, History of the Albigensians 8, col. 559). The treaty is dated at Paris on the day before the Ides of April 1228, by a reckoning that began the year at Easter; its editors give 12 April 1229 (Treaty of Paris (1229) cols 883–887).

Primary sources

Scripture

2 Timothy 2:19

Canons of the Third Lateran Council The Third Lateran Council · March 1179
canon 27

History of the Albigensians Peter of les Vaux-de-Cernay · c. 1212–1218
2, cols 545–548; dedication, cols 543–544; 12–13, cols 564–565; 16, cols 565–568; 37, cols 585–587; 71–72, cols 667–672; 83, cols 700–701; 85–86, cols 708–711; 14, col. 565; 8, col. 559

Letters Innocent III · 1198–1216
11.26 (March 1208), PL 215, cols 1354–1358

Report of the Legates Arnaud Amalric and Milo to Innocent III Arnaud Amalric, abbot of Cîteaux, and Milo · August 1209
cols 139–141

Song of the Albigensian Crusade William of Tudela · c. 1210–1213
laisse 21 (Meyer, vol. 2, pp. 26–27)

Dialogue on Miracles Caesarius of Heisterbach · c. 1219–1223
5.21 (Strange, vol. 1, pp. 301–302)

Treaty of Paris (1229) Issued in the name of Raymond VII, count of Toulouse · 12 April 1229
cols 883–887; preliminary articles, cols 879–880

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Béziers, Toulouse
Who Innocent III, Simon de Montfort, Raymond VI of Toulouse, Arnaud Amalric
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Third Lateran Council March 1179 874
The First Crusade 1095–1099 849

LEADS TO

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Murder of Thomas Becket Before · 29 December 1170 866

The Papal Inquisition Is Established After · 1231 903

CHURCH AND STATE

The Murder of Thomas Becket Before · 29 December 1170 866

The Papal Inquisition Is Established After · 1231 903

← Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor Earlier · c. 1209
→ The Fourth Lateran Council Later · November 1215

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Fourth Lateran Council

November 1215 · Firm date

Innocent III gathers more than four hundred bishops in Rome. The council issues a creed that speaks of bread and wine "transubstantiated", orders measures against heresy and yearly confession, and requires Jews and Muslims to wear distinguishing dress.

Innocent III held a general council in the Lateran basilica at Rome in November 1215. Roger of Wendover counts 412 bishops and more than 800 abbots and priors, and says the decrees were read out to the full council (Roger of Wendover, Flowers of History pp. 343–344).

The first of the seventy-one constitutions is a creed. It confesses one God in three persons, creator of all things, and one universal church, outside which no one at all is saved. In the sacrament of the altar, it says, the body and blood of Christ are truly contained under the forms of bread and wine, the bread and wine having been "transubstantiated" (transsubstantiatis) into them by God's power; only a rightly ordained priest can perform this sacrament (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 1) (Decretals of Gregory IX X 1.1.1).

Constitution 3 excommunicates every heresy opposed to this faith. The condemned are to be handed to the secular authorities for "due punishment", and their goods confiscated. A person merely suspected must prove his innocence or be excommunicated, and after a year is condemned as a heretic. Rulers are to swear to drive out the heretics the church points out. A lord who neglects this is excommunicated, and after a further year the pope may release his vassals from fealty and offer his land to Catholics. Those who take the cross against heretics receive the crusaders' indulgence. Each bishop is to visit suspect parishes yearly and make men swear to name heretics to him (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 3).

Constitution 21 requires all the faithful of either sex, once at the age of discernment, to confess their sins to their own priest at least once a year and to receive the eucharist at least at Easter, or be barred from church and from Christian burial. A priest who reveals a confession is to be deposed and confined to a monastery for life (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 21).

Constitution 68 says that where dress does not distinguish Jews and Saracens from Christians, Christians have by mistake had relations with Jewish or Saracen women, and Jews or Saracens with Christian women. To stop this "damnable mixing" it decrees that Jews and Saracens of both sexes, in every Christian province and at all times, are to be marked off from other people in public by their dress. They are not to appear in public at all on the days before Easter when Christians mourn the Passion, and princes are to punish any who then insult Christ (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 68).

The creed and the constitution on heretics passed into the Decretals of Gregory IX (Decretals of Gregory IX X 1.1.1) (Decretals of Gregory IX X 5.7.13). The Council of Trent cited "the great Council of Lateran" for yearly confession (Council of Trent Session 14, canon 8 on penance) and called the change in the eucharist transubstantiation (Council of Trent Session 13, chapter 4 and canon 2). The Church of England's Articles reject transubstantiation as repugnant to Scripture (Thirty-Nine Articles article 28); the Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem of 1672 used the word, adding that it does not explain how the change happens (Confession of Dositheus decree 17).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Roger of Wendover, an English monk writing within twenty years, places the council in November 1215, in Innocent's eighteenth year, in the church of the Holy Saviour at Rome, which is the Lateran basilica (Roger of Wendover, Flowers of History pp. 343–344).

The word in constitution 1 was not new. Joseph Goering, "The Invention of Transubstantiation", Traditio 46 (1991), pp. 147–170, traces it to the schools of the middle of the twelfth century. With this constitution it entered the decrees of a general council. Gary Macy, "The Dogma of Transubstantiation in the Middle Ages", Journal of Ecclesiastical History 45 (1994), pp. 11–41, argues that most theologians of the thirteenth century did not treat the council's wording as settling how the change takes place.

Primary sources

Flowers of History Roger of Wendover · To 1235
pp. 343–344

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215 constitution 1; constitution 3; constitution 21; constitution 68

Decretals of Gregory IX (Liber Extra) Compiled by Raymond of Penyafort for Gregory IX · 1234
X 1.1.1; X 5.7.13

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 14, canon 8 on penance; Session 13, chapter 4 and canon 2

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
article 28

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672
decree 17

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Innocent III
Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882
Waldo and the Poor of Lyon c. 1173 870
The Schools Become Universities c. 1150–1215 862
The Third Lateran Council March 1179 874
The Albigensian Crusade 1209–1229 890

LEADS TO

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899
The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903
Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae c. 1265–1273 912
The Second Council of Lyon May 1274 916
Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam 18 November 1302 925

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Third Lateran Council Before · March 1179 874
Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae After · c. 1265–1273 912

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Third Lateran Council Before · March 1179 874
The Second Council of Lyon After · May 1274 916

← The Albigensian Crusade Earlier · 1209–1229
→ Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers Later · 22 December 1216

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers

22 December 1216 · Firm date

Dominic, a Spanish canon who had spent nearly ten years preaching against heresy in southern France, gathers a community at Toulouse. Pope Honorius III confirms it in December 1216, and within five years its friars are in Paris, Bologna and Spain.

Dominic was subprior of the cathedral canons of Osma in Spain. Travelling with his bishop, Diego, he met in the south of France the abbots whom the pope had sent to preach against the Albigensians, whom the church held to be heretics. Jordan of Saxony, who knew Dominic and wrote some twelve years after his death, reports the bishop's advice to them: the heretics won people by a show of gospel poverty, and would not be answered by preachers who came with horses and baggage. Diego sent his own retinue home, and the preachers went on foot, without money (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 19–22).

Diego died, and a crusade was preached against the Albigensians. Dominic stayed and preached, almost alone, for nearly ten years (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 31–32, 37). As the Lateran council of 1215 drew near, two men of Toulouse joined him. One, Peter Seila, gave houses in the city, and Bishop Fulk assigned the group a sixth of the diocese's tithes for books and food (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 38–39).

Dominic went with Fulk to the council to ask Innocent III to confirm an order that would be called, and would be, an order of Preachers. The pope told him to return and choose, with his brothers, a rule already approved (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 40–42); the council itself forbade new religious orders and required new houses to take an approved rule (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 13). They chose the Rule of Augustine, with stricter customs added, and resolved to hold no landed property (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 40–42). In the summer of 1216 they were given the church of Saint Romanus; they were about sixteen. Innocent died, and Dominic went to his successor (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 44–45).

On 22 December 1216, at Rome, Honorius III addressed a privilege to Dominic, prior of Saint Romanus at Toulouse, and his brothers. It took their church under papal protection and confirmed there the life of canons under the Rule of Augustine (Honorius III, Religiosam vitam (22 December 1216)). A month later he wrote to them as "preachers" and charged them to preach the word of God in season and out of season (Honorius III, Gratiarum omnium largitori (21 January 1217)).

In 1217 Dominic told the brothers, few as they were, that he would scatter them through the world. Some went to Paris, others to Spain and, in 1218, to Bologna (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 46–47, 49, 51, 55). The first general chapter met at Bologna in 1220, with Jordan present, and ruled that the order would keep neither property nor fixed revenues (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 86–87). Dominic fell ill and died at Bologna the next year; the bishop of Ostia, the future Gregory IX, conducted the funeral (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 88, 92–96).

Among the first brothers sent to Paris were two who went to study (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 46–47, 49, 51, 55). Ten years after Dominic's death Gregory IX was commissioning Dominican friars to seek out heretics (Gregory IX, Ille humani generis (22 November 1231)); see the Papal Inquisition Is Established.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The privilege Religiosam vitam is dated at Saint Peter's on the eleventh day before the kalends of January, in the year of the Incarnation 1216 and the first year of Honorius III, which is 22 December 1216 (Honorius III, Religiosam vitam (22 December 1216)). Jordan of Saxony gives the years of the steps before and after it: the church of Saint Romanus in the summer of 1216, the dispersal in 1217 and the first general chapter in 1220 (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 44–45) (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 46–47, 49, 51, 55) (Jordan of Saxony, Libellus 86–87).

Primary sources

Little Book on the Beginnings of the Order of Preachers (Libellus) Jordan of Saxony · c. 1232–1234
19–22; 31–32, 37; 38–39; 40–42; 44–45; 46–47, 49, 51, 55; 86–87; 88, 92–96

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215
constitution 13

Letters and Privileges Honorius III · 1216–1227
Religiosam vitam (22 December 1216); Gratiarum omnium largitori (21 January 1217)

Letters and Statutes Gregory IX · 1227–1241
Ille humani generis (22 November 1231)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Toulouse, Rome, Bologna
Who Dominic, Innocent III, Honorius III
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895
Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886

LEADS TO

The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903

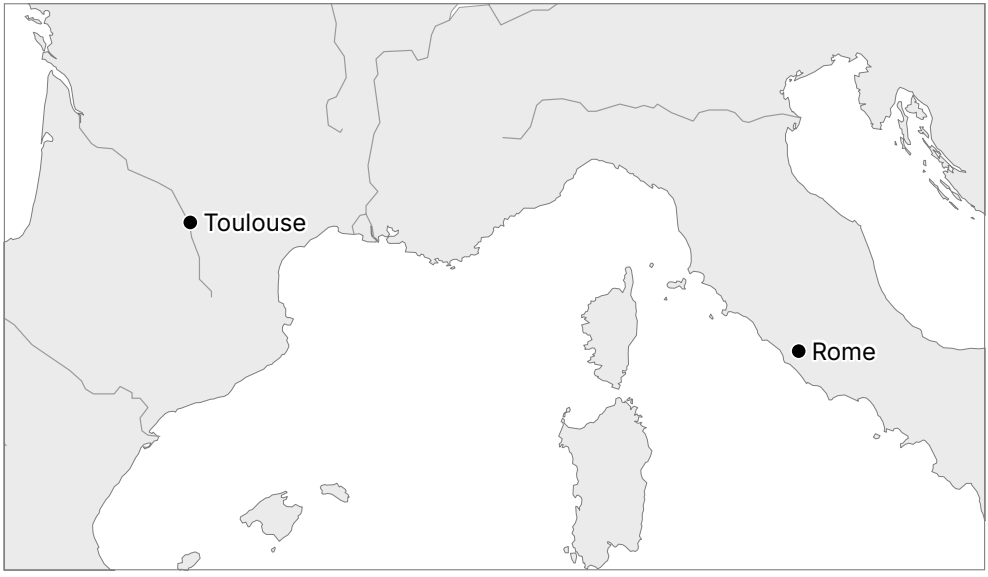
Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae c. 1265–1273 912

The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor Before · c. 1209 886

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery After · c. 1337–1345 933



← The Fourth Lateran Council Earlier · November 1215
→ The Papal Inquisition Is Established Later · 1231

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Papal Inquisition Is Established

1231 · Firm date

Gregory IX issues statutes against heretics and commissions Dominican friars to seek them out, try them and hand the unrepentant to the secular power. Papal inquisitors begin work at Toulouse; in 1252 Innocent IV orders the cities of northern Italy to force confessions.

The Fourth Lateran Council had made the search for heretics the duty of each bishop, who was to visit suspect parishes and put the neighbours on oath (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 3).

In 1231 Gregory IX issued statutes of his own. They excommunicate Cathars, Patarenes, the Poor of Lyon and other named groups. Those the church condemns are to be left to the secular court for "the punishment due". Those who are caught and then return to do penance are to be imprisoned for life; the version in the church's law book reads, of those who will not return (Gregory IX, Excommunicamus (1231)) (Decretals of Gregory IX X 5.7.15). Supporters lose their legal rights, suspects who do not clear themselves within a year are condemned as heretics, no appeal is heard, and no advocate or notary may act for them. Laymen may not dispute about the faith. Everyone who knows of heretics or secret meetings must report them. Their children to the second generation are barred from church office (Gregory IX, Excommunicamus (1231)).

In November 1231 Gregory wrote to the Dominican prior of Regensburg and a fellow friar. They were to assemble clergy and people and preach, then with chosen helpers "inquire diligently" after heretics and those of ill repute. Any found guilty who would not obey the church absolutely were to be dealt with under the new statutes. Those who abjured were to be absolved and given the customary penance, with care taken against pretended conversions. The letter gives them power to censure anyone who resists and adds that two of them may act if not all can be present (Gregory IX, Ille humani generis (22 November 1231)).

William Pelhisson, a friar of the convent at Toulouse, describes the work there. The pope made two Dominicans inquisitors for the dioceses of Toulouse and Cahors (William Pelhisson, Chronicle pp. 13–14). They offered a time of grace, in which those who confessed fully were promised that they would not be imprisoned, exiled or stripped of their goods (William Pelhisson, Chronicle p. 27). They summoned suspects and heard witnesses. One man, John Textor, protested that he was a married, meat-eating Christian. Pelhisson, who calls him accursed, says that he was condemned in the friars' cloister, that in the bishop's prison he then declared himself of one belief with heretics held there, and that he refused to recant and was burned with them. At Cahors the friars condemned dead persons, whose bodies were dragged through the town and burned (William Pelhisson, Chronicle pp. 17–20). In November 1235 the consuls drove the friars out of Toulouse. One of them went to the pope at Rome, and Gregory had the count restore them (William Pelhisson, Chronicle pp. 37–41).

In 1252 Innocent IV ordered the city governments of northern Italy to hand arrested heretics to the bishop or the inquisitors within fifteen days, to apply the laws against heretics to those condemned, and to force those arrested, stopping short of loss of limb or danger of death, to confess their errors and name others, as thieves are forced to name accomplices (Innocent IV, Ad extirpanda 24–26).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The statutes beginning Excommunicamus are assigned to 1231 by their editor (Gregory IX, Excommunicamus (1231)). The letter to the Dominicans of Regensburg, dated at Rieti on 22 November in Gregory's fifth year, 1231, calls them his statutes against heretics "lately published" (Gregory IX, Ille humani generis (22 November 1231)). The year is that of the statutes and of this commission to friars; the inquisitors in Languedoc whom Pelhisson describes were at work by 1235, the year he gives for the expulsion of the friars from Toulouse (William Pelhisson, Chronicle pp. 37–41).

Primary sources

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215
constitution 3

Letters and Statutes Gregory IX · 1227–1241
Excommunicamus (1231); Ille humani generis (22 November 1231)

Decretals of Gregory IX (Liber Extra) Compiled by Raymond of Penyafort for Gregory IX · 1234
X 5.7.15

Chronicle William Pelhisson · Mid-thirteenth century
pp. 13–14; p. 27; pp. 17–20; pp. 37–41

Ad extirpanda Innocent IV · 15 May 1252
24–26

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Toulouse
Who Gregory IX
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

Waldo and the Poor of Lyon c. 1173 870
Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899
The Albigensian Crusade 1209–1229 890

LEADS TO

The Trial of Joan of Arc 30 May 1431 969
The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews 1478–1492 987

CHURCH AND STATE

The Albigensian Crusade Before · 1209–1229 890
Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam After · 18 November 1302 925

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Albigensian Crusade Before · 1209–1229 890
The Black Death After · 1347–1351 941

← Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers Earlier · 22 December 1216
→ Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq Later · 1245–1307

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq

1245–1307 · Firm date

Innocent IV sends Franciscans to the Mongol khan in 1245 and is told in reply to come and submit. William of Rubruck debates before the khan's umpires at the Mongol court in 1254. By 1305 John of Montecorvino has a church and a choir in Khanbaliq.

In March 1245 Innocent IV, then at Lyon, addressed two letters to the king and people of the Tartars. The first sets out the Christian faith: the Father sent his Son, who was born of a virgin, died on the cross, rose, and left on earth a vicar holding the keys of the kingdom of heaven. It commends the Franciscan Laurence of Portugal and his companions (Innocent IV, Dei patris immensa (no. 102, pp. 72–73)). The second says that the pope is astonished to hear that they have invaded many countries, Christian and other, and laid them waste, sparing neither sex nor age. It urges them to stop, above all to stop persecuting Christians, and to say through his envoys what they intend (Innocent IV, Cum non solum (no. 105, pp. 74–75)).

John of Plano Carpini, a Franciscan, writes that he told the first Mongol chiefs he met what the pope asked of them: to become Christians, to cease the slaughter and to write what they intended (John of Plano Carpini, History of the Mongols, Rockhill, pp. 5–7). He reached the camp of Güyük on 22 July and saw him enthroned as emperor on 24 August (John of Plano Carpini, History of the Mongols, Rockhill, pp. 18–22). Christians of the khan's household told him they believed that Güyük was about to become a Christian; he kept Christian clerks, John writes, and a chapel stood before his tent (John of Plano Carpini, History of the Mongols, Rockhill, p. 29). On 11 November the khan's secretaries went through the reply with the friars word by word while they put it into Latin, and it was written out "in Saracenic" as well (John of Plano Carpini, History of the Mongols, Rockhill, pp. 27–28). A Persian text of the letter, found in the Vatican archives in 1920 (Güyük Khan, letter to Innocent IV, Pelliot, p. 15), says that the request that the khan be baptised has not been understood; that God destroyed the peoples the pope speaks of, because they disobeyed God's order and killed Mongol envoys; and that the pope must come in person with the kings to offer service and homage. If they do not, the Mongols will know them as enemies (Güyük Khan, letter to Innocent IV, Persian text, in Pelliot's translation, pp. 18–23).

William of Rubruck, also a Franciscan, sailed into the Black Sea in May 1253 (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, p. 41). He had preached in Saint Sophia that he was no one's envoy, but was going among unbelievers as the rule of his order directed (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, p. 48). He reached the camp of the khan Möngke, his "Mangu Chan", on 27 December (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 165–175). In Karakorum, he writes, there were twelve temples of idols, two mosques and one Christian church (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 220–221). On the eve of Pentecost 1254, by the khan's order and before three umpires, he argued with one of those he calls Tuins, or idolaters; at the end, he writes, nobody said "I believe; I want to become a Christian" (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 228–235). Next day Möngke told him that as God gave the hand different fingers, so he gave men different ways (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 235–236). William left with a letter from the khan to King Louis of France, which told the king to send envoys if he would obey (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 248–251); he had baptised, he records, six people (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, p. 254).

John of Montecorvino says that he left Tabriz in 1291, spent thirteen months in India and went on to Cathay with a letter from the pope to the great khan. Writing from Khanbaliq in January 1305, he reports a church with a bell-tower, some six thousand people baptised by his own estimate, and a choir of boys whom he had bought, baptised and taught. The Nestorians, he says, had accused him for five years of being a spy and an impostor (John of Montecorvino, first letter (8 January 1305), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 45–51). Andrew of Perugia, a bishop sent out by the Apostolic See, writes that he reached the city in 1308, by his reckoning, and that John was consecrated archbishop there (Andrew of Perugia, letter of 1326, Yule, vol. 3, pp. 71–72).

William met priests of the Church of the East at Möngke's court, and John found them powerful in Cathay; both call them Nestorians (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, pp. 168, 171) (John of Montecorvino, first letter (8 January 1305), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 45–51). For that church's coming to China in the seventh century see the mission of Aluoben.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The pope's two letters are dated at Lyon on 5 and 13 March in his second year, 1245 (Innocent IV, Dei patris immensa (no. 102, pp. 72–73)) (Innocent IV, Cum non solum (no. 105, pp. 74–75)). John of Plano Carpini gives the days of his stay at the khan's court by the church calendar, without the year (John of Plano Carpini, History of the Mongols, Rockhill, pp. 18–22); the Persian text of the khan's reply is dated to the last days of the month Jumada II of the year 644, which its editor, Paul Pelliot, converts to 3–11 November 1246 (Güyük Khan, letter to Innocent IV, Persian text, in Pelliot's translation, pp. 18–23). William of Rubruck dates his sailing to 7 May 1253 (William of Rubruck, Journey, Rockhill, p. 41), and John of Montecorvino dates his letters from Khanbaliq to 8 January 1305 and to Quinquagesima Sunday in February 1306 (John of Montecorvino, first letter (8 January 1305), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 45–51) (John of Montecorvino, second letter (1306), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 55–58).

The closing year is that of the creation of the archbishopric. Henry Yule, Cathay and the Way Thither (second edition, revised by Henri Cordier, vol. 3, 1914), pp. 9–10, places it in the spring of 1307, noting that only an undated fragment of the bull survives and that the letter naming one of the suffragan bishops is dated 1 May 1307 (Andrew of Perugia, letter of 1326, Yule's introductory notice, vol. 3, pp. 9–10). Andrew of Perugia puts the consecration itself at Khanbaliq in 1308, "as well as I can reckon" (Andrew of Perugia, letter of 1326, Yule, vol. 3, pp. 71–72).

Primary sources

Letters to the King and People of the Tartars (Dei patris immensa and Cum non solum) Innocent IV · 5 and 13 March 1245
Dei patris immensa (no. 102, pp. 72–73); Cum non solum (no. 105, pp. 74–75)

History of the Mongols (Ystoria Mongalorum) John of Plano Carpini · c. 1247
Rockhill, pp. 5–7; Rockhill, pp. 18–22; Rockhill, p. 29; Rockhill, pp. 27–28

Letter of Güyük Khan to Pope Innocent IV Issued in the name of Güyük Khan · November 1246
Pelliot, p. 15; Persian text, in Pelliot's translation, pp. 18–23

Journey to the Eastern Parts of the World (Itinerarium) William of Rubruck · c. 1255
Rockhill, p. 41; Rockhill, p. 48; Rockhill, pp. 165–175; Rockhill, pp. 220–221; Rockhill, pp. 228–235; Rockhill, pp. 235–236; Rockhill, pp. 248–251; Rockhill, p. 254; Rockhill, pp. 168, 171

Letters from Khanbaliq John of Montecorvino · 8 January 1305 and February 1306 first letter (8 January 1305), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 45–51; second letter (1306), in Yule, vol. 3, pp. 55–58

Letter from Zayton Andrew of Perugia · January 1326
Yule, vol. 3, pp. 71–72; Yule's introductory notice, vol. 3, pp. 9–10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Karakorum, Beijing, Lyon

Who John of Plano Carpini, William of Rubruck, John of Montecorvino, Innocent IV
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886

The Church of the East Reaches China AD 635 739

LEADS TO

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris 1287–1288 921

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Stephen I and the Christian Kingdom of Hungary Before · AD 1000 or 1001 828

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris After · 1287–1288 921

← The Papal Inquisition Is Established Earlier · 1231
→ Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae Later · c. 1265–1273

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae

c. 1265–1273 · Estimated date

The Dominican friar Thomas Aquinas, pupil of Albert the Great and master at Paris, sets out theology in three parts, in questions and articles, drawing on Scripture, church doctors and philosophers. He stops writing at Naples in December 1273 and dies three months later.

Thomas Aquinas came of a noble family. William of Tocco, a Dominican who gathered the evidence for his canonization more than forty years after his death, tells how he was sent as a boy to study at Naples, joined the Friars Preachers there, and was seized and held by his family before they let him go back (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas chs. 5–8, 11). The order sent him to Cologne to study under Albert the Great. His fellow students, Tocco says, called the silent young man "the dumb ox", and Albert is reported to have said that his bellowing in teaching would be heard through the whole world (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas chs. 12–13). On Albert's recommendation he went to teach at Paris, where he became a master. Among his books Tocco names a Summa of theology in three parts (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas chs. 14, 16–17).

The Summa opens by asking whether any teaching is needed beyond philosophy. Thomas answers that human beings are directed to an end beyond the grasp of reason, and that even what reason can discover about God would be known only by a few, after a long time and with many errors; a teaching revealed by God was therefore necessary for salvation (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae I.1.1). Theology argues from the articles of faith and treats Scripture as its proper authority, but it also uses philosophy, because "grace does not destroy nature but perfects it" (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae I.1.8). The second question gives five ways of proving that God exists: from motion, from efficient causes, from possibility and necessity, from the degrees found in things, and from the governance of the world (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae I.2.3).

In the Third Part Thomas treats the eucharist with the word that stands in the creed of the Fourth Lateran Council (Fourth Lateran Council, constitution 1). The whole substance of the bread is changed into the whole substance of Christ's body, a change that "can be called transubstantiation", while the appearances of bread and wine remain (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae III.75.4–5).

He did not finish. Bartholomew of Capua testified in 1319 that after saying Mass at Naples Thomas wrote and dictated nothing more, leaving the Summa in the treatise on penance. Pressed by his companion Reginald, he answered that all he had written seemed to him straw beside what he had seen and what had been revealed to him (Canonization process of Thomas Aquinas (Naples, 1319), 79). Tocco has a similar story (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas ch. 47). Summoned to a council, Thomas fell ill on the road and died on 7 March 1274 (Canonization process of Thomas Aquinas (Naples, 1319), 79) (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas ch. 65). The editors of the English translation note that the missing questions were supplied afterwards from his commentary on the Sentences (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae Supplement, editors' note).

In 1879 Pope Leo XIII called Thomas "chief and master" of the scholastic doctors, recalled that the Council of Trent laid the Summa on the altar beside Scripture, and asked the Catholic bishops to restore his teaching (Leo XIII, Aeterni Patris 17, 22, 31).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The end is fixed by witnesses. Bartholomew of Capua testified in 1319 that Thomas wrote nothing after a Mass said at Naples about the feast of Saint Nicholas, 6 December, and left the Summa unfinished in its Third Part (Canonization process of Thomas Aquinas (Naples, 1319), 79). William of Tocco dates his death to 7 March 1274 (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas ch. 65), so the work was broken off in December 1273.

The sources cited here do not date the beginning; Tocco lists the Summa among the books of Thomas's years as a master and gives no year (William of Tocco, Life of Thomas Aquinas chs. 14, 16–17). Jean-Pierre Torrell, Saint Thomas Aquinas, vol. 1, The Person and His Work (1996; revised edition 2005), places the First Part in the years when Thomas taught at Rome, 1265 to 1268. The Third Part was still in hand at Naples in December 1273 (Canonization process of Thomas Aquinas (Naples, 1319), 79).

Primary sources

Life of Saint Thomas Aquinas William of Tocco · c. 1318–1323
chs. 5–8, 11; chs. 12–13; chs. 14, 16–17; ch. 47; ch. 65

Summa Theologiae Thomas Aquinas · c. 1265–1273
I.1.1; I.1.8; I.2.3; III.75.4–5; Supplement, editors' note

Constitutions of the Fourth Lateran Council The Fourth Lateran Council · November 1215
constitution 1

Canonization Process of Thomas Aquinas at Naples 21 July – 18 September 1319
79

Aeterni Patris Leo XIII · 4 August 1879
17, 22, 31

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Paris, Naples
Who Thomas Aquinas, Albert the Great Threads Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Schools Become Universities c. 1150–1215 862

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Fourth Lateran Council Before · November 1215 895

The Second Council of Lyon After · May 1274 916

← Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq Earlier · 1245–1307

→ The Second Council of Lyon Later · May 1274

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Second Council of Lyon

May 1274 · Firm date

Gregory X holds a general council at Lyon, where envoys of the Byzantine emperor Michael VIII accept the Roman faith and primacy. The council also fixes the rules of the papal conclave. After the emperor's death the Greek church repudiates the union.

Gregory X opened the council in the cathedral of Lyon in May 1274 and named three matters: help for the Holy Land, the union of the Greeks and the reform of morals (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 61–63). Before the second session he obtained from the bishops, province by province, a tenth of church revenues for six years (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 63–64).

On 24 June envoys of the Greek emperor, Michael VIII Palaiologos, arrived with letters under a golden seal and declared that they came to full obedience to the Roman church and to acknowledge its faith and primacy. On the feast of Peter and Paul the pope sang mass, Bonaventure preached, and the creed was sung in Latin and in Greek, the words "who proceeds from the Father and the Son" three times (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 64–65). At the fourth session, on 6 July, the letters of the emperor, his son and the Greek bishops were read, and an envoy, the logothete, swore on the emperor's soul to hold the faith of the Roman church. The pope intoned the Te Deum in tears (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 65–66).

The emperor's letter repeats a confession that the pope's envoys had brought him. It confesses the Holy Spirit as proceeding from the Father and the Son (Michael VIII, Profession of Faith (1274) cols 69–72), and the Roman church as holding the supreme and full primacy over the whole church, with the right to define questions of faith (Michael VIII, Profession of Faith (1274) cols 71–72). It ends with a request that the Greek church may say the creed as it did before the schism and keep its rites (Michael VIII, Profession of Faith (1274) cols 73–74).

Of the council's constitutions, the first professes that the Spirit proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son, as from one principle and by one spiration, and condemns those who deny it or who say that the Spirit proceeds as from two principles (Second Council of Lyon, constitution 1 (Fideli ac devota)). The second orders that ten days after a pope's death the cardinals be shut in one room; if they have not chosen within three days they are to have one dish at each meal, and after five more only bread, wine and water. It leaves in force what Alexander III had laid down for papal elections (Third Lateran Council) (Second Council of Lyon, constitution 2 (Ubi periculum)). Bonaventure died at Lyon on 15 July, two days before the council closed (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 67–68).

The Greek historian Pachymeres tells how the union was made at home. The emperor argued to his clergy that it came to three things, the pope's primacy, appeal to him and his commemoration in the liturgy, each empty in practice; some answered that the third could not be granted to men who had tampered with the creed (Pachymeres, History, Michael 5.18, pp. 386–390). He swore in a sealed document that no one would be made to add an iota to the creed, and exiled those who would not sign (Pachymeres, History, Michael 5.20, p. 395). When the envoys returned the bishops declared the patriarch's see vacant, since he had sworn never to accept the peace, and the pope was named in the liturgy (Pachymeres, History, Michael 5.21–22, pp. 398–399). After Michael's death his son Andronikos asked pardon of the union's opponents, and they had the great church purified and the unionist clergy punished (Pachymeres, History, Andronikos 1.2–7, pp. 14–22). A statement of faith issued under the patriarch Gregory of Cyprus rejected the peace lately made, as having brought enmity with God and, under the pretence of accommodation, torn the church apart (Tomos of 1285 cols 235–236). It taught that the Father is the only source and only cause of the Godhead and that the Spirit has existence from the Father; "through the Son", where saints say it, means the Spirit's eternal manifestation, not its coming into being (Tomos of 1285 cols 241–242).

The First Vatican Council quoted the profession's words on the Roman primacy as what the Greeks professed "with the approval of the Second Council of Lyons" (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus chapter 4). A joint Orthodox and Catholic statement of 2003 says that the union was never received by the clergy and faithful of the East, and recommends that the Catholic Church declare the condemnation of 1274 no longer applicable (Orthodox–Catholic Consultation, The Filioque (2003) II. Historical Considerations; IV. Recommendations).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The contemporary record of the council gives its days. It dates the first session to Monday 7 May 1274, the pope having ordered a three-day fast on the second of the month (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 61–63). The second session was on 18 May (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 63–64), the fourth on Friday 6 July, the octave of Peter and Paul (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 65–66), and the fifth and last on 16 and 17 July (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 67–68). The record puts the third session on 7 June (Second Council of Lyon, Brief Record (Brevis nota) cols 63–64). The introduction printed with the constitutions in N. P. Tanner (ed.), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils (1990), lists six sessions, on 7 and 18 May, 4 or 7 June, and 6, 16 and 17 July 1274 (Second Council of Lyon, introduction).

Primary sources

Brief Record of the Second Council of Lyon AD 1274
cols 61–63; cols 63–64; cols 64–65; cols 65–66; cols 67–68

Letter and Profession of Faith to Gregory X Michael VIII Palaiologos · AD 1274
cols 69–72; cols 71–72; cols 73–74

Constitutions of the Second Council of Lyon The Second Council of Lyon · May–July 1274; promulgated 1 November 1274
constitution 1 (Fideli ac devota); constitution 2 (Ubi periculum); introduction

History George Pachymeres · c. AD 1308
Michael 5.18, pp. 386–390; Michael 5.20, p. 395; Michael 5.21–22, pp. 398–399; Andronikos 1.2–7, pp. 14–22

Tomos of the Synod of Blachernae (1285) Gregory II of Cyprus, patriarch of Constantinople, and his synod · AD 1285 cols 235–236; cols 241–242

Pastor Aeternus The First Vatican Council · 18 July 1870
chapter 4

The Filioque: A Church-Dividing Issue? North American Orthodox-Catholic Theological Consultation · 25 October 2003
II. Historical Considerations; IV. Recommendations

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Lyon
Who Gregory X, Michael VIII Palaiologos, Bonaventure
Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882

The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

LEADS TO

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae Before · c. 1265–1273 912

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils After · 1341–1351 937

EAST AND WEST

The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople Before · April 1204 882

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris After · 1287–1288 921

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Fourth Lateran Council Before · November 1215 895

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam After · 18 November 1302 925

← Thomas Aquinas Writes the Summa Theologiae Earlier · c. 1265–1273
→ Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris Later · 1287–1288

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris

1287–1288 · Firm date

Rabban Sauma, a monk of the Church of the East born in Khanbaliq, comes west as envoy of the Mongol king Arghun. He recites his creed to the cardinals in Rome, meets the kings of France and England, and in 1288 receives communion from Pope Nicholas IV.

The story is told in a Syriac history from the Church of the East, written, in its translator's judgment, probably in the first half of the fourteenth century (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, Budge's introduction, p. 5). Its author says that he has abridged what Rabban Sauma "himself wrote in his narrative in Persian" (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, p. 197)).

According to the History, Sauma was born to Christian parents in Khanbaliq, which its translator identifies as Peking, and became a monk and hermit. With his disciple Mark he set out for Jerusalem (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, chs. 1–3 (Budge, pp. 124–135)). They had passed through Armenia and were making for Georgia when they heard that the road was cut, and they turned back (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, chs. 3–4 (Budge, pp. 145–146)). In 1281 the bishops at Baghdad chose Mark, by then a metropolitan with the name Yahballaha, as catholicos, the head of their church; the History gives as the reason that the Mongols ruled and he knew their customs and language (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 5 (Budge, pp. 151–156)). The Mongol king Arghun wished to take Palestine and Syria and wanted the help of the Christian kings of the West. He asked the catholicos for an envoy, and Rabban Sauma was sent with letters and gifts (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 165–167)).

He travelled by Constantinople and Naples to Rome, where the pope had died and twelve cardinals were governing (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 167–173)). They asked which apostle had taught his people and what he believed. Thomas, Addai and Mari, he said; no one had come to the East from the pope (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 173–174)). He then recited his creed: one God in three persons, the Father begetting, the Son begotten, the Spirit proceeding; and in Christ perfect God and perfect man, with "two Natures" and, as the translator renders the Syriac word qnome (his ḳĕnômîn), "two Persons", in one parsopa (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, p. 175)). On the Spirit the two sides differed. Sauma held that the Father is the cause both of the Son and of the Spirit, and that the Son is not the cause of the Spirit; the cardinals said they confessed that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. He answered that he had come not to dispute but to be blessed by the pope and to deliver his message (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 175–178)).

With no pope to answer him he went on to Paris, where the king of France showed him the Crown of Thorns (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 182–185)), and to the king of England, who received the Eucharist from his hands (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 185–187)). After a winter at Genoa he was called back to Rome. The new pope, Nicholas, was, he was told, the bishop who had talked with him on his first visit. Sauma celebrated his own liturgy before a crowd, who said, the History reports, "The language is different, but the use is the same", and on Palm Sunday Nicholas IV gave him communion (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 187–192)).

The History says that the pope sent Yahballaha a crown, vestments, a ring and a bull giving him patriarchal authority over all the "Children of the East" (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 195–196)). The pope's own letter addresses Yahballaha as a bishop "in the parts of the East". It thanks him for his kindness to the Franciscans and sends a profession of faith for him to teach, which states that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son and that the Roman church holds the primacy over the whole Catholic Church (Nicholas IV, letter to Yahballaha, 7 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 195–199)). To Arghun the pope wrote that he should be baptised at once and not wait for Jerusalem to be freed (Nicholas IV, letter to Arghun, 2 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 200–203)). Sauma returned to Arghun, who set up a church at the door of his camp and put him in charge of it (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, chs. 7–8 (Budge, pp. 196–199)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Chapter 7 of the History, which tells of the embassy, names no year. The next chapter opens in a year of the Greeks that its translator, E. A. Wallis Budge, corrects to 1600, AD 1288, after the envoy's return (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 8 (Budge, p. 198)). For the sea battle that Rabban Sauma watched from a roof at Naples, Budge cites J.-B. Chabot (Histoire de Mar Jabalaha III, 1895), who dates it to 24 June 1287 (History of Mar Yahballaha and Rabban Sauma, ch. 7 (Budge, p. 171, with his note)). The pope's letters carried home by the envoys are dated at Saint Peter's on 2 and 7 April in his first year, which is 1288 (Nicholas IV, letter to Arghun, 2 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 200–203)) (Nicholas IV, letter to Yahballaha, 7 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 195–199)).

Primary sources

History of Mar Yahballaha III and of Rabban Sauma After 1317
Budge's introduction, p. 5; ch. 7 (Budge, p. 197); chs. 1–3 (Budge, pp. 124–135); chs. 3–4 (Budge, pp. 145–146); ch. 5 (Budge, pp. 151–156); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 165–167); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 167–173); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 173–174); ch. 7 (Budge, p. 175); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 175–178); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 182–185); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 185–187); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 187–192); ch. 7 (Budge, pp. 195–196); chs. 7–8 (Budge, pp. 196–199); ch. 8 (Budge, p. 198); ch. 7 (Budge, p. 171, with his note)

Letters to the Mongol Court and to Yahballaha III Nicholas IV · 2–7 April 1288 to Yahballaha, 7 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 195–199); to Arghun, 2 April 1288 (Chabot, pp. 200–203)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Paris, Beijing
Who Rabban Sauma, Yahballaha III, Nicholas IV
Threads East and West, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Church of the East Reaches China AD 635 739

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq 1245–1307 907

EAST AND WEST

The Second Council of Lyon Before · May 1274 916

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils After · 1341–1351 937

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq Before · 1245–1307 907

The King of Kongo Is Baptised After · 3 May 1491 992

← The Second Council of Lyon Earlier · May 1274
→ Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam Later · 18 November 1302

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam

18 November 1302 · Firm date

In his conflict with Philip IV of France, Pope Boniface VIII declares that the church has one head, that the temporal sword is subject to the spiritual, and that it is necessary for salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff.

In 1296 Boniface VIII forbade clergy, in the bull Clericis laicos, to pay any tax to lay rulers without the pope's leave, and excommunicated rulers who levied one. The bull names no ruler (Boniface VIII, Clericis laicos). The Florentine chronicler Giovanni Villani, a contemporary, tells how strife arose between the pope and Philip IV of France: the king arrested a bishop, took the revenues of vacant sees, and forbade the French prelates to answer the pope's summons; the pope's letters were thrown on the fire at the king's court (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.62).

On 18 November 1302, at the Lateran in Rome, Boniface issued a short doctrinal bull (Boniface VIII, Unam sanctam Latin text, dating clause). It names no king.

There is, it says, one holy catholic and apostolic church, outside which there is neither salvation nor remission of sins. This one body has one head, Christ and his vicar, Peter and Peter's successor; Greeks or others who say they were not committed to Peter are not of Christ's sheep. Two swords are in the power of the church. The spiritual is wielded by the church, the temporal for the church, "by the hand of kings and knights, but at the will and sufferance of the priest". The spiritual power establishes the earthly and judges it, and the highest spiritual power is judged by God alone. The bull ends:

> Indeed we declare, announce and define, that it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff. (Boniface VIII, Unam sanctam pp. 435–437)

Villani tells also of an assembly at Paris at which the king had the pope charged with heresy and other crimes (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.62), and reports that in September 1303 the king's agent William of Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna seized Boniface at Anagni. The townspeople freed him after three days; he died in Rome on 12 October (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.63).

The meaning and reach of the bull have been argued over since. In 1306 Clement V declared that it brought no prejudice to the king and kingdom of France, who were no more subject to the church than before (Clement V, Meruit). The Fifth Lateran Council renewed it in 1516, speaking of subjection to the pope as necessary for "all Christ's faithful" and saving Clement's declaration (Fifth Lateran Council, session 11 On the abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction). The Lutheran confessors of 1537 called the constitution of Boniface false and godless for making the pope ruler of kingdoms by divine right (Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope 33). Among Catholics, Archbishop Manning argued in 1875 that the bull claims only a spiritual power that touches rulers indirectly, against the reading, which he ascribes to Bossuet, that it claimed temporal supremacy and had been withdrawn (Manning, The Vatican Decrees pp. 57–70). The Catechism of 1992 explains that the saying "outside the Church there is no salvation" is not directed at people who, without fault of their own, do not know Christ and his church (Catechism of the Catholic Church 846–847).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Latin text ends “given at the Lateran on the fourteenth day before the kalends of December, in the eighth year of our pontificate”, which is 18 November 1302 (Boniface VIII, Unam sanctam Latin text, dating clause). Henderson’s English translation prints the date as “Nov. 14”, a slip in converting the Roman date (Boniface VIII, Unam sanctam pp. 435–437).

Primary sources

Clericis laicos Boniface VIII · 25 February 1296
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

New Chronicle (Nuova Cronica) Giovanni Villani · Begun in 1300
8.62; 8.63

Unam sanctam Boniface VIII · 18 November 1302
Latin text, dating clause; pp. 435–437

Meruit Clement V · 1 February 1306
archive.org

Fifth Lateran Council, Session 11: On the Abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction Leo X, with the approval of the Fifth Lateran Council · 19 December 1516
On the abrogation of the Pragmatic Sanction

Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope Philip Melanchthon; subscribed by the theologians assembled at Smalcald · February 1537
33

The Vatican Decrees in Their Bearing on Civil Allegiance Henry Edward Manning · 1875
pp. 57–70

Catechism of the Catholic Church 1992
846–847

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Boniface VIII, Philip IV of France
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Concordat of Worms 23 September 1122 858
The Fourth Lateran Council November 1215 895

LEADS TO

The Popes at Avignon 1309–1377 929
The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Second Council of Lyon Before · May 1274 916
The Popes at Avignon After · 1309–1377 929

CHURCH AND STATE

The Papal Inquisition Is Established Before · 1231 903
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel After · 1419–1436 964

← Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris Earlier · 1287–1288
→ The Popes at Avignon Later · 1309–1377

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Popes at Avignon

1309–1377 · Estimated date

After the election of a Gascon pope in 1305 the papal court settles at Avignon on the Rhône and stays for some seventy years. Petrarch calls it Babylon; Catherine of Siena urges Gregory XI to come home, and he returns to Rome in 1377.

Boniface VIII (see Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam) was followed by Benedict XI, who died at Perugia in July 1304. The cardinals, shut up there for more than nine months and divided into two parties, agreed to choose a man from beyond the Alps. In June 1305 they elected the archbishop of Bordeaux, who became Clement V. The Florentine chronicler Giovanni Villani tells, as a thing done in secret, that Philip IV of France had met the archbishop beforehand and exacted promises. By this election, Villani writes, “the papacy reverted to foreigners, and the court went beyond the mountains” (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.80).

Villani speaks of the pope's court at Avignon from 1308 (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.101–102) (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 9.8). Clement died in 1314 on the road to Bordeaux; Villani, no friend of the Gascon pope, calls him greedy for money and a simoniac (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 9.59). His successor John XXII, elected in 1316 after a vacancy of two years, had been bishop of Avignon (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 9.81).

The poet Petrarch, living there, called the city "the Babylon of the West". "Here reign the successors of the poor fishermen of Galilee," he wrote; "they have strangely forgotten their origin." He described men loaded with gold and clad in purple, palaces and fortified heights, and parchments turned by a leaden seal into nets to catch Christians (Petrarch, Letters without a Name letter 5).

Catherine of Siena, a Dominican tertiary (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of Catherine's life), wrote to Gregory XI in a different tone, as a daughter to a father. "Come, come, and resist no more the will of God that calls you," she wrote; the vicar of Christ should rest in his own place, the seat of Peter (Catherine of Siena, Letters To Gregory XI ("Come, come")). "Be manly in my sight, and not timorous." He should return, raise the standard of the cross and give the church good priests (Catherine of Siena, Letters To Gregory XI ("Be manly")). "Up, father, like a man!" (Catherine of Siena, Letters To Gregory XI ("Up, father")). In 1376 Florence, then at war with the pope, sent her to Avignon as its envoy (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of Catherine's life) (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of public events, 1376–1378).

Gregory returned to Italy and entered Rome in January 1377. He died in March 1378, and by September of that year the cardinals had declared the election of his successor invalid and chosen another pope (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of public events, 1376–1378); see the Great Western Schism.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The sources cited here do not give the day the court arrived. Giovanni Villani has the pope's court at Avignon when Henry of Luxemburg sought confirmation of his election, which he puts in 1308 (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 8.101–102), and again in 1310 (Giovanni Villani, Chronicle 9.8). The opening year 1309 is the one usual in modern accounts for Clement V's arrival and is kept from the outline; this entry has not traced it to a primary document, so the date is marked as estimated.

For the end, Vida Scudder's edition of Catherine's letters (1905) dates Catherine's arrival at Avignon to 18 June 1376 and Gregory XI's entry into Rome to 17 January 1377 (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of Catherine's life) (Catherine of Siena, Letters editor's table of public events, 1376–1378).

Primary sources

New Chronicle (Nuova Cronica) Giovanni Villani · Begun in 1300
8.80; 8.101–102; 9.8; 9.59; 9.81

Letters without a Name (Liber sine nomine) Petrarch · c. 1340–1353 letter 5

Letters Catherine of Siena · c. 1376–1378 (the letters cited)
editor's table of Catherine's life; To Gregory XI ("Come, come"); To Gregory XI ("Be manly"); To Gregory XI ("Up, father"); editor's table of public events, 1376–1378

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Avignon, Rome
Who Clement V, Gregory XI, Catherine of Siena
Threads Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam 18 November 1302 925

LEADS TO

The Black Death 1347–1351 941
The Great Western Schism 1378–1417 946
Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam Before · 18 November 1302 925
The Great Western Schism After · 1378–1417 946

← Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam Earlier · 18 November 1302
→ Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery Later · c. 1337–1345

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery

c. 1337–1345 · Estimated date

A young man from a ruined Rostov family settles in the forest near Radonezh and builds a small church of the Trinity. The community that gathers round him adopts the common life and grows into the Trinity-Sergius Lavra.

What is known of Sergius comes almost wholly from his Life. Its editors explain that Epiphanius the Wise, a monk of his monastery, wrote it in 1417–1418, twenty-six years after Sergius died, and that it survives in a revision made a generation later by Pachomius the Serb (Life of Sergius of Radonezh editors' introduction). It is a saint's life, and what follows is its account.

The Life says that Sergius of Radonezh was born to Cyril, a boyar of the Rostov region, and his wife Maria, and was baptized Bartholomew (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 2) (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 5). Tatar raids and tributes, and then the harsh rule of Moscow's officers in Rostov, ruined the family, which moved to the village of Radonezh. When his parents had died, Bartholomew persuaded his elder brother Stephen, already a monk, to seek a solitary place with him. Deep in the forest, by a spring, they built a hut, a cell and a small wooden church, and had it consecrated in the name of the Holy Trinity with the blessing of Metropolitan Theognostus. Stephen found the life too hard and left for a monastery in Moscow (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 5).

Bartholomew stayed alone. An abbot named Mitrofan tonsured him on 7 October, the feast of the martyrs Sergius and Bacchus, and gave him the name Sergius. He was twenty-three. The Life tells of his solitude among wolves and bears (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 6). Then others came to live near him, at first no more than twelve. At their urging he was ordained priest and made abbot by Bishop Athanasius at Pereyaslavl (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 7).

Envoys later brought a cross and a letter from Patriarch Philotheos of Constantinople, who advised him to establish the common life. With the agreement of Metropolitan Alexis, Sergius did so: he assigned the monks their duties and ordered that no one call anything his own (Life of Sergius of Radonezh chs. 15–16).

The Life reports that Grand Prince Dmitry came for his blessing before marching against the Tatar ruler Mamai, and that Sergius foretold the victory (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 22). It says that Metropolitan Alexis wished to make him his successor and that Sergius refused (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 25). He died on 25 September 1392 (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 32).

The Life says that he founded many other monasteries besides his own, and it names several begun by his disciples (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 7) (Life of Sergius of Radonezh chs. 17, 19–20). His own house, at what is now Sergiyev Posad, became the Trinity-Sergius Lavra; the editors of the Life give 1452 as the year of his canonization (Life of Sergius of Radonezh editors' introduction).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The Life gives no year for the founding, and its own indications do not agree. It says the church of the Trinity was consecrated under Grand Prince Simeon Ivanovich, and its author adds that he thinks this was at the beginning of the reign (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 5); the editors' note gives his reign as 1340–1353. It says Sergius was twenty-three when he was tonsured there (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 6) and seventy-eight when he died in the year 6900, that is 1392 (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 32). Counting back from the death gives a birth in 1314 and a tonsure about 1337, the year kept here from the outline.

But the Life also places his birth at the coming of the host of Akhmyl (Life of Sergius of Radonezh ch. 2), which the editors date to 1322; that gives a tonsure about 1345 and fits the reign of Simeon. The editors remark that the age of seventy-eight "raises doubts". The founding therefore falls between about 1337 and 1345, with the later years better supported by the Life's references to rulers.

Primary sources

Life of Sergius of Radonezh Epiphanius the Wise; reworked by Pachomius the Serb · 1417–1418; reworked c. 1440–1459 editors' introduction; ch. 2; ch. 5; ch. 6; ch. 7; chs. 15–16; ch. 22; ch. 25; ch. 32; ch. 7; chs. 17, 19–20

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Sergiyev Posad
Who Sergius of Radonezh
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Baptism of Rus' AD 988/989 821
The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos AD 963–972 814

LEADS TO

Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska 24 September 1794 1265

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers Before · 22 December 1216 899
Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils After · 1341–1351 937

← The Popes at Avignon Earlier · 1309–1377
→ Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils Later · 1341–1351

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils

1341–1351 · Firm date

Councils at Constantinople in 1341 and 1351 uphold the monk Gregory Palamas against Barlaam. God's essence is beyond reach, they teach, but his uncreated energies, seen as the light of Tabor, are shared by the saints. The Orthodox Church holds this teaching as its own.

Monks who followed the "life of stillness", in Greek hesychia, repeated continually the prayer "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me" and taught that the pure in heart receive a divine illumination (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§2–3) (Synodal Tome of 1341 §47). Barlaam of Calabria, a monk from Calabria versed in secular philosophy, attacked them in writing (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§2–3). According to the tome of the council that judged him, he ridiculed their breathing exercises and charged them with claiming to share in God's very essence; when they answered that they shared not in the essence but in the uncreated grace of the Spirit, he accused them of believing in two gods (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§2–3) (Synodal Tome of 1341 §47).

Gregory Palamas, a priest-monk whom the monks of Mount Athos call their brother, answered in the treatises known as the Triads (Hagioretic Tome closing declaration and signatures (PG 150, cols 1235–1236)). He defended beginners who control their breathing in order to gather the mind into the heart (Palamas, Triads 1.2.1 and following). He argued that the light which shone from Christ at the Transfiguration (Matthew 17:1–2), the light of Tabor as he calls it, was no created symbol but the light of the Godhead itself (Palamas, Triads 3.1.9 and following). And he drew a distinction: God's essence is beyond all sharing, while his energies, such as his providence, his will and the grace that deifies, are uncreated, and God is wholly present in each of them (Palamas, Triads 3.2.5 and following). The leading monks of Athos signed a declaration that this teaching agreed with the tradition of the saints (Hagioretic Tome closing declaration and signatures (PG 150, cols 1235–1236)).

In 1341 a council met in Hagia Sophia in Constantinople in the presence of the emperor (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§5, 51–53), whom the later tome names as Andronikos Palaiologos (Synodal Tome of 1351 §46). It found that Barlaam had spoken "blasphemously and heretically" about the light of Tabor and about the prayer, and ruled that he must repent or be cut off from the church; Patriarch John signed the tome that August and forbade further argument (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§5, 51–53).

The argument went on. The tome of 1351 relates that Akindynos took up Barlaam's charges and that some bishops still opposed Palamas. In that year the emperor John Kantakouzenos presided over a council in the Blachernae palace at which Palamas, by now metropolitan of Thessalonica, answered his critics (Synodal Tome of 1351 §§2–6). The council held that the Fathers distinguish God's essence from his energy, that the energy is uncreated, that this puts no composition in God, and that creatures partake of the energy and not of the essence. It declared the light of the Transfiguration uncreated yet not the essence of God, placed Barlaam and Akindynos under anathema, and named Palamas a defender of the faith (Synodal Tome of 1351 §§18–19, 30–40, 46, 51).

The Orthodox Church receives these councils: the encyclical of the Holy and Great Council held on Crete in 2016 lists the councils of 1341, 1351 and 1368 among those "of universal authority" (Holy and Great Council, Encyclical I.3).

Latin theology spoke differently. Thomas Aquinas had taught that God's action and power are not distinct from his essence (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae I.25.1, reply to objection 2), and in 1336 Pope Benedict XII had defined that the blessed see the divine essence itself, face to face (Benedict XII, Benedictus Deus). In 1910 the article on hesychasm in the Catholic Encyclopedia called the distinction "fundamentally opposed" to the scholastic idea of God (Fortescue, Hesychasm (Catholic Encyclopedia, 1910)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The tome of the first council is dated August of the ninth indiction, the Byzantine year that ended on 31 August 1341 (Synodal Tome of 1341 §§5, 51–53). The translation of the tome of 1351 used here carries no date in its text; the year is the one given in the list of these councils in the encyclical of the Orthodox council of 2016 (Holy and Great Council, Encyclical I.3).

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 17:1–2

The Synodal Tome of 1341 The synod of Constantinople under Patriarch John · August 1341

§§2–3; §47; §§5, 51–53

The Hagioretic Tome Gregory Palamas, with the signatures of the monks of Mount Athos · c. 1340 closing declaration and signatures (PG 150, cols 1235–1236)

Triads in Defence of the Holy Hesychasts Gregory Palamas · c. 1338–1341

1.2.1 and following; 3.1.9 and following; 3.2.5 and following

The Synodal Tome of 1351 The synod of Constantinople under Patriarch Kallistos · 1351

§46; §§2–6; §§18–19, 30–40, 46, 51

Encyclical of the Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church · Pentecost 2016

I.3

Summa Theologiae Thomas Aquinas · c. 1265–1273
I.25.1, reply to objection 2

Benedictus Deus Pope Benedict XII · 1336
papalencyclicals.net

Hesychasm (The Catholic Encyclopedia, 1910) Adrian Fortescue · 1910
newadvent.org

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Mount Athos, Thessalonica
Who Gregory Palamas, Barlaam of Calabria
Threads Creeds and Councils, Monasticism and Religious Life, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Lavra and the Monastic Republic of Athos AD 963–972 814

LEADS TO

The Philokalia Is Published 1782 1241

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Second Council of Lyon Before · May 1274 916
The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus After · 1414–1418 959

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery Before · c. 1337–1345 933
The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ After · 1384–1441 954

EAST AND WEST

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris Before · 1287–1288 921
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion After · 6 July 1439 974

← Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery Earlier · c. 1337–1345
→ The Black Death Later · 1347–1351

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Black Death

1347–1351 · Estimated date

Plague spreads through Europe, reaching Florence, Avignon and Paris in 1348. Priests and friars die with the rest or flee. Jews are accused of poisoning the wells and burned, though Pope Clement VI calls the charge false. In 1349 he bans the flagellants.

Giovanni Boccaccio opens his Decameron with the plague at Florence. It had begun, he says, some years before in the East, and its effects showed in the city in the spring of 1348: swellings in the groin or the armpits, then dark spots, and death for almost all within three days. The authority of laws "human and divine" all but dissolved, because those who should have enforced them were dead or sick (Boccaccio, Decameron, Day 1, introduction). A few priests hurried the dead to the nearest church, and when the churchyards were full the bodies were laid in trenches by the hundred. It was believed, he writes, that more than a hundred thousand people died within the walls between March and July (Boccaccio, Decameron, Day 1, introduction (the burials and the number of the dead)).

A friar of Paris, whom his editor identifies as a Carmelite, writing of 1348 and 1349, says that in many towns timid priests withdrew and left the sacraments to bolder members of religious orders, and that the sisters of the Hôtel-Dieu nursed the sick without fear of death and died in great numbers. No one, he says, died without confession and the last sacrament, and Clement VI gave the dying in many cities absolution from guilt and penalty through their confessors (Jean de Venette, Chronicle, 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 211–213)). The English chronicler Henry Knighton, a generation later, records the same grant, and adds that the bishop of Lincoln gave every priest power to hear confessions (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, p. 61).

The pope's court was at Avignon. A Life of Clement, quoted by the seventeenth-century annalist Raynaldus, says that he appointed physicians to visit the poor there and bought a field to be consecrated as a burial ground (Raynaldus, Annales ecclesiastici, 1348, §32 (vol. 25, p. 454), quoting a Life of Clement VI). Knighton passes on figures that reached England: 1,312 dead at Avignon in a single day by a count made before the pope; seven friars left of 140 at Montpellier; not one of 150 Franciscans at Marseilles (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 58–59). In England, he writes, priests became so few that many churches had no services, and widowers crowded into holy orders, many of them barely able to read (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, p. 63).

The Paris friar reports that people blamed infected air and water, that the Jews were accused of poisoning the wells, and that in Germany and elsewhere many thousands of them were slaughtered and burned. He himself doubts that poison could have done so much (Jean de Venette, Chronicle, 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 213–214)). On 4 July 1348 Clement forbade any Christian to force Jews to baptism, or to wound, kill or rob them without the judgment of the lord of the place (Clement VI, bull of 4 July 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33)). On 26 September he wrote again. Christians, led astray by the devil, were blaming the plague on poisoning by the Jews and had killed some of them without regard for age or sex, though the Jews were ready to answer before a judge. He would have any who were guilty punished; but the charge was not credible, he said, because the plague struck Jews too, and peoples among whom no Jews lived. The annalist who prints the letter adds that bishops were to forbid such violence under pain of excommunication (Clement VI, bull of 26 September 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33)).

The killing went on. At Strasbourg, says the city's chronicler Jacob of Königshofen, the Jews were burned on a wooden platform in their cemetery on 14 February 1349, about two thousand of them. Those who accepted baptism were spared, the debts owed to them were cancelled, and their money, he remarks, was what killed them (Königshofen, Chronicle, on the plague and the burning of the Jews, 1349).

In 1349, the Paris friar continues, bands of men from Germany, Flanders, Hainaut and Lorraine went from town to town stripped to their breeches, scourging themselves with spiked whips until the blood ran (Jean de Venette, Chronicle, 1349 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 216–218)). On 20 October Clement ordered the bishops to suppress these "Flagellants". They held the keys of the church cheap, he wrote, formed societies and wore a habit without leave, and many of them had shed the blood of Jews and of Christians. Penance done privately, without such societies, he did not forbid (Clement VI, Inter sollicitudines, Raynaldus, 1349, §§20–22).

When the plague had passed, the friar wrote, the world was not changed for the better: people were more grasping and quarrelsome than before, and few could be found to teach children their letters (Jean de Venette, Chronicle, 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 215–216)).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The years 1347 to 1351 are those usual in modern accounts for the passage of the plague across Europe and are kept from the outline; this entry has not traced the first and last of them to a primary document, so the date is marked as estimated. The sources cited fix the middle of the span. Boccaccio puts the outbreak at Florence in the spring of 1348 and says that the plague had begun some years earlier in the East (Boccaccio, Decameron, Day 1, introduction). The Paris chronicler dates the mortality in France to 1348 and 1349 (Jean de Venette, Chronicle, 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 211–213)). The pope's letters on the Jews are dated at Avignon on 4 July and 26 September in his seventh year, 1348 (Clement VI, bull of 4 July 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33)) (Clement VI, bull of 26 September 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33)), and his letter against the flagellants on 20 October in his eighth year, 1349 (Clement VI, Inter sollicitudines, Raynaldus, 1349, §§20–22). The burning at Strasbourg is dated to Saint Valentine's day, 14 February 1349 (Königshofen, Chronicle, on the plague and the burning of the Jews, 1349).

Primary sources

The Decameron Giovanni Boccaccio · Soon after 1348
Day 1, introduction; Day 1, introduction (the burials and the number of the dead)

Chronicle (second continuation of the chronicle of Guillaume de Nangis) Jean de Venette (attributed) · Mid-fourteenth century, ending in 1368
1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 211–213); 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 213–214); 1349 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 216–218); 1348 (Géraud, vol. 2, pp. 215–216)

Chronicle Henry Knighton · late fourteenth century
vol. 2, p. 61; vol. 2, pp. 58–59; vol. 2, p. 63

Annales ecclesiastici (continuation from 1198) Odorico Raynaldi · Mid-seventeenth century
1348, §32 (vol. 25, p. 454), quoting a Life of Clement VI

Bulls of 1348 Protecting the Jews Clement VI · 4 July and 26 September 1348 bull of 4 July 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33); bull of 26 September 1348 (Raynaldus, 1348, §33)

German Chronicle of Strasbourg Jacob of Königshofen · Late fourteenth and early fifteenth century on the plague and the burning of the Jews, 1349

Inter sollicitudines (letter against the flagellants) Clement VI · 20 October 1349
Raynaldus, 1349, §§20–22

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Avignon, Strasbourg, Florence
Who Clement VI
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Popes at Avignon 1309–1377 929

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Papal Inquisition Is Established Before · 1231 903

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus After · 1414–1418 959

← Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils Earlier · 1341–1351

→ The Great Western Schism Later · 1378–1417

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Great Western Schism

1378–1417 · Firm date

The cardinals who elect Urban VI at Rome in 1378 declare the election forced and set up Clement VII. For nearly forty years two and then three lines of popes divide Latin Christendom, until at Constance two are deposed, one resigns and Martin V is elected.

Gregory XI died at Rome in March 1378, and the cardinals met in conclave in the palace where he had died. They chose Bartholomew, archbishop of Bari, who took the name Urban VI, and in a letter of 8 May they announced that they had elected him freely and unanimously and had crowned him at Easter in St Peter's (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 128–129).

In August cardinals who had elected him declared the election void. Armed Romans, they now said, had surrounded and entered the palace and threatened to kill them unless they chose a Roman or an Italian, and they had named the archbishop out of fear (Declaration of the Cardinals (1378)). Catherine of Siena wrote to three Italian cardinals that this was false: they had chosen Urban canonically, done him reverence and asked favours of him, and had now made an antipope (Catherine of Siena, Letters To Three Italian Cardinals). The English chronicler Knighton records that the cardinals who left Urban went to Avignon and set up Robert of Geneva as Pope Clement, the Clement VII of the Avignon line, and that kings and kingdoms adhered some to one pope and some to the other (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, p. 129).

Each line continued. Asked by the king of France for a remedy, the University of Paris proposed three: that both claimants resign, that they accept arbitration, or that a general council decide (University of Paris, On Ending the Schism). In 1409 the cardinals called a council at Pisa, which declared that their united college had the right to summon it and cited both claimants to hear its judgment (Council of Pisa (1409)). The modern editor of the decrees of Constance says that Pisa elected Alexander V as a third pope (Council of Constance, editor's introduction); his successor John XXIII names him as his predecessor (Council of Constance, session 1). Neither of the older claimants gave way, so that the Council of Constance had three to deal with: John XXIII, Gregory XII of the Roman line and Benedict XIII of the Avignon line (Council of Constance, session 12).

Constance, summoned by John XXIII, deposed him on 29 May 1415 after he had fled the city (Council of Constance, session 12). On 4 July it accepted the resignation of Gregory XII, made through his proxy Carlo Malatesta, having first allowed itself to be convoked afresh in Gregory's name (Council of Constance, session 14). On 26 July 1417 it deposed Benedict XIII (Council of Constance, session 37). On 11 November Cardinal Oddo Colonna was elected and took the name Martin V (Council of Constance, session 41 (editor's summary)).

The schism was ended by a council that had judged popes. What that implied for the authority of councils and popes is taken up in the Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The cardinals' own letter puts the election of Urban VI in April 1378 and is dated 8 May (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 128–129); their declaration against him followed in August (Declaration of the Cardinals (1378)). The schism is counted as ended with the election of Martin V on 11 November 1417 (Council of Constance, session 41 (editor's summary)) (Council of Constance, editor's introduction).

Primary sources

Chronicle Henry Knighton · late fourteenth century
vol. 2, pp. 128–129; vol. 2, p. 129

Declaration of the Cardinals against Urban VI The cardinals who had elected Urban VI · August 1378
gutenberg.org

Letters Catherine of Siena · c. 1376–1378 (the letters cited)
To Three Italian Cardinals

Letter of the University of Paris on Ending the Schism The University of Paris · 1393, as dated in the source book
gutenberg.org

Decrees of the Council of Pisa The Council of Pisa · 1409
gutenberg.org

Decrees of the Council of Constance The Council of Constance · 1414–1418
editor's introduction; session 1; session 12; session 14; session 37; session 41 (editor's summary)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Avignon, Pisa
Who Urban VI, Clement VII (Avignon), Martin V
Threads Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Popes at Avignon 1309–1377 929

LEADS TO

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959

The Trial of Joan of Arc 30 May 1431 969

Benedict XVI Resigns and Francis Is Elected 11 February 2013 1484

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Popes at Avignon Before · 1309–1377 929

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus After · 1414–1418 959

← The Black Death Earlier · 1347–1351
→ Wycliffe and the First English Bible Later · c. 1382

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Wycliffe and the First English Bible

c. 1382 · Estimated date

The teaching of the Oxford theologian John Wycliffe is condemned at London in 1382. A hostile chronicler says that he put the Gospel into English; the whole Bible is translated in those decades, and a constitution of 1409 forbids such versions without a bishop's approval.

John Wycliffe taught theology at Oxford and held the parish of Lutterworth (Gregory XI, Bull to Oxford (1377)). In 1377 Gregory XI wrote to the university that this "Professor of the Sacred Scriptures" was preaching errors that struck at the whole state of the church, and ordered his arrest (Gregory XI, Bull to Oxford (1377)). In May 1382 Archbishop William of Canterbury called bishops and doctors of theology and law to the house of the Friars Preachers in London, and they condemned a list of conclusions taken from his teaching (Fasciculi Zizaniorum p. 272). The twenty-four conclusions hold that the substance of bread and wine remains after the consecration, deny that a bishop or priest in mortal sin can ordain, consecrate or baptise, and attack church endowments and the friars. None of them concerns the translation of the Bible (Blackfriars Council (1382)).

It is a hostile chronicler who connects Wycliffe with the English Scriptures. Henry Knighton, writing under the year 1382, says that Master John Wycliffe translated the Gospel from Latin into English, so that it became common and more open to laymen, and to women who could read, than it had been to learned clerks; the pearl of the Gospel, he complains, was scattered and trodden by swine (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 151–152).

The translators' own voice is heard in the prologue attached to the English Bible. Its writer does not give his name. "A symple creature hath translatid the bible out of Latyn into English," he says, and he describes the work: collecting old Latin Bibles and commentaries to establish a sound text, studying it with the gloss, consulting grammarians and theologians on hard words, and translating by the sense, with many learned companions to correct the result. He cites Jerome's saying that holy writ is the scripture of peoples, made so that all peoples should know it (Wycliffite Bible, General Prologue chapter 15).

John Foxe, writing in the sixteenth century, says that Wycliffe died at Lutterworth on St Silvester's day, 31 December, and enters the death under the year 1384 (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 3, p. 53). A constitution of Archbishop Arundel, printed by Foxe under the year 1409, forbade anyone to translate any text of Scripture into English on his own authority, or to read any such translation made in Wycliffe's time or since, until the bishop or a provincial council had approved it (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 3, p. 245). In 1415 the Council of Constance condemned forty-five articles drawn from his writings, declared him a heretic and ordered his bones dug up and removed from church ground (Council of Constance, session 8). Foxe reports that this was done forty-one years after his burial and that the bones were burned and the ashes thrown into a river (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 3, pp. 94–96).

The conclusions condemned in 1382 do not mention the translation; it was Arundel's constitution that restricted it. The same council that condemned Wycliffe's memory went on to try Jan Hus, and its sentence calls Wycliffe the root from which Hus's teaching grew (Council of Constance, session 15).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The sources used here do not give the year in which the translation was begun or finished. The year used here is that of the London condemnation, which the collection of documents against Wycliffe dates to May 1382 (Fasciculi Zizaniorum p. 272), and it is under 1382 that Knighton enters his complaint that Wycliffe had translated the Gospel (Knighton, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 151–152). The prologue is undated and speaks of the English Bible as "late translatid" (Wycliffite Bible, General Prologue chapter 15); Arundel's constitution, which Foxe prints under 1409, refers to translations made "in the time of John Wickliff, or since" (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 3, p. 245). Scholars distinguish an earlier and a later version of the Wycliffite Bible and regard the work as that of several hands over some years; see Mary Dove, The First English Bible: The Text and Context of the Wycliffite Versions (2007).

Primary sources

Bull to the University of Oxford against John Wycliffe Pope Gregory XI · May 1377
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Fasciculi Zizaniorum late fourteenth to early fifteenth century
p. 272

Conclusions of Wycliffe Condemned at London The council held by the archbishop of Canterbury at the Blackfriars, London · 1382
sourcebooks.fordham.edu

Chronicle Henry Knighton · late fourteenth century
vol. 2, pp. 151–152

General Prologue to the Wycliffite Bible late fourteenth century
chapter 15

Acts and Monuments John Foxe · 1563; enlarged editions in 1570, 1576 and 1583
vol. 3, p. 53; vol. 3, p. 245; vol. 3, pp. 94–96

Decrees of the Council of Constance The Council of Constance · 1414–1418
session 8; session 15

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Oxford, Lutterworth, London
Who John Wycliffe
Threads Scripture and Canon, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636
The Popes at Avignon 1309–1377 929

LEADS TO

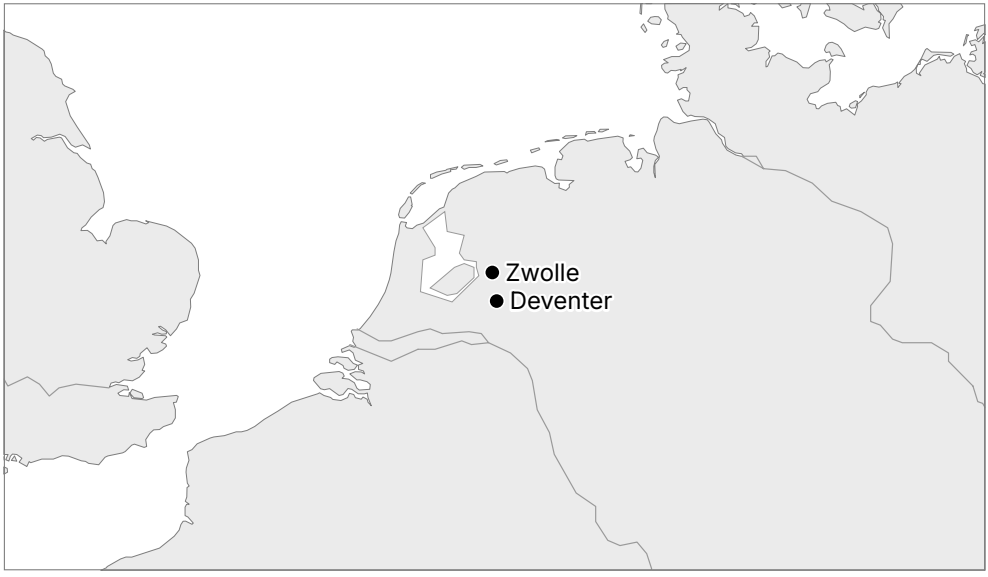
The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel 1419–1436 964
Tyndale's English New Testament 1526 1034

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Cyril and Methodius among the Slavs Before · AD 863–885 790
Gutenberg Prints the Bible After · c. 1454–1455 983

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor Before · c. 1209 886
The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ After · 1384–1441 954



← The Great Western Schism Earlier · 1378–1417
→ The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ Later · 1384–1441

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ

1384–1441 · Firm date

Geert Groote of Deventer gives up his benefices and preaches repentance. After his death in 1384 his followers form houses that live in common by copying books, and a monastery at Windesheim. In 1441 Thomas à Kempis, one of them, writes out the Imitation of Christ.

According to the Life that Thomas à Kempis wrote of him, Geert Groote was a citizen of Deventer who studied at Paris, became a master of arts at eighteen and held church benefices, until a Carthusian prior who had been his friend persuaded him to change his life (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, chs. 1–5 (Arthur, pp. 5–11)). He resigned his benefices and left his house to a community of poor women. He took deacon's orders so that he could preach, and refused the priesthood out of awe of it (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 3 (Arthur, pp. 160–161)). He preached at Deventer, Zwolle, Utrecht, Leiden, Delft, Amsterdam and other towns, often twice in a day (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 15 (Arthur, p. 44)). When opponents among the clergy obtained an edict that forbade him to preach, he obeyed it (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 9 (Arthur, pp. 20–21)).

Groote paid students to copy books of theology and used their visits to win them to a devout life (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 9 (Arthur, pp. 20–21)). For those who wished to live together he laid down that they should earn their living by the work of their hands and, "as far as might be, live in common"; he allowed begging only in evident need. He also planned a monastery of canons regular, moved by his regard for John Ruysbroeck and his house at Groenendaal in Brabant (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 15 (Arthur, pp. 45–46)). He died at Deventer in a time of plague, on the feast of Saint Bernard in 1384, in his forty-fourth year, and named the priest Florentius as his successor (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 16 (Arthur, pp. 46–49)) (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 3 (Arthur, pp. 160–161)).

In 1387 the first church at Windesheim, near Zwolle, was consecrated, and six men took the habit of canons regular there; all but one had been disciples of Groote (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 6 (Arthur, pp. 167–168)). A letter on the founding of Windesheim, which its translator ascribes to a later prior of that house, calls what Groote began "the New Devotion". It says that the house of Florentius was the first of the congregations of clerks, and Groote's own house at Deventer the first of the congregations of women (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, appended letter of William Vornken, sections 2–8 (Arthur, pp. 210–214)). Thomas came to Deventer as a schoolboy and was taken in by Florentius. He remembered priests and clerks who put what they had into a common stock, obeyed a rector, and "laboured carefully in copying books" (Thomas à Kempis, Life of John Gronde, ch. 1 (Arthur, pp. 169–171)).

Thomas Hemerken of Kempen was invested as a canon in 1406 at Mount St Agnes near Zwolle. Its first prior, his brother John, had been one of the six at Windesheim (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 6 (Arthur, pp. 167–168)) (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, years 1399 and 1406 (Arthur, pp. 35, 41)). The brother who continued the house chronicle after Thomas's death in 1471 says that he copied the Bible that the community used and composed "divers little books" for the young, plain in style (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, continuation, year 1471 (Arthur, pp. 143–144)).

The Imitation of Christ is a short Latin work in four books. It begins from Christ's words about following him (John 8:12) and sets a good life above learning: "I had rather feel contrition than be skilful in the definition thereof", and a peasant who serves God is better than a philosopher who neglects himself (Imitation of Christ 1.1–2). The third book praises love, "a good above all others" (Imitation of Christ 3.5); the fourth opens with the reverence in which Christ is to be received in communion (Imitation of Christ 4.1).

A manuscript now in the Royal Library at Brussels contains the four books and other treatises. It ends with a Latin note that it was finished and completed in 1441 by the hand of brother Thomas of Kempen (per manus fratris Thome Kempis) at Mount St Agnes near Zwolle (Brussels autograph of 1441, colophon, as printed by Ruelens, pp. 6–7). The note shows that Thomas wrote the volume out in that year. It does not say who composed the Imitation. From 1604 the work was claimed for others, among them Jean Gerson, chancellor of Paris, and those who denied it to Thomas pointed out that the note names only a copyist. Charles Ruelens, keeper of manuscripts at Brussels, answered with an argument of Bishop Malou of Bruges: Thomas set the four books at the head of a volume of his own writings and did not mix in the works of others. Ruelens adds that an older copy, with a note dated 1425, names Thomas as author (Brussels autograph of 1441, Ruelens's introduction, pp. 6, 11–12).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Life gives no year for Groote's conversion or for the start of his preaching, and the year 1374 in the outline could not be traced to a primary source. The entry is therefore dated from his death, which Thomas à Kempis places on the feast of Saint Bernard in 1384 (Thomas à Kempis, Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 16 (Arthur, pp. 46–49)) (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 3 (Arthur, pp. 160–161)), to the year written at the end of the Brussels manuscript, 1441 (Brussels autograph of 1441, colophon, as printed by Ruelens, pp. 6–7). Between them the chronicle of Thomas's monastery dates the consecration at Windesheim to 1387 (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, part 2, ch. 6 (Arthur, pp. 167–168)) and his own investiture to 1406 (Chronicle of Mount St Agnes, years 1399 and 1406 (Arthur, pp. 35, 41)).

When the Imitation was composed is not fixed by these documents. Charles Ruelens, introducing the facsimile of the manuscript (The Imitation of Christ: Being the Autograph Manuscript of Thomas à Kempis, London: Elliot Stock, in the printing of 1885), reports an older manuscript at Brussels with a note dated 1425 that already names Thomas as the author (Brussels autograph of 1441, Ruelens's introduction, pp. 6, 11–12). This entry has not seen that manuscript.

Primary sources

Scripture
John 8:12

Lives of Gerard Groote, Florentius Radewijns and Their Followers Thomas à Kempis · After 1439
Life of Gerard Groote, chs. 1–5 (Arthur, pp. 5–11); Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 15 (Arthur, p. 44); Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 9 (Arthur, pp. 20–21); Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 15 (Arthur, pp. 45–46); Life of Gerard Groote, ch. 16 (Arthur, pp. 46–49); Life of John Gronde, ch. 1 (Arthur, pp. 169–171)

Chronicle of the Canons Regular of Mount St Agnes Thomas à Kempis, with an anonymous continuation · Fifteenth century, continued to 1477 part 2, ch. 3 (Arthur, pp. 160–161); part 2, ch. 6 (Arthur, pp. 167–168); appended letter of William Vornken, sections 2–8 (Arthur, pp. 210–214); years 1399 and 1406 (Arthur, pp. 35, 41); continuation, year 1471 (Arthur, pp. 143–144)

The Imitation of Christ (De imitatione Christi) Thomas à Kempis (attributed) · Early fifteenth century; a copy with a note dated 1425 is reported
1.1–2; 3.5; 4.1

Autograph Manuscript of the Imitation of Christ (1441) Written out by Thomas à Kempis · 1441 colophon, as printed by Ruelens, pp. 6–7; Ruelens's introduction, pp. 6, 11–12

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Deventer, Zwolle
Who Geert Groote, Thomas à Kempis
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886

LEADS TO

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils Before · 1341–1351 937

The Society of Jesus Is Founded After · 27 September 1540 1067

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Wycliffe and the First English Bible Before · c. 1382 950

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus After · 1414–1418 959

← Wycliffe and the First English Bible Earlier · c. 1382
→ The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Later · 1414–1418

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus

1414–1418 · Firm date

A general council ends the papal schism, declares that even a pope must obey it, and orders councils to meet at fixed intervals. It also tries the Czech preacher Jan Hus, who had come under the king's safe-conduct, and hands him over to be burned on 6 July 1415.

The council met at Constance on the summons of John XXIII, the pope of the line begun at Pisa (Council of Constance, session 1). When he fled in March 1415 it declared that his departure did not dissolve it (Council of Constance, session 3), and on 6 April, in the decree Haec sancta, it declared that it "has its authority directly from Christ" and that everyone, "including also the pope", is bound to obey it in what concerns the faith, the ending of the schism and the reform of the church (Council of Constance, session 5 (6 April 1415)) (Council of Constance, session 5, in the translation of Thatcher and McNeal, no. 171). It then deposed two of the three claimants and accepted the resignation of the third (see the Great Western Schism). In October 1417, in the decree Frequens, it ordered that general councils be held in future at fixed intervals, in the end every ten years (Council of Constance, session 39). A month later Martin V was elected (Council of Constance, session 41 (editor's summary)).

Jan Hus, a priest and master of Prague, came to give an account of his faith; Sigismund, king of the Romans, had issued him a safe-conduct, dated 18 October 1414, which took him under the protection of the empire and ordered that he be let pass, stay and return freely (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio pp. 237–238). Hus reached Constance on 3 November (Hus, Letters letter 37, p. 157). Within weeks he was a prisoner, and the Bohemian lord John of Chlum posted protests on the church doors that he had been seized under the king's safe-conduct (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio pp. 253–254). He was heard in public on three days in June 1415 (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio pp. 275–315). Afterwards he wrote that Sigismund's word was as little to be trusted as his safe-conduct (Hus, Letters letter 63, pp. 229–230), and on 1 July he declared that he would not abjure articles he had never held, nor those taken from his books, lest he offend against the truth (Hus, Letters Final Declaration, pp. 275–276).

On 6 July the council condemned thirty articles from his writings, declared him a heretic, degraded him from the priesthood and gave him up to the secular power (Council of Constance, session 15). Peter of Mladoňovice, who was there, reports that Hus told the assembly he had come freely, with the safe-conduct of the king then present (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio p. 319). A paper crown painted with devils was set on his head, Sigismund ordered him taken away, and he was led to a meadow outside the town. Chained to the stake, he refused a last offer of his life in return for recanting and died singing "Christ, Son of the living God, have mercy on me". His ashes were thrown into the Rhine (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio pp. 320–323). In September the council decreed that a safe-conduct given by an emperor or king does not prevent a competent judge from trying a case of heresy (Council of Constance, session 19 (editor's summary)).

The two decrees on councils remain contested. Martin V said at the last session that he approved what the council, acting as a council, had decided in matters of faith (Council of Constance, session 45, note quoting the pope's reply). Pius II forbade appeals from a pope to a council (Pius II, Execrabilis), and the First Vatican Council rejected the idea that a council is an authority above the Roman pontiff (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus chapter 3). The modern editor of the decrees notes that the standing of the sessions held before Martin's election is still disputed (Council of Constance, editor's introduction). In 1999 John Paul II praised the moral courage of Hus and expressed "deep regret" for the "cruel death" inflicted on him (John Paul II, Address on John Hus (1999)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The council's first session is dated 16 November 1414 and its last 22 April 1418 (Council of Constance, session 1) (Council of Constance, session 45). The sentence against Hus was passed in the fifteenth session on 6 July 1415 (Council of Constance, session 15), and Peter of Mladoňovice describes his death on the same day (Peter of Mladoňovice, Relatio pp. 320–323).

Primary sources

Decrees of the Council of Constance The Council of Constance · 1414–1418
session 1; session 3; session 5 (6 April 1415); session 5, in the translation of Thatcher and McNeal, no. 171; session 39; session 41 (editor's summary); session 15; session 19 (editor's summary); session 45, note quoting the pope's reply; editor's introduction; session 45

Account of the Trial and Death of Master Jan Hus Peter of Mladoňovice · c. 1415
pp. 237–238; pp. 253–254; pp. 275–315; p. 319; pp. 320–323

Letters Jan Hus · 1414–1415 (the letters cited) letter 37, p. 157; letter 63, pp. 229–230; Final Declaration, pp. 275–276

Execrabilis Pope Pius II · January 1460
gutenberg.org

Pastor Aeternus The First Vatican Council · 18 July 1870
chapter 3

Address to an International Symposium on John Hus Pope John Paul II · 17 December 1999
vatican.va

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constance, Prague
Who Jan Hus, Sigismund, Martin V
Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order, Reform and Reformation, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Western Schism 1378–1417 946
Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950

LEADS TO

The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel 1419–1436 964
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974
Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007
The Moravians at Herrnhut 13 August 1727 1225

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils Before · 1341–1351 937
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel After · 1419–1436 964

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Great Western Schism Before · 1378–1417 946
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion After · 6 July 1439 974

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ Before · 1384–1441 954
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel After · 1419–1436 964

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Black Death Before · 1347–1351 941
The Trial of Joan of Arc After · 30 May 1431 969

← The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ Earlier · 1384–1441
→ The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel Later · 1419–1436

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel

1419–1436 · Firm date

After the burning of Jan Hus, Praguers and Taborites defend the lay chalice in arms. A crusade proclaimed by Martin V fails before Prague in 1420, the city states its demands in Four Articles, and in 1436 legates of the Council of Basel concede the chalice at Jihlava.

The Council of Constance, which condemned Jan Hus and gave him up to be burned in July 1415 (see the council and his trial), had ruled three weeks earlier against priests who gave lay people the cup as well as the bread at communion, a practice that the editor of its decrees says had lately been revived in Bohemia. Christ had given both, the council said, and the early church had received both; but the later custom that the laity receive the bread alone was to be held as a law, and those who stubbornly said otherwise were to be punished as heretics (Council of Constance, session 13 (15 June 1415), with the editor's heading).

Master Lawrence of Březová, who sided with the chalice, tells what followed. On 30 July 1419 a procession carrying the sacrament was insulted at the town hall of the New Town of Prague, and the crowd threw the burgomaster and some of the councillors from the building and killed them. King Wenceslas died of a stroke on 16 August. The next day crowds broke organs and images in the churches, above all in those where the chalice was refused (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1419 (Höfler, pp. 340–341)). Early in 1420 a band of those he calls Taborite brethren seized the stronghold of Hradiště, fortified it and named it Mount Tábor (Bohemia) (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1420 (Höfler, p. 351)). They chose four captains, one of them the one-eyed Jan Žižka, formerly of the king's household (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1420 (Höfler, p. 356)).

On 1 March 1420 Martin V, at the request of Sigismund, king of the Romans, called on rulers everywhere to arm for the extermination of the Wycliffites, Hussites and other heretics, and granted those who took the cross full pardon of their sins (Martin V, Omnium plasmatoris Domini, Palacký, no. 12 (pp. 17–20)). The crusade was proclaimed at Breslau on 17 March (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 352–353)). Sigismund's army camped before Prague from 30 June. On 14 July it attacked a wooden bulwark that Žižka had built on the hill of Vítkov and was thrown back (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 374–379)).

From the besieged city the burgomasters and community of Prague sent the army, in Latin, Czech and German, the Four Articles for which they stood: that the word of God be preached freely and in due order by the Lord's priests throughout the kingdom; that the eucharist be given freely in both kinds, bread and wine, to all the faithful not in mortal sin; that the clergy be deprived of the worldly lordship over wealth and temporal goods that it holds against Christ's command, and brought back to the rule of the Gospel and the life of the apostles; and that mortal sins, above all public ones, and other disorders against the law of God be duly and reasonably put down in every rank by those whose duty it is (Four Articles of Prague, articles 1–4 (Höfler, pp. 380–384)). Sigismund had himself crowned in Prague castle on 28 July, and two days later his army went home (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 384–385)).

A Prague chronicle of these years records the wars that followed. Žižka died in October 1424 while besieging the castle of Přibyslav. In 1431 a great army led by the electors of the empire, with the legate of the council then sitting at Basel, fled from the Bohemians (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, year 1424 (Höfler, pp. 87–88)) (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, year 1431 (Höfler, p. 92)). Under 1433 it tells of a siege of Plzeň that lasted nearly a year, and of its end: on the Sunday after Corpus Christi the Bohemian lords and the Praguers destroyed the field armies of the Taborites and of the Orphans, as Žižka's men were called after his death, in a battle near Lipany (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, year 1424 (Höfler, pp. 87–88)) (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, under the year 1433 (Höfler, pp. 93–94)).

At Jihlava in July 1436, before Sigismund, the Bohemian estates handed the council's legates the agreed Compacts and four priests promised obedience on behalf of all. The legates proclaimed peace. No one was to defame Bohemians and Moravians for communicating in both kinds; they were to be held good Catholics, and the bishops were to give the cup to those accustomed to it (Compacts of Basel, reports of 5 July 1436 (Palacký, nos. 964–965, pp. 456–458)) (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, year 1436 (Höfler, pp. 94–96)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Lawrence of Březová dates the killing of the councillors of the New Town of Prague to Sunday 30 July 1419 and the death of King Wenceslas to 16 August (Lawrence of Březová, Chronicle, year 1419 (Höfler, pp. 340–341)). The crusade bull is dated at Florence on 1 March in the third year of Martin V, 1420 (Martin V, Omnium plasmatoris Domini, Palacký, no. 12 (pp. 17–20)). The legates of the Council of Basel dated their report of the settlement at Jihlava on 5 July 1436 (Compacts of Basel, reports of 5 July 1436 (Palacký, nos. 964–965, pp. 456–458)); a Prague chronicle places it at the feast of Saint Procopius, which is 4 July (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, year 1436 (Höfler, pp. 94–96)). The same chronicle gives no year of its own for the battle of Lipany, which it tells under 1433 at the end of a siege of nearly a year (Chronicle of the Old College of Prague, under the year 1433 (Höfler, pp. 93–94)); that puts it in 1434.

Primary sources

Decrees of the Council of Constance The Council of Constance · 1414–1418
session 13 (15 June 1415), with the editor's heading

Hussite Chronicle (De gestis et variis accidentibus regni Boemiae) Lawrence of Březová · Covers 1414–1422 year 1419 (Höfler, pp. 340–341); year 1420 (Höfler, p. 351); year 1420 (Höfler, p. 356); year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 352–353); year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 374–379); year 1420 (Höfler, pp. 384–385)

Omnium plasmatoris Domini (crusade bull against the Hussites) Martin V · 1 March 1420
Palacký, no. 12 (pp. 17–20)

The Four Articles of Prague The burgomasters, councillors and community of Prague · July 1420 articles 1–4 (Höfler, pp. 380–384)

Chronicle of the Old College of Prague (Chronicon veteris collegiati Pragensis) Covers 1419–1441 year 1424 (Höfler, pp. 87–88); year 1431 (Höfler, p. 92); under the year 1433 (Höfler, pp. 93–94); year 1436 (Höfler, pp. 94–96)

Reports on the Conclusion of the Compacts at Jihlava Legates of the Council of Basel and an anonymous reporter · 5 July 1436 reports of 5 July 1436 (Palacký, nos. 964–965, pp. 456–458)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Prague, Tábor (Bohemia), Basel
Who Jan Žižka, Sigismund, Martin V, Jan Hus
Threads Reform and Reformation, Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959

Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950

LEADS TO

Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Before · 1414–1418 959

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament After · 1516 1003

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

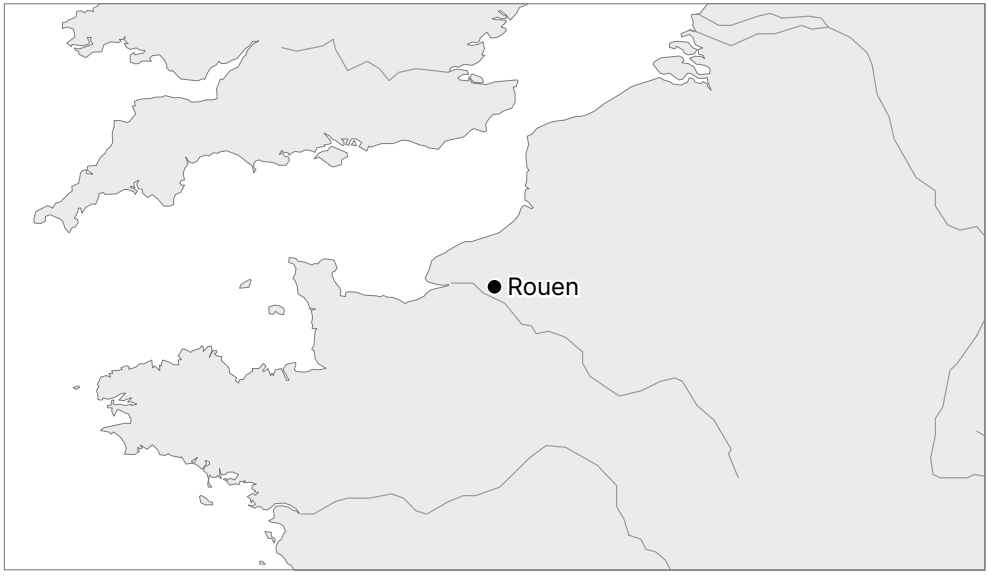
The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Before · 1414–1418 959

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion After · 6 July 1439 974

CHURCH AND STATE

Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam Before · 18 November 1302 925

The Trial of Joan of Arc After · 30 May 1431 969



← The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Earlier · 1414–1418
→ The Trial of Joan of Arc Later · 30 May 1431

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Trial of Joan of Arc

30 May 1431 · Firm date

A church court at Rouen under Bishop Pierre Cauchon tries Joan of Arc for heresy, and on 30 May 1431 she is burned as relapsed. In 1456 judges appointed by Pope Callixtus III declare that trial and its sentences null. Both verdicts are known from the courts' own records.

On 21 February 1431 a prisoner was brought before a church court in the castle of Rouen. The king, its record says, had given her up to be tried "in the matter of the Faith" (Trial of Condemnation, 21 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 3–7)); a notary of the court later testified that, as he had heard, she was brought to Rouen on letters from the king of England, and that Englishmen guarded her (Nullification Trial, deposition of Guillaume Manchon, 2 May 1452 (Murray, p. 178)). She said that she was called Jeanne, that she was born at Domrémy and that she was about nineteen (Trial of Condemnation, 21 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 3–7)). The judges were Pierre Cauchon, bishop of Beauvais, and the deputy of the inquisitor of France (Trial of Condemnation, 24 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 127– 134)). Two years before, Joan of Arc had written to the king of England and his commanders before Orléans that she was sent by God, the King of Heaven, to drive them out of France. The letter was read in court, and she acknowledged it except for three phrases (Trial of Condemnation, 1 March 1431, letter of 22 March 1429 (Murray, pp. 36–38)).

The court's record gives her answers. When she was thirteen, she said, she "had a Voice from God" in her father's garden, with a light. It taught her to be good and to go to church, and later told her to go into France and raise the siege of Orléans (Trial of Condemnation, 22 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 10–11)). She named Saint Michael, whom she had seen "before my eyes", and Saints Catherine and Margaret (Trial of Condemnation, 27 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 24–26)). Asked whether she was in the grace of God, she answered: "If I am not, may God place me there; if I am, may God so keep me" (Trial of Condemnation, 24 February 1431 (Murray, p. 18)). She wore men's clothes, she said, at God's command. Asked to submit her words and deeds to the decision of the church, she referred herself to God who had sent her: "in my opinion it is all one, God and the Church" (Trial of Condemnation, 17 March 1431 (Murray, pp. 86–87)).

On 24 May, in the cemetery of Saint-Ouen, she asked that her case be sent to the pope and was told that this would not do. While the bishop was reading the sentence she gave way and signed an abjuration, and was sentenced to prison for life (Trial of Condemnation, 24 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 127–134)). Four days later the judges found her again in men's clothes. Her voices, she told them, had reproached her, and what she had revoked she had revoked "for fear of the fire" (Trial of Condemnation, 28 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 135–138)). On 30 May, in the Old Market, the judges declared her a relapsed heretic and abandoned her to the secular power, with a request that it moderate its judgment as to death and mutilation (Trial of Condemnation, 29–30 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 138–146)).

In 1455 Callixtus III received a petition from her mother and brothers. His rescript repeats their claims, that she had detested heresy, had asked for her case to be sent to the Apostolic See and had been condemned unjustly, and charges the archbishop of Reims and the bishops of Paris and Coutances to hear both sides and judge (Callixtus III, rescript of 11 June 1455, Quicherat, vol. 2, pp. 95–98). Among the witnesses was the Dominican Martin Ladvenu, who had heard her confession and given her communion. He testified that she was led to the fire without any sentence from the secular judges, and that she maintained to the end that her voices came from God (Nullification Trial, depositions of Martin Ladvenu, 1452–1456 (Murray, pp. 193–195)).

On 7 July 1456 the papal judges gave sentence at Rouen (Nullification Trial, last day of the process (Quicherat, vol. 3, p. 351)). They declared that the twelve articles on which the first court had sought opinions had been drawn from her answers falsely and with malice. They pronounced the trial, both its sentences and the abjuration "null, non-existent, without value or effect", and Joan and her family free of any stain of infamy. Of her revelations they said only that on such a question "it is most difficult to furnish a certain judgment". They ordered a cross set up in the Old Market, where she had died "by a cruel and horrible fire" (Nullification Trial, sentence of 7 July 1456 (Murray, pp. 321–327)).

In 1920 Benedict XV declared her a saint (Benedict XV, Divina disponente formula of canonization).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The record of the first trial dates the final sentence in the Old Market of Rouen to Wednesday 30 May 1431 (Trial of Condemnation, 29–30 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 138–146)). The pope's commission for the second trial is dated at Rome on 11 June 1455 (Callixtus III, rescript of 11 June 1455, Quicherat, vol. 2, pp. 95–98), and its record places the sentence on 7 July 1456 (Nullification Trial, last day of the process (Quicherat, vol. 3, p. 351)). The English translation used here prints "June" at the foot of that sentence, against its own introduction and the Latin text.

Primary sources

Record of the Trial of Condemnation of Joan of Arc The court of Pierre Cauchon, bishop of Beauvais · 1431, put into its Latin form afterwards
21 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 3–7); 24 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 127–134); 1 March 1431, letter of 22 March 1429 (Murray, pp. 36–38); 22 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 10–11); 27 February 1431 (Murray, pp. 24–26); 24 February 1431 (Murray, p. 18); 17 March 1431 (Murray, pp. 86–87); 28 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 135–138); 29–30 May 1431 (Murray, pp. 138–146)

Record of the Nullification Trial of Joan of Arc The papal judges delegate, Jean Juvénal des Ursins, Guillaume Chartier, Richard de Longueil and Jean Bréhal · Inquiries of 1452; trial of 1455–1456 deposition of Guillaume Manchon, 2 May 1452 (Murray, p. 178); depositions of Martin Ladvenu, 1452–1456 (Murray, pp. 193–195); last day of the process (Quicherat, vol. 3, p. 351); sentence of 7 July 1456 (Murray, pp. 321–327)

Rescript Opening the Review of Joan of Arc's Condemnation (Humilibus supplicum votis) Callixtus III · 11 June 1455
Quicherat, vol. 2, pp. 95–98

Divina disponente (bull of canonization of Joan of Arc) Benedict XV · 16 May 1920 formula of canonization

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rouen
Who Joan of Arc, Pierre Cauchon, Callixtus III
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903
The Great Western Schism 1378–1417 946

CHURCH AND STATE

The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel Before · 1419–1436 964

The Fall of Constantinople After · 29 May 1453 979

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Before · 1414–1418 959
The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews After · 1478–1492 987

← The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel Earlier · 1419–1436
→ The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion Later · 6 July 1439

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion

6 July 1439 · Firm date

Pope Eugene IV and the Byzantine emperor John VIII proclaim the reunion of the Latin and Greek churches at Florence on 6 July 1439, in a decree affirming the Filioque and papal primacy. Mark of Ephesus refuses to sign, and the union finds little acceptance in Constantinople.

The emperor John VIII Palaiologos sailed from Constantinople to Italy with the patriarch Joseph, bishops and court officials to hold a council of union; the pope, Eugene IV, paid for the journey. They landed at Venice and went on to Ferrara (Doukas, History 31.1–2 (Bekker pp. 212–213)). There, on 9 April 1438, Eugene declared with the assent of the emperor and the patriarch that an ecumenical council was in being (Council of Florence, Ferrara, session 4 (9 April 1438)). Plague drove it to Florence in January 1439 (Council of Florence, decree of 10 January 1439).

The Greek historian Doukas names Mark of Ephesus as the chief spokesman of the Greeks, and Bessarion of Nicaea and Isidore of Russia as the most learned of their bishops (Doukas, History 31.3–4 (Bekker pp. 213–214)). After many sessions the bull Laetentur caeli, "Let the heavens rejoice", was issued on 6 July 1439 in the pope's name with the agreement of the emperor and the Greek representatives. It defines that the Holy Spirit proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son as from one principle and by a single spiration, and that the Fathers' phrase "through the Son" means that the Son too is, as the Greeks say, cause, and as the Latins say, principle of the Spirit's subsistence. It declares that the words "and from the Son" were lawfully and reasonably added to the creed, that the Eucharist is truly consecrated in leavened or in unleavened wheat bread, each church keeping its custom, and that the souls of those who die truly penitent and in the love of God before making satisfaction are cleansed after death by cleansing pains and helped by the suffrages of the living. It defines that the Roman pontiff holds the primacy over the whole world as successor of Peter and true vicar of Christ, with full power to rule the whole church, as is also contained, it adds, in the acts of the ecumenical councils and the sacred canons; and it ranks the patriarch of Constantinople second after him, without prejudice to the privileges and rights of the Eastern patriarchs (Council of Florence, Florence, session 6 (Laetentur caeli)).

Doukas says that all the Greeks subscribed and took communion with the Latins, except Mark (Doukas, History 31.3–4 (Bekker pp. 213–214)). Mark then wrote to "all Orthodox Christians" against those who had signed, whom he called Greco-Latins. He went through the decree point by point, held that the pope is one of the patriarchs and that only if he is Orthodox, and told his readers to flee communion with the unionists (Mark of Ephesus, Encyclical Letter §§1–2, 6–7 (PO 17, pp. 449–451, 456–459)). Doukas, himself a supporter of the union, reports that when the bishops landed at Constantinople they told the crowd that they had betrayed their faith, and that when asked why they had signed they answered that they had feared the Franks and wished the hand that signed cut off (Doukas, History 31.9 (Bekker pp. 215–216)). When a united liturgy was celebrated in Hagia Sophia late in 1452, on 12 December by his dating, with the pope commemorated, the greater part of the clergy and monks, he says, would have none of it (Doukas, History 36.2–6 (Bekker pp. 253–255)).

At Florence the same council went on to issue bulls of union with the Armenians in 1439 and with the Copts in 1442 (Council of Florence, sessions 8 and 11). The Roman Catholic Church counts Florence among the ecumenical councils and renewed its definition of the papal primacy at the First Vatican Council (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus chapter 3). The Orthodox Church did not receive the union: the encyclical of the Orthodox council held on Crete in 2016 names, among councils of universal authority, one held at Constantinople in 1484 "to refute the unionist Council of Florence" (Holy and Great Council, Encyclical I.3). Mark of Ephesus is honoured as a saint among the Orthodox; the handbook of the Orthodox Church in America calls him Saint Mark, says that he is venerated as one of the Three Pillars of Orthodoxy, and calls the union of Florence unjust and forced (Orthodox Church in America, The Orthodox Faith, vol. III, Fifteenth Century, The Great Schism in the Papacy, and the Conciliar Movement).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

History Doukas · c. 1462
31.1–2 (Bekker pp. 212–213); 31.3–4 (Bekker pp. 213–214); 31.9 (Bekker pp. 215–216); 36.2–6 (Bekker pp. 253–255)

Decrees of the Council of Ferrara and Florence The Council of Ferrara–Florence under Pope Eugene IV · 1438–1445
Ferrara, session 4 (9 April 1438); decree of 10 January 1439; Florence, session 6 (Laetentur caeli); sessions 8 and 11

Encyclical Letter to All Orthodox Christians Mark of Ephesus · c. 1440
§§1–2, 6–7 (PO 17, pp. 449–451, 456–459)

Pastor Aeternus The First Vatican Council · 18 July 1870
chapter 3

Encyclical of the Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church · Pentecost 2016
I.3

The Orthodox Faith Thomas Hopko, for the Orthodox Church in America
vol. III, Fifteenth Century, The Great Schism in the Papacy, and the Conciliar Movement

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Florence, Ferrara
Who Eugene IV, John VIII Palaiologos, Mark of Ephesus, Bessarion Threads East and West, Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Schism of 1054 16 July 1054 832
The Fourth Crusade Sacks Constantinople April 1204 882
The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959
The Second Council of Lyon May 1274 916

LEADS TO

The Fall of Constantinople 29 May 1453 979
The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075
The Union of Brest October 1596 1125
Rome and Constantinople Lift the Anathemas of 1054 7 December 1965 1432
The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church June 2016 1493

EAST AND WEST

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils Before · 1341–1351 937
The Fall of Constantinople After · 29 May 1453 979

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel Before · 1419–1436 964
Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg After · 1 October 1529 1042

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus Before · 1414–1418 959

Luther's Ninety-five Theses

After · 31 October 1517

1007

← The Trial of Joan of Arc Earlier · 30 May 1431
→ The Fall of Constantinople Later · 29 May 1453

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Fall of Constantinople

29 May 1453 · Firm date

After a siege of some eight weeks the Ottoman sultan Mehmed II takes Constantinople on 29 May 1453. The last emperor, Constantine XI, dies in the fighting, Hagia Sophia becomes a mosque, and the sultan makes the anti-unionist monk Gennadius patriarch.

The historian Doukas, who favoured the union, relates that the emperor Constantine XI Palaiologos had sent from Constantinople to Rome, asking for help and for the union made at the Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion to be confirmed. A papal legate, Cardinal Isidore, arrived in November 1452, and on 12 December, by Doukas's dating, a liturgy was celebrated in Hagia Sophia by Greeks and Latins together with the pope commemorated (Doukas, History 36.1–6 (Bekker pp. 252–255)); the translation of Sphrantzes used here puts the commemoration on 12 November (Sphrantzes, Chronicle 36.6). Doukas says that most of the clergy, monks and nuns refused it, and that the monk Gennadius, the former George Scholarios, nailed to his cell door a warning to the citizens that, along with the city, which was about to be destroyed, they had lost the faith of their fathers (Doukas, History 36.1–6 (Bekker pp. 252–255)). Doukas also attributes to the grand duke, the emperor's chief minister, the remark that it would be better to see the Turkish turban in the city than the Latin mitre (Doukas, History 37.10 (Bekker p. 264)).

Mehmed II brought his army before the walls in the first days of April 1453. The Venetian surgeon Barbaro, who was inside, reckoned it at about a hundred and sixty thousand men (Barbaro, Diary 5 April). George Sphrantzes, who counted the defenders at the emperor's order, puts them at 4,773 Greeks and some two hundred foreigners, and the besiegers at two hundred thousand (Sphrantzes, Chronicle 35.6–8). Neither says how he arrived at his figure for the Ottoman army.

The general assault began three hours before daybreak on 29 May. Barbaro describes three waves, the last of them the janissaries, and the moment the sultan's flag was raised on a tower and the defenders knew the city was taken (Barbaro, Diary 29 May). Constantine was killed. Sphrantzes says only that he was not at the emperor's side (Sphrantzes, Chronicle 35.9). Doukas has him cut down unrecognised, as a common soldier (Doukas, History 39.13 (Bekker pp. 286–287)), and Kritoboulos, a Greek who served the sultan, says that he fell fighting with those around him (Kritoboulos, History 1.235).

Crowds took refuge in Hagia Sophia and were carried off as captives (Doukas, History 39.17–20 (Bekker pp. 289–292)) (Kritoboulos, History 1.252). Kritoboulos describes the plunder of houses and churches and the enslavement of the people. He reports that nearly four thousand died and more than fifty thousand were taken, and says that Mehmed, entering the city, wept at what had been done to it (Kritoboulos, History 1.239–256). Doukas relates that the sultan went into Hagia Sophia, struck a soldier who was breaking up the marble floor, had one of his clerics mount the pulpit to call out the Muslim prayer, and himself prayed at the altar; the church, he laments, had become a house of Muhammad (Doukas, History 40.1–2 (Bekker pp. 298–299)).

Soon afterwards, Kritoboulos writes, Mehmed sought out Gennadius, who had been found a captive at Adrianople, and made him patriarch of the Christians, granting him authority over the church no less than it had enjoyed under the emperors (Kritoboulos, History 2.2). The Greek church lived on under Ottoman rule with an opponent of the union at its head.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Sphrantzes, who was in the city, dates the fall to Tuesday 29 May (Sphrantzes, Chronicle 35.9), and the Venetian Barbaro's diary gives the same day for the final assault (Barbaro, Diary 29 May). The appointment of Gennadius is placed by Kritoboulos among the events that followed the conquest, without a date (Kritoboulos, History 2.2).

Primary sources

History Doukas · c. 1462
36.1–6 (Bekker pp. 252–255); 37.10 (Bekker p. 264); 39.13 (Bekker pp. 286–287); 39.17–20 (Bekker pp. 289–292); 40.1–2 (Bekker pp. 298–299)

Chronicle George Sphrantzes · by about 1477
36.6; 35.6–8; 35.9

Diary of the Siege of Constantinople Nicolò Barbaro · 1453
5 April; 29 May

History of Mehmed the Conqueror Kritoboulos of Imbros · c. 1467
1.235; 1.252; 1.239–256; 2.2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople
Who Mehmed II, Constantine XI Palaiologos, Gennadius Scholarius
Threads East and West, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974
Constantine Dedicates Constantinople 11 May AD 330 594

LEADS TO

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

EAST AND WEST

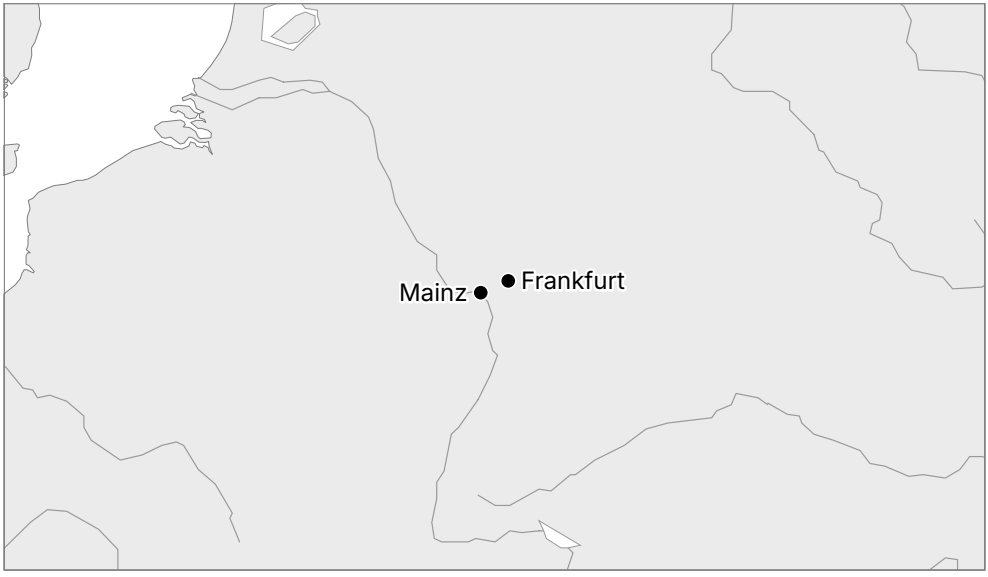
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion Before · 6 July 1439 974

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate After · 26 January 1589 1121

CHURCH AND STATE

The Trial of Joan of Arc Before · 30 May 1431 969

The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews After · 1478–1492 987



← The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion Earlier · 6 July 1439
→ Gutenberg Prints the Bible Later · c. 1454–1455

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Gutenberg Prints the Bible

c. 1454–1455 · Estimated date

At Mainz in the mid-1450s the Latin Bible is printed from movable metal type in an edition of well over a hundred copies, the first large book so made in Europe. A visitor who saw sheets of it in 1454 reported that every copy was sold before the work was finished.

The book is a Latin Bible in Jerome's version, the Vulgate, printed in two folio volumes in a heavy gothic type like the script of missals, most pages in two columns of forty-two lines (Gutenberg Bible Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy) (Gutenberg Bible Library of Congress, exhibition note). It does not name its printer. The library at Göttingen, which holds a complete copy on vellum, catalogues it as the work of Johannes Gutenberg at Mainz in partnership with Johannes Fust and Peter Schöffer, and notes that the attribution, though now regarded as certain, does not rest on his name appearing in it (Gutenberg Bible Göttingen State and University Library, catalogue note).

The earliest report of it is a letter. On 12 March 1455 Enea Silvio Piccolomini, bishop of Siena and later Pope Pius II, wrote to Cardinal Juan de Carvajal about a "miraculous man" seen at Frankfurt. He had not seen whole Bibles, he said, but several quires from different books, in lettering so clean and correct that the cardinal could read it without his glasses. Witnesses told him that 158 copies had been completed, though others said 180, and he doubted that one could be bought, since buyers had been found for all of them before the volumes were finished (Piccolomini, Letter to Carvajal (12 March 1455)).

A legal record shows what the venture cost. On 6 November 1455 the notary Ulrich Helmasperger certified at Mainz that Johann Fust had sworn to having advanced Gutenberg 1,550 gulden, which he had himself borrowed at interest, and that he claimed back whatever had not been spent on "the work of the books" for their common profit; the judgment it reports went against Gutenberg (Helmasperger Instrument). Princeton University Library notes that the only fifteenth-century writer to connect Gutenberg's name with a printed Bible is the Cologne Chronicle of 1499, which has the printer Ulrich Zell recall that the art was invented at Mainz and that its first product was a Latin Bible in large letters (Gutenberg Bible Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy).

The holding libraries give slightly different counts. Göttingen estimates the edition at about 180 copies, some 140 on paper and 40 on vellum, and counts 49 complete and incomplete copies known today (Gutenberg Bible Göttingen State and University Library, catalogue note). Princeton speaks of at least 120 paper copies and perhaps 40 on vellum (Gutenberg Bible Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy). The Library of Congress describes its own as one of three perfect vellum copies (Gutenberg Bible Library of Congress, exhibition note).

Princeton University Library describes the book as the first large-scale typographic book of the West: it gave readers across Europe copies of the same text that were all but identical, and the Vulgate in this form remained the standard Latin Bible into the sixteenth century (Gutenberg Bible Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The book carries no date. Piccolomini's letter of 12 March 1455 says that he had seen gatherings of it and that the copies were reported finished and sold (Piccolomini, Letter to Carvajal (12 March 1455)); Princeton University Library places what he saw at Frankfurt in the autumn of 1454 (Gutenberg Bible Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy). The Göttingen library dates its copy "about 1454, not after August 1456" (Gutenberg Bible Göttingen State and University Library, catalogue note), and the Library of Congress says the printing was probably completed late in 1455 (Gutenberg Bible Library of Congress, exhibition note).

Primary sources

The Gutenberg Bible (42-line Bible) c. 1454–1455, not after August 1456
Princeton University Library, account of the Scheide copy; Library of Congress, exhibition note; Göttingen State and University Library, catalogue note

Letter to Cardinal Juan de Carvajal Enea Silvio Piccolomini · 12 March 1455 rylandscollections.com

The Helmasperger Notarial Instrument Ulrich Helmasperger, notary · 6 November 1455 gutenberg-digital.p.sub.uni-goettingen.de

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mainz, Frankfurt
Who Johannes Gutenberg
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636

LEADS TO

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Wycliffe and the First English Bible Before · c. 1382 950

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament After · 1516

← The Fall of Constantinople Earlier · 29 May 1453
→ The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews Later · 1478–1492

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews

1478–1492 · Firm date

In 1478 Sixtus IV lets Ferdinand and Isabella appoint inquisitors against baptised Jews said to keep Jewish rites. Burnings begin at Seville in 1481; in 1482 the pope writes of complaints against the inquisitors. In 1492 the monarchs order all Jews to leave their kingdoms.

On 1 November 1478 Sixtus IV answered a petition from Ferdinand II of Aragon and Isabella I of Castile, king and queen of Castile and León. They had told him that in their kingdoms many who had been baptised, without having been strictly forced to it, were returning to the rites of the Jews while passing as Christians. The pope allowed them to choose, for each city or diocese, three bishops or other priests over forty years old and trained in theology or canon law. These men were to have against such people the jurisdiction that bishops and inquisitors have by law. The king and queen could remove and replace them (Sixtus IV, Exigit sincerae devotionis, Fita, pp. 449–452).

Andrés Bernáldez, parish priest of Los Palacios, who approved of the work, describes what followed at Seville. Two Dominican friars began their inquisition there at the start of 1481. They arrested some of the city's richest and most honoured citizens and burned six men and women at the first burning. Many fled. In eight years, he says, the tribunal burned more than 700 people and reconciled more than 5,000 (Bernáldez, History of the Catholic Monarchs, ch. 44 (vol. 1, pp. 129–134)).

Complaints reached Rome. On 29 January 1482 Sixtus wrote to the king and queen that his bull had been drawn up contrary to the decrees of the fathers, its terms having been put to him only in general. The two inquisitors at Seville, it was said, had proceeded without order of law, imprisoned many unjustly, put them to cruel torments, declared them heretics unjustly and taken the goods of those put to death. He left the two in office, ordered them to act together with the bishops, and refused to let the monarchs name inquisitors in their other kingdoms (Sixtus IV, Letters of 1482, brief of 29 January 1482 (Fita, pp. 459–461)). On 18 April he wrote that, as he had been informed, the inquisition in Aragon, Valencia, Mallorca and Catalonia was being conducted not from zeal for the faith and the salvation of souls but from greed for gain. He ordered that the accused be told the names and testimony of their accusers, be allowed advocates, be held only in the bishops' prisons, and be free to appeal to Rome (Sixtus IV, Letters of 1482, bull of 18 April 1482 (Lea, vol. 1, pp. 587–590)). Ferdinand replied on 13 May that he gave the report no credit, that if such things had been granted he did not intend ever to let them take effect, and that inquisitors must be appointed at his pleasure (Ferdinand, Letter to Sixtus IV, Lea, vol. 1, pp. 590–592).

In February 1482 the pope himself had named eight more Dominicans as inquisitors in Castile and León, among them Tomás de Torquemada (Sixtus IV, Letters of 1482, letter of 11 February 1482 (Fita, pp. 462–464)). By November 1484 Torquemada was inquisitor general, and inquisitors and lawyers summoned by him to Seville drew up instructions (Instructions of Seville (1484), preamble (fol. 2r–v)). On arriving in a town the inquisitors were to preach and announce thirty or forty days of grace. Those who came in that time and told all they knew of themselves and of others would escape death, perpetual prison and the loss of their goods (Instructions of Seville (1484), articles 1–4 (fol. 3r–v)). The reconciled would abjure in public and be barred for life from public office and from a list of trades, from wearing silk or gold, from riding and from bearing arms. Money penances were to go to the war against the Moors of Granada. Those who confessed after the term lost their property (Instructions of Seville (1484), articles 5–8 (fol. 4r–v)).

On 31 March 1492, at Granada, the king and queen ordered every Jew to leave their kingdoms by the end of July and never return, on pain of death. The edict gives the reason: some Christians were judaizing, and contact with Jews, who taught them their law, was much to blame. Separate quarters, twelve years of inquisition and the removal of the Jews from Andalusia had not been enough. They might sell their property and take their goods, but no gold, silver or coin (Edict of Expulsion (1492), Amador de los Ríos, vol. 3, pp. 603–607). Bernáldez describes their going. They sold a house for a donkey and a vineyard for a piece of cloth, he writes, and took the roads, old and young, on foot and on asses; there was no Christian who did not feel sorry for them. They were urged to accept baptism all along the way, and very few did (Bernáldez, History of the Catholic Monarchs, chs. 110–112 (vol. 1, pp. 337–342)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The bull is dated at Rome on 1 November 1478 (Sixtus IV, Exigit sincerae devotionis, Fita, pp. 449–452). Ferdinand and Isabella acted on it on 27 September 1480, when they commissioned two Dominicans as inquisitors (Sixtus IV, Exigit sincerae devotionis, royal commission of 27 September 1480 (Fita, pp. 448–453)), and Bernáldez, who calls these two the first inquisitors, puts the start of their work at Seville at the beginning of 1481 (Bernáldez, History of the Catholic Monarchs, ch. 44 (vol. 1, pp. 129–134)). The edict of expulsion is dated at Granada on 31 March 1492 (Edict of Expulsion (1492), Amador de los Ríos, vol. 3, pp. 603–607).

The numbers are disputed and no complete records survive. For the tribunal of Seville from 1481 to 1488 Bernáldez gives more than 700 burned and more than 5,000 reconciled (Bernáldez, History of the Catholic Monarchs, ch. 44 (vol. 1, pp. 129–134)); for the Jews of Castile and Aragon at the time of the edict he reports 35,000 or 36,000 households, more than 160,000 people (Bernáldez, History of the Catholic Monarchs, chs. 110–112 (vol. 1, pp. 337–342)). Henry Charles Lea, A History of the Inquisition of Spain, vol. 4 (1907), pp. 517–519, sets out how widely later estimates of those burned differ: one writer allowed fewer than 400 for the whole history of the tribunal and another 2,000 down to 1504, while Juan Antonio Llorente calculated 8,800 by the end of Torquemada's office, by a method that Lea calls absurd. The queen's secretary Hernando del Pulgar, as Lea reports him, put the burned in all Spain at 2,000 and those reconciled under edicts of grace at 15,000. On the exiles Lea, vol. 1 (1906), p. 142, lists estimates from Bernáldez's 160,000 to 800,000 in later Spanish writers, cites Isidore Loeb's reckoning of 1887 (165,000 emigrants, 50,000 baptised, 20,000 dead), and judges that all such figures are "more or less a matter of guess-work". Estimates made since Lea wrote are not given here, because this entry could not confirm them.

Primary sources

Exigit sincerae devotionis (bull allowing Ferdinand and Isabella to appoint inquisitors) Sixtus IV · 1 November 1478
Fita, pp. 449–452; royal commission of 27 September 1480 (Fita, pp. 448–453)

History of the Catholic Monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella Andrés Bernáldez · Late fifteenth and early sixteenth century
ch. 44 (vol. 1, pp. 129–134); chs. 110–112 (vol. 1, pp. 337–342)

Letters of 1482 on the Inquisition in Castile and Aragon Sixtus IV · 29 January, 11 February and 18 April 1482 brief of 29 January 1482 (Fita, pp. 459–461); bull of 18 April 1482 (Lea, vol. 1, pp. 587–590); letter of 11 February 1482 (Fita, pp. 462–464)

Letter to Sixtus IV on the Inquisition (13 May 1482) Ferdinand II of Aragon · 13 May 1482
Lea, vol. 1, pp. 590–592

Instructions of Seville for the Inquisitors (1484) Tomás de Torquemada and the inquisitors and lawyers assembled at Seville · 29 November 1484 preamble (fol. 2r–v); articles 1–4 (fol. 3r–v); articles 5–8 (fol. 4r–v)

Edict of Expulsion of the Jews from Castile and Aragon Ferdinand and Isabella · 31 March 1492
Amador de los Ríos, vol. 3, pp. 603–607

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Seville, Granada
Who Isabella I of Castile, Ferdinand II of Aragon, Sixtus IV, Tomás de Torquemada
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Papal Inquisition Is Established 1231 903

CHURCH AND STATE

The Fall of Constantinople Before · 29 May 1453 979

The King of Kongo Is Baptised After · 3 May 1491 992

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Trial of Joan of Arc Before · 30 May 1431 969

The First Anabaptists After · 21 January 1525 1029

← Gutenberg Prints the Bible Earlier · c. 1454–1455
→ The King of Kongo Is Baptised Later · 3 May 1491

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

The King of Kongo Is Baptised

3 May 1491 · Firm date

On 3 May 1491 the king of Kongo is baptised at his court by Portuguese friars and takes the name João. The account is Portuguese. A generation later his son Afonso I writes as a Christian king, asking Lisbon for priests and protesting against the trade in his people.

The account followed here is that of a Portuguese writer, Rui de Pina, chronicler of King John II, who wrote to honour his king and the faith.

According to Pina, Portuguese ships under Diogo Cão reached the kingdom of Kongo in 1485. When the messengers he sent inland to the king were slow to return, Cão carried off to Portugal some Kongo nobles who had come aboard. They were sent back with presents and an invitation to the Christian faith (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 57). The king then sent an embassy of his own with ivory and palm cloth. It asked for priests to baptise him and his people, for masons and carpenters to build churches, for farmers, and for women to teach the baking of bread, and it brought boys to be taught to read and write. The envoys were baptised at Beja with the king and queen of Portugal as godparents (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 58).

A fleet carrying Franciscan friars and church furnishings left Lisbon on 19 December 1490. It reached the river of Kongo on 29 March 1491, and on Easter day, 3 April, the lord of the coastal province of Soyo, an uncle of the king, was baptised with the name Manuel (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 58 (pp. 150–157)). The Portuguese then travelled twenty-three days to the royal court, where the king received them before a great crowd, seated on a platform, and was presented with the masons, carpenters and farmers he had asked for (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapters 59–60). Pina does not name the town. The king's son Afonso I of Kongo later dated a letter from "our city of Congo" (Afonso I, Letters no. XXVII (6 July 1526), pp. 53–54), the place now called Mbanza Kongo.

The king would not wait for the stone church, which was begun on 6 May and dedicated to Saint Mary (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 61). On 3 May 1491 a friar named João baptised him in a hall of his palace together with six of his nobles, and he took the name João after the king of Portugal. He then ordered the idols burned (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 62 (pp. 165–169)). The queen was baptised on 4 June as Leonor, and the king went to war against rebels under a banner of the cross that the Portuguese had given him (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 63). Pina reports the nobles' dreams and the finding of a stone cross as miracles (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 62 (pp. 165–169)).

The Kongo side is heard only later. A proclamation issued in Afonso's name in 1512 says that his father received Christian teaching and made a good beginning but was then turned away from it; that Afonso, who held to the faith, was exiled; and that on his father's death he defeated a brother who had seized the kingdom, his enemies testifying that they saw a white cross and Saint James in the sky (Afonso I, Letters no. IX (1512), pp. 6–9). In 1526 he wrote to the king of Portugal that he needed nothing from that kingdom but priests, a few teachers, and wine and flour for the mass, and that merchants were carrying off his people, even nobles and his own kin, so that the land was being emptied; it was his will that there be no trade in slaves in his kingdoms (Afonso I, Letters no. XXVII (6 July 1526), pp. 53–54).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Rui de Pina dates the king's baptism to Holy Cross day, 3 May 1491 (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 62 (pp. 165–169)). His own chronology is not quite consistent, since he also says that the stone church was begun on 6 May and that the king asked for baptism before it was finished (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 61). The other dates in the narrative, 29 March for the landing, 3 April for the baptism at Soyo and 4 June for the queen, are also his (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 58 (pp. 150–157)) (Rui de Pina, Chronicle of John II chapter 63).

Primary sources

Chronicle of King John II Rui de Pina · early sixteenth century chapter 57; chapter 58; chapter 58 (pp. 150–157); chapters 59–60; chapter 61; chapter 62 (pp. 165–169); chapter 63

Letters Afonso I of Kongo · 1512–1526 (the letters cited) no. XXVII (6 July 1526), pp. 53–54; no. IX (1512), pp. 6–9

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Mbanza Kongo
Who Nzinga a Nkuwu, Afonso I of Kongo
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church 1921 1367

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Rabban Sauma, a Monk from Beijing, Visits Rome and Paris Before · 1287–1288 921

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic After · 1493 996

CHURCH AND STATE

The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews Before · 1478–1492 987

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic After · 1493 996

← The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews Earlier · 1478–1492
→ Christianity Crosses the Atlantic Later · 1493

THE HIGH AND LATE MIDDLE AGES

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic

1493 · Firm date

In 1493 Pope Alexander VI grants the lands Columbus has found to the crown of Castile and charges it to convert their peoples. A second fleet carries priests to Hispaniola, where mass is said in January 1494 and a friar, Ramón Pané, records the first baptisms.

All the accounts used here are European, written for patrons at home; the islanders speak in them only as Europeans reported their words. Returning from his first voyage in February 1493, Christopher Columbus wrote that the people he had met knew "no sect, nor idolatry", believed that power and goodness were in the sky, and were well disposed to become Christians; in the same letter he offered the Spanish sovereigns slaves, to be taken from among "idolaters" (Columbus, Letter to Santángel pp. 266–271). On 4 May Alexander VI issued at Rome the bull Inter caetera. On the report of the Spanish envoys, and "out of the fullness of our apostolic power", he gave, granted and assigned to the kings of Castile all islands and mainlands found or to be found to the west and south of a line drawn from pole to pole a hundred leagues beyond the Azores and Cape Verde, so far as no Christian prince already held them. He commanded them to send God-fearing and learned men to instruct the inhabitants in the Catholic faith (Alexander VI, Inter Caetera (4 May 1493)).

A second fleet of seventeen ships left Cadiz that September (Peter Martyr, De Orbe Novo decade 1, book 1). Finding the men left on Hispaniola dead, Columbus chose a new site further along the coast, where the fleet's physician describes a town being built (Chanca, Letter pp. 300–308). He calls it Marta, a name that his editor says is found nowhere else (Chanca, Letter pp. 300–308); the friar Ramón Pané calls it Isabella (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 27–29). Peter Martyr, writing at the Spanish court a few months later, says that a church was put up within days and that mass was celebrated there on the feast of the Three Kings (Peter Martyr, De Orbe Novo decade 1, book 2). The physician noted that the islanders copied the Spaniards at prayer and said they wished to be Christians, yet kept in their houses figures that he took for idols (Chanca, Letter pp. 309–310).

Pané, a friar of the order of St Jerome, stayed when other friars went home. At Columbus's order he lived for nearly two years with the cacique Guarionex and wrote down what he learned of the islanders' beliefs. Guarionex, he reports, learned the Lord's Prayer and the Creed and then turned away, persuaded by other chiefs that the Christians were wicked men who had taken their lands by force (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 27–29). When men sent by Guarionex took the images from the friars' chapel and buried them, the governor, Bartholomew Columbus, had the men burned (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 29–30). The first islander baptised, Pané says, was Guaticaua, christened John Matthew, on St Matthew's day 1496 (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 27–29) (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 30–31); and he concludes that with some of the people force and punishment are needed (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 30–31).

The papal grant came to be used as a title to conquest. The Requerimiento, a proclamation for Spanish commanders to read before attacking, told its hearers that a pope had made a "donation" of their lands to Castile and threatened war and slavery if they did not submit (Requerimiento). In 2023 two departments of the Holy See declared that the "doctrine of discovery", which some scholars trace to bulls such as Inter caetera, "is not part of the teaching of the Catholic Church"; that the bulls did not adequately reflect the equal dignity and rights of indigenous peoples and were manipulated by colonial powers to justify immoral acts; and that the Church repudiates concepts that fail to recognise those rights (Holy See, Joint Statement on the Doctrine of Discovery (2023) §§5–7).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The bull Inter caetera is dated 4 May 1493 (Alexander VI, Inter Caetera (4 May 1493)). The second fleet sailed from Cadiz on 25 September 1493 (Peter Martyr, De Orbe Novo decade 1, book 1), and Peter Martyr, writing in April 1494, places a mass at the new settlement on the feast of the Three Kings, 6 January 1494 (Peter Martyr, De Orbe Novo decade 1, book 2). Pané dates the first baptism to St Matthew's day, 21 September, 1496 (Pané, Antiquities of the Indians pp. 30–31).

Primary sources

Letter on the First Voyage Christopher Columbus · 15 February 1493
pp. 266–271

Inter Caetera Pope Alexander VI · 4 May 1493
papalencyclicals.net

De Orbe Novo (Decades of the New World) Peter Martyr d'Anghiera · 1493–1494 (Decade 1, books 1–2) decade 1, book 1; decade 1, book 2

Letter on the Second Voyage of Columbus Diego Álvarez Chanca · 1494
pp. 300–308; pp. 309–310

Account of the Antiquities of the Indians Ramón Pané · c. 1498
pp. 27–29; pp. 29–30; pp. 30–31

The Requerimiento Issued in the name of King Ferdinand and Queen Juana of Castile · c. 1513
ecda.northeastern.edu

Joint Statement on the "Doctrine of Discovery" Dicastery for Culture and Education and Dicastery for Promoting Integral Human Development · 30 March 2023
§§5–7

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where La Isabela, Rome
Who Christopher Columbus, Alexander VI, Ramón Pané
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

LEADS TO

Our Lady of Guadalupe 1531 1051

Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free 2 June 1537 1063

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The King of Kongo Is Baptised Before · 3 May 1491 992

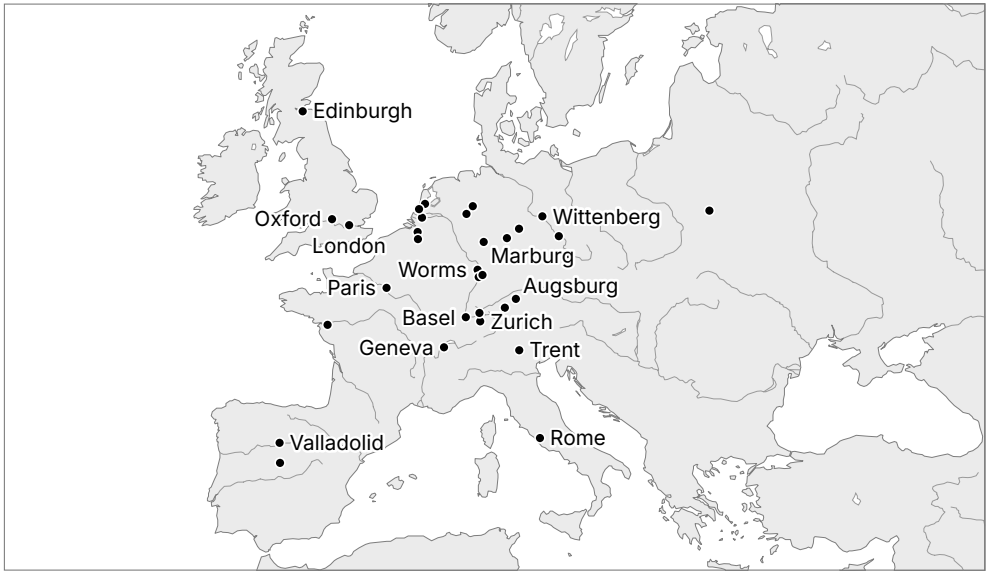
Our Lady of Guadalupe After · 1531 1051

CHURCH AND STATE

The King of Kongo Is Baptised Before · 3 May 1491 992

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms After · 1520–1521 1012

← The King of Kongo Is Baptised Earlier · 3 May 1491
→ Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament Later · 1516
TIMELINE



The Reformation

1500–1650

Western Christianity divides. Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, the Anabaptists and the English church break with Rome; Trent renews Catholicism; missions reach Asia and the Americas.

What began as a dispute over indulgences became a lasting division into Catholic, Lutheran, Reformed, Anglican and Anabaptist traditions, each with its own confessions. The Bible was translated into the languages of Europe. The era ends with the wars of religion and the settlements that followed them.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

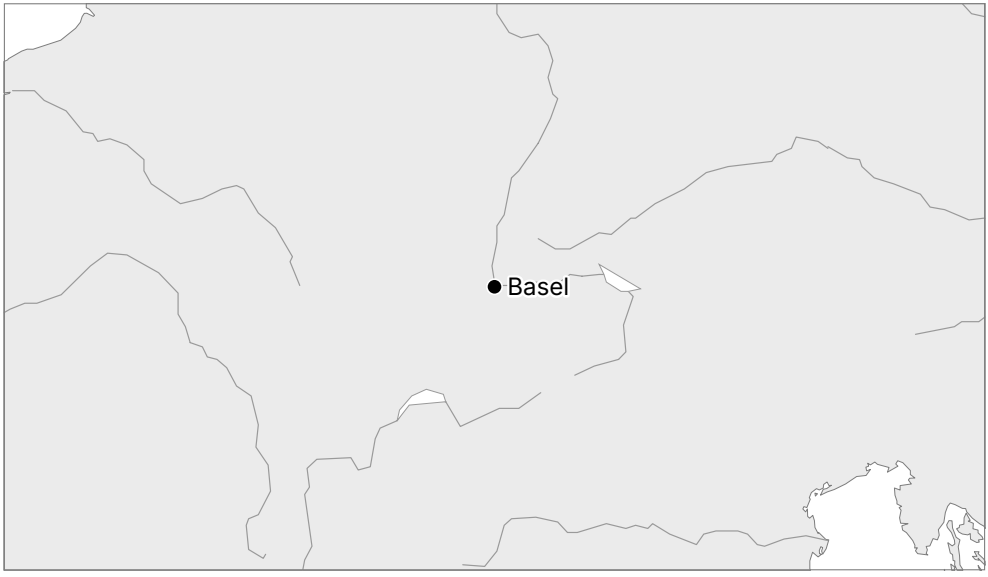
Beyond this map: Tepeyac, Goa, Kagoshima, Moscow, Constantinople, Nagasaki, Udayamperur, Kochi, Beijing, Macau, Plymouth, Massachusetts, Gorgora

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012
Luther Translates the Bible into German 1522–1534 1017
Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021
The German Peasants' War 1524–1525 1025
The First Anabaptists 21 January 1525 1029
Tyndale's English New Testament 1526 1034
The Protestation at Speyer 19 April 1529 1038
Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg 1 October 1529 1042
The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046
Our Lady of Guadalupe 1531 1051
England Breaks with Rome 1534 1055
Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059
Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free 2 June 1537 1063
The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067
Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071
The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075
The Book of Common Prayer 1549–1552 1080
The Peace of Augsburg 25 September 1555 1084
The Burning of Protestants under Mary I 1555–1558 1087
The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091
The Scottish Reformation August 1560 1096
Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel 24 August 1562 1100
The Heidelberg Catechism 19 January 1563 1104
Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I 25 February 1570 1108
The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre 24 August 1572 1113
The Book of Concord 25 June 1580 1117
Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121



The Union of Brest October 1596 1125
The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan 1597–1614 1129
The Edict of Nantes April 1598 1133
The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath 1599–1653 1137
Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142
The First Baptist Congregations 1609 1146
The King James Bible 1611 1151
The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia 1618–1648 1155
The Synod of Dort 1618–1619 1159
The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth 1620 1163
Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church 1622–1632 1167
The Trial of Galileo 22 June 1633 1172
The Westminster Confession 1643–1649 1176

THE REFORMATION

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament

1516 · Firm date

In 1516 the Basel printer Johann Froben issues Erasmus's Novum Instrumentum, the New Testament in Greek with a revised Latin version and notes, dedicated to Pope Leo X. Its preface wishes Scripture translated into every language.

In 1516 the press of Johann Froben at Basel issued a large volume with the title Novum Instrumentum omne, the whole New Testament, which the title page says was carefully revised and corrected by Erasmus of Rotterdam (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) title page). The last leaf dates the printing to February 1516 (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) colophon). On 7 March Erasmus told a correspondent that the New Testament was published (Erasmus, Letters to Urbanus Regius, 7 March 1516 (Nichols no. 380, vol. 2, p. 247)).

The book prints the Greek text and a Latin version side by side in two columns (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) second pagination, p. 183 (1 John 5)).

The title page says that the text has been corrected against the Greek, against many manuscripts in both languages and against the quotations of the fathers, among them Origen, Chrysostom, Cyril, Jerome, Cyprian, Ambrose, Hilary and Augustine of Hippo, and that notes tell the reader what has been changed and why. It asks the reader who meets a change to weigh whether it is for the better before taking offence (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) title page).

Erasmus dedicated the work to Pope Leo X. He writes that he has put it out under the pope's name so that its usefulness may spread more widely (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) dedication to Leo X, last page). That August he wrote to Leo again and stated his aim: not to tear up "the old and commonly accepted edition" but to emend it where it was corrupt and make it clear where it was obscure, on the evidence of the earliest manuscripts and of fathers approved by the church. He added that he was ready to correct any error of his own (Erasmus, Letters to Leo X, 9 August 1516 (Nichols no. 434, vol. 2, p. 316, where the translation prints 8 August)).

Before the text stands an exhortation to the reader, the Paraclesis. Erasmus says there that he disagrees with those who would not have Scripture translated into all tongues and read by lay men and women. He wishes that all women would read the Gospel and Paul's letters, and, in the English version of 1529, "I would to God, the plowman would sing a text of the scripture at his plowbeam, and that the weaver at his loom, with this would drive away the tediousness of time" (Erasmus, Paraclesis English version of 1529).

Erasmus admitted that the work had been hurried. In June 1516 he wrote to a friend in England that it had come out "fairly accurate, considering the limited time" and that he would soon be at work on another edition (Erasmus, Letters to William Latimer, 5 June 1516 (Nichols no. 404, vol. 2, p. 275)).

The book set two things before its readers together: a New Testament corrected from Greek manuscripts (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) title page) and the wish that everyone should read it in their own language (Erasmus, Paraclesis English version of 1529). Philip Melanchthon later wrote that the students at Wittenberg were at this time directed to the writings of Erasmus for Latin and Greek, and that Martin Luther took up Greek and Hebrew (Melanchthon, Life of Luther part 1). The German and English New Testaments of the next ten years are told under Luther Translates the Bible into German and Tyndale's English New Testament.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The colophon dates the printing to February 1516 (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) colophon), and the dedication is dated 1 February (Erasmus, Novum Instrumentum (1516) dedication to Leo X, last page). On 7 March 1516 Erasmus wrote that the New Testament was published (Erasmus, Letters to Urbanus Regius, 7 March 1516 (Nichols no. 380, vol. 2, p. 247)).

Primary sources

Novum Instrumentum omne (1516) Edited and translated by Erasmus of Rotterdam · Printed at Basel, February 1516 title page; colophon; second pagination, p. 183 (1 John 5); dedication to Leo X, last page

Letters Erasmus of Rotterdam · The letters cited date from 1516 to Urbanus Regius, 7 March 1516 (Nichols no. 380, vol. 2, p. 247); to Leo X, 9 August 1516 (Nichols no. 434, vol. 2, p. 316, where the translation prints 8 August); to William Latimer, 5 June 1516 (Nichols no. 404, vol. 2, p. 275)

Paraclesis Erasmus of Rotterdam · 1516

English version of 1529

History of the Life and Acts of Martin Luther Philip Melanchthon · 1546

part 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Basel
Who Erasmus
Threads Scripture and Canon, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Gutenberg Prints the Bible c. 1454–1455 983

Jerome Translates the Latin Vulgate c. 382–405 636

The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ 1384–1441 954

LEADS TO

Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007

Luther Translates the Bible into German 1522–1534 1017

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021

Tyndale's English New Testament 1526 1034

Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus 1844–1859 1293

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Gutenberg Prints the Bible Before · c. 1454–1455 983

Luther Translates the Bible into German After · 1522–1534 1017

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel Before · 1419–1436 964

Luther's Ninety-five Theses After · 31 October 1507

← Christianity Crosses the Atlantic Earlier · 1493
→ Luther's Ninety-five Theses Later · 31 October 1517

THE REFORMATION

Luther's Ninety-five Theses

31 October 1517 · Firm date

On 31 October 1517 Martin Luther sends the archbishop of Mainz ninety-five theses questioning what indulgences can do. Whether he also posted them on the Castle Church at Wittenberg that day is disputed. The controversy that follows becomes the Reformation.

In 1517 an indulgence granted by Pope Leo X for the building of St Peter's in Rome was being preached in the provinces of Albert of Brandenburg, archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg (Instructio summaria preamble and first and fourth graces (Kidd no. 6, pp. 13–16)) (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517). Albert's instruction to the preachers offered full remission of sins and of the pains of purgatory to those who were contrite, had confessed, prayed in seven churches and gave according to their rank. For souls already in purgatory it offered full remission by way of intercession, and for this the giver need not be contrite or have confessed (Instructio summaria preamble and first and fourth graces (Kidd no. 6, pp. 13–16)). The teaching behind such grants had been stated by Pope Clement VI in 1343: the merits of Christ, with those of Mary and the elect, form a treasure that the popes dispense to the penitent for the remission of temporal punishment (Clement VI, Unigenitus Kidd no. 1, pp. 1–2).

Among the preachers was the Dominican Johann Tetzel, whom Luther later called the originator of the affair (Luther, Preface to the Latin Writings (1545) on the years 1517–1519). One of Tetzel's sample sermons has dead parents cry out to their children that a small alms would free them from their torments (Tetzel, Sample Sermons second sermon (Kidd no. 8, p. 18)).

On 31 October 1517 Martin Luther, who lectured on theology at Wittenberg (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses heading), wrote to Albert (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517). He had not heard the preachers himself, he said, but grieved at what the people believed: that a letter of indulgence made them sure of salvation, and that souls flew out of purgatory as soon as the money fell into the chest (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517). He asked the archbishop to withdraw the instruction, and he enclosed his own "Disputations" (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517).

These were ninety-five theses in Latin, announced for debate at Wittenberg (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses heading). The first says that Christ, in calling for repentance, "willed that the whole life of believers should be repentance" (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses thesis 1). The pope, Luther argues, can remit only penalties imposed by his own authority or by the canons (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses thesis 5). Those who say that the soul flies out when the penny rings in the box "preach man" (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses thesis 27). Every truly repentant Christian has a right to full remission of penalty and guilt, even without letters of pardon (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses thesis 36), and the true treasure of the church is the gospel (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses thesis 62). The theses do not reject indulgences or the pope: they curse whoever speaks against the truth of apostolic pardons and bless whoever guards against the licence of the preachers (Luther, Ninety-Five Theses theses 71–72).

Whether Luther posted the theses in public that day is not certain. His letter to Albert does not speak of it (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517). In 1545 he recalled that he wrote to the archbishop and to his own bishop and, when they ignored him, published the theses (Luther, Preface to the Latin Writings (1545) on the years 1517–1519). Philip Melanchthon wrote in 1546 that Luther affixed them to the church next to the castle at Wittenberg on the day before All Saints (Melanchthon, Life of Luther part 1).

Luther recalled that he was soon denounced to the pope and ordered to Rome (Luther, Preface to the Latin Writings (1545) on the years 1517–1519). What followed is told under Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Luther's letter to Archbishop Albert is dated from Wittenberg on the vigil of All Saints 1517, that is 31 October, and says that the theses are enclosed (Luther, Letters, to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517). This fixes the day on which he sent them.

That he also posted them on the Castle Church that day rests on Melanchthon's statement of 1546 (Melanchthon, Life of Luther part 1); Melanchthon came to Wittenberg only in 1518 (Luther, Preface to the Latin Writings (1545) on the years 1517–1519). Erwin Iserloh, The Theses Were Not Posted (1968), argued that no posting took place. Volker Leppin and Timothy J. Wengert, "Sources for and against the Posting of the Ninety-Five Theses", Lutheran Quarterly 29 (2015), pp. 373–398, set out the evidence, including a note by Luther's assistant Georg Rörer; one author argues for the posting and the other against it, and together they call the question unresolvable.

Primary sources

Instructio summaria (Summary Instruction for the Indulgence Commissaries) Issued in the name of Albert of Brandenburg, archbishop of Mainz · c. 1517 preamble and first and fourth graces (Kidd no. 6, pp. 13–16)

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to Albert of Mainz, 31 October 1517

Unigenitus Dei Filius Pope Clement VI · 27 January 1343
Kidd no. 1, pp. 1–2

Preface to the Complete Edition of the Latin Writings Martin Luther · 1545 on the years 1517–1519

Sample Sermons for Parish Priests Johann Tetzel · c. 1517 second sermon (Kidd no. 8, p. 18)

The Ninety-Five Theses Martin Luther · 1517 heading; thesis 1; thesis 5; thesis 27; thesis 36; thesis 62; theses 71–72

History of the Life and Acts of Martin Luther Philip Melanchthon · 1546
part 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Wittenberg
Who Martin Luther, Johann Tetzel, Albert of Brandenburg, Leo X
Threads Reform and Reformation, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959
Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003
The Hussites and the Compacts of Basel 1419–1436 964

LEADS TO

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012
Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021
Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification 31 October 1999 1474
Catholics and Lutherans Mark 500 Years of the Reformation Together 31 October 2016 1498

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament Before · 1516 1003
Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms After · 1520–1521 1012

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion Before · 6 July 1439 974
Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms After · 1520–1521 1012

← Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament Earlier · 1516
→ Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms Later · 1520–1521

THE REFORMATION

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms

1520–1521 · Firm date

Leo X condemns forty-one of Luther's propositions in 1520 and excommunicates him in January 1521. Before Charles V at Worms that April, Luther refuses to retract unless convinced by Scripture or evident reason. An imperial edict outlaws him, and he is hidden in a Saxon castle.

In 1520 Martin Luther published three books that set out his case. To the Christian Nobility asked the emperor and the lay rulers to reform the church and denied that only the pope may interpret Scripture or call a council (Luther, To the Christian Nobility part 1, the three walls). The Babylonian Captivity of the Church denied that there are seven sacraments (Luther, Babylonian Captivity Works of Martin Luther 2, p. 177). The Freedom of a Christian taught that faith alone justifies (Luther, Freedom of a Christian opening of the treatise).

The bull Exsurge Domine of Pope Leo X was not an answer to these books: B. J. Kidd's collection dates it 15 June 1520 (Leo X, Exsurge Domine editor's heading in Kidd, no. 38, p. 74), eight days before Luther signed the dedication of the first of them (Luther, To the Christian Nobility dedication to Nicholas von Amsdorf, date). It condemned forty-one propositions taken from Luther's writings, among them that the treasure from which the pope grants indulgences is not the merits of Christ and the saints, that the Roman pontiff is not by Christ's institution his vicar over all churches, and that purgatory cannot be proved from canonical Scripture (Leo X, Exsurge Domine propositions 17, 25 and 37). From such errors, the bull says, it would follow that the church, which the Holy Spirit guides, has always erred, against Christ's promise to be with his disciples to the end of the world. It ordered Luther's books burned, said that he had refused a summons and a safe-conduct, and gave him sixty days to recant (Leo X, Exsurge Domine sections after the forty-one propositions).

On 10 December 1520 Luther burned the bull at Wittenberg with the books of canon law (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, 10 December 1520). On 3 January 1521 a second bull, dated at St Peter's in Rome, declared him a heretic and excommunicated him and all who followed or protected him (Leo X, Decet Romanum Pontificem sections II–III and date).

The emperor Charles V summoned Luther under safe-conduct to the diet at Worms (Luther, Letters, to Charles V, 28 April 1521). On 18 April 1521, asked again whether he would retract his books, Luther answered that unless he was convinced by the testimony of Scripture or by evident reason, since he did not trust popes or councils alone, his conscience was captive to the word of God, and he could not and would not retract anything (Acts of Luther at Worms hearing of 18 April (Kidd no. 42, pp. 82–85)). In the text edited from the manuscripts and first prints the speech ends Gott helf mir. Amen, "God help me. Amen." The words Ich kan nicht anderst, hie stehe ich, "I cannot do otherwise, here I stand", stand in only two prints, both from one Wittenberg press, and the editor judged them an addition (Acts of Luther at Worms close of the speech, with the editor's note (Reichstagsakten 2, pp. 555–556)).

The next day Charles told the estates that a single monk, "led astray by private judgement", had set himself against the faith held by all Christians for a thousand years, and that he would hear him no more (Charles V, Declaration of 19 April 1521 Kidd no. 43, pp. 85–86). The Edict of Worms declared Luther cut off from the church and a manifest heretic, forbade anyone to house, feed or help him, and ordered his arrest and the burning of his books (Edict of Worms §§ 26–31 and 37 (Kidd no. 45, pp. 87–89)).

On 12 May Luther described how he had been "snatched" from his companions and brought by night to a castle (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Amsdorf, 12 May 1521); the editors of his letters identify it as the Wartburg. He later told the elector Frederick the Wise of Saxony that he had hidden for a year in obedience to him (Luther, Letters, to Elector Frederick, 5 March 1522).

See Luther Translates the Bible into German and the Protestation at Speyer.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The second bull is dated 3 January 1521 (Leo X, Decet Romanum Pontificem sections II–III and date). The record of the hearings places them on 17 and 18 April 1521 (Acts of Luther at Worms hearing of 18 April (Kidd no. 42, pp. 82–85)), and the emperor's declaration followed on the 19th (Charles V, Declaration of 19 April 1521 Kidd no. 43, pp. 85–86). B. J. Kidd's collection dates the first bull 15 June 1520 (Leo X, Exsurge Domine editor's heading in Kidd, no. 38, p. 74) and the edict 26 May 1521 (Edict of Worms §§ 26–31 and 37 (Kidd no. 45, pp. 87–89)). Luther's letters fix the burning of the bull on 10 December 1520 (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, 10 December 1520) and his arrival at the castle before 12 May 1521 (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Amsdorf, 12 May 1521); the editors of the letters, Preserved Smith and Charles M. Jacobs (Luther's Correspondence, vol. 2, 1918), identify the castle as the Wartburg.

Primary sources

To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation Martin Luther · 1520 part 1, the three walls; dedication to Nicholas von Amsdorf, date

The Babylonian Captivity of the Church Martin Luther · 1520
Works of Martin Luther 2, p. 177

The Freedom of a Christian Martin Luther · 1520 opening of the treatise

Exsurge Domine Pope Leo X · 15 June 1520
editor's heading in Kidd, no. 38, p. 74; propositions 17, 25 and 37; sections after the forty-one propositions

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to Georg Spalatin, 10 December 1520; to Charles V, 28 April 1521; to Nicholas Amsdorf, 12 May 1521; to Elector Frederick, 5 March 1522

Decet Romanum Pontificem Pope Leo X · 3 January 1521 sections II–III and date

Acts and Deeds of Dr Martin Luther at the Diet of Worms 1521 hearing of 18 April (Kidd no. 42, pp. 82–85); close of the speech, with the editor's note (Reichstagsakten 2, pp. 555–556)

Declaration on Luther, 19 April 1521 Emperor Charles V · 19 April 1521
Kidd no. 43, pp. 85–86

Edict of Worms Issued in the name of Emperor Charles V · May 1521
§§ 26–31 and 37 (Kidd no. 45, pp. 87–89)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Worms, Wittenberg, Rome
Who Martin Luther, Charles V, Leo X, Frederick the Wise Threads Reform and Reformation, Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007

LEADS TO

Luther Translates the Bible into German 1522–1534 1017
The German Peasants' War 1524–1525 1025
The Protestation at Speyer 19 April 1529 1038
England Breaks with Rome 1534 1055
The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Luther's Ninety-five Theses Before · 31 October 1517 1007

Luther Translates the Bible into German After · 1522–1534 1017

CHURCH AND STATE

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic Before · 1493 996

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich After · 29 January 1523 1021

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Luther's Ninety-five Theses Before · 31 October 1517 1007

England Breaks with Rome After · 1534 1055

← Luther's Ninety-five Theses Earlier · 31 October 1517
→ Luther Translates the Bible into German Later · 1522–1534

THE REFORMATION

Luther Translates the Bible into German

1522–1534 · Firm date

In hiding over the winter of 1521–22, Luther translates the New Testament into German; it is printed at Wittenberg in September 1522. The Old Testament follows in parts, and the complete Bible appears in 1534.

In December 1521 Martin Luther, writing from the castle where he was hidden after the events told under Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms, told a friend that he would translate the New Testament into German, “a thing which my friends demand”, and wished that every town had its own interpreter (Luther, Letters, to John Lang, 18 December 1521). By the end of March 1522 he was back in Wittenberg and reported that he had translated the whole New Testament in his “Patmos” and that he and Philip Melanchthon had begun to polish it. He asked for plain words, not those of the court (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, 30 March 1522).

About 20 September 1522 Luther sent finished copies to the Saxon court, lacking only the preface to Romans (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, about 20 September 1522). The book, Das Newe Testament Deutzsch, was printed at Wittenberg by Melchior Lotter, with woodcuts by Lucas Cranach in the Revelation (Luther, September Testament (1522) library record of the copy).

Luther's prefaces told readers how to read. In 1522 he called John's Gospel, Paul's letters and 1 Peter the kernel of the New Testament and wrote that beside them the letter of James was an "epistle of straw", having nothing of the gospel about it; the passage stood only in the edition of 1522 (Luther, Prefaces to the Bible preface to the New Testament, 1522 (Works 6, pp. 443–444)). He set Hebrews, James, Jude and Revelation apart from what he called the chief books, and he did not think James the work of an apostle (Luther, Prefaces to the Bible prefaces to Hebrews and to James and Jude (Works 6, pp. 476–478)).

The Old Testament followed in parts. In November 1522 Luther was "only in Leviticus" and planned to publish the books of Moses first, then the histories, then the prophets (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, 3 November 1522). In December 1523 the second part was finished and he was at work on the third, which he called the hardest and longest (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Hausmann, 4 December 1523). In January 1530 he was about to return to the prophets (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Hausmann, 3 January 1530). The complete Bible, Biblia, das ist, die gantze Heilige Schrifft Deudsch, was printed at Wittenberg by Hans Lufft in 1534 (Luther Bible (1534) museum record of the copy).

In 1530 Luther defended his method in an open letter. Critics objected that he had written "by faith alone" in Romans 3, though the word "alone" is not in Paul's text. He granted that it is in neither the Greek nor the Latin and argued that German idiom and Paul's meaning both require it. A translator, he wrote, must ask "the mother in the home, the children on the street, the common person in the market" how they speak. He recalled that he, Philip and Aurogallus had sometimes spent four days on three lines of Job (Luther, On Translating on Romans 3).

The Roman church gave its own ruling on these questions at the Council of Trent. In 1546 the council declared that the old Latin Vulgate was to be held as authentic in public lectures, disputations, sermons and expositions, and that no one might, in matters of faith and morals, interpret Scripture against the sense held by the church (Council of Trent Session 4, decree on the edition and use of the sacred books).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Luther's letters date the work: the plan in December 1521 (Luther, Letters, to John Lang, 18 December 1521), the finished draft of the New Testament by 30 March 1522 (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, 30 March 1522), and printed copies about 20 September 1522 (Luther, Letters, to Georg Spalatin, about 20 September 1522); the day of that last letter is fixed by its editors, Preserved Smith and Charles M. Jacobs (Luther's Correspondence, vol. 2, 1918), from the publication of the book. The complete Bible carries the year 1534 on its title page (Luther Bible (1534) museum record of the copy).

Primary sources

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to John Lang, 18 December 1521; to Georg Spalatin, 30 March 1522; to Georg Spalatin, about 20 September 1522; to Georg Spalatin, 3 November 1522; to Nicholas Hausmann, 4 December 1523; to Nicholas Hausmann, 3 January 1530

Das Newe Testament Deutzsch (the September Testament, 1522) Translated by Martin Luther · Printed at Wittenberg, September 1522 library record of the copy

Prefaces to the Books of the Bible Martin Luther · 1522–1545 preface to the New Testament, 1522 (Works 6, pp. 443–444); prefaces to Hebrews and to James and Jude (Works 6, pp. 476–478)

Biblia, das ist, die gantze Heilige Schrifft Deudsch (1534) Translated by Martin Luther and his colleagues at Wittenberg · Printed at Wittenberg, 1534 museum record of the copy

An Open Letter on Translating Martin Luther · 8 September 1530 on Romans 3

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 4, decree on the edition and use of the sacred books

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Wartburg, Wittenberg
Who Martin Luther, Philip Melanchthon
Threads Scripture and Canon, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

LEADS TO

Tyndale's English New Testament 1526 1034

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament Before · 1516 1003

Tyndale's English New Testament After · 1526 1034

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms Before · 1520–1521 1012

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich After · 29 January 1523 1021

← Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms Earlier · 1520–1521
→ Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich Later · 29 January 1523

THE REFORMATION

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich

29 January 1523 · Firm date

Zwingli, preacher at Zurich's Great Minster, defends his teaching in sixty-seven articles before the city council on 29 January 1523. The council rules that he is to go on preaching, and by Easter 1525 it has abolished the mass in the city.

Huldrych Zwingli was canon and preacher at the Great Minster of Zurich (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation decree of 29 January 1523 (Selected Works, pp. 92–94)). He wrote in 1522 that three years earlier he had begun by preaching through the whole Gospel of Matthew, then Acts and letters of Paul and Peter, and that when he began he had not yet heard the name of those whose follower he was now said to be (Zwingli, Archeteles Latin Works 1, pp. 238–239).

In Lent 1522 a witness told the council that sausages had been cut up and eaten in the house of a printer on Ash Wednesday, and that Zwingli was present and did not eat (Zurich council records inquiry of March 1522 (Kidd no. 171, pp.

390–391)). Zwingli then published a tract which argued from Scripture that "according to divine law no kind of food is forbidden to man at any time" (Zwingli, On the Choice of Foods Latin Works 1, p. 110).

On 3 January 1523 the burgomaster and councils summoned the clergy of their territory to appear on 29 January and argue, in German and from Scripture, the matters in dispute, and they invited the bishop of Constance to send representatives (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation the council's mandate and the opening (Selected Works, pp. 43–45)). For the day Zwingli issued sixty-seven articles, which he offered to defend from Scripture and from Scripture only (Zwingli, Sixty-seven Articles preamble). They say that the gospel does not depend on the approval of the church, that Christ is the only way to salvation and the only eternal high priest, that the mass is not a sacrifice but a remembrance of Christ's one sacrifice and an assurance of the salvation he has given, that Christians may eat any food at any time, that marriage is permitted to all, and that Scripture knows nothing of a purgatory after this life (Zwingli, Sixty-seven Articles articles 1, 3, 17, 18, 24, 28 and 57).

More than six hundred people gathered in the town hall (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation the council's mandate and the opening (Selected Works, pp. 43–45)). The bishop's vicar general, Johann Faber, declined to debate old customs there. Such matters, he said, belonged before a general council or the universities, because changes made at Zurich would not be accepted by Christians elsewhere (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation speech of Johann Faber (Selected Works, pp. 50–52)). That afternoon the council decreed that, since no one had refuted Zwingli from Scripture, he should continue to preach the gospel as before, and that the other clergy should preach nothing they could not defend from Scripture (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation decree of 29 January 1523 (Selected Works, pp. 92–94)).

The council went on by stages. After a second disputation, a mandate of 27 October 1523 left images and the mass as they were for the time being (Zurich council records mandate of 27 October 1523 (Kidd no. 198, p. 438)). The Zurich chronicler Heinrich Bullinger reports that in June 1524 the council had the shrines of the martyrs Felix and Regula removed from the Great Minster and stopped the playing of organs (Zurich council records Egli no. 547, from Bullinger (Kidd no. 203, pp. 442–443)). On 12 April 1525 it ordered that no mass be said any more and that the Lord's Supper be held according to a printed order; a chronicler notes that the majority was small (Zurich council records Egli no. 684, 12 April 1525 (p. 306; English extract in Kidd no. 205)).

Some of those who had followed Zwingli soon broke with him and with the council; see the First Anabaptists.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The council's summons is dated 3 January 1523 and names 29 January as the day of the hearing; its decree bears the same date (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation the council's mandate and the opening (Selected Works, pp. 43–45)) (Acts of the First Zurich Disputation decree of 29 January 1523 (Selected Works, pp. 92–94)). The entry is placed at that day. The other steps are dated by the council's records: the mandate on images and the mass on 27 October 1523 (Zurich council records mandate of 27 October 1523 (Kidd no. 198, p. 438)) and the end of the mass on 12 April 1525 (Zurich council records Egli no. 684, 12 April 1525 (p. 306; English extract in Kidd no. 205)).

Primary sources

Acts of the First Zurich Disputation Erhard Hegenwald · 1523 decree of 29 January 1523 (Selected Works, pp. 92–94); the council's mandate and the opening (Selected Works, pp. 43–45); speech of Johann Faber (Selected Works, pp. 50–52)

Archeteles Huldrych Zwingli · 22–23 August 1522
Latin Works 1, pp. 238–239

Records of the Zurich Council on the Reformation, 1519–1533 1519–1533 inquiry of March 1522 (Kidd no. 171, pp. 390–391); mandate of 27 October 1523 (Kidd no. 198, p. 438); Egli no. 547, from Bullinger (Kidd no. 203, pp. 442–443); Egli no. 684, 12 April 1525 (p. 306; English extract in Kidd no. 205)

Concerning Choice and Liberty Respecting Food Huldrych Zwingli · 16 April 1522
Latin Works 1, p. 110

The Sixty-seven Articles Huldrych Zwingli · January 1523 preamble; articles 1, 3, 17, 18, 24, 28 and 57

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Zurich
Who Huldrych Zwingli
Threads Reform and Reformation, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther's Ninety-five Theses 31 October 1517 1007
Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

LEADS TO

The First Anabaptists 21 January 1525 1029
Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg 1 October 1529 1042
Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Luther Translates the Bible into German Before · 1522–1534 1017
The German Peasants' War After · 1524–1525 1025

CHURCH AND STATE

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms Before · 1520–1521 1012
The German Peasants' War After · 1524–1525 1025

← Luther Translates the Bible into German Earlier · 1522–1534
→ The German Peasants' War Later · 1524–1525

THE REFORMATION

The German Peasants' War

1524–1525 · Firm date

In 1525 peasants in Swabia, Franconia and Thuringia rise, arguing their demands from the gospel in twelve printed articles. Luther first blames lords and peasants alike, then urges the rulers to strike the rebels down. Thomas Müntzer is taken at Frankenhausen in May.

Early in 1525 a pamphlet of twelve articles was printed in the name of the peasants. Its preface denies that the gospel is the cause of revolt. The articles ask that each community may choose and dismiss its own pastor, that the tithe of grain support the pastor and the poor, and that serfdom end, "considering that Christ has delivered and redeemed us all". They ask for game, fish, wood and common land to be free again, and the last offers to withdraw any article shown to be against the word of God. Modern editors attribute the text to Sebastian Lotzer, a furrier at Memmingen in Swabia (Twelve Articles preface and articles 1–5, 10 and 12, with the editors' abstract).

In July 1524 the preacher Thomas Müntzer had told the dukes of Saxony that the sword was given to rulers to wipe out the godless, and that if they would not use it, it would be taken from them (Müntzer, Sermon to the Princes title and closing sections).

Martin Luther answered the articles in his Admonition to Peace. He told the princes and bishops that they had no one but themselves to thank for the rising, because they flayed and robbed their subjects (Luther, Admonition to Peace to the princes and lords (Works 4, pp. 220–221)). He told the peasants that they bore God's name in vain, since Christians suffer wrong and do not fight for themselves (Luther, Admonition to Peace to the peasants (Works 4, pp. 225–226 and 233)), and that the demand to end serfdom turned Christian freedom into a bodily thing (Luther, Admonition to Peace on the third article (Works 4, p. 240)). Both sides were in the wrong, he wrote, and nobles and town councillors should be chosen to settle the matter (Luther, Admonition to Peace admonition to both (Works 4, p. 244)).

In May, with the rising spreading, Luther published Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants. The peasants, it says, have broken their oaths, robbed and rebelled, and covered it all with the gospel. A rebel is outside the law, and anyone who can should strike him down, secretly or openly, as one must kill a "mad dog" (Luther, Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes Works 4, pp. 248–249). A Christian ruler should first pray and offer terms and then use the sword; whoever dies on the rulers' side may be a martyr, and Luther urges: "Stab, smite, slay" (Luther, Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes Works 4, pp. 251–253).

In the middle of May Müntzer was captured with the rebel army at Frankenhausen; a confession taken from him was printed with the date 16 May 1525, and the library that holds the pamphlet describes it as obtained under torture (Müntzer, Confession title of the pamphlet, with the library's description). On 23 May Luther wrote that it was pitiful to be so cruel to "the poor people", but that God willed it, so that fear might restrain them (Luther, Letters, to John Rühel, 23 May 1525). A week later he wrote that it was better for all the peasants to be killed than for the princes and magistrates to perish, and he reported that he was now being called a toady of princes (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Amsdorf, 30 May 1525).

Luther did not withdraw what he had written. "It is enough that my conscience is clear before God," he told a friend who passed on the criticism (Luther, Letters, to John Rühel, 30 May 1525).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Müntzer's sermon is dated 13 July 1524 (Müntzer, Sermon to the Princes title and closing sections). The Twelve Articles carry no date; the editors of the text cited place their drafting between 27 February and 1 March 1525 (Twelve Articles preface and articles 1–5, 10 and 12, with the editors' abstract). C. M. Jacobs, in Works of Martin Luther, vol. 4 (1931), says that Luther received the articles shortly before 16 April 1525, that the Admonition appeared early in May, and that the tract against the peasants was written about 4 May and published before the middle of the month. Müntzer's printed confession is dated the Tuesday after Cantate, 16 May 1525 (Müntzer, Confession title of the pamphlet, with the library's description). B. J. Kidd, Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation (1911), p. 170, dates the battle of Frankenhausen 15 May, and Preserved Smith and Charles M. Jacobs, Luther's Correspondence, vol. 2 (1918), p. 318, give 27 May for Müntzer's execution at Mühlhausen.

Primary sources

The Twelve Articles of the Peasants Early 1525 preface and articles 1–5, 10 and 12, with the editors' abstract

Sermon to the Princes (Exposition of the Second Chapter of Daniel) Thomas Müntzer · 13 July 1524 title and closing sections

Admonition to Peace: A Reply to the Twelve Articles of the Peasants in Swabia Martin Luther · April–May 1525 to the princes and lords (Works 4, pp. 220–221); to the peasants (Works 4, pp. 225–226 and 233); on the third article (Works 4, p. 240); admonition to both (Works 4, p. 244)

Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants Martin Luther · May 1525
Works 4, pp. 248–249; Works 4, pp. 251–253

Confession of Thomas Müntzer (1525) Thomas Müntzer, as recorded by his interrogators · 16 May 1525 title of the pamphlet, with the library's description

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to John Rühel, 23 May 1525; to Nicholas Amsdorf, 30 May 1525; to John Rühel, 30 May 1525

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Memmingen, Frankenhausen
Who Thomas Müntzer, Martin Luther Threads Church and State, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012

CHURCH AND STATE

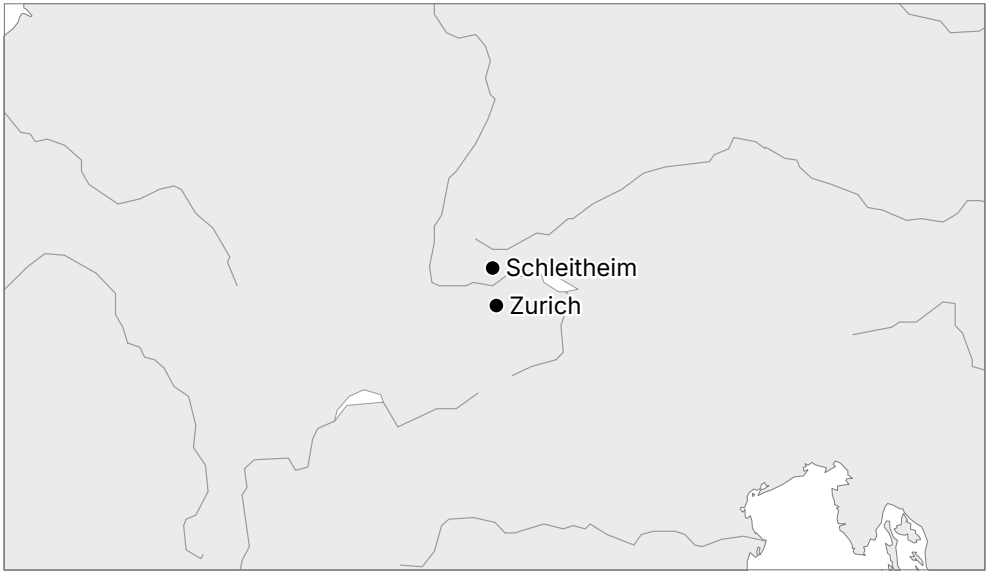
Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich Before · 29 January 1523 1021

The First Anabaptists After · 21 January 1525 1029

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich Before · 29 January 1523 1021

The First Anabaptists After · 21 January 1525 1029



← Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich Earlier · 29 January 1523
→ The First Anabaptists Later · 21 January 1525

THE REFORMATION

The First Anabaptists

21 January 1525 · Firm date

In January 1525 former followers of Zwingli at Zurich begin to baptise adults on confession of faith. The council answers with banishment and, from 1526, with death by drowning; Felix Manz is drowned in 1527. The Schleitheim articles of that year state what they believed.

In September 1524 Conrad Grebel, Felix Manz and four companions at Zurich wrote to Thomas Müntzer. They wanted the Lord's Supper kept with ordinary bread and the words of Scripture only, called the baptism of infants senseless and contrary to all Scripture, and held that the gospel and those who follow it are not to be protected with the sword (Grebel, Letter to Müntzer 5 September 1524).

The council of Zurich held a disputation and on 18 January 1525 ordered all unbaptised children to be baptised within a week, on pain of banishment. On 21 January it forbade Grebel and Manz to dispute further and expelled four of their associates (Zurich council records mandates of 18 and 21 January 1525 (Egli nos. 621–624; Kidd no. 211, pp. 453–454)).

The chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren, written later, tells what the group did. Grebel, Manz and George Blaurock, a priest from Chur, were together with others. After prayer Blaurock stood up and asked Grebel to baptise him with true Christian baptism on his faith; Grebel did so, there being no ordained minister for such a work; and the others then asked Blaurock to baptise them (Hutterite Chronicle pp. 34–35). Within three weeks the council was questioning villagers of Zollikon whom Manz and Blaurock had baptised (Zurich council records hearing of early February 1525 (Egli no. 636; Kidd no. 212, p. 454)).

On 7 March 1526 the council decreed that anyone who baptised another would be "drowned without mercy" (Zurich council records mandate of 7 March 1526 (Egli no. 936; Kidd no. 213, p. 455)). Huldrych Zwingli reported the decision to a friend that day. He would not have wished reborn Christianity to begin with such examples, he wrote, but God had once struck down Ananias to forestall greater evils (Zwingli, Letters, to Vadian, 7 March 1526 (Kidd no. 213, pp. 455–456)). On 5 January 1527 the court sentenced Manz, who had baptised again after swearing to stop, to be bound, taken out in a boat and thrown into the water to die (Zurich council records sentence of 5 January 1527 (Egli no. 1109, pp. 529–530)). The same day Blaurock was whipped through the city and banished, on pain of drowning if he returned (Zurich council records sentence of 5 January 1527 (Egli no. 1110, pp. 530–531)).

On 24 February 1527 a meeting at Schleitheim agreed seven articles. Baptism is for those who have learned repentance and believe, which excludes all infant baptism. The sword is ordained by God outside the "perfection of Christ" and belongs to the worldly magistrates; within that perfection only the ban is used. Christians are not to swear at all (Schleitheim Confession articles 1, 6 and 7 and closing date, with the editors' abstract). Their drafting is attributed to Michael Sattler (Schleitheim Confession articles 1, 6 and 7 and closing date, with the editors' abstract). That May he was tried on charges brought in the name of the emperor's governor: breaking the imperial mandate, denying that the body and blood of Christ are present in the sacrament, rejecting infant baptism and oaths, and saying that the Turks should not be resisted. His tongue was cut out, his body was torn with hot tongs and he was burned; his wife was drowned a few days later (Martyrs Mirror pp. 416–418). Blaurock was burned near Klausen in Tyrol in 1529 (Martyrs Mirror p. 430).

The other reformers rejected this teaching: at Marburg in 1529 Luther and Zwingli signed together that infant baptism is right and that a Christian may hold civil authority (Marburg Articles articles 12 and 14).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The year is fixed by the council's mandates of 18 and 21 January 1525 (Zurich council records mandates of 18 and 21 January 1525 (Egli nos. 621–624; Kidd no. 211, pp. 453–454)) and by the hearing of the first people baptised, held within three weeks (Zurich council records hearing of early February 1525 (Egli no. 636; Kidd no. 212, p. 454)). No source read for this entry names the day of the first baptism: the Hutterite chronicle gives none (Hutterite Chronicle pp. 34–35). Fritz Blanke, Brothers in Christ (1961; German original 1955), places it on the evening of 21 January 1525, the day of the council's second mandate, and the entry follows him.

The Martyrs Mirror puts the death of Manz in 1526; the court's sentence is dated the Saturday before Epiphany 1527, that is 5 January (Zurich council records sentence of 5 January 1527 (Egli no. 1109, pp. 529–530)). The Schleitheim articles are dated St Matthias's day 1527, 24 February (Schleitheim Confession articles 1, 6 and 7 and closing date, with the editors' abstract). The Martyrs Mirror dates Sattler's execution 21 May 1527 (Martyrs Mirror pp. 416–418).

Primary sources

Letter to Thomas Müntzer Conrad Grebel and his companions · 5 September 1524
5 September 1524

Records of the Zurich Council on the Reformation, 1519–1533 1519–1533
mandates of 18 and 21 January 1525 (Egli nos. 621–624; Kidd no. 211, pp. 453–454); hearing of early February 1525 (Egli no. 636; Kidd no. 212, p. 454); mandate of 7 March 1526 (Egli no. 936; Kidd no. 213, p. 455); sentence of 5 January 1527 (Egli no. 1109, pp. 529–530); sentence of 5 January 1527 (Egli no. 1110, pp. 530–531)

The Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren Begun by Kaspar Braitmichel and continued by others · Begun in the sixteenth century; carried down to 1665
pp. 34–35

Letters Huldrych Zwingli · The letters cited date from 1526 and 1529 to Vadian, 7 March 1526 (Kidd no. 213, pp. 455–456)

The Schleitheim Confession (Brotherly Union) Swiss Brethren assembled at Schleitheim; drafted by Michael Sattler · 24 February 1527 articles 1, 6 and 7 and closing date, with the editors' abstract

Martyrs Mirror Thieleman J. van Braght · 1660
pp. 416–418; p. 430

The Marburg Articles Drafted by Martin Luther; signed by ten theologians · October 1529 articles 12 and 14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Zurich, Schleitheim
Who Conrad Grebel, Felix Manz, George Blaurock, Michael Sattler
Threads Reform and Reformation, Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021

LEADS TO

The First Baptist Congregations 1609 1146

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The German Peasants' War Before · 1524–1525 1025
The Protestation at Speyer After · 19 April 1529 1038

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Spanish Inquisition and the Expulsion of the Jews Before · 1478–1492 987
Tyndale's English New Testament After · 1526 1034

CHURCH AND STATE

The German Peasants' War Before · 1524–1525 1025

The Protestation at Speyer After · 19 April 1529 1038

← The German Peasants' War Earlier · 1524–1525
→ Tyndale's English New Testament Later · 1526

THE REFORMATION

Tyndale's English New Testament

1526 · Firm date

William Tyndale, unable to work in England, has his English New Testament printed at Worms in 1526. The bishop of London bans it and Thomas More writes against it. Tyndale is strangled and burned at Vilvoorde in 1536.

John Foxe tells that William Tyndale, disputing with a learned man who set the pope's laws above God's, answered that if God spared his life he would cause "a boy that driveth the plough" to know more of Scripture than his opponent did (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, p. 117 (Cattley)). Refused a place in the household of Cuthbert Tunstall, bishop of London, he concluded, Foxe continues, that there was no place to translate the New Testament "in all England", and left for Germany (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, pp. 117–118 (Cattley)).

A first printing was begun at Cologne. Its surviving sheets open with a prologue: "I have here translated, brethren and sisters, most dear and tenderly beloved in Christ, the New Testament, for your spiritual edifying, consolation, and solace" (Tyndale, Cologne New Testament (1525) opening of the prologue (Parker Society edition, p. 7, note)). Johannes Cochlaeus, an opponent of Luther then living in Cologne, wrote years later that he learned of the work from the printers, that the city's senate stopped it at his prompting, and that the two Englishmen fled up the Rhine to Worms with the printed sheets (Cochlaeus, Commentaria under the year 1526 (Arber, pp. 22–24)).

The complete New Testament came out as a small book naming neither place nor printer; the library at Stuttgart, which holds the one copy with its title page, assigns it to the press of Peter Schöffer at Worms in 1526 (Tyndale, New Testament (1526) the Stuttgart library's description of its copy). On 11 August 1526 Georg Spalatin noted a report that six thousand copies of the New Testament in English had been printed at Worms (Spalatin, Diary 11 August 1526 (Arber, pp. 25–26)). In an address to the reader at the end, Tyndale says that he "had no man to counterfeit", no English version to follow, and asks that his work be counted "as a thing begun rather than finished" (Tyndale, New Testament (1526) epistle to the reader (Parker Society edition, p. 390)).

In a prohibition dated 23 October 1526, Tunstall ordered every copy in his diocese to be handed in within thirty days on pain of excommunication. Supporters of Luther's sect, he wrote, had mixed heretical articles and erroneous opinions into the translation (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 4, pp. 666–667 (Cattley)). Thomas More defended the burning of the book. It deserved to be called Tyndale's or Luther's testament, he argued, because it wrongly and with intent put "seniors" for priests, "congregation" for church and "love" for charity (More, Dialogue Concerning Heresies book 3, chapter 8). More added that the church's law did not forbid an English Bible as such, and that a translation by a sound Catholic scholar, approved by the bishops, would be good (More, Dialogue Concerning Heresies book 3, chapter 16). Tyndale's own argument, in a book of 1528, was that Scripture "ought to be in the mother tongue", as the law of Moses and the psalms had been in Israel's (Tyndale, Obedience of a Christian Man preface (Parker Society edition, p. 144)).

Tyndale lived mostly at Antwerp (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, p. 119 (Cattley)). Foxe tells that he was betrayed, held for a year and a half in the castle of Vilvoorde, condemned under the emperor's decree, strangled at the stake and burned in 1536, crying, "Lord! open the king of England's eyes" (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, pp. 123 and 127 (Cattley)).

For the later English Bible see the King James Bible.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The book carries no date or place (Tyndale, New Testament (1526) the Stuttgart library's description of its copy). The year 1526 rests on Spalatin's note of 11 August 1526 that an English New Testament had been printed at Worms (Spalatin, Diary 11 August 1526 (Arber, pp. 25–26)) and on Bishop Tunstall's prohibition, dated 23 October 1526 as Foxe prints it (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 4, pp. 666–667 (Cattley)). Foxe himself puts the translation "about A.D. 1527" (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, p. 119 (Cattley)). Edward Arber, The First Printed English New Testament (1871), p. 26, has Tyndale arrive at Worms from the interrupted printing at Cologne in October 1525. For Tyndale's death Foxe gives the year 1536 and no day (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 5, pp. 123 and 127 (Cattley)).

Primary sources

Acts and Monuments John Foxe · 1563; enlarged editions in 1570, 1576 and 1583
vol. 5, p. 117 (Cattley); vol. 5, pp. 117–118 (Cattley); vol. 4, pp. 666–667 (Cattley); vol. 5, p. 119 (Cattley); vol. 5, pp. 123 and 127 (Cattley)

The Cologne Fragment of Tyndale's New Testament (1525) Translated by William Tyndale · Printed at Cologne, 1525 opening of the prologue (Parker Society edition, p. 7, note)

Commentaries on the Acts and Writings of Martin Luther Johannes Cochlaeus · 1549
under the year 1526 (Arber, pp. 22–24)

The New Testament in English (Worms, 1526) Translated by William Tyndale · Printed at Worms, 1526
the Stuttgart library's description of its copy; epistle to the reader (Parker Society edition, p. 390)

Diary Georg Spalatin · Entry of 11 August 1526
11 August 1526 (Arber, pp. 25–26)

A Dialogue Concerning Heresies Thomas More · Revised edition dated 1530 book 3, chapter 8; book 3, chapter 16

The Obedience of a Christian Man William Tyndale · 1528 preface (Parker Society edition, p. 144)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Worms, Antwerp, Vilvoorde
Who William Tyndale, Thomas More
Threads Scripture and Canon, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Wycliffe and the First English Bible c. 1382 950
Luther Translates the Bible into German 1522–1534 1017
Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

LEADS TO

The King James Bible 1611 1151

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Luther Translates the Bible into German Before · 1522–1534 1017
The Council of Trent After · 1545–1563 1075

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The First Anabaptists Before · 21 January 1525 1029
The Burning of Protestants under Mary I After · 1555–1558 1087

← The First Anabaptists Earlier · 21 January 1525
→ The Protestation at Speyer Later · 19 April 1529

THE REFORMATION

The Protestation at Speyer

19 April 1529 · Firm date

At the diet of Speyer in April 1529 the majority revokes the latitude that the diet of 1526 had left to each ruler in religion. A group of princes and fourteen cities enter a formal protest, holding that in matters of salvation each must answer to God for himself.

The Edict of Worms of 1521 had outlawed Martin Luther, forbidden his books and ordered his supporters to be seized (Edict of Worms §§ 26–29). In 1526 a diet at Speyer resolved unanimously that, until a council met, each estate would "so live, govern, and carry himself" in the matters touched by the edict "as he hopes and trusts to answer it to God and His Imperial Majesty" (Recess of Speyer (1526) § 4 (Kidd no. 90, p. 185)).

The diet met at Speyer again in March 1529. The proposition put to it in the name of the emperor Charles V complained that pernicious doctrines were increasing daily, forbade anyone to go over to a new sect before the council, and said that several estates had expounded the article of 1526 at their pleasure, to the great trouble of the faith. The emperor therefore annulled it by his own power (Diet of Speyer (1529) proposition, §§ 1, 4 and 7 (Kidd no. 104, pp. 240–241)). On 7 April the majority resolved that those who had kept the Edict of Worms should keep to it until the council; that the other estates should prevent all further innovation as far as was humanly possible; that doctrines denying the sacrament of Christ's body and blood should not be tolerated; and that no one should be forbidden or hindered from celebrating or hearing mass (Diet of Speyer (1529) majority resolution, §§ 5–7 (Kidd no. 105, p. 242)).

A minority refused. In their protest the elector John of Saxony and his allies told the majority that they held its resolution "null and not binding" on themselves and their people. They would go on, by the recess of 1526, so to live and govern as they trusted to answer before God and the emperor (Protestation of Speyer protest (Kidd no. 107a, pp. 243–244)). The appeal drawn up on 25 April gives two grounds. A recess adopted unanimously can only be altered unanimously. And "in matters which concern God's honour and the salvation and eternal life of our souls, every one must stand and give account before God for himself" (Protestation of Speyer instrument of appeal (Kidd no. 107b, pp. 244–245)).

The appeal names John of Saxony, Margrave George of Brandenburg, Dukes Ernest and Francis of Brunswick-Lüneburg, Landgrave Philip of Hesse and Prince Wolfgang of Anhalt (Protestation of Speyer instrument of appeal, opening (Ney, pp. 29–30)). The envoys of fourteen cities adhered to it: Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, Kempten, Nördlingen, Heilbronn, Reutlingen, Isny, St Gallen, Weissenburg and Windsheim (Protestation of Speyer instrument of appeal, close (Ney, p. 94)).

The protest was made by rulers for themselves and their people (Protestation of Speyer protest (Kidd no. 107a, pp. 243–244)). The same princes, with the cities of Nuremberg and Reutlingen, put their names the next year to the confession presented to the emperor at Augsburg (Augsburg Confession conclusion, signatures); see the Augsburg Confession and, for the months between, Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

B. J. Kidd, Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation (1911), dates the majority's resolution 7 April and the protest 19 April 1529 (Protestation of Speyer protest (Kidd no. 107a, pp. 243–244)); the timeline follows him. Julius Ney's edition of the documents (1906) notes that the early prints date the written protestation 20 April. The instrument of appeal was drawn up on 25 April (Protestation of Speyer instrument of appeal (Kidd no. 107b, pp. 244–245)). Kidd adds that the name "Protestant" comes from this protest.

Primary sources

Edict of Worms Issued in the name of Emperor Charles V · May 1521
§§ 26–29

Recess of the Diet of Speyer (1526) 27 August 1526
§ 4 (Kidd no. 90, p. 185)

Proposition and Majority Resolution of the Diet of Speyer (1529) 15 March and 7 April 1529 proposition, §§ 1, 4 and 7 (Kidd no. 104, pp. 240–241); majority resolution, §§ 5–7 (Kidd no. 105, p. 242)

Protestation and Appeal of the Evangelical Estates at Speyer (1529) 19–25 April 1529 protest (Kidd no. 107a, pp. 243–244); instrument of appeal (Kidd no. 107b, pp. 244–245); instrument of appeal, opening (Ney, pp. 29–30); instrument of appeal, close (Ney, p. 94)

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
conclusion, signatures

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Speyer
Who Charles V, Philip of Hesse, John of Saxony
Threads Church and State, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012

LEADS TO

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg 1 October 1529 1042
The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046
The Peace of Augsburg 25 September 1555 1084

CHURCH AND STATE

The First Anabaptists Before · 21 January 1525 1029
England Breaks with Rome After · 1534 1055

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The First Anabaptists Before · 21 January 1525 1029
Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg After · 1 October 1529 1042

← Tyndale's English New Testament Earlier · 1526
→ Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg Later · 1 October 1529

THE REFORMATION

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg

1 October 1529 · Firm date

In October 1529 Philip of Hesse brings Luther and Zwingli together at Marburg. They sign fourteen articles of agreement and a fifteenth recording that they could not agree whether Christ's body and blood are bodily present in the bread and wine.

Landgrave Philip of Hesse called the reformers of Wittenberg and those of the Swiss and south German cities to his court at Marburg (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg). His chancellor opened the public session by urging them to seek God's glory and brotherly unity (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg).

Martin Luther and his party arrived on Thursday 30 September 1529 (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg). The landgrave first had the leaders talk in private pairs, Luther with Johannes Oecolampadius and Philip Melanchthon with Huldrych Zwingli; four sessions followed before the landgrave and no more than twenty-four hearers (Zwingli, Letters, to Vadian, 20 October 1529).

The question was how to understand Christ's words "this is my body" (Matthew 26:26). Andreas Osiander, who sat with Luther's party, reports that Luther wrote the words on the table in chalk. Zwingli argued from the saying "The flesh profits nothing" (John 6:63) that a bodily eating would be useless, and from texts on Christ's likeness to us that his body, like ours, can be in only one place. Luther answered that John 6 does not speak of the Supper and that God can keep a body in one place, in many or in none. Asked for his proof from Scripture, he lifted the cloth and pointed to the chalked words (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg).

No agreement was reached on this point. Osiander says that his side would have accepted the others as brothers if they had confessed that Christ's body is present in the Supper, in whatever manner, and that they would not; they in turn asked to be received as brothers and to share communion, and this was refused. It was then agreed that Luther should set down the chief articles of faith and that all should sign (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg).

Ten theologians signed fifteen articles. Fourteen record agreement, from the Trinity and justification by faith to infant baptism and civil authority (Marburg Articles articles 1–14 and signatures). The fifteenth says that both sides hold the sacrament of the altar to be a sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, and the spiritual partaking of that body and blood to be necessary for every Christian. It then states that they have not agreed at this time whether the true body and blood of Christ are bodily present in the bread and wine, and that each side should show the other Christian love, as far as conscience allows, and pray God for a right understanding (Marburg Articles article 15).

The two sides reported the outcome differently. Luther wrote to his wife that "although we object to be brethren, we wish to live at peace" (Luther, Letters, to his wife, 4 October 1529). Zwingli wrote that Luther had been beaten in the eyes of fair judges, and that the papists could no longer hope to win Luther over now that the two parties agreed on the other doctrines (Zwingli, Letters, to Vadian, 20 October 1529).

The confession presented at Augsburg the next year teaches that the body and blood of Christ are truly present and distributed in the Supper, and rejects those who teach otherwise (Augsburg Confession article 10); see the Augsburg Confession.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Osiander's report gives the days of the week: Luther's party arrived on a Thursday, private talks were held on the Friday, the public debate on the Saturday and Sunday, and the articles were worked out on the Monday (Osiander, Report on Marburg report to the council of Nuremberg). In 1529 these were 30 September and 1 to 4 October. The articles as printed are dated 3 October 1529 (Marburg Articles articles 1–14 and signatures); Luther wrote on 4 October that the conference was almost ended (Luther, Letters, to his wife, 4 October 1529). The entry is placed at 1 October, when the talks began.

Primary sources

Scripture

Matthew 26:26; John 6:63

Report on the Marburg Colloquy Andreas Osiander · October 1529 report to the council of Nuremberg

Letters Huldrych Zwingli · The letters cited date from 1526 and 1529
to Vadian, 20 October 1529

The Marburg Articles Drafted by Martin Luther; signed by ten theologians · October 1529 articles 1–14 and signatures; article 15

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to his wife, 4 October 1529

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
article 10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Marburg

Who Martin Luther, Huldrych Zwingli, Philip of Hesse, Philip Melanchthon Threads Reform and Reformation, Creeds and Councils, Temple and Worship

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021

The Protestation at Speyer 19 April 1529 1038

LEADS TO

The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Protestation at Speyer Before · 19 April 1529 1038

The Augsburg Confession After · 25 June 1530 1046

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion Before · 6 July 1439 974

The Augsburg Confession After · 25 June 1530 1046

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela Before · c. 1200 878

The Book of Common Prayer After · 1549–1552 1080

← The Protestation at Speyer Earlier · 19 April 1529
→ The Augsburg Confession Later · 25 June 1530

THE REFORMATION

The Augsburg Confession

25 June 1530 · Firm date

At the Diet of Augsburg seven princes and two cities present the emperor Charles V with a statement of their faith in twenty-eight articles, drawn up by Philip Melanchthon. Lutheran princes and cities bind themselves to it again in the Book of Concord of 1580.

The emperor Charles V summoned the estates of the empire to Augsburg to deliberate on defence against the Turks and on the division in religion, and asked them to submit their opinions on the second matter in German and Latin. The Lutheran princes answered with a statement of what was taught in their lands (Augsburg Confession Preface 1–8). Martin Luther was not at the diet (Luther, Letters, to Justus Jonas, 9 July 1530). The text was drawn up by Philip Melanchthon (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Hausmann, 6 July 1530). In May Luther had read what he calls “Philip’s Apology” and told the elector John of Saxony that he was delighted with it and could not himself have worded it “so softly and sweetly” (Luther, Letters, to the elector John, 15 May 1530).

On Saturday 25 June 1530 the confession was presented to the emperor (Melanchthon, Letters, to Luther, 27 June 1530 (no. 744)). Luther, passing on what Justus Jonas had written to him, says that it was read by Dr Christian Beyer before the emperor and the princes and bishops of the empire (Luther, Letters, to Nicholas Hausmann, 6 July 1530). It carries the names of the elector John of Saxony, six other princes and the cities of Nuremberg and Reutlingen (Augsburg Confession Conclusion 8–17).

The first twenty-one articles set out teaching. Article 4 says that people "cannot be justified before God by their own strength, merits, or works, but are freely justified for Christ's sake, through faith", when they believe that they are received into favour and that their sins are forgiven for Christ's sake; "this faith God imputes for righteousness in His sight" (Augsburg Confession IV). Article 7 calls the church the congregation of saints in which the Gospel is rightly taught and the sacraments are rightly administered (Augsburg Confession VII). Article 10 teaches that the body and blood of Christ are truly present in the Lord's Supper and are distributed to those who eat it (Augsburg Confession X). The signers add that this teaching varies in nothing from Scripture, from the catholic church or from the church of Rome as known from its writers, and that the disagreement is about certain abuses (Augsburg Confession XXI 5–6). Seven further articles defend changes made in their churches, among them communion in both kinds and the marriage of priests (Augsburg Confession XXII–XXVIII).

The emperor referred the confession to learned men of several nations, and their reply, the Confutation, is dated 3 August 1530 in the edition cited (Confutation heading and preamble). On article 4 it agrees that no one can merit eternal life by his own powers without grace, and it holds it contrary to Scripture to deny that works done with the help of grace are meritorious, though of themselves, it says, our works have no merit and it is God's grace that makes them worthy of eternal life (Confutation on article IV). It rejects the ascription of justification to faith alone (Confutation on article VI). Melanchthon relates that the emperor demanded assent to the Confutation and did not receive the defence, the Apology, which the princes offered in return (Apology of the Augsburg Confession Preface 1–8).

The Lutheran princes and cities who published the Book of Concord in 1580 declared that they held to the confession presented in 1530 and to no other (Book of Concord, Preface 16). The Peace of Augsburg forbade the emperor and the estates to make war on any estate of the empire on account of the Augsburg Confession (Peace of Augsburg § 15). The Joint Declaration confirmed in 1999 recalls that doctrinal condemnations on justification were put forward both in the Lutheran confessions and by the Council of Trent, and states that they do not apply to the teaching of either church as presented in it (Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification 1, 41); see Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The confession's own text gives only the place and the year. The day comes from letters written at the time. On 27 June 1530, a Monday, Melanchthon wrote to Luther that the confession had been presented "last Saturday" (proximo Sabbato) (Melanchthon, Letters, to Luther, 27 June 1530 (no. 744)), which was 25 June.

The "Apology" that Luther read in May is the draft of the confession under its earlier name. B. J. Kidd, Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation (1911), pp. 255–256, sets out the sequence: Melanchthon sent the draft to Luther on 11 May and Luther answered the elector on 15 May.

Primary sources

The Augsburg Confession Drafted by Philip Melanchthon · 1530
Preface 1–8; Conclusion 8–17; IV; VII; X; XXI 5–6; XXII–XXVIII

Letters Martin Luther · 1507–1546
to Justus Jonas, 9 July 1530; to Nicholas Hausmann, 6 July 1530; to the elector John, 15 May 1530

Letters Philip Melanchthon · 1514–1560 to Luther, 27 June 1530 (no. 744)

The Confutation of the Augsburg Confession Theologians commissioned by Charles V · 1530 heading and preamble; on article IV; on article VI

Apology of the Augsburg Confession Philip Melanchthon · Drafted 1530; printed 1531

Preface 1–8

The Book of Concord The Lutheran princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire · 1580

Preface 16

The Religious Peace of Augsburg The imperial diet, in the name of King Ferdinand · 25 September 1555

§ 15

Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification The Lutheran World Federation and the Catholic Church · Text completed 1997; confirmed 31 October 1999

1, 41

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Augsburg
Who Philip Melanchthon, Charles V, Martin Luther Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg 1 October 1529 1042

The Protestation at Speyer 19 April 1529 1038

LEADS TO

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

The Peace of Augsburg 25 September 1555 1084

The Book of Concord 25 June 1580 1117

The Barmen Declaration 31 May 1934 1375

Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification 31 October 1999 1474

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg Before · 1 October 1529 1042

The Council of Trent After · 1545–1563 1075

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg Before · 1 October 1529 1042
England Breaks with Rome After · 1534 1055

← Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg Earlier · 1 October 1529
→ Our Lady of Guadalupe Later · 1531

THE REFORMATION

Our Lady of Guadalupe

1531 · Traditional date

A Nahuatl account printed in 1649 tells how the Virgin Mary appeared in December 1531 to Juan Diego on the hill of Tepeyac and left her image on his cloak. The Catholic Church has approved the devotion and in 2002 declared Juan Diego a saint.

The story is told in the Nican Mopohua, an account in Nahuatl. It sets the events early in December 1531, ten years after the conquest of the city of Mexico. In its telling Juan Diego, an indigenous commoner who lived at Cuauhtitlan, was walking to Tlatelolco before dawn on a Saturday when, at the hill of Tepeyac, he heard singing and was called by name. On the hilltop stood a lady whose clothing shone like the sun. She told him that she was the ever-virgin Mary, mother of the true God, that she wished a house to be built for her there, where she would hear the weeping of the people of that land and of all who called on her, and that he was to carry her wish to the bishop of Mexico (Nican Mopohua lines 1–39).

The bishop, the Franciscan Juan de Zumárraga, the account goes on, listened without belief and told him to come again; on a second visit he asked for a sign (Nican Mopohua lines 40–83). Juan Diego then stayed at home with his uncle Juan Bernardino, who was dying. When he set out to fetch a priest, the lady met him, told him that his uncle was already well, and sent him to the hilltop to cut flowers, which he found in bloom although it was the season of frost, and which he carried in his cloak to the bishop (Nican Mopohua lines 94–146). When he opened the cloak and the flowers fell to the floor, the account says, the image of the Virgin appeared on the cloth; the bishop knelt, asked pardon, and placed the cloak in his chapel (Nican Mopohua lines 181–193). The account ends with the building of a shrine at Tepeyac, and says that the bishop moved the image from his chapel to the principal church so that all could see it (Nican Mopohua lines 194–218).

The account as it stands was printed in Mexico City in 1649, in a book whose licences name Luis Laso de la Vega, chaplain of the shrine, as its author (Nican Mopohua title page of the printing of 1649, with the approbation and licence on the two leaves after it). That is 118 years after the date it gives. The historians named in the dating note, who examined the record, found no document of the 1530s that mentions the apparition. One of them, Joaquín García Icazbalceta, was asked by the archbishop of Mexico in 1883 for his judgment as a historian (García Icazbalceta, Letter on Guadalupe editor's preface (Advertencia), p. 7). He noted that the defenders of the apparition themselves admit that no original record of an inquiry into it exists (García Icazbalceta, Letter on Guadalupe § 11), and wrote that the many surviving writings of Zumárraga contain no allusion to the event and never use the name Guadalupe (García Icazbalceta, Letter on Guadalupe § 12). He also summarized an inquiry of 1556 into a sermon in which the Franciscan provincial, Francisco de Bustamante, attacked what he called a new devotion at a chapel of Our Lady named Guadalupe and said that its image had been painted by an Indian, Marcos (García Icazbalceta, Letter on Guadalupe §§ 30–31). The Holy See holds that the Nahuatl account was written in 1556 by Antonio Valeriano (Holy See, Biography of Juan Diego paragraphs 1 and 3).

The Catholic Church has approved the devotion: John Paul II wrote in 1999 that the appearance of Mary to Juan Diego had a decisive effect on evangelization, recorded that she is invoked as "Patroness of all America", and welcomed the bishops' proposal that her feast be kept throughout the continent on 12 December (John Paul II, Ecclesia in America 11). On 31 July 2002, in the basilica at Tepeyac, which he called the Marian heart of Mexico and of America, he declared Juan Diego a saint (John Paul II, Homily at the canonization of Juan Diego 1, 3).

How this is dated

Traditional date. From later tradition or from internal biblical chronology, with no outside anchor.

The year and the month are those the Nican Mopohua itself gives (Nican Mopohua line 3). The Holy See's biography of Juan Diego puts the first apparition on 9 December and the last on 12 December (Holy See, Biography of Juan Diego paragraphs 1 and 3). The account was printed in 1649 (Nican Mopohua title page of the printing of 1649, with the approbation and licence on the two leaves after it), 118 years after the date it gives, and when it was first written down is disputed; the date is therefore marked traditional.

How old that tradition is, historians dispute. Stafford Poole, Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Origins and Sources of a Mexican National Symbol, 1531–1797 (1995), argues that no documentary evidence of the apparitions, and no clear reference to them, survives from the years between 1531 and 1648. Joaquín García Icazbalceta, writing in 1883, had found the surviving writings of Bishop Zumárraga silent about it (García Icazbalceta, Letter on Guadalupe § 12). The Holy See, in the biography issued for the canonization of Juan Diego, dates the Nican Mopohua to 1556 and ascribes it to the indigenous writer Antonio Valeriano (Holy See, Biography of Juan Diego paragraphs 1 and 3), which would place the written account within twenty-five years of the event.

Primary sources

Nican Mopohua Printed by Luis Laso de la Vega; authorship disputed · Printed 1649; date of composition disputed lines 1–39; lines 40–83; lines 94–146; lines 181–193; lines 194–218; title page of the printing of 1649, with the approbation and licence on the two leaves after it; line 3

Letter on the Origin of the Image of Our Lady of Guadalupe Joaquín García Icazbalceta · Written October 1883; printed 1896
editor's preface (Advertencia), p. 7; § 11; § 12; §§ 30–31

Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin (1474–1548): Biography The Holy See · 2002 paragraphs 1 and 3

Ecclesia in America John Paul II · 22 January 1999
11

Homily at the Canonization of Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin John Paul II · 31 July 2002
1, 3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Tepeyac
Who Juan Diego, Juan de Zumárraga
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic 1493 996

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic Before · 1493 996

Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free After · 2 June 1537 1063

← The Augsburg Confession Earlier · 25 June 1530
→ England Breaks with Rome Later · 1534

THE REFORMATION

England Breaks with Rome

1534 · Firm date

Parliament forbids appeals to Rome and in 1534 declares Henry VIII the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England. John Fisher and Thomas More, who deny the title, are beheaded in 1535.

The Act in Restraint of Appeals enacted that suits about wills, marriage and divorce, and tithes should be finally decided within the king's jurisdiction "and not elsewhere", and no longer carried on appeal to Rome. Its preamble declares that "this realm of England is an empire", governed by one supreme head and king (Statutes of the Realm, 24 Hen. VIII c. 12). Thomas Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, wrote that in May 1533 he held a court at Dunstable on the marriage of Henry VIII and Katherine of Aragon, that Katherine refused to appear because her cause was before the pope, and that he gave sentence that the pope had no power to license such a marriage. He then crowned Anne Boleyn at Westminster, and adds that she was already married to the king and with child (Cranmer, Letters, letter 14, to Nicholas Hawkyns, 17 June 1533).

Further Acts followed. One recited the clergy's promise to make no new canons without the king's assent and laid penalties on any who broke it (Statutes of the Realm, 25 Hen. VIII c. 19). Another gave the archbishop of Canterbury the power to grant the licences and dispensations that had been sought at Rome (Statutes of the Realm, 25 Hen. VIII c. 21, s. 3). In the session that opened on 3 November 1534, Parliament enacted that the king and his successors "shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England", with power to visit, correct and reform all errors, heresies and abuses (Statutes of the Realm, 26 Hen. VIII c. 1). A companion Act made it high treason, from 1 February following, maliciously to wish or attempt by words or writing to deprive the king of the dignity, title or name of his royal estate (Statutes of the Realm, 26 Hen. VIII c. 13).

John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Thomas More had refused the oath to the succession that Parliament required, and both were attainted of misprision of treason (Statutes of the Realm, 26 Hen. VIII c. 22 and c. 23). William Roper, More's son-in-law, tells how More was called to Lambeth before the archbishop, the lord chancellor and the king's secretary, Thomas Cromwell, and was sent to the Tower (Roper, Life of More the oath at Lambeth). A London chronicler of the time records that Fisher was condemned on 17 June 1535 for denying the king to be supreme head of the Church of England and beheaded on Tower Hill on 22 June, and that More was condemned on 1 July and beheaded on 6 July for the same cause (Wriothesley, Chronicle vol. 1, pp. 28–29). Roper, who was not present and follows those who were, reports that More after the verdict called the Act repugnant to the laws of God and his church, whose supreme government, he said, belongs by right to the see of Rome and may not be taken by any temporal prince (Roper, Life of More the arraignment).

The Act of Supremacy defines no doctrine; it gives the king power to reform "errors, heresies, and abuses" (Statutes of the Realm, 26 Hen. VIII c. 1). An Act of 1539 names Cromwell as the king's vicegerent for the exercise of that office in church causes (Statutes of the Realm, 31 Hen. VIII c. 10). What was done with the power under Henry's son is told in the Book of Common Prayer.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The year is that of the Act of Supremacy, which was passed in the session of Parliament that opened on 3 November 1534 (Statutes of the Realm, 26 Hen. VIII c. 1). The Statutes of the Realm place the Act in Restraint of Appeals in 1532–3, and Cranmer's sentence at Dunstable followed in May 1533 (Cranmer, Letters, letter 14, to Nicholas Hawkyns, 17 June 1533). Quotations from the statutes are given in modern spelling.

Primary sources

The Statutes of the Realm The Parliament of England · Acts and charters of 1101–1713; cited here for 1533–1552
24 Hen. VIII c. 12; 25 Hen. VIII c. 19; 25 Hen. VIII c. 21, s. 3; 26 Hen. VIII c. 1; 26 Hen. VIII c. 13; 26 Hen. VIII c. 22 and c. 23; 31 Hen. VIII c. 10

Letters Thomas Cranmer · 1531–1556 letter 14, to Nicholas Hawkyns, 17 June 1533

The Life of Sir Thomas More William Roper · Written about 1555; first printed 1626
the oath at Lambeth; the arraignment

A Chronicle of England during the Reigns of the Tudors Charles Wriothesley · A contemporary record from about 1520 to 1559
vol. 1, pp. 28–29

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who Henry VIII, Thomas Cranmer, Thomas More, Thomas Cromwell, John Fisher Threads Church and State, Reform and Reformation, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Murder of Thomas Becket 29 December 1170 866
Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012

LEADS TO

The Book of Common Prayer 1549–1552 1080
The Burning of Protestants under Mary I 1555–1558 1087

CHURCH AND STATE

The Protestation at Speyer Before · 19 April 1529 1038

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva After · 1536–1541 1059

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Augsburg Confession Before · 25 June 1530 1046

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva After · 1536–1541 1059

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms Before · 1520–1521 1012

The Council of Trent After · 1545–1563 1075

← Our Lady of Guadalupe Earlier · 1531

→ Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva Later · 1536–1541

THE REFORMATION

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva

1536–1541 · Firm date

John Calvin, a French exile, publishes the Institutes of the Christian Religion at Basel in 1536 and is kept in Geneva by Guillaume Farel. Banished in 1538, he returns in 1541, and the city adopts the church ordinances he asked for.

John Calvin left France, his native country, and was living quietly at Basel when, as he later wrote, many were burned in France for their faith and pamphlets put it about that the victims were Anabaptists and rebels. He says that he published the Institutes to clear them, and that the book was then only a small treatise summarizing the chief truths of the Christian religion (Calvin, Preface to the Psalms preface). He addressed it to King Francis I. His first purpose, he tells the king, had been to give his countrymen the rudiments of godliness; he now offers the book as a confession from which the king may learn what the doctrine is that is being punished with prison, exile and fire (Calvin, Institutes Prefatory address to Francis I).

By 1557, he says, it had grown into a much larger work (Calvin, Preface to the Psalms preface). In its final form it opens: "Our wisdom, in so far as it ought to be deemed true and solid Wisdom, consists almost entirely of two parts: the knowledge of God and of ourselves" (Calvin, Institutes 1.1.1). Its third book defines predestination as "the eternal decree of God, by which he determined with himself whatever he wished to happen with regard to every man", and adds that "some are preordained to eternal life, others to eternal damnation" (Calvin, Institutes 3.21.5).

By his own account Calvin meant to spend a single night in Geneva on the way to Strasbourg. Guillaume Farel, who with Pierre Viret had lately driven "Popery" from the city, pressed him to stay, and when entreaty failed declared that God would curse his retirement and his studies if he refused to help. Calvin says that he was struck with terror and stayed (Calvin, Preface to the Psalms preface). The council register records that the two preachers would not accept the ceremonies that Bern pressed on the city and the councils adopted, that they preached after being forbidden, and that on 23 April 1538 the General Council voted that they leave the city within three days (Geneva registers, Council, 21–23 April 1538). Calvin says that Martin Bucer then drew him back into the ministry (Calvin, Preface to the Psalms preface).

On 13 September 1541 the register notes that Calvin had arrived from Strasbourg, that he asked that the church be set in order and the order put in writing, and that the council resolved to ask him to stay for good (Geneva registers, Council, 13 September 1541). The resulting ordinances were passed by the General Council on 20 November (Geneva registers, Council, 20 November 1541). They name four offices which, they say, the Lord instituted for the government of his church: pastors, teachers, elders and deacons (Ecclesiastical Ordinances (1541) p. 590). Twelve elders, chosen from the city's councils, are to watch over the life of everyone and to meet the ministers each Thursday. The councils added that the ministers have no civil jurisdiction and wield only the spiritual sword of the word of God (Ecclesiastical Ordinances (1541) pp. 595, 600, and 602 note 1).

On 27 October 1553 the council, having taken the advice of the churches of Bern, Basel, Zurich and Schaffhausen, condemned Michael Servetus, whom the ministers had had imprisoned for his heresies, to be burned alive at Champel, and the sentence was carried out (Geneva registers, Company of Pastors, 13 August and 27 October 1553). Later events in the Reformed churches include the Heidelberg Catechism and the Scottish Reformation.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The translation cited prints the prefatory address with the date "Basle, 1st August 1536" and notes readings of "the edition published at Basle in 1536" (Calvin, Institutes Prefatory address to Francis I). Calvin's own account gives no dates (Calvin, Preface to the Psalms preface). Those of his banishment, his return and the adoption of the ordinances are taken from the registers of the councils of Geneva (Geneva registers, Council, 21–23 April 1538) (Geneva registers, Council, 13 September 1541) (Geneva registers, Council, 20 November 1541).

Primary sources

Preface to the Commentary on the Psalms John Calvin · 22 July 1557
preface

Institutes of the Christian Religion John Calvin · First edition 1536; final Latin edition 1559
Prefatory address to Francis I; 1.1.1; 3.21.5

Registers of the Council and of the Company of Pastors of Geneva The secretaries of the Council and of the Company of Pastors · Entries of 1536–1564
Council, 21–23 April 1538; Council, 13 September 1541; Council, 20 November 1541; Company of Pastors, 13 August and 27 October 1553

The Ecclesiastical Ordinances of Geneva Drafted by John Calvin and a committee of the Council; enacted by the councils of Geneva · Adopted 20 November 1541
p. 590; pp. 595, 600, and 602 note 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Basel, Geneva
Who John Calvin, Guillaume Farel
Threads Reform and Reformation, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Zwingli and the Reformation in Zurich 29 January 1523 1021
The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046

LEADS TO

The Scottish Reformation August 1560 1096
The Heidelberg Catechism 19 January 1563 1104
The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre 24 August 1572 1113
The Synod of Dort 1618–1619 1159
The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus 16 March 1672 1196

REFORM AND REFORMATION

England Breaks with Rome Before · 1534 1055
The Society of Jesus Is Founded After · 27 September 1540 1067

CHURCH AND STATE

England Breaks with Rome Before · 1534 1055
Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free After · 2 June 1537 1063

← England Breaks with Rome Earlier · 1534
→ Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free Later · 2 June 1537

THE REFORMATION

Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free

2 June 1537 · Firm date

In the bull Sublimis Deus Pope Paul III declares that the peoples of the Americas are truly human, capable of the Christian faith, and not to be enslaved or deprived of their property. Las Casas and the Crown's own laws show that enslavement went on.

Bartolomé de Las Casas tells how the Dominican friars of Hispaniola agreed on a sermon, signed it, and gave it to Antonio de Montesinos to preach on the fourth Sunday of Advent before the governor, the king's officials and the lawyers of Santo Domingo. In Las Casas's telling the preacher asked them by what right they held the Indians in so cruel a servitude and made war on peoples who had lived peaceably in their own lands, and whether these were not men with rational souls. The leading settlers demanded that he retract, Las Casas says, and none, as far as he later learned, was converted (Las Casas, History of the Indies 3.3–4). His book places these events in 1511 (Las Casas, History of the Indies 3.1).

On 2 June 1537 Paul III issued the bull Sublimis Deus from Rome (Paul III, Sublimis Deus dating clause (Latin text, p. 430)). It argues that since Christ told his preachers to teach all nations, all are capable of receiving the faith, and it blames the enemy of the human race for inspiring those who say that the Indians of the west and the south may be treated like dumb brutes, as if incapable of the faith. The pope declares that "the Indians are truly men", able to understand the Catholic faith and eager to receive it; that they and all peoples whom Christians may later discover "are by no means to be deprived of their liberty or the possession of their property, even though they be outside the faith of Jesus Christ"; that they are not to be enslaved; and that anything done to the contrary is null. They are to be converted by preaching and by the example of a good life (Paul III, Sublimis Deus paragraphs 1–4).

Five years later the New Laws of Charles V ordered that no Indian be made a slave for any cause, whether war, rebellion or ransom, and that those held without title be freed (New Laws of the Indies fol. 5v). They also forbade new grants of Indians to settlers and ordered existing grants to pass to the Crown at the holder's death (New Laws of the Indies fol. 7r). Las Casas, finishing his Short Account in December 1542, wrote that the killing and oppression were then at their height in every region where Spaniards were (Las Casas, Short Account pp. 411–412). In notes added in 1546 he says that the settlers resisted the new laws, in Peru by open revolt, and that where they had ceased to kill by the sword they killed slowly by forced service (Las Casas, Short Account pp. 413–414).

In 1550 Charles V summoned theologians and jurists to Valladolid to hear Las Casas and the royal chronicler Juan Ginés de Sepúlveda (Las Casas, Disputation with Sepúlveda title page). According to the record that Las Casas printed, Sepúlveda contended that the conquests of the Indies were lawful, and Las Casas that they had been and could only be tyrannical, unjust and wicked (Las Casas, Disputation with Sepúlveda title page). Las Casas summarizes his opponent's case in two claims: that the wars made on the Indians were just, and that the Indians were bound to submit to the Spaniards as the less understanding to the more prudent (Las Casas, Disputation with Sepúlveda argument (opening summary)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The bull's Latin dating clause reads quarto nonas Iunii, the fourth day before the nones of June in the third year of Paul III, which is 2 June 1537 (Paul III, Sublimis Deus dating clause (Latin text, p. 430)). The English translation linked from the source record renders this "the fourth of June", and the web page that reproduces it dates it 29 May; neither agrees with the Latin.

Las Casas does not date Montesinos's sermon by year in the chapters that describe it; he places it on the fourth Sunday of Advent (Las Casas, History of the Indies 3.3–4) in a book that opens with the events of 1511 (Las Casas, History of the Indies 3.1).

Primary sources

History of the Indies Bartolomé de Las Casas · Put into its present form from about 1552; first printed 1875
3.3–4; 3.1

Sublimis Deus Paul III · 2 June 1537 dating clause (Latin text, p. 430); paragraphs 1–4

The New Laws of the Indies Charles V · Barcelona, 20 November 1542; additions at Valladolid, 4 June 1543
fol. 5v; fol. 7r

A Short Account of the Destruction of the Indies Bartolomé de Las Casas · Written 1542; printed 1552
pp. 411–412; pp. 413–414

Here Is Contained a Dispute or Controversy (the Valladolid disputation) Bartolomé de Las Casas, with a summary by Domingo de Soto · Printed 1552; the assembly was called in 1550 title page; argument (opening summary)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Valladolid
Who Paul III, Bartolomé de Las Casas, Juan Ginés de Sepúlveda, Antonio de Montesinos

Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Christianity Crosses the Atlantic 1493 996

LEADS TO

Medellín and Liberation Theology 24 August 1968 1436

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Our Lady of Guadalupe Before · 1531 1051

The Society of Jesus Is Founded After · 27 September 1540 1067

CHURCH AND STATE

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva Before · 1536–1541 1059

The Peace of Augsburg After · 25 September 1555 1084

← Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva Earlier · 1536–1541

→ The Society of Jesus Is Founded Later · 27 September 1540

THE REFORMATION

The Society of Jesus Is Founded

27 September 1540 · Firm date

Pope Paul III approves the Society of Jesus, a company of ten priests, masters of the University of Paris, led by Ignatius of Loyola. Its members vow poverty, chastity and obedience, with a special vow to go wherever the pope sends them.

In the account of his life that he dictated in his last years, Ignatius of Loyola says that until he was twenty-six his delight was in soldiering and in making a name. Defending the citadel of Pamplona against the French, he had one leg broken and the other injured by a cannon ball (Ignatius, Autobiography pp. 19–20). During his recovery he asked for romances, was given a life of Christ and a book of saints' lives, and by reading them began to love spiritual things (Ignatius, Autobiography pp. 23–24). After a pilgrimage to Jerusalem he resolved to study, in order to be better fitted to save souls (Ignatius, Autobiography pp. 80–81). His book of Spiritual Exercises begins from one principle: "Man is created to praise, reverence, and serve God our Lord, and by this means to save his soul" (Ignatius, Spiritual Exercises Principle and Foundation).

At the University of Paris Ignatius befriended Peter Faber and Francis Xavier, whom he won, he says, by giving them the Exercises (Ignatius, Autobiography p. 122). He and his companions resolved to go to Venice and then to Jerusalem, to spend their lives there helping souls; if they could not stay in Jerusalem they would go to Rome and offer themselves to the pope, to be used as he thought best (Ignatius, Autobiography p. 126). In Venice those who were not yet priests were ordained. No ship sailed for the East that year, and after the year of waiting they went to Rome. On the way, in a church a few miles from the city, Ignatius felt that God the Father placed him with Christ his Son (Ignatius, Autobiography pp. 136–140) (Ignatius, Autobiography pp. 140–141).

On 27 September 1540 Paul III approved their way of life in the bull Regimini militantis Ecclesiae (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae editors' note to the Formula). It names ten priests, masters of arts of Paris, with Ignatius, Faber and Xavier among them, and recites the statement of their way of life that they had drawn up, the Formula of the Institute (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae §§ 1–3). Whoever wishes to serve as a soldier of God under the banner of the cross in the Society, which they wish to bear the name of Jesus, joins a community founded for the progress of souls in Christian life and doctrine and for the spread of the faith, by preaching, spiritual exercises, works of charity and the teaching of children and the unlettered (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae § 4 (Formula, paragraph 1)). Beyond the obedience every Christian owes the pope, the members bind themselves by a special vow to go at once wherever he sends them, whether to the Turks or other unbelievers, even in the lands called the Indies, to heretics and schismatics, or to the faithful (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae § 6 (Formula, paragraph 3)). They vow obedience to their superior and perpetual poverty, though the Society may hold colleges with endowments for its students (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae Formula, paragraphs 6–8). The pope limited the Society to sixty members (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae § 16).

Xavier sailed from Lisbon for India on 7 April 1541 (Xavier, Letters, letter 10, Goa, 18 September 1542); his mission is told in Francis Xavier in India and Japan.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The date is that of the bull Regimini militantis Ecclesiae, 27 September 1540, as given by the editors of the Formula of the Institute (Paul III, Regimini militantis Ecclesiae editors' note to the Formula). The Latin text used here for the body of the bull omits the dating clause.

Primary sources

Autobiography Ignatius of Loyola, as taken down by Luis Gonçalves da Câmara · Dictated between 1553 and 1555

pp. 19–20; pp. 23–24; pp. 80–81; p. 122; p. 126; pp. 136–140; pp. 140–141

The Spiritual Exercises Ignatius of Loyola · Composed over many years; approved by Paul III on 31 July 1548

Principle and Foundation

Regimini militantis Ecclesiae Paul III · 27 September 1540

editors' note to the Formula; §§ 1–3; § 4 (Formula, paragraph 1); § 6 (Formula, paragraph 3); Formula, paragraphs 6–8; § 16

Letters Francis Xavier · 1535–1552

letter 10, Goa, 18 September 1542

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Paris
Who Ignatius of Loyola, Francis Xavier, Paul III, Peter Faber
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Mission and Expansion, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Dominic Founds the Order of Preachers 22 December 1216 899

Francis of Assisi and the Friars Minor c. 1209 886

LEADS TO

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church 1622–1632 1167

The Suppression of the Jesuits 21 July 1773 1237

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Devotio Moderna and the Imitation of Christ Before · 1384–1441 954

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel After · 24 August 1562 1100

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free Before · 2 June 1537 1063

Francis Xavier in India and Japan After · 1542–1552 1071

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva Before · 1536–1541 1059

The Council of Trent After · 1545–1563 1075

← Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free Earlier · 2 June 1537
→ Francis Xavier in India and Japan Later · 1542–1552

THE REFORMATION

Francis Xavier in India and Japan

1542–1552 · Firm date

The Jesuit Francis Xavier lands at Goa in 1542, teaches and baptizes among the Christians of Cape Comorin, and in 1549 carries the Christian message to Japan with the Japanese convert Anjiro. He dies in 1552 on an island off China.

Francis Xavier sailed from Lisbon on 7 April 1541 and reached India on 6 May 1542, landing at Goa (Xavier, Letters, letter 10, Goa, 18 September 1542). A later letter finds him among the Christians of Comorin, who told him that they were Christians but knew nothing of the precepts and mysteries of their religion. He spoke Castilian and they "Malabar", so with the help of men who knew both languages he had the catechism translated, learned it by heart, and went through the villages of the coast with a bell, gathering children and adults twice a day to repeat the Creed, the commandments and the prayers (Xavier, Letters, letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, pp. 151–152). He writes that he often baptized whole villages in a day, until he could hardly use his hands (Xavier, Letters, letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, p. 153). He wished he could go round the universities of Europe, Paris above all, crying out to learned men that souls were being lost through their fault (Xavier, Letters, letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, p. 155).

At Malacca, he wrote in January 1548, a Portuguese merchant brought him a Japanese named Anger, Anjiro, who had come looking for him, troubled in conscience, and who spoke some Portuguese. Xavier was struck by his eagerness to learn. Anjiro told him that the Japanese would question a preacher closely and would watch whether his life agreed with his words (Xavier, Letters, letter 55, Cochin, 21 January 1548). A year later Xavier reported three Japanese students at the college of Santa Fe in Goa, the ablest of whom he calls Paul, and said that he had determined to go to Japan (Xavier, Letters, letter 63, to Ignatius, Cochin, 14 January 1549).

They landed at Kagoshima, Paul's home, on 15 August 1549 and were well received (Xavier, Letters, letter 79, Kagoshima, 5 November 1549, vol. 2, p. 232). Xavier wrote that the Japanese surpassed in goodness any people lately discovered (Xavier, Letters, letter 79, vol. 2, p. 237), and that the lord of the place gave his subjects leave to become Christians (Xavier, Letters, letter 79, vol. 2, p. 259). He travelled on to Meaco, the capital, found it disturbed by war and could not see the sovereign (Xavier, Letters, letter 86, Cochin, 29 January 1552, vol. 2, pp. 335–336). At Amanguchi (Yamaguchi), by his account, about five hundred people were baptized in two months (Xavier, Letters, letter 86, vol. 2, p. 338).

Back in India, Xavier wrote that the Japanese had their doctrines from China and that he hoped to enter China that year, 1552 (Xavier, Letters, letter 86, vol. 2, pp. 347–348). His last letters are dated from the island of San Chan in November 1552; in them he complains that the commandant of Malacca had hindered his going to China (Xavier, Letters, letter 124, San Chan, 13 November 1552). He did not reach it. He died on the island a few weeks later, as the dating note explains. For the later history of the church in Japan see the Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Xavier's own letters give the framework: he reached India on 6 May 1542 (Xavier, Letters, letter 10, Goa, 18 September 1542) and Japan on the feast of the Assumption, 15 August, 1549 (Xavier, Letters, letter 79, Kagoshima, 5 November 1549, vol. 2, p. 232), and his last letters are dated from the island of San Chan (Shangchuan) on 13 November 1552 (Xavier, Letters, letter 124, San Chan, 13 November 1552).

His death on the island is not in his letters. H. J. Coleridge, The Life and Letters of St. Francis Xavier (1872), vol. 2, pp. 571–572, names the Chinese youth Antonio as one of the two who attended him and puts the death on Friday 2 December 1552. Pope Francis, in his general audience of 17 May 2023, gives 3 December 1552.

The letters are cited by Coleridge's numbers and with the dates he prints. Several of those dates differ by a few days from the ones in the edition made from the manuscript copies, Monumenta Xaveriana, vol. 1 (Madrid, 1899–1900). The widest difference is for the letter from Cochin, his number 14: Coleridge dates it 31 December 1543, while the Spanish text closes "De Cochim á xv de Henero de 1544", 15 January 1544, and its editors note that one copy has the 12th in its heading (Xavier, Letters, the letter from Cochin in its Spanish text, Monumenta Xaveriana vol. 1, pp. 278 and 295). The letter from Kagoshima ends in Coleridge's text with 11 November 1549, though his table of contents and the manuscripts have 5 November.

Primary sources

Letters Francis Xavier · 1535–1552
letter 10, Goa, 18 September 1542; letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, pp. 151–152; letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, p. 153; letter 14, Cochin, vol. 1, p. 155; letter 55, Cochin, 21 January 1548; letter 63, to Ignatius, Cochin, 14 January 1549; letter 79, Kagoshima, 5 November 1549, vol. 2, p. 232; letter 79, vol. 2, p. 237; letter 79, vol. 2, p. 259; letter 86, Cochin, 29 January 1552, vol. 2, pp. 335–336; letter 86, vol. 2, p. 338; letter 86, vol. 2, pp. 347–348; letter 124, San Chan, 13 November 1552; the letter from Cochin in its Spanish text, Monumenta Xaveriana vol. 1, pp. 278 and 295

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Goa, Kagoshima
Who Francis Xavier, Anjiro

Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067

LEADS TO

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan 1597–1614 1129

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath 1599–1653 1137

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142

The Tranquebar Mission 9 July 1706 1217

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward 17 March 1865 1317

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Society of Jesus Is Founded Before · 27 September 1540 1067

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan After · 1597–1614 1129

← The Society of Jesus Is Founded Earlier · 27 September 1540
→ The Council of Trent Later · 1545–1563

THE REFORMATION

The Council of Trent

1545–1563 · Firm date

In twenty-five sessions spread over eighteen years, the Catholic bishops assembled at Trent define their church's teaching on Scripture and tradition, justification and the sacraments, and decree a reform of the clergy.

Paul III summoned a general council to Trent in a bull of 22 May 1542, after earlier summonses to Mantua and Vicenza had come to nothing; he chose Trent, he says, because the Germans wished for it (Council of Trent Bull of indiction (22 May 1542)). The council opened on 13 December 1545 (Council of Trent Session 1).

The fourth session, on 8 April 1546, declares that the truth and discipline of the Gospel are contained "in the written books, and the unwritten traditions" that have come down from the apostles, and that the council receives both "with an equal affection of piety, and reverence". It lists the books of the Bible, among them Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach, Baruch and the two books of Maccabees, and anathematizes anyone who does not receive them, entire with all their parts, as sacred and canonical, as they are contained in the old Latin Vulgate, and who knowingly despises the traditions (Council of Trent Session 4, decree concerning the canonical Scriptures). A Protestant position is stated in the Articles of the Church of England: the church reads these books "for example of life and instruction of manners" but does not apply them to establish any doctrine (Thirty-Nine Articles VI).

The sixth session, on 13 January 1547, issued the decree on justification. In adults, it says, justification begins from God's prevenient grace, without any merits on their part; they are disposed to it by freely assenting to that grace and cooperating with it, and cannot move themselves towards justice by their own free will without it (Council of Trent Session 6, chapter 5). Justification itself "is not remission of sins merely, but also the sanctification and renewal of the inward man". Christ merited it by his passion, baptism is its instrument, and its one formal cause is the justice of God by which he makes us just, so that "we are not only reputed, but are truly called, and are, just" (Council of Trent Session 6, chapter 7). We are said to be justified by faith because faith is "the beginning of human salvation, the foundation, and the root of all Justification", and freely because nothing that goes before justification, whether faith or works, merits the grace of it (Council of Trent Session 6, chapter 8). The canons condemn the statement that a person can be justified by his own works without grace, and equally the statements that the sinner is justified by faith alone, "in such wise as to mean, that nothing else is required to co-operate" towards obtaining the grace of justification and that he need not be prepared and disposed by the movement of his own will, or by the sole imputation of Christ's justice or the sole remission of sins, to the exclusion of the grace and charity poured into the heart (Council of Trent Session 6, canons 1, 9 and 11).

The council moved to Bologna in March 1547 because of disease at Trent (Council of Trent Session 8) and resumed at Trent on 1 May 1551 (Council of Trent Session 11). In this second period it granted a safe-conduct to the German Protestants, who had asked to be heard (Council of Trent Session 13, decree on the safe-conduct). In April 1552 it suspended itself because of war in Germany, in a decree which recalls that it had been restored at the instance of the emperor Charles V (Council of Trent Session 16). It met again under Pius IV from 18 January 1562 (Council of Trent Session 17). Among its later decrees, one orders every cathedral church to maintain a college in which boys are trained for the priesthood (Council of Trent Session 23, decree on reformation, chapter 18), and the last uphold purgatory, the invocation of saints, images and indulgences, while ordering that "all evil gains" from indulgences be abolished (Council of Trent Session 25, decrees on purgatory, on saints and images, and on indulgences).

The council closed on 4 December 1563 and asked the pope to confirm its decrees (Council of Trent Session 25, on the close of the council). Pius IV did so on 26 January 1564 (Council of Trent Confirmation of the council, 26 January 1564). The profession of faith he issued later that year binds those who swear it to all that Trent defined, and by name to its teaching on original sin and justification (Tridentine Profession of Faith V, XI). The Joint Declaration of Lutherans and Catholics confirmed in 1999 says that the Lutheran teaching presented in it does not fall under Trent's condemnations (Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification 41); see Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Bull of indiction (22 May 1542); Session 1; Session 4, decree concerning the canonical Scriptures; Session 6, chapter 5; Session 6, chapter 7; Session 6, chapter 8; Session 6, canons 1, 9 and 11; Session 8; Session 11; Session 13, decree on the safe-conduct; Session 16; Session 17; Session 23, decree on reformation, chapter 18; Session 25, decrees on purgatory, on saints and images, and on indulgences; Session 25, on the close of the council; Confirmation of the council, 26 January 1564

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
VI

The Tridentine Profession of Faith Pius IV · 13 November 1564
V, XI

Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification The Lutheran World Federation and the Catholic Church · Text completed 1997; confirmed 31 October 1999

41

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Trent
Who Paul III, Pius IV, Charles V
Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation, Scripture and Canon, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046
Luther Is Excommunicated and Outlawed at Worms 1520–1521 1012
The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974
African Councils List the Books of Scripture AD 393–397 648

LEADS TO

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel 24 August 1562 1100
The Trial of Galileo 22 June 1633 1172
Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus 1653–1713 1191
The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus 16 March 1672 1196
The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception 8 December 1854 1305
The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324
The Second Vatican Council 1962–1965 1422
The Catechism of the Catholic Church 11 October 1992 1471
Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification 31 October 1999 1474

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Augsburg Confession Before · 25 June 1530 1046
The Elizabethan Settlement After · 1559 1091

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Society of Jesus Is Founded Before · 27 September 1540 1067

The Book of Common Prayer After · 1549–1552 1080

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Tyndale's English New Testament Before · 1526 1034

The King James Bible After · 1611 1151

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

England Breaks with Rome Before · 1534 1055

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I After · 25 February 1570 1108

← Francis Xavier in India and Japan Earlier · 1542–1552
→ The Book of Common Prayer Later · 1549–1552

THE REFORMATION

The Book of Common Prayer

1549–1552 · Firm date

Parliament orders one English service book, drawn up under the archbishop of Canterbury, to be used in every church in England from Pentecost 1549. A revised book, which no longer calls the communion the Mass, follows in 1552.

An Act of the first year of Edward VI ordered that communion be given to the people in both kinds, bread and wine (Statutes of the Realm, 1 Edw. VI c. 1, s. 8). The Act of Uniformity of 1549 recites that the realm had long had several "uses", those of Sarum, York, Bangor and Lincoln, and of late a variety of new forms as well, and that the king had therefore appointed the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, with other bishops and learned men, to draw up one order of common prayer and of the sacraments, having regard to Scripture and to the usages of the primitive church. The result was The Book of the Common Prayer. From the following Pentecost every minister was to use it "and none other"; one who refused would lose a year's income from a benefice and be imprisoned for six months (Statutes of the Realm, 2 & 3 Edw. VI c. 1). A London chronicler notes that St Paul's and several parishes began to use it earlier, at the beginning of Lent (Wriothesley, Chronicle vol. 2, p. 9).

The book's preface gives its reasons. The old services had broken up the reading of Scripture, they had been read to the people in Latin, which they did not understand, and the rules were so many that it was harder to find what to read than to read it. Now Scripture is to be read through in order and in English, the priest needs only this book and the Bible, and "all the whole realm shall have but one use" (Book of Common Prayer (1549) preface, pp. 17–19). The communion service is still headed "commonly called the Mass" (Book of Common Prayer (1549) p. 76). The priest gives the bread with the words "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life" (Book of Common Prayer (1549) p. 92).

A second Act in 1552 says that doubts had arisen about the manner of the service and that the book has therefore been "explained, and made fully perfect". It annexes the new book, adds a form for ordaining bishops, priests and deacons, and requires everyone to attend church on Sundays and holy days (Statutes of the Realm, 5 & 6 Edw. VI c. 1). In the new book the service is "the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion", and the priest stands at the north side of a table (Book of Common Prayer (1552) p. 265). The words at the giving of the bread become "Take and eat this, in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart by faith, with thanksgiving" (Book of Common Prayer (1552) p. 279). A declaration added at the end says that kneeling to receive does not mean that any adoration is done to the bread and wine, or to "any real and essential presence there being of Christ's natural flesh and blood" (Book of Common Prayer (1552) p. 283). The new service was first used at St Paul's on 1 November 1552 (Wriothesley, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 78–79).

What became of the book after Edward's death is told in the Burning of Protestants under Mary I and the Elizabethan Settlement.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The first Act of Uniformity required the book to be used from the feast of Pentecost after it was passed (Statutes of the Realm, 2 & 3 Edw. VI c. 1), and Wriothesley enters the Act under the session of Parliament that was prorogued on 14 March 1549 (Wriothesley, Chronicle vol. 2, p. 9). The second Act set the feast of All Saints for the revised book (Statutes of the Realm, 5 & 6 Edw. VI c. 1), and Wriothesley records its first use at St Paul's on 1 November 1552 (Wriothesley, Chronicle vol. 2, pp. 78–79). Quotations from the Acts and the prayer books follow the modern spelling of the editions cited.

Primary sources

The Statutes of the Realm The Parliament of England · Acts and charters of 1101–1713; cited here for 1533–1552
1 Edw. VI c. 1, s. 8; 2 & 3 Edw. VI c. 1; 5 & 6 Edw. VI c. 1

A Chronicle of England during the Reigns of the Tudors Charles Wriothesley · A contemporary record from about 1520 to 1559
vol. 2, p. 9; vol. 2, pp. 78–79

The Book of Common Prayer (1549) Church of England · 1549
preface, pp. 17–19; p. 76; p. 92

The Book of Common Prayer (1552) Church of England · 1552
p. 265; p. 279; p. 283

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who Thomas Cranmer, Edward VI
Threads Temple and Worship, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

England Breaks with Rome 1534 1055

LEADS TO

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I 1555–1558 1087

The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

Luther and Zwingli Meet at Marburg Before · 1 October 1529 1042

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism After · 1652–1667 1187

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Council of Trent Before · 1545–1563 1075

The Elizabethan Settlement After · 1559 1091

← The Council of Trent Earlier · 1545–1563
→ The Peace of Augsburg Later · 25 September 1555

THE REFORMATION

The Peace of Augsburg

25 September 1555 · Firm date

The imperial diet at Augsburg makes a lasting peace between the estates of the old religion and those of the Augsburg Confession. Each estate keeps its religion in its own lands; subjects who dissent may emigrate; all other confessions are excluded.

The diet that met at Augsburg in 1555 was held without the emperor. The recess explains that Charles V was kept away by bodily weakness and other hindrances and that his brother Ferdinand I, king of the Romans, took the business on himself in the emperor's name (Peace of Augsburg §§ 3–5). The estates found that agreement on the disputed articles of faith could not be reached quickly. Earlier truces in the matter of religion, they recalled, had never been enough to keep the peace. They therefore set the question of doctrine aside for another time and took up the question of peace (Peace of Augsburg §§ 9–11, 13).

The terms are these. The emperor, the king and the estates are not to make war on any estate of the empire, or harm it, on account of the Augsburg Confession, nor to force it from that confession in its own principalities, lands and lordships; the disputed religion is to be brought to agreement only by Christian, friendly and peaceful means (Peace of Augsburg § 15). The estates of the Augsburg Confession are in the same way to leave those of the old religion, spiritual and secular, undisturbed in their religion, property and rights (Peace of Augsburg § 16). All who belong to neither of these two religions are shut out of the peace entirely (Peace of Augsburg § 17).

On one point the two sides could not agree, and Ferdinand settled it by the authority the emperor had given him: an archbishop, bishop or other prelate who leaves the old religion must give up his office and its revenues, and the chapter may elect a successor of the old religion (Peace of Augsburg § 18). Church property that estates had taken over stays as it is, provided it did not belong to an immediate estate of the empire and had not been in the clergy's hands at the treaty of Passau or since; and the bishops' jurisdiction over the religion, worship and ministry of the estates of the Augsburg Confession is suspended until the religion is reconciled (Peace of Augsburg §§ 19–20). No estate may draw another's subjects to its religion or protect them against their rulers. Subjects of either religion who wish to leave on account of it may go with their wives and children and sell their goods, on paying the customary dues (Peace of Augsburg §§ 23–24). In the free and imperial cities where both religions had been practised, both are to continue side by side (Peace of Augsburg § 27).

The peace was to hold until the religion was reconciled, and if that never came about it was to stand for ever (Peace of Augsburg § 25). The recess is dated at Augsburg on 25 September 1555 (Peace of Augsburg closing clause). For its later history see the Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Religious Peace of Augsburg The imperial diet, in the name of King Ferdinand · 25 September 1555
§§ 3–5; §§ 9–11, 13; § 15; § 16; § 17; § 18; §§ 19–20; §§ 23–24; § 27; § 25; closing clause

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Augsburg
Who Charles V, Ferdinand I
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046

The Protestation at Speyer 19 April 1529 1038

LEADS TO

The Heidelberg Catechism 19 January 1563 1104

The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia 1618–1648 1155

CHURCH AND STATE

Rome Declares the Peoples of the Americas Free Before · 2 June 1537 1063

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I After · 1555–1558 1087

← The Book of Common Prayer Earlier · 1549–1552
→ The Burning of Protestants under Mary I Later · 1555–1558

THE REFORMATION

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I

1555–1558 · Firm date

Under Mary I, Parliament returns England to obedience to Rome and revives the medieval heresy laws. From 1555 to 1558 Protestants who will not recant are burned, among them the bishops Latimer, Ridley and Cranmer. John Foxe's book records them as martyrs.

Mary I of England was proclaimed queen in London on 19 July 1553 (Machyn, Diary 19 July 1553). At the end of November 1554 the Lords and Commons declared themselves "very sorry and repentant of the schism" from Rome and asked to be received back into the unity of the church, and the pope's legate, Cardinal Reginald Pole, absolved the realm (Second Act of Repeal, 1554, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 385–387) (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 6, pp. 568–572). The same Parliament revived three medieval statutes against heresy, to be in force from 20 January 1555 (Revival of the Heresy Acts, 1554, in Gee and Hardy, p. 384). Under the statute of 1401, a person convicted of heresy in a bishop's court who refused to abjure, or who relapsed after abjuring, was handed to the sheriff to be burned in public (Statute of 1401 (2 Henry IV, c. 15), in Gee and Hardy, p. 137).

The first to die, Foxe says, was John Rogers, burned at Smithfield in London on 4 February 1555 (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 6, pp. 611–612); the diary of the Londoner Henry Machyn records the burning under the same day (Machyn, Diary 4 February 1555). In May the king and queen wrote to the bishop of London complaining that heretics sent to the bishops were being left in their errors. He was to try to win them back and, if they stayed obstinate, to proceed against them "according to the order of the laws" (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 7, p. 86).

On 16 October 1555 Nicholas Ridley, bishop of London under Edward VI, and Hugh Latimer, once bishop of Worcester, were burned together at Oxford (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 7, pp. 406–407). Foxe reports that when the fire was brought Latimer told Ridley to "play the man" and spoke of lighting "such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out"; Latimer died quickly, and Ridley, whose fire was badly laid, slowly (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 7, pp. 547–551). Thomas Cranmer, the former archbishop of Canterbury, signed a recantation in prison that acknowledged the pope as head of the church (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 8, pp. 82–84). On 21 March 1556, when he was to repeat it in public before his execution, he renounced what he had signed, and by Foxe's account he held his right hand in the flame so that it burned first (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 8, pp. 88–90) (Machyn, Diary 21 and 22 March 1556).

The last to suffer, according to Foxe, were three men and two women burned at Canterbury about six days before the queen died (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 8, p. 504). Mary died on 17 November 1558, and Pole, who had been consecrated archbishop of Canterbury the day after Cranmer's death, within days of her (Machyn, Diary 21 and 22 March 1556) (Machyn, Diary 17 and 19 November 1558).

The narratives of these deaths cited here come from Acts and Monuments, and it is the work of a partisan. Foxe calls the dead martyrs and their judges papists moved by "implacable despite" (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 8, p. 504); Mary's Parliament had called what they held "errors and heresies" (Revival of the Heresy Acts, 1554, in Gee and Hardy, p. 384). The first Parliament of Elizabeth I repealed the heresy statutes in 1559 (Act of Supremacy, 1559, in Gee and Hardy, p. 446).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The revived heresy statutes took effect on 20 January 1555 (Revival of the Heresy Acts, 1554, in Gee and Hardy, p. 384). Foxe and the London diarist Henry Machyn both put the first burning, that of John Rogers, on 4 February 1555 (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 6, pp. 611–612) (Machyn, Diary 4 February 1555), and Foxe dates the last to about 10 November 1558, some six days before Mary's death, which Machyn puts on 17 November (Foxe, Acts and Monuments vol. 8, p. 504) (Machyn, Diary 17 and 19 November 1558). The days are those of the calendar then used in England.

The number of the dead is a modern count. Eamon Duffy, Fires of Faith: Catholic England under Mary Tudor (2009), gives 284 people burned for heresy between February 1555 and November 1558.

Primary sources

The Diary of Henry Machyn Henry Machyn · 1550–1563
19 July 1553; 4 February 1555; 21 and 22 March 1556; 17 and 19 November 1558

Mary's Second Act of Repeal Parliament of England · 1554
in Gee and Hardy, pp. 385–387

Acts and Monuments John Foxe · 1563; enlarged editions in 1570, 1576 and 1583
vol. 6, pp. 568–572; vol. 6, pp. 611–612; vol. 7, p. 86; vol. 7, pp. 406–407; vol. 7, pp. 547–551; vol. 8, pp. 82–84; vol. 8, pp. 88–90; vol. 8, p. 504

Act for the Reviving of Three Statutes for the Punishment of Heresies Parliament of England · 1554, in force from 20 January 1555
in Gee and Hardy, p. 384

Statute on the Burning of Heretics (De heretico comburendo) Parliament of England · 1401
in Gee and Hardy, p. 137

Act of Supremacy (1559) Parliament of England · 1559
in Gee and Hardy, p. 446

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Oxford, London
Who Mary I of England, Thomas Cranmer, Hugh Latimer, Nicholas Ridley, Reginald Pole
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Book of Common Prayer 1549–1552 1080

England Breaks with Rome 1534 1055

LEADS TO

The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I 25 February 1570 1108

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Tyndale's English New Testament Before · 1526 1034

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I After · 25 February 1570 1108

CHURCH AND STATE

The Peace of Augsburg Before · 25 September 1555 1084

The Elizabethan Settlement After · 1559 1091

← The Peace of Augsburg Earlier · 25 September 1555
→ The Elizabethan Settlement Later · 1559

THE REFORMATION

The Elizabethan Settlement

1559 · Firm date

Elizabeth I's first Parliament ends the pope's jurisdiction in England, makes the queen supreme governor of the church and restores the Prayer Book. In 1570 the pope excommunicates her, and new laws make Catholic priests and those reconciled to Rome traitors.

Elizabeth I was proclaimed queen in London on 17 November 1558, the day her sister Mary I of England died (Machyn, Diary 17 November 1558). Her first Parliament passed two statutes. The Act of Supremacy repealed Mary's revival of the heresy laws, declared that no "foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate" should exercise spiritual jurisdiction in the realm, and annexed authority over the church to the crown (Act of Supremacy, 1559, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 446–447). Clergy and officers of the crown were to swear that the queen was "the only supreme governor of this realm" in spiritual as in temporal things, or lose their offices (Act of Supremacy, 1559, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 448–449).

The Act of Uniformity restored the Prayer Book of the last years of Edward VI, with a few named changes, as the only form of public worship from 24 June 1559; everyone was to attend the parish church on Sundays and holy days or pay twelve pence (Act of Uniformity, 1559, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 458–463). Machyn's diary records the bishop of London deprived in May and seven more bishops in June (Machyn, Diary 10 and 29 May, 21 and 26 June 1559). Matthew Parker, who had lost his own offices under Mary, was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury on 17 December 1559 (Parker, Correspondence pp. 482–484).

The Thirty-Nine Articles, agreed, as their title says, in the Convocation of 1562 and confirmed in 1571, teach that "we are justified by Faith only" and that transubstantiation "cannot be proved by holy Writ". They give the prince the chief government of all estates, ecclesiastical and civil, but not the ministering of God's word or of the sacraments (Thirty-Nine Articles title; articles XI, XXVIII, XXXVII; ratification).

On 25 February 1570 Pope Pius V issued the bull Regnans in excelsis. It declared Elizabeth a heretic, excommunicated her and her adherents, pronounced her deprived of her "pretended title" to the crown and released her subjects from their oaths (Pius V, Regnans in excelsis sections 3–5 and the closing date). Parliament answered in 1571 by making it high treason to bring in or use a papal bull or to be reconciled to Rome by one (Act against Bulls from Rome, 1571, in Prothero, pp. 60–62). An act of 1581 made it treason to withdraw the queen's subjects from their obedience, or for that purpose from the established religion to the Roman, and fined those who heard mass or stayed away from church (Act of 1581 (23 Elizabeth, c. 1), in Prothero, pp. 74–75). An act of 1585 made it treason for any subject of the queen ordained priest under Rome's authority since 1559 to be in England at all, and a capital crime to shelter one (Act against Jesuits and Seminarists, 1585, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 485–487).

Catholics were now put to death as traitors, as Protestants had been burned as heretics under Mary. On 1 December 1581 the Jesuit Edmund Campion and two other priests were drawn to Tyburn and executed (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 1), convicted of plotting the queen's deposition and death (Allen, Briefe Historie pp. 16–20). The Catholic writer William Allen held that they suffered "under pretence of high treason" and in truth for their religion (Allen, Briefe Historie p.

1); the statute of 1585 says that such priests came to stir up "sedition, rebellion, and open hostility" (Act against Jesuits and Seminarists, 1585, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 485–487).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The two statutes belong to the first regnal year of Elizabeth (1 Elizabeth I, c. 1 and c. 2). The London diarist Henry Machyn puts the end of the Parliament that passed them on 10 May 1559 (Machyn, Diary 10 and 29 May, 21 and 26 June 1559), and the Act of Uniformity fixes 24 June 1559, the feast of the Nativity of St John the Baptist, as the day from which the restored Prayer Book was to be used (Act of Uniformity, 1559, in Gee and Hardy, pp. 458–463). The official short title of the first act is "Act of Supremacy 1558" (Act of Supremacy, 1559, short title and section VIII, at legislation.gov.uk); the year 1559 is the modern reckoning.

Primary sources

The Diary of Henry Machyn Henry Machyn · 1550–1563
17 November 1558; 10 and 29 May, 21 and 26 June 1559

Act of Supremacy (1559) Parliament of England · 1559
in Gee and Hardy, pp. 446–447; in Gee and Hardy, pp. 448–449; short title and section VIII, at legislation.gov.uk

Act of Uniformity (1559) Parliament of England · 1559
in Gee and Hardy, pp. 458–463

Correspondence of Matthew Parker Matthew Parker · 1535–1575
pp. 482–484

The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion Church of England · 1563, ratified 1571
title; articles XI, XXVIII, XXXVII; ratification

Regnans in excelsis Pope Pius V · 25 February 1570
sections 3–5 and the closing date

Act against the Bringing In and Putting in Execution of Bulls from the See of Rome Parliament of England · 1571
in Prothero, pp. 60–62

Act to Retain the Queen's Majesty's Subjects in their Due Obedience Parliament of England · 1581
in Prothero, pp. 74–75

Act against Jesuits and Seminarists Parliament of England · 1585
in Gee and Hardy, pp. 485–487

A Briefe Historie of the Glorious Martyrdom of Twelve Reverend Priests William Allen · 1582
p. 1; pp. 16–20

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who Elizabeth I, Matthew Parker
Threads Church and State, Reform and Reformation, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I 1555–1558 1087
The Book of Common Prayer 1549–1552 1080

LEADS TO

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I 25 February 1570 1108
The First Baptist Congregations 1609 1146
The King James Bible 1611 1151
The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth 1620 1163
The Oxford Movement 14 July 1833 1289

CHURCH AND STATE

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I Before · 1555–1558 1087
The Scottish Reformation After · August 1560 1096

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Book of Common Prayer Before · 1549–1552 1080

The Scottish Reformation After · August 1560 1096

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Council of Trent Before · 1545–1563 1075

The Scottish Reformation After · August 1560 1096

← The Burning of Protestants under Mary I Earlier · 1555–1558
→ The Scottish Reformation Later · August 1560

THE REFORMATION

The Scottish Reformation

August 1560 · Firm date

In August 1560 the Scottish Parliament, meeting while its Catholic queen is in France, ratifies a Protestant confession of faith written by John Knox and his colleagues, ends the pope's jurisdiction and forbids the mass.

John Knox had preached in England under Edward VI and then lived at Geneva; at the bidding of John Calvin he served for a time as preacher to the English exiles at Frankfurt (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 1, pp. 231–232). He landed in Scotland on 2 May 1559. On 11 May, after a sermon against idolatry at Perth, a crowd broke the images in the church and sacked the houses of the Grey and Black Friars; Knox calls those who did it "the raschall multitude" (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 1, pp. 318–322).

Parliament met at Edinburgh in the summer of 1560 (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1560/8/4–6). Asked to set down the doctrine they wished established, the Protestant barons and ministers presented a confession within four days (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, p. 92). It was read article by article, and Knox reports that of the lay lords only three voted against it and that the bishops said nothing (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 121–122). The record of Parliament notes its ratification on 17 August 1560 (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1560/8/3). The Confession names three marks of the true church: the true preaching of the word of God, the right administration of the sacraments, and church discipline uprightly administered (Scots Confession article 18). It rejects transubstantiation, and it also condemns those who call the sacraments nothing but bare signs (Scots Confession article 21).

On 24 August Parliament declared that the bishop of Rome had no jurisdiction in Scotland, annulled earlier acts contrary to the Confession, and forbade anyone to say or hear mass, on pain of confiscation and bodily punishment for a first offence, banishment for a second and death for a third (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1560/8/4–6). The queen, Mary, Queen of Scots, was in France with her husband the French king. The acts were sent to them there, and Knox writes that no ratification came back (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 125–127).

Knox writes that after the Parliament he and five other ministers were charged to draw up a plan for the church's government, the Book of Discipline (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 128–129); the book's own preface dates the charge to 29 April 1560 (First Book of Discipline, preface, in Knox, Works, vol. 2, pp. 183–184). It gave each congregation the election of its minister and asked for a schoolmaster in every church (First Book of Discipline, in Knox, Works, vol. 2, pp. 189, 209–210). Part of the nobility signed it, but Knox says that others who held church property grudged it, and it was refused ratification (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 128–129) (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 297–298).

Mary, by then a widow, landed on 19 August 1561. Mass was said in her chapel the following Sunday, and on the next day a proclamation forbade anyone, on pain of death, to alter the state of religion she had found standing at her arrival (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 267–273). Knox preached that one mass was more fearful to him than ten thousand armed enemies, and he records an interview in which the queen accused him of raising her subjects against her (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 276–278). In July 1567 Mary gave up the crown to her son, James VI and I, and the Parliament held in his name that December ratified the acts of 1560 (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland 1567/12/104) (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1567/12/1–4).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The parliamentary record dates the ratification of the Confession to 17 August 1560 (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1560/8/3) and the three acts on the pope, on earlier laws and on the mass to 24 August 1560 (Records of the Parliaments of Scotland A1560/8/4–6). Knox counts the year from 25 March, so the signing of the Book of Discipline, which he puts on 27 January 1560, fell in January 1561 by modern reckoning (Knox, History of the Reformation vol. 2, pp. 128–129).

Primary sources

The History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland
John Knox · 1559–1571
vol. 1, pp. 231–232; vol. 1, pp. 318–322; vol. 2, p. 92; vol. 2, pp. 121–122; vol. 2, pp. 125–127; vol. 2, pp. 128–129; vol. 2, pp. 297–298; vol. 2, pp. 267–273; vol. 2, pp. 276–278

Acts of the Scottish Parliament of August 1560 Parliament of Scotland · August 1560; ratified December 1567
A1560/8/4–6; A1560/8/3; 1567/12/104; A1567/12/1–4

The Scots Confession John Knox and other ministers of the Scottish reformed church · August 1560 article 18; article 21

The First Book of Discipline John Knox and five other ministers · 1560 preface, in Knox, Works, vol. 2, pp. 183–184; in Knox, Works, vol. 2, pp. 189, 209–210

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Edinburgh

Who John Knox, Mary, Queen of Scots
Threads Reform and Reformation, Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

LEADS TO

The Westminster Confession 1643–1649 1176

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Elizabethan Settlement Before · 1559 1091

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel After · 24 August 1562 1100

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Elizabethan Settlement Before · 1559 1091

The Heidelberg Catechism After · 19 January 1563 1104

CHURCH AND STATE

The Elizabethan Settlement Before · 1559 1091

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I After · 25 February 1570 1108

← The Elizabethan Settlement Earlier · 1559
→ Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel Later · 24 August 1562

THE REFORMATION

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel

24 August 1562 · Firm date

In 1562 the Carmelite nun Teresa founds the small, enclosed and unendowed convent of St Joseph at Ávila to keep her order's rule in its early strictness. More houses follow, friars join the reform, among them John of the Cross, and both leave writings on prayer.

Teresa of Ávila was a Carmelite nun at Ávila (Teresa, Foundations prologue 2 (p. 2)) (Teresa, Life 36.27–31). She writes that her convent kept the rule of the order as relaxed by a papal bull of mitigation, that the house was large and comfortable, and that the nuns often left it to stay elsewhere (Teresa, Life 32.12). She tells of a vision of the place prepared for her in hell, which left her distressed at the loss of souls, "especially of the Lutherans", and resolved to keep her rule as perfectly as she could (Teresa, Life 32.1–11). A companion suggested that they found a small convent like those of the barefoot orders, and Teresa reports that after communion the Lord commanded her to work for it and said that it should be called St Joseph's (Teresa, Life 32.13–14).

The plan was mocked in the town and resisted in her own convent, and the Carmelite provincial withdrew his consent (Teresa, Life 32.17–18). A brief authorising the house came from Rome, Teresa placed it under the bishop, and on St Bartholomew's Day 1562 the first sisters took the habit (Teresa, Life 36.1–6). Within days the city council resolved that the convent must be closed, and a lawsuit followed; Teresa in the end refused the compromise of an endowment (Teresa, Life 36.14–21). The house was to hold no more than thirteen nuns, living on alms. They kept the Carmelite rule in the form given in 1248, never eating meat except in need and fasting eight months of the year (Teresa, Life 36.27–31).

Teresa went on to found other convents, seven more by 1573 (Teresa, Foundations prologue 2 (p. 2)). The general of the order also gave her licence for two houses of friars under the same rule (Teresa, Foundations 2.4–6 (pp. 16–17)). At Medina del Campo she met a young friar, John of the Cross, who was thinking of joining the Carthusians, and persuaded him to wait for her foundation (Teresa, Foundations 3.16 (pp. 30–31)). The friars' first house was in a small hamlet, which her editors identify as Duruelo, and the first mass was said there in Advent 1568 (Teresa, Foundations 13.2 and 14.5 (pp. 106, 111)).

The reform divided the order. In December 1577 Teresa wrote to Philip II that friars of the old observance had seized the two confessors of the reform who served the convent of the Incarnation at Ávila and were holding them prisoner (Teresa, Letters to Philip II, 4 December 1577 (vol. 3, pp. 3–5)). The next year she wrote that John had been kept nine months in a cell hardly large enough to hold him before he escaped (Teresa, Letters to Father Gracián, August 1578 (vol. 3, pp. 147–148)).

Both left writings on prayer. Teresa's Interior Castle, written in 1577, pictures the soul as a castle of crystal with many rooms, entered by the gate of prayer, with God in the innermost chamber (Teresa, Interior Castle preface; First Mansions 1.2–4, 9). John's Dark Night comments on his own poem and describes two purgations, of the senses and of the spirit, on the way to union with God (John of the Cross, Dark Night prologue; 1.8).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Teresa herself gives the day and the year: the first sisters took the habit "on St. Bartholomew's Day", which is 24 August, and the monastery was founded "in the year 1562" (Teresa, Life 36.1–6). The later dates in this entry are also hers, from the Book of the Foundations and from the preface of the Interior Castle.

Primary sources

The Book of the Foundations Teresa of Ávila · 1573–1582
prologue 2 (p. 2); 2.4–6 (pp. 16–17); 3.16 (pp. 30–31); 13.2 and 14.5 (pp. 106, 111)

The Life of Teresa of Jesus Teresa of Ávila · c. 1562–1565
36.27–31; 32.12; 32.1–11; 32.13–14; 32.17–18; 36.1–6; 36.14–21

The Letters of Teresa of Ávila Teresa of Ávila · letters cited: 1577 and 1578 to Philip II, 4 December 1577 (vol. 3, pp. 3–5); to Father Gracián, August 1578 (vol. 3, pp. 147–148)

The Interior Castle Teresa of Ávila · 1577
preface; First Mansions 1.2–4, 9

The Dark Night of the Soul John of the Cross · Late sixteenth century; the text gives no date
prologue; 1.8

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Ávila
Who Teresa of Ávila, John of the Cross
Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Society of Jesus Is Founded Before · 27 September 1540 1067

The Suppression of the Jesuits After · 21 July 1773 1237

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Scottish Reformation Before · August 1560 1096

The Heidelberg Catechism After · 19 January 1563 1104

← The Scottish Reformation Earlier · August 1560
→ The Heidelberg Catechism Later · 19 January 1563

THE REFORMATION

The Heidelberg Catechism

19 January 1563 · Firm date

In January 1563 the elector Frederick III issues a catechism for the churches and schools of the Palatinate. Its 129 questions, beginning with the believer's 'only comfort in life and in death', become a confession of Reformed churches.

Frederick III of the Palatinate, elector Palatine, sent the catechism to the pastors and schoolmasters of his territory with a preface dated at Heidelberg on 19 January 1563. He writes that he found the young taught "without any established, certain, and clear catechism", each teacher following his own plan, and that he had therefore had one prepared in German and Latin "with the advice and cooperation of our entire theological faculty in this place" and of the superintendents and leading ministers (Frederick III, Preface to the Heidelberg Catechism in Richards, pp. 183–199).

The preface names no author (Frederick III, Preface to the Heidelberg Catechism in Richards, pp. 183–199). An old tradition credits Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus. The introduction that the Christian Reformed Church prints with the catechism today calls it the work of a team of ministers and university theologians, with Ursinus probably the chief writer and Olevianus in a lesser role (Heidelberg Catechism introduction to the edition of the Christian Reformed Church).

The first question asks, "What is thy only comfort in life and in death?" The answer begins: "That I, with body and soul, both in life and in death, am not my own, but belong to my faithful Saviour Jesus Christ" (Heidelberg Catechism question 1). The second question sets out the plan of the whole in three parts: how great my sin and misery are, how I am redeemed from them, and how I am to be thankful to God for that redemption (Heidelberg Catechism question 2). In his lectures on the catechism Ursinus says that the question of comfort stands first because it contains the design and substance of the whole (Ursinus, Commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism p. 17).

Question 80 contrasts the Lord's Supper with the mass. The mass, it says, teaches that the living and the dead do not have forgiveness through Christ's sufferings unless he is still offered for them daily by priests, and is therefore "a denial of the one sacrifice and passion of Jesus Christ" and "an accursed idolatry" (Heidelberg Catechism question 80). The question was absent from the first printing and was added and then enlarged in the two that followed, by the elector's command (Heidelberg Catechism question 80, Schaff's note). The Council of Trent had taught in September 1562 that in the mass the same Christ who offered himself on the cross is offered in an unbloody manner, and it condemned the claim that the mass takes anything from the sacrifice of the cross (Council of Trent Session 22, chapters 1–2 and canon 4).

In 2004 the synod of the Christian Reformed Church in North America declared that it could no longer hold the question in its existing form as part of its confession, and its edition prints the condemnation in brackets, as not reflecting the present teaching and practice of the Roman Catholic Church; the Reformed Church in America keeps the full text as a statement made in its historical setting (Heidelberg Catechism question 80, notes of the Christian Reformed Church).

The same church's introduction notes that the Synod of Dort approved the catechism in 1619 (Heidelberg Catechism introduction to the edition of the Christian Reformed Church).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The elector's preface is dated at Heidelberg on Tuesday, 19 January 1563 (Frederick III, Preface to the Heidelberg Catechism in Richards, pp. 183–199). The catechism was reprinted twice in the same year with additions; the form of question 80 that became standard belongs to the third printing (Heidelberg Catechism question 80, Schaff's note) (Heidelberg Catechism question 80, notes of the Christian Reformed Church). On the question of who wrote it, see Lyle D. Bierma and others, An Introduction to the Heidelberg Catechism: Sources, History, and Theology (2005), pp. 49–74.

Primary sources

Preface of the Elector Frederick III to the Heidelberg Catechism Frederick III, Elector Palatine · 19 January 1563
in Richards, pp. 183–199

The Heidelberg Catechism Theologians and ministers of the Palatinate, by order of the elector Frederick III · 1563
introduction to the edition of the Christian Reformed Church; question 1; question 2; question 80; question 80, Schaff's note; question 80, notes of the Christian Reformed Church

Commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism Zacharias Ursinus · Lectures of the 1560s and 1570s; edition of David Pareus, 1591
p. 17

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 22, chapters 1–2 and canon 4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Heidelberg
Who Frederick III of the Palatinate, Zacharias Ursinus, Caspar Olevianus Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

The Peace of Augsburg 25 September 1555 1084

LEADS TO

The Synod of Dort 1618–1619 1159

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Scottish Reformation Before · August 1560 1096

The Book of Concord After · 25 June 1580 1117

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel Before · 24 August 1562 1100

The Book of Concord After · 25 June 1580 1117

← Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel Earlier · 24 August 1562
→ Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I Later · 25 February 1570

THE REFORMATION

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I

25 February 1570 · Firm date

In 1570 Pope Pius V declares Elizabeth I deposed. Parliament makes reconciliation with Rome treason, and priests such as the Jesuit Edmund Campion are executed: as traitors, says the government; for their religion, say Catholic writers.

On 25 February 1570 Pius V issued at Rome the bull Regnans in excelsis. It declared Elizabeth I a heretic, pronounced her deprived of her "pretended title" to the crown and commanded her subjects not to obey her (Pius V, Regnans in excelsis sections 3–5 and the closing date). William Camden, whose history was printed forty-five years later, says that John Felton set the bull up on the gates of the bishop of London's palace and was hanged for it, and that most of the more moderate Catholics secretly disliked the bull (Camden, Annales 1570, sections 13 and 15). In 1571 Parliament made it high treason to use a bull from Rome or to be reconciled to Rome by one (Act against Bulls from Rome, 1571, in Prothero, pp. 60–62); that law and those that followed it are told under the Elizabethan settlement.

In June 1580 the Jesuit Edmund Campion landed at Dover (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 8). In a paper for the Privy Council he wrote that he was a priest sent to preach the gospel and minister the sacraments, "strictly forbidden" to deal with matters of state, and he asked to be heard before the Council, the universities and the lawyers (Campion, Challenge to the Privy Council articles 1–5). The government later printed a document taken, it said, from an accomplice after Campion's death: on 14 April 1580 the pope had granted Campion and Robert Persons an explanation that the bull always bound the queen and the heretics but did not bind Catholics as things stood, only when it could be publicly executed (Cecil, Execution of Justice pp. 19–20).

By the account of the Catholic writer William Allen, Campion was taken on 17 July 1581 (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 10), lodged in the Tower in London and racked (Allen, Briefe Historie pp. 12–13). In November he and others were indicted for having plotted abroad the queen's death and an invasion, and a jury found them guilty (Allen, Briefe Historie pp. 16–19). On 1 December he was drawn to Tyburn with two other priests (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 1). There, Allen reports, he denied the treasons charged, but "if you esteeme my religion treason" he must grant it; asked his opinion of the bull, he gave no answer; and he prayed for Elizabeth, "your queene and my queene" (Allen, Briefe Historie pp. 2–5).

The government's defence, The Execution of Justice in England, was penned, its 1675 editor says, by direction of Lord Treasurer Burghley (Cecil, Execution of Justice preface of the 1675 reprint). It says that the seminary priests and Jesuits came to persuade the people to obey the bull and were condemned as traitors under the treason law of Edward III, "not being dealt withal upon questions of Religion" (Cecil, Execution of Justice pp. 5–7). By the Catholics' own catalogue, it adds, not above sixty had been executed in twenty-five years, against almost four hundred who died under Mary I of England (Cecil, Execution of Justice p. 22). Allen answered that many had died "for mere matter of religion" under new statutes that made cases of conscience treason (Allen, Defence of English Catholics chapter 1, vol. 1, pp. 10–11), and that Campion and those arraigned with him under the old statute were not guilty (Allen, Defence of English Catholics chapter 2, vol. 1, pp. 29–30).

In 1970 Pope Paul VI canonised forty martyrs of England and Wales, Campion among them. They had been, he said, faithful subjects of the royal power, which they recognised as legitimate in all that belongs to the civil and political order, and their loyalty to it came into conflict with their fidelity to God (Paul VI, homily of 25 October 1970 heading and the sections 'Lealtà e fedeltà' and 'Possano tutti ottenere la salvezza').

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The bull closes with its date. As Camden prints it, that is the fifth day before the Kalends of March (25 February) in the year of the Incarnation 1569, the fifth of the pontificate (Camden, Annales 1570, sections 13 and 15); the modern translation cited prints 25 February 1570 (Pius V, Regnans in excelsis sections 3–5 and the closing date). A year of the Incarnation began on 25 March, as the old-style year in England did, on which Camden's editor remarks (Camden, Annales editor's introduction, section 18), so a February of 1569 in that reckoning is February 1570 in the modern one. Camden, under 1570, says that the pope had given the sentence "the last yeare" and now had it posted in London (Camden, Annales 1570, sections 13 and 15). The days given for Campion's arrest, trial and death are William Allen's (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 10) (Allen, Briefe Historie pp. 16–19) (Allen, Briefe Historie p. 1). The government's tract is dated 17 December 1583 on the title page of the reprint used here (Cecil, Execution of Justice title page of the 1675 reprint), and Allen's reply is dated 1584 on the title of the edition cited (Allen, Defence of English Catholics half-title of vol. 1).

Primary sources

Regnans in excelsis Pope Pius V · 25 February 1570
sections 3–5 and the closing date

Annals of the Reign of Elizabeth William Camden · 1615 (to 1588) and 1625 (complete)
1570, sections 13 and 15; editor's introduction, section 18

Act against the Bringing In and Putting in Execution of Bulls from the See of Rome Parliament of England · 1571
in Prothero, pp. 60–62

A Briefe Historie of the Glorious Martyrdom of Twelve Reverend Priests William Allen · 1582
p. 8; p. 10; pp. 12–13; pp. 16–19; p. 1; pp. 2–5

Challenge to the Privy Council Edmund Campion · 1580
articles 1–5

The Execution of Justice in England Attributed to William Cecil, Lord Burghley · 17 December 1583
pp. 19–20; preface of the 1675 reprint; pp. 5–7; p. 22; title page of the 1675 reprint

A True, Sincere and Modest Defence of English Catholics William Allen · 1584 chapter 1, vol. 1, pp. 10–11; chapter 2, vol. 1, pp. 29–30; half-title of vol. 1

Homily at the Canonization of Forty Martyrs of England and Wales Pope Paul VI · 25 October 1970 heading and the sections 'Lealtà e fedeltà' and 'Possano tutti ottenere la salvezza'

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, London
Who Pius V, Elizabeth I, Edmund Campion
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I 1555–1558 1087

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Burning of Protestants under Mary I Before · 1555–1558 1087

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre After · 24 August 1572 1113

CHURCH AND STATE

The Scottish Reformation Before · August 1560 1096

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre After · 24 August 1572 1113

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Council of Trent Before · 1545–1563 1075

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate After · 26 January 1589 1121

← The Heidelberg Catechism Earlier · 19 January 1563
→ The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre Later · 24 August 1572

THE REFORMATION

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre

24 August 1572 · Firm date

After the king's Catholic sister marries the Protestant Henry of Navarre, the Huguenot leader Coligny is shot in Paris. From 24 August 1572 he and thousands of French Protestants are killed there and in other towns. Accounts of who decided it differed from the first.

Marguerite de Valois, the Catholic sister of King Charles IX of France, was married at Notre-Dame in Paris to the Protestant king of Navarre, the later Henry IV of France, who had come to the city with eight hundred gentlemen (Marguerite de Valois, Memoirs letter 4). Among the French Protestants, the Huguenots, in Paris in August 1572 was Admiral Gaspard de Coligny (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 538).

On 22 August Coligny was shot from a window as he walked back from the court to his lodging and was wounded in the hand and arm. An Englishman who saw him in bed that day wrote that the king took it "very grievously" (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 538). Marguerite, writing many years later, puts the wound in the shoulder. She says that the king blamed the duke of Guise and meant to punish him, and was then told that his mother, Catherine de' Medici, and his brother Anjou had had their share in the attempt. The Huguenots, she says, were threatening to take justice for themselves, and the king gave his consent to what followed only with the greatest difficulty, persuaded that his life and his kingdom depended on it (Marguerite de Valois, Memoirs letter 4) (Marguerite de Valois, Memoirs letter 5).

The historian De Thou, who was in Paris as a young man, writes that it was decided to "exterminate all the Protestants", that the queen mother approved, and that Navarre was to be spared. Guise told the captains it was the king's will. Armed men broke into Coligny's lodging, Besme, a retainer of the house of Guise, ran him through, and the body was thrown from the window, mutilated, dragged to the river and hung on the gibbet at Montfaucon (De Thou, History of His Own Time extract in Robinson, Readings, vol. 2, pp. 180–183). Marguerite tells how a wounded man fled into her bedchamber with archers at his heels, and how another was killed at her feet (Marguerite de Valois, Memoirs letter 5).

Reports sent to England in September said that the killing in Paris lasted more than eight days and that "the opinion is" that above 3,000 died there, besides 400 gentlemen. They tell of more killing at Orléans, Lyon, Meaux and Rouen, and name the queen mother, Anjou, the duke of Nevers and Tavannes as those who devised it (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 583) (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 584). The French authorities gave other accounts. A proclamation in Normandy on 28 August put the slaughter in Paris down to the private quarrel between Guise and the admiral (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 545). In October the Parlement of Paris declared the dead Coligny guilty of treason and of a conspiracy against the king, and ordered a yearly thanksgiving in Paris on St Bartholomew's Day (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 622).

The same English reports say that the prince of Condé was to hear mass and that Navarre was being pressed to follow, and that Protestants in the south, no longer safe in their houses, had gathered at Nîmes and Montauban and were holding Catholics as hostages (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 567).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

St Bartholomew's Day is 24 August. A letter written in Paris on 22 August 1572 reports the shooting of Coligny that day (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 538), a royal lieutenant's proclamation of 28 August already speaks of the slaughter in Paris (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 545), and in October the Parlement of Paris ordered a thanksgiving on every anniversary of St Bartholomew (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 622). The killings in the provinces ran on into September (Calendar of State Papers Foreign, Elizabeth, vol. 10, no. 583).

Estimates of the number killed differ very widely. Philip Benedict, "The Saint Bartholomew's Massacres in the Provinces", The Historical Journal 21 (1978), pp. 205–225, calls the casualty figures "notoriously unreliable" and arrives at a rough figure of about 3,000 for the provincial towns taken together. For Paris this entry reports only what an English informant heard at the time.

Primary sources

Memoirs of Marguerite de Valois Marguerite de Valois · Written before 1615; first printed 1628 letter 4; letter 5

Calendar of State Papers, Foreign Series, of the Reign of Elizabeth English ambassadors, agents and correspondents; calendared by Allan James Crosby · Documents of 1572–1574
vol. 10, no. 538; vol. 10, no. 583; vol. 10, no. 584; vol. 10, no. 545; vol. 10, no. 622; vol. 10, no. 567

History of His Own Time Jacques-Auguste de Thou · Early seventeenth century extract in Robinson, Readings, vol. 2, pp. 180–183

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Paris

Who Catherine de' Medici, Charles IX of France, Gaspard de Coligny
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

LEADS TO

The Edict of Nantes April 1598 1133

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I Before · 25 February 1570 1108

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan After · 1597–1614 1129

CHURCH AND STATE

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I Before · 25 February 1570 1108

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate After · 26 January 1589 1121

← Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I Earlier · 25 February 1570
→ The Book of Concord Later · 25 June 1580

THE REFORMATION

The Book of Concord

25 June 1580 · Firm date

After years of disputes among Lutherans following Luther's death, six theologians sign the Formula of Concord in 1577. In 1580 Lutheran electors, princes and cities publish it with the Augsburg Confession, Luther's catechisms and the ancient creeds as one Book of Concord.

After the death of Martin Luther, the Lutheran rulers say in the preface to the Book of Concord, false teaching and division spread in their churches, and their opponents taunted them that they no longer knew which was the true Augsburg Confession. Meetings of princes at Frankfurt in 1558 and Naumburg in 1561 did not bring the peace they wanted (Book of Concord, preface 4–8, 16). In 1576 the elector of Saxony called a group of theologians to Torgau. Their draft was sent to the other Lutheran rulers, examined by their theologians, revised, and then read by some of the rulers to the clergy and schoolmasters of their territories, who subscribed it (Book of Concord, preface 12–15).

The result was the Formula of Concord. The manuscripts of its short form, the Epitome, are dated at Bergen on 29 May 1577 and signed by six theologians, Jakob Andreae first and Martin Chemnitz last (Formula of Concord, Epitome, closing note in the Triglot edition, p. 842). It starts from a rule. The Scriptures of the prophets and apostles are "the only judge, rule, and standard" of doctrine; the three creeds, the Augsburg Confession of 1530 with its Apology, the Smalcald Articles and Luther's catechisms "are not judges" but a testimony to how Scripture has been understood (Formula of Concord, Epitome, Rule and Norm 1–8).

Twelve articles then take the disputed points in turn. On justification the Formula teaches that faith alone is the means by which Christ's righteousness is laid hold of, and that to justify means to absolve, "to declare free from sins" (Formula of Concord, Epitome III.5, 7). On election it says that God's eternal choice extends only over the godly, the children of God, and is a cause of their salvation, that his foreknowledge is not the cause of evil, and that he is not willing that any should perish (Formula of Concord, Epitome XI.4–5, 10).

On the Lord's Supper it speaks against those it calls Sacramentarians. Christ's body and blood, it says, are "truly and essentially present" and are received with the bread and wine by mouth, by the unworthy and unbelieving as well as by believers (Formula of Concord, Epitome VII.1–2, 6, 15–16). The Reformed taught otherwise: the Heidelberg Catechism says that Christ according to his human nature is now not on earth, and that believers are united to his body by the Holy Spirit although he is in heaven and they on earth (Heidelberg Catechism questions 47 and 76). The preface adds that the condemnations are aimed at false opinions and their obstinate teachers and not at those who err in simplicity, "much less" at entire churches (Book of Concord, preface 20).

The Formula was printed with the older confessions as one book (Book of Concord, table of contents). Its preface carries the names of three electors, Louis of the Palatinate, Augustus of Saxony and John George of Brandenburg, followed by other princes, counts and thirty-five cities (Book of Concord, preface 25). The signers say that they publish it so that the living and those who come after may know what their churches confess (Book of Concord, preface 4–8, 16).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Formula is dated by its manuscripts: "Actum Bergae", 29 May 1577, according to the note in the Triglot edition (Formula of Concord, Epitome, closing note in the Triglot edition, p. 842). For the publication of the whole book the entry follows F. Bente, "Historical Introductions to the Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church", in Triglot Concordia (1921): the official German edition appeared at Dresden with the year 1580 on its title page, and 25 June 1580, the fiftieth anniversary of the presentation of the Augsburg Confession, was chosen as the day of its publication.

Primary sources

The Book of Concord The Lutheran princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire · 1580
preface 4–8, 16; preface 12–15; preface 20; table of contents; preface 25

The Formula of Concord Signed by Jakob Andreae, Martin Chemnitz and four other Lutheran theologians · 1577
Epitome, closing note in the Triglot edition, p. 842; Epitome, Rule and Norm 1–8; Epitome III.5, 7; Epitome XI.4–5, 10; Epitome VII.1–2, 6, 15–16

The Heidelberg Catechism Theologians and ministers of the Palatinate, by order of the elector Frederick III · 1563
questions 47 and 76

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Dresden
Who Jakob Andreae, Martin Chemnitz
Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046

LEADS TO

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Heidelberg Catechism Before · 19 January 1563 1104

The Synod of Dort After · 1618–1619 1159

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Heidelberg Catechism Before · 19 January 1563 1104

The First Baptist Congregations After · 1609 1146

← The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre Earlier · 24 August 1572

→ Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate Later · 26 January 1589

THE REFORMATION

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate

26 January 1589 · Firm date

In January 1589 Jeremias II of Constantinople, visiting Russia, installs Metropolitan Job as the first patriarch of Moscow. A council at Constantinople confirms it in 1590 and ranks Moscow fifth. The tsar's charter calls the Russian realm the Third Rome.

In June 1588 Jeremias II of Constantinople, patriarch of Constantinople, reached the Russian frontier at Smolensk, and in July Tsar Fyodor received him in Moscow. No patriarch of Constantinople, the tsar told his nobles, had come to Russia in the time of his forefathers (Russian ambassadorial records, in Muravyov, Relations with the East, June–July 1588) (Russian ambassadorial records, in Muravyov, Relations with the East, July 1588 – 13 January 1589).

The records of the tsar's foreign office say that the talks were conducted by the tsar's brother-in-law, Boris Godunov. The tsar first proposed that Jeremias himself stay in Russia as patriarch, with his seat at Vladimir. Jeremias answered that a patriarch belongs beside the tsar and that his own church was calling him home. On 13 January 1589 Godunov asked him instead to install a patriarch chosen by the Russian council, and he agreed (Russian ambassadorial records, in Muravyov, Relations with the East, July 1588 – 13 January 1589). The bishops met on 19 January; on 23 January they named candidates and the tsar settled on Job of Moscow, metropolitan of Moscow; and on Sunday 26 January Jeremias laid his hands on him in the cathedral (Russian ambassadorial records, in Muravyov, Relations with the East, 19–26 January 1589).

In May the decisions were set down in a charter in the tsar's name. Jeremias, it says, chose and installed Job. From now on the patriarch of Moscow is to be installed by the Russian council with the tsar's consent and is to write to Constantinople for its agreement, and the Russian church is to have four metropolitans, six archbishops and eight bishops (Charter of the Moscow Patriarchate (1589) narrative, decrees and closing clauses). The charter also gives a speech of Jeremias in praise of the tsar. Old Rome, he says in it, fell through the Apollinarian heresy; the second Rome, Constantinople, is held by the Turks; and the tsar's Russian realm, "the Third Rome", has surpassed all in piety, so that he alone under heaven is called a Christian emperor (Charter of the Moscow Patriarchate (1589) speech of Jeremias).

The image was not new. About 1523 the monk Philotheus of Pskov, in a letter to a local official against astrology, had written that all Christian realms had come together in that of his sovereign: two Romes had fallen, a third stood, and a fourth there would not be (Philotheus, Letter to Munekhin closing section). That was one monk's letter of counsel to a layman (Philotheus, Letter to Munekhin closing section). In 1589 the phrase stood in a document sealed by the tsar and by both patriarchs (Charter of the Moscow Patriarchate (1589) narrative, decrees and closing clauses).

In May 1590 a council at Constantinople confirmed what Jeremias had done. Its charter, as translated in the Russian record, says that Job is to be named and honoured with the patriarchs, with his place in the prayers after the patriarch of Jerusalem and with the see of Constantinople as his head, and that his successors may be installed by the council of Moscow. Jeremias, the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem and eighty-one metropolitans, archbishops and bishops signed it (Synodal charter of Constantinople (1590) in Muravyov, under June 1590).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Russian court record gives the days: the council met on 19 January 1589, the election was held on Thursday 23 January, and Job was installed on Sunday 26 January (Russian ambassadorial records, in Muravyov, Relations with the East, 19–26 January 1589). These are dates of the Julian calendar used in Russia; 26 January 1589 is 5 February by the Gregorian calendar. The charter is dated May of the year 7097 from the creation of the world, which is 1589 (Charter of the Moscow Patriarchate (1589) narrative, decrees and closing clauses), and the confirmation of Constantinople May 7098, which is 1590 (Synodal charter of Constantinople (1590) in Muravyov, under June 1590). The editor of Philotheus's letter dates it to the end of 1523 or the beginning of 1524 (Philotheus, Letter to Munekhin closing section).

Primary sources

Relations of Russia with the East in Church Affairs Records of the tsar's foreign office, edited by Andrei Nikolaevich Muravyov · Records of 1588–1593; published 1858
June–July 1588; July 1588 – 13 January 1589; 19–26 January 1589

Charter on the Establishment of the Patriarchate of Moscow Tsar Fyodor Ivanovich, Patriarch Jeremias II of Constantinople, Patriarch Job of Moscow and the council of Russian and Greek clergy · May 1589 narrative, decrees and closing clauses; speech of Jeremias

Letter to Misyur Munekhin on Unfavourable Days and Hours Philotheus of Pskov · c. 1523–1524 closing section

Synodal Charter of Constantinople Confirming the Patriarchate of Moscow Patriarch Jeremias II and the council of Constantinople · May 1590
in Muravyov, under June 1590

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Moscow, Constantinople

Who Job of Moscow, Jeremias II of Constantinople, Boris Godunov
Threads East and West, Papacy and Church Order, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Fall of Constantinople 29 May 1453 979
The Baptism of Rus' AD 988/989 821

LEADS TO

The Union of Brest October 1596 1125
Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism 1652–1667 1187
Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221
The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks 1917–1918 1363
The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church June 2016 1493
Constantinople Grants Autocephaly to the Orthodox Church of Ukraine 6 January 2019 1502

EAST AND WEST

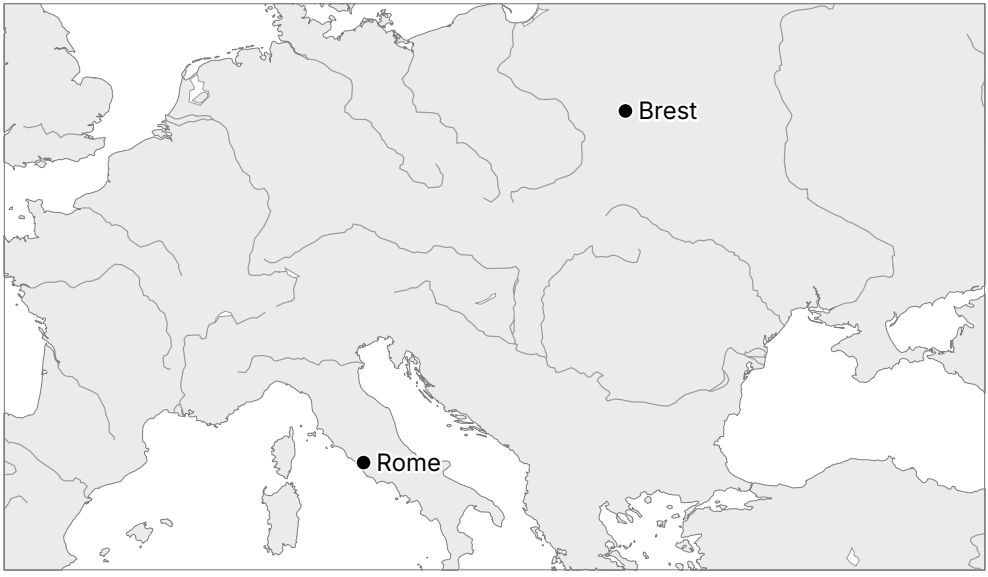
The Fall of Constantinople Before · 29 May 1453 979
The Union of Brest After · October 1596 1125

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Regnans in Excelsis and the Execution of Catholic Priests under Elizabeth I Before · 25 February 1570 1108
The Union of Brest After · October 1596 1125

CHURCH AND STATE

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre Before · 24 August 1572 1113
The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan After · 1597–1614 1129



← The Book of Concord Earlier · 25 June 1580
→ The Union of Brest Later · October 1596

THE REFORMATION

The Union of Brest

October 1596 · Firm date

In 1595 the metropolitan of Kiev and most of his bishops, Orthodox subjects of the Polish king, offer union with Rome on thirty-three conditions. Clement VIII receives them, and the union is proclaimed at Brest in 1596. Other bishops and Prince Ostrogski stay outside it.

The Orthodox bishops of the metropolitanate of Kiev lived under the king of Poland, who, as they put it, was "not of the same religion" (Articles of the Union of Brest articles 10, 12, 15, 25). On 1 June 1595 their metropolitan, Michael Rohoza, and several of his bishops set their names to thirty-three articles that they wanted guaranteed before entering union with the Roman church (Articles of the Union of Brest preamble and article 33). They asked to keep the creed as the Greek fathers taught it, with the Spirit proceeding "from the Father through the Son", and to keep their liturgy in their own language, communion in both kinds and married priests (Articles of the Union of Brest articles 1–9). They asked that their bishops be chosen only from Ruthenians or Greeks of their own religion, that the metropolitan and bishops sit in the senate, that their churches not be turned into Latin ones, and that none of their faithful be received into the Roman rite (Articles of the Union of Brest articles 10, 12, 15, 25).

Two bishops, Hypatius Potij and Cyril Terletsky, carried the request to Rome (Articles of the Union of Brest preamble and article 33). Before Clement VIII they made a profession of faith and promised obedience to the pope, for themselves and for those who had sent them (Clement VIII, Magnus Dominus in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 240–243). In the bull Magnus Dominus of 23 December 1595 the pope received the Ruthenian bishops, clergy and people into the Catholic Church and permitted them their rites and ceremonies, so long as these were not opposed to the Catholic faith and did not exclude communion with the Roman church (Clement VIII, Magnus Dominus in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 244–245). The bull calls their former state the schism of the Greeks and their act a return (Clement VIII, Magnus Dominus in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 240–243).

The union was proclaimed at a synod at Brest in October 1596 (John Paul II, Letter on the Union of Brest (1995) 1). The pope wrote in January 1597 that the metropolitan and his fellow bishops had ratified there what their envoys had done in Rome, and that some of the Ruthenian bishops had not accepted the union (Clement VIII, letters, in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae, vol. 3, no. 198 (18 January 1597), pp. 269–270). In June he declared void an excommunication which, he had been told, the patriarch of Constantinople had laid on the Ruthenians who had joined Rome (Clement VIII, letters, in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae, vol. 3, no. 199 (5 June 1597), pp. 270–271). Prince Konstanty Ostrogski, palatine of Kiev, stayed outside it. In 1605 the pope was still answering his complaint that the bishops had taken the matter to Rome without his knowledge, and his proposal that the patriarchs of Antioch and Constantinople be approached (Clement VIII, letters, in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae, vol. 3, no. 229 (15 January 1605), pp. 286–287).

John Paul II, writing in 1995 to the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, calls the union a restoration of communion with Rome in the line of the Council of Florence, in which the bishops kept their eastern identity and did not pass over to the Latin tradition (John Paul II, Letter on the Union of Brest (1995) 2). The patriarch of Moscow, in a declaration signed with the pope in 2016, holds that "uniatism", the joining of one community to another by separating it from its own church, is not the way to restore unity, while the communities that arose in this way have the right to exist (Joint Declaration of Francis and Kirill (Havana, 2016) 25).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The articles are dated 1 June 1595 by the old calendar (Articles of the Union of Brest preamble and article 33). The bull Magnus Dominus is dated at Rome on the tenth day before the kalends of January 1595, which is 23 December (Clement VIII, Magnus Dominus in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 244–245). For the proclamation at Brest this entry follows the Holy See's own reckoning, 16 October 1596 (John Paul II, Letter on the Union of Brest (1995) 1); Clement VIII's letter of 18 January 1597 confirms that the synod had been held but gives no day (Clement VIII, letters, in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae, vol. 3, no. 198 (18 January 1597), pp. 269–270).

Primary sources

Articles Concerning Union with the Roman Church (Articles of Brest) Michael Rohoza, metropolitan of Kiev, and the bishops of his province · 1 June 1595 (old calendar) articles 10, 12, 15, 25; preamble and article 33; articles 1–9

Magnus Dominus et laudabilis nimis Pope Clement VIII · 23 December 1595 in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 240–243; in Theiner, vol. 3, pp. 244–245

Apostolic Letter for the Fourth Centenary of the Union of Brest John Paul II · 12 November 1995
1; 2

Letters of Clement VIII on the Union of the Ruthenians Pope Clement VIII · 1595–1605
no. 198 (18 January 1597), pp. 269–270; no. 199 (5 June 1597), pp. 270–271; no. 229 (15 January 1605), pp. 286–287

Joint Declaration of Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill of Moscow and All Russia Pope Francis and Patriarch Kirill · 12 February 2016
25

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Brest, Rome
Who Clement VIII, Michael Rohoza, Konstanty Ostrogski
Threads East and West, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Florence Proclaims Reunion 6 July 1439 974

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

EAST AND WEST

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate Before · 26 January 1589 1121

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath After · 1599–1653 1137

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate Before · 26 January 1589 1121

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath After · 1599–1653 1137

← Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate Earlier · 26 January 1589
→ The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan Later · 1597–1614

THE REFORMATION

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan

1597–1614 · Firm date

In 1597 the Japanese ruler Hideyoshi has twenty-six Christians, foreign friars and Japanese converts, crucified at Nagasaki. In 1614 the Tokugawa government orders Christianity suppressed throughout Japan as a threat to the country of the gods and of Buddha.

In 1587 Toyotomi Hideyoshi, ruler of Japan, issued two edicts on Christianity. The first forbade lords to force the people of their domains to convert. The second called Japan the country of the gods, accused the missionaries of having shrines and temples destroyed, and ordered them to leave within twenty days, while the foreign ships might go on trading (Hideyoshi, edicts of 1587 Limitation, articles 1–2 and 8; Expulsion, articles 1–4). The missionaries did not all leave. Ten years later Jesuits were established in the country, and Franciscans from the Philippines kept a house and hospital in the capital with Hideyoshi's sufferance (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, on the galleon San Felipe).

In 1596 the Spanish galleon San Felipe, sailing from Manila for Mexico, lost its rudder in storms and ran aground on the Japanese coast, and Hideyoshi seized its cargo. Antonio de Morga, an official at Manila, reports that the ship's pilot, showing a Japanese official a chart of the Spanish king's dominions, said that the friars went in first to preach and the soldiers followed, and that this was repeated to Hideyoshi (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, on the galleon San Felipe). He ordered the friars of the capital and their Japanese helpers to be crucified (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, on the arrests). The sentence carried before them said that they had come from the Philippines as ambassadors and stayed "preaching the Christian religion, which in former years I have strictly forbidden" (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, sentence of the Combaco).

They were taken to Nagasaki and crucified on a hill in sight of the town on 5 February 1597 (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, on the crucifixion). The Jesuit Luís Fróis, writing that year, counts twenty-six: six Franciscans in the middle and ten Japanese on either side, three of whom belonged to the Society of Jesus. They were bound to the crosses and killed with lances. One of the three, the Japanese brother Paul Miki, spoke from his cross. He said that he was a Japanese and a Jesuit and was dying for having preached the gospel, that there was no way to salvation but the one the Christians hold, and that he forgave the ruler and all who had a part in his death and asked them to seek baptism (Fróis, Account of the Martyrdom at Nagasaki chapter 14, sections 104–110 (pp. 768–769)). The sentence and the friar's letter that Morga prints speak of twenty-four (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, sentence of the Combaco) (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, letter of Fray Martin de la Ascension).

On 27 January 1614 the government of Tokugawa Ieyasu issued a proclamation ordering Christianity suppressed. It calls Japan "the country of gods and of Buddha". The Christians, it says, have come "longing to disseminate an evil law" so as to "change the government of the country, and obtain possession of the land"; they honour condemned criminals; and they are to be swept out until "not an inch of soil remains to them in Japan". Rules issued with it made Buddhist priests responsible for vouching for the religion of their parishioners (Ieyasu, proclamation of 1614 in Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, vol. 6, pp. 46–48).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Hideyoshi's edicts carry the dates of the eighteenth and nineteenth days of the sixth month of the fifteenth year of Tenshō, which is 1587 (Hideyoshi, edicts of 1587 Limitation, articles 1–2 and 8; Expulsion, articles 1–4). Morga gives 5 February 1597, St Agatha's day, for the crucifixions (Morga, Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas chapter 6, on the crucifixion); Fróis says that the prisoners reached a place eight or nine leagues from Nagasaki on 4 February and were put to death the next day, the feast of St Agatha (Fróis, Account of the Martyrdom at Nagasaki chapters 12–13, sections 95–98 (pp. 766–767)). Ernest Satow, who translated the proclamation against Christianity, converts its Japanese date, the twelfth month of the eighteenth year of Keichō, to 27 January 1614, and heads it "Proclamation of Iyeyasu" (Ieyasu, proclamation of 1614 in Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, vol. 6, pp. 46–48). James Murdoch, A History of Japan, vol. 2 (1903), p. 611, says that the proclamation appeared under the name of Ieyasu's son Hidetada; at pp. 499–503 he follows the expulsion of the missionaries through 1614, drawing on the Jesuit annual letter of that year.

Primary sources

Edicts of Toyotomi Hideyoshi on Christianity (1587) Toyotomi Hideyoshi · 18th and 19th days of the sixth month of Tenshō 15 (1587)
Limitation, articles 1–2 and 8; Expulsion, articles 1–4

Sucesos de las Islas Filipinas (Events of the Philippine Islands) Antonio de Morga · Printed at Mexico, 1609 chapter 6, on the galleon San Felipe; chapter 6, on the arrests; chapter 6, sentence of the Combaco; chapter 6, on the crucifixion; chapter 6, letter of Fray Martin de la Ascension

Account of the Twenty-Six Crucified at Nagasaki Luís Fróis · 1597 chapter 14, sections 104–110 (pp. 768–769); chapters 12–13, sections 95–98 (pp. 766–767)

Proclamation against Christianity (1614) Tokugawa Ieyasu · 27 January 1614 (twelfth month of Keichō 18) in Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, vol. 6, pp. 46–48

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nagasaki
Who Paul Miki, Toyotomi Hideyoshi, Tokugawa Ieyasu
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071

LEADS TO

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward 17 March 1865 1317

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre Before · 24 August 1572 1113

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes After · October 1685 1204

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Francis Xavier in India and Japan Before · 1542–1552 1071

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath After · 1599–1653 1137

CHURCH AND STATE

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate Before · 26 January 1589 1121

The Edict of Nantes After · April 1598 1133

← The Union of Brest Earlier · October 1596
→ The Edict of Nantes Later · April 1598

THE REFORMATION

The Edict of Nantes

April 1598 · Firm date

Henry IV of France issues an edict to settle the civil wars over religion. It restores Catholic worship throughout the kingdom and gives the Reformed freedom of conscience, worship in named places, access to offices and courts in which they are represented.

In April 1598 Henry IV of France was at Nantes (Edict of Nantes first brevet (3 April 1598)). The edict he issued there looks back over years of civil war: one of its articles cancels every sentence passed against the Reformed on account of their religion since the death of King Henry II (Edict of Nantes art. 58). In the preamble the king says that he has received the complaints of his Catholic subjects and the petitions of those of the "so-called Reformed religion", as the edict calls the French Protestants. Since God has not yet allowed his subjects to worship in one form of religion, he says, they should at least do so without disorder, and he gives them one general law by a "perpetual and irrevocable" edict (Edict of Nantes preamble).

The first articles order that the memory of what was done on both sides in the troubles be treated as extinguished (Edict of Nantes art. 1–2). Catholic worship is to be restored wherever it had been interrupted, and churches and church property are to be handed back to the clergy (Edict of Nantes art. 3). The Reformed may live anywhere in the kingdom without being questioned, molested or forced to act against their conscience in matters of religion (Edict of Nantes art. 6).

Their public worship is allowed only in listed places: in the houses of nobles who hold high justice, in the towns where it had been held openly in 1596 and in 1597 up to the end of August, in the places granted by the edict of 1577, and in the suburbs of one further town in each bailiwick (Edict of Nantes art. 7–11). Elsewhere it is forbidden, and expressly at court, in Paris and within five leagues of the city (Edict of Nantes art. 13–14). The Reformed must keep the Catholic feast days and pay tithes to the parish clergy (Edict of Nantes art. 20, 25). No distinction of religion is to be made in admitting students to universities and schools or the sick and poor to hospitals, and the Reformed are declared capable of holding every public office (Edict of Nantes art. 22, 27). Their lawsuits go to special chambers of the parlements; in those of Bordeaux and Grenoble half the judges are to be of their own religion (Edict of Nantes art. 30–31).

Two royal warrants issued with the edict went further. One promised 45,000 écus a year for purposes it leaves unnamed (Edict of Nantes first brevet (3 April 1598)). The other left in Reformed hands for eight years the garrisoned towns they had held up to the end of August 1597 (Edict of Nantes second brevet (30 April 1598)). The Parlement of Paris registered the edict on 25 February 1599 (Edict of Nantes registration notes).

The edict thus gave a second confession a place in law inside a Catholic kingdom, on unequal terms (Edict of Nantes art. 3) (Edict of Nantes art. 13–14). In October 1685 Henry's grandson Louis XIV revoked it, saying in his own edict that most of the Reformed had since become Catholics, so that it no longer served a purpose (Edict of Fontainebleau preamble, art. 1 and dating clause). See Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The edict dates itself only by the month: given at Nantes "in the month of April" 1598, in the ninth year of the reign (Edict of Nantes dating clause). The documents issued with it carry days. The first royal warrant is dated 3 April (Edict of Nantes first brevet (3 April 1598)); the second, dated the last day of April, speaks of the edict as newly resolved and still to be published (Edict of Nantes second brevet (30 April 1598)); the particular articles are dated 2 May (Edict of Nantes particular articles, closing clause). The day long given for the signing, 13 April, is not in the text. Jean-Louis Bourgeon, "La date de l'édit de Nantes : 30 avril 1598", Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français 144 (1998), pp. 17–50, argues for 30 April. The timeline therefore gives the month and no day.

Primary sources

The Edict of Nantes Henry IV of France · April–May 1598 first brevet (3 April 1598); art. 58; preamble; art. 1–2; art. 3; art. 6; art. 7–11; art. 13–14; art. 20, 25; art. 22, 27; art. 30–31; second brevet (30 April 1598); registration notes; dating clause; particular articles, closing clause

The Edict of Fontainebleau (Revocation of the Edict of Nantes) Louis XIV of France · October 1685
preamble, art. 1 and dating clause

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nantes
Who Henry IV of France
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The St Bartholomew's Day Massacre 24 August 1572 1113

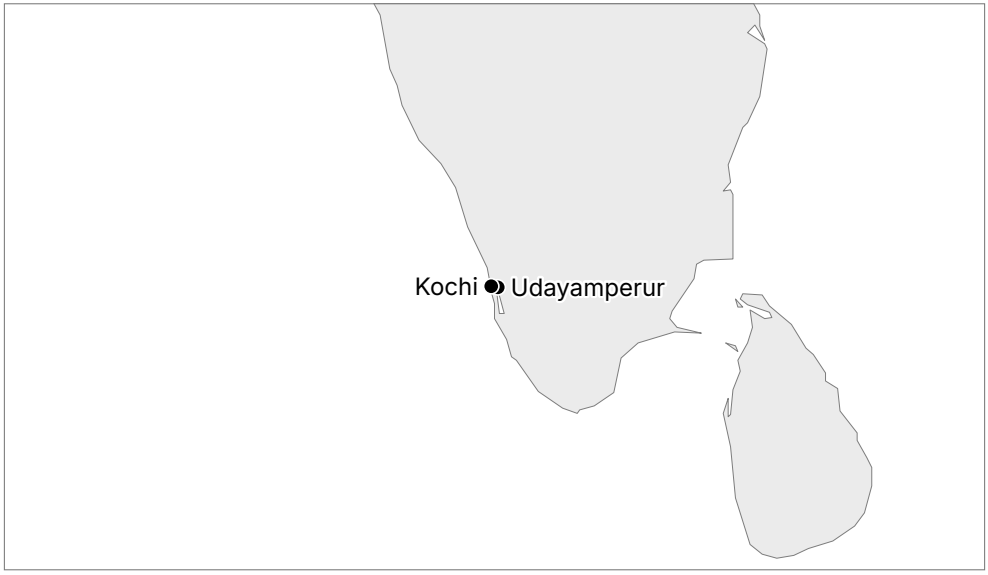
LEADS TO

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes October 1685 1204

CHURCH AND STATE

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan Before · 1597–1614 1129

The First Baptist Congregations After · 1609 1146



← The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan Earlier · 1597–1614
→ The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath Later · 1599–1653

THE REFORMATION

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath

1599–1653 · Firm date

In June 1599 the archbishop of Goa holds a synod at Diamper that binds the Thomas Christians of Malabar to Rome and cuts their tie to the patriarch of Babylon. In 1653 many of them swear to obey their Jesuit archbishop no longer, and the community divides.

In May 1599 Aleixo de Menezes, archbishop of Goa, summoned the Christians of St Thomas in the mountains of Malabar to a synod. His summons says that they had kept the faith since the apostle Thomas preached to them (see the tradition of Thomas in India); that Pope Clement VIII had ordered him, on the death of their archbishop Mar Abraham, to take possession of the bishopric and admit no bishop from Babylon, "as has been hitherto the Custom", such bishops being Nestorian heretics; and that for two years his orders had gone unobeyed. It called Archdeacon George, the priests and four laymen from every town to Diamper (Synod of Diamper, Publication and Calling (pp. 89–94)). A decree of the synod says that meetings held after Mar Abraham's death had sworn to accept no bishop except from the patriarch of Babylon, and declares those oaths void (Synod of Diamper, Action III, decree 19 (pp. 175–177)).

The synod opened on 20 June 1599 in the church of All Saints at Diamper (Synod of Diamper, Action I (pp. 97–98)). The next day Menezes swore a profession of faith, and after him the archdeacon, kneeling before him, the clergy and the lay representatives. It received the Council of Trent, anathematised Nestorius, condemned the teaching that the law of St Thomas and the law of St Peter were two different laws, and promised to accept no bishop but one appointed by the pope and never again to obey the patriarch of Babylon (Synod of Diamper, Action II, decree 2 and the profession of faith (pp. 106–119)). The decrees forbade naming the patriarch in the liturgy (Synod of Diamper, Action III, decree 8 (pp. 144–145)), listed Syriac books that no one might keep or read (Synod of Diamper, Action III, decree 14 (p. 154)), and ordered books written in Syriac to be handed in within two months for correction or destruction (Synod of Diamper, Action III, decree 16 (pp. 171–172)). The acts count 813 members, 133 of them priests and 660 lay representatives, and say that all signed (Synod of Diamper, conclusion (p. 423)).

For the breach of 1653 the nearest account found is that of the Carmelite Giuseppe Sebastiani, the pope's delegate to Malabar, printed in 1666 (Sebastiani, Prima speditione title page). He says that George's nephew Thomas, archdeacon after him, was at odds with the Jesuit archbishop Francisco Garcia (Sebastiani, Prima speditione book 1, ch. 1 (pp. 2–3)). A Syrian bishop who called himself patriarch reached India and was held by the Jesuits; the archdeacon's people went to Mattancherry, by Cochin, asking to see him; and he was shipped to Goa. They then swore in the church there, on the Gospels and before a crucifix set on the altar, never again to acknowledge Garcia as their prelate (Sebastiani, Prima speditione book 1, ch. 2 (pp. 3–4)). His account has no cross outside the church and no ropes. No account of those was found earlier than 1873, when the English clergyman Thomas Whitehouse printed what a metropolitan of the Thomas Christians had told him: the oath was sworn at the foot of the cross outside the church, with long ropes tied to it for those who could not reach it (Whitehouse, Lingerings of Light p. 160). A history kept among them, professing to date from 1770 (Whitehouse, Lingerings of Light p. 63), says, as he quotes it, that the Portuguese had drowned the patriarch and that all then swore in the church at Mattancherry to acknowledge Portuguese bishops no longer (Whitehouse, Lingerings of Light p. 160).

Later twelve priests made Thomas a bishop, on the strength of a letter that Sebastiani calls forged (Sebastiani, Prima speditione book 1, ch. 2 (pp. 5–6)). In December 1657 priests of "many churches" signed before Sebastiani a declaration renouncing Thomas and promising obedience to Rome (Sebastiani, Prima speditione book 2, ch. 13 (pp. 136–137)).

The churches descended from the Thomas Christians read these events differently. The account published by an eparchy of the Syro-Malabar Church, which is in communion with Rome, calls the oath the Coonan Cross Oath. It says that Latin missionaries, suspecting the Thomas Christians of heresy, "started Latinizing them", that the oath began the division of a church that had been one, and that those who returned to Latin rule became the Syro-Malabar Church (Syro-Malabar Eparchy of Melbourne, Significant Dates opening narrative and the entries for 1599 and 1653). The Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church says that the synod brought the "enforced domination" of Roman Catholicism and that the oath overthrew it (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church, History History, second and third paragraphs). The Mar Thoma Church calls the synod "a coercive attempt" to impose Latin customs (Mar Thoma Church, History section 'Portuguese Intervention and Challenges'). Other churches of the same descent, among them the Jacobite and Syro-Malankara churches that the Syro-Malabar account names (Syro-Malabar Eparchy of Melbourne, Significant Dates opening narrative and the entries for 1599 and 1653), are not represented here.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The summons calls the synod for 20 June 1599, the third Sunday after Pentecost (Synod of Diamper, Publication and Calling (p. 93)), the acts date its opening to that day (Synod of Diamper, Action I (pp. 97–98)) and the profession of faith to 21 June (Synod of Diamper, Action II, decree 2 and the profession of faith (pp. 106–119)). The title page of the acts in Geddes's translation prints "July" for the month, and says that the record was printed at Coimbra in 1606 (Synod of Diamper, title page).

For the oath of 1653 no account written at the time was found. Sebastiani's book, the nearest found, gives no day or month for it. It was printed at Rome in 1666 (Sebastiani, Prima speditione title page), thirteen years after the events, by an author who left Rome for India in February 1656 (Sebastiani, Prima speditione book 1, ch. 3 (p. 10)) and who says that he had written his account seven years before it was printed (Sebastiani, Prima speditione To the reader). The date 3 January 1653 for the oath, and 22 May 1653 for the laying of hands on the archdeacon, are those of the chronology published by a Syro-Malabar eparchy, which names no source for them (Syro-Malabar Eparchy of Melbourne, Significant Dates opening narrative and the entries for 1599 and 1653); they are that church's own. Whitehouse, in 1873, put the making of the archdeacon into a bishop on Friday 3 January 1654 (Whitehouse, Lingerings of Light pp. 160–161).

Primary sources

Acts and Decrees of the Synod of Diamper Synod convened by Aleixo de Menezes, archbishop of Goa · June 1599; printed 1606
Publication and Calling (pp. 89–94); Action III, decree 19 (pp. 175–177); Action I (pp. 97–98); Action II, decree 2 and the profession of faith (pp. 106–119); Action III, decree 8 (pp. 144–145); Action III, decree 14 (p. 154); Action III, decree 16 (pp. 171–172); conclusion (p. 423); Publication and Calling (p. 93); title page

Prima speditione all'Indie Orientali Giuseppe di Santa Maria (Sebastiani) · Written about 1659, printed 1666 title page; book 1, ch. 1 (pp. 2–3); book 1, ch. 2 (pp. 3–4); book 1, ch. 2 (pp. 5–6); book 2, ch. 13 (pp. 136–137); book 1, ch. 3 (p. 10); To the reader

Lingerings of Light in a Dark Land Thomas Whitehouse · 1873
p. 160; p. 63; pp. 160–161

Significant Dates in the History of the Syro-Malabar Church Syro-Malabar Eparchy of St Thomas the Apostle, Melbourne
opening narrative and the entries for 1599 and 1653

History of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church History, second and third paragraphs

The Enduring Legacy: A History of the Mar Thoma Church Malankara Mar Thoma Syrian Church section 'Portuguese Intervention and Challenges'

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Udayamperur, Kochi
Who Aleixo de Menezes, George of the Cross, Thoma I Threads East and West, Mission and Expansion, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Apostle Thomas and the Christians of India AD 52 429

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071

EAST AND WEST

The Union of Brest Before · October 1596 1125

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church After · 1622–1632 1167

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan Before · 1597–1614 1129

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing After · 24 January 1601 1142

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Union of Brest Before · October 1596 1125

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus After · 1653–1713 1191

← The Edict of Nantes Earlier · April 1598
→ Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing Later · 24 January 1601

THE REFORMATION

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing

24 January 1601 · Firm date

The Jesuit Matteo Ricci reaches Beijing in January 1601 with gifts for the Wanli emperor and is allowed to stay. He writes a catechism that argues from reason and the Chinese classics, and scholars such as Xu Guangqi are baptized and work with him.

In 1602 the Jesuit Diego de Pantoja, who had entered China from the Portuguese town of Macau, wrote from Beijing that in twenty years no more than five or six priests of his order had got into the country, and that they had long looked for a way to reach the emperor with a gift (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, p. 332). In May 1600 Matteo Ricci, Pantoja and a Chinese Jesuit brother left Nanjing by boat with two clocks, three oil paintings of Christ and of the Virgin, and a finely bound breviary (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, pp. 336–338). A eunuch who collected the emperor's tolls detained them on the way and took some of their goods (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, pp. 339–346).

After six months the emperor asked for the clocks, and the party reached Beijing on 24 January 1601 (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 4.12 (pp. 405–407)). Pantoja reports that the emperor was delighted with the paintings and clocks and had four eunuchs taught to tend them, but did not receive the Jesuits himself and had their portraits painted instead (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, pp. 348–351). The official responsible for foreigners held them under guard for about three months and petitioned for them to be sent away; the emperor did not answer, and they rented a house and kept an allowance from the court (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, pp. 353–355).

Ricci wrote a catechism in Chinese meant chiefly for readers outside the church; the Jesuit account says that it argued from natural reason more than from Scripture, quoted the ancient Chinese books, and refuted the sects of China except the school of Confucius (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.2 (pp. 488–489)). The same account says that the yearly offerings to ancestors seem free of idolatry and "perhaps" of superstition, and adds that Christians would do better to give alms instead (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 1.10 (pp. 107–108)).

It also tells of the Chinese scholars who joined the Jesuits. Xu Guangqi of Shanghai visited the Jesuit house at Nanjing in 1603, read the catechism in manuscript through the night and was baptized, as Paul, before he went home (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 4.19 (pp. 471–473)). The next year he took the highest degree at Beijing (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.3 (pp. 492–493)), and he urged that a book of European science be published (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.7 (pp. 510–511)). Ricci's preface to their Chinese Euclid, dated 1607, says that he explained the text aloud while Xu wrote it down (Jihe yuanben, Ricci's preface). Xu's preface calls mathematics the least part of Ricci's learning, the greatest being to cultivate the self and serve Heaven, and says he publishes the lesser first because it is easier to believe (Jihe yuanben, Xu Guangqi's preface). In 1616, when the Board of Rites accused the Jesuits, he told the emperor in a memorial that he was one of those who believed their books (Xu Guangqi, Memorial of 1616, Chinese Repository 19, pp. 118–119).

Ricci died in Beijing on 11 May 1610 (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.20 (pp. 612–614)), and the emperor granted land for his grave (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.21 (pp. 616–626)). For the later dispute over these rites, see the Chinese Rites Controversy.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Latin edition of Ricci's own account gives the day: the party reached Beijing on 24 January 1601, as the Chinese year was ending (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 4.12 (pp. 405–407)). Pantoja's letter gives no day: it says that they were held under guard for more than two and a half months of the winter and travelled four days to the capital once the emperor sent for them, and a marginal note in Purchas's printing puts the end of the confinement at the beginning of January 1601 (Pantoja, Letter of 1602, Purchas 12, pp. 347–349, with the marginal note on p. 347). A petition of 1610 translated in the same book dates the arrival to the twelfth moon of the twenty-eighth year of Wanli and Ricci's death to the eighteenth day of the third moon of the thirty-eighth year (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.21 (pp. 616–626)), ten years later, which the narrative gives as 11 May (Ricci and Trigault, De Christiana expeditione 5.20 (pp. 612–614)).

Primary sources

Letter from Beijing to Luis de Guzmán (9 March 1602) Diego de Pantoja · 9 March 1602

Purchas 12, p. 332; Purchas 12, pp. 336–338; Purchas 12, pp. 339–346; Purchas 12, pp. 348–351; Purchas 12, pp. 353–355; Purchas 12, pp. 347–349, with the marginal note on p. 347

De Christiana expeditione apud Sinas (On the Christian Expedition among the Chinese) Matteo Ricci, edited and put into Latin by Nicolas Trigault · Finished by Ricci shortly before his death in 1610; published in Latin 1615

4.12 (pp. 405–407); 5.2 (pp. 488–489); 1.10 (pp. 107–108); 4.19 (pp. 471–473); 5.3 (pp. 492–493); 5.7 (pp. 510–511); 5.20 (pp. 612–614); 5.21 (pp. 616–626)

Elements of Geometry (Jihe yuanben): the prefaces of Xu Guangqi and Matteo Ricci Xu Guangqi and Matteo Ricci · 1607
Ricci's preface; Xu Guangqi's preface

Memorial in Defence of the Jesuits (Bianxue zhangshu) Xu Guangqi · 1616 (44th year of Wanli)
Chinese Repository 19, pp. 118–119

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Beijing, Macau
Who Matteo Ricci, Xu Guangqi
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071
The Church of the East Reaches China AD 635 739
Franciscan Envoys to the Mongols and the Church of Khanbaliq 1245–1307 907

LEADS TO

The Chinese Rites Controversy 1704–1742 1212
Korean Scholars Found a Church 1784 1245

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath Before · 1599–1653 1137
The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth After · 1620 1163

← The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath Earlier · 1599–1653
→ The First Baptist Congregations Later · 1609

THE REFORMATION

The First Baptist Congregations

1609 · Estimated date

English Separatists in Amsterdam, led by John Smyth, reject infant baptism and found their church anew by baptizing believers on confession of faith. Thomas Helwys leads part of the group back to London and argues that no king has power over conscience.

In a book printed in 1609 John Smyth described his own course as a passage from Puritanism to "Brownism", the Separatists' rejection of the Church of England as a false church, and from there to "true Christian baptism" (Smyth, Character of the Beast, Epistle to the Reader (Works 2, pp. 564–567)). The title page states two propositions: that infants are not to be baptized, and that converts from "Antichristian" churches are to be admitted to the true church by baptism (Smyth, Character of the Beast, title page (Works 2, p. 563)). Anyone who rejects the Church of England as false, he wrote, must reject the baptism it gave as well (Smyth, Character of the Beast, Epistle to the Reader (Works 2, pp. 564–567)).

His congregation, which William Bradford places at Amsterdam (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 3 (p. 23)), therefore began again. John Robinson, pastor of another English Separatist congregation abroad, wrote in 1614 that he had heard from members of the group how it was done: they dissolved their former church, and Smyth baptized first himself, then Thomas Helwys, then the rest, each making a confession (Robinson, Of Religious Communion, Works 3, p. 168). Smyth defended the act against the charge that no one may baptize himself: if two or three may form a church where there is none, he argued, they may also recover baptism (Smyth, Character of the Beast, Works 2, pp. 659–660).

The group divided. Smyth came to hold that baptism should be sought from a true church where one exists; he wrote that they had baptized themselves only because they then knew no church they could join with a good conscience, and that Helwys accused him of sinning against the Holy Spirit by abandoning what he had once acknowledged (Smyth, Last Book, Works 2, pp. 756–757).

In 1611 a confession of twenty-seven articles was printed in the name of the "English people remaining at Amsterdam"; its editor attributes it to Helwys (Declaration of Faith (1611), title page and editor's introduction (McGlothlin, pp. 84–86)). It defines the church as a company of faithful people joined to the Lord and to one another by baptism on their own confession of the faith and of sins, and says that baptism "in no wise" belongs to infants (Declaration of Faith (1611), art. 10, 13–14). It teaches that God would have all people saved and that believers may fall from grace (Declaration of Faith (1611), art. 5, 7). It calls magistracy a holy ordinance of God, allows magistrates to be church members, and charges Smyth with denying this (Declaration of Faith (1611), art. 24 and the charges against Smyth). The Swiss Brethren of the previous century had held that a Christian may not serve as a magistrate (Schleitheim Confession art. 6); see the First Anabaptists.

In 1612, in the reign of James I, Helwys published a book that speaks directly to "our lord the King" (Helwys, Mystery of Iniquity, title page) (Helwys, Mystery of Iniquity, p. 69). He argued that those who had fled persecution should come back to their own country (Helwys, Mystery of Iniquity, pp. 205, 212), and in 1614 Robinson wrote of him and his people as being in London (Robinson, Of Religious Communion, Works 3, pp. 160, 162–163). The king, Helwys wrote, has authority in earthly matters only and none over consciences, those of Roman Catholics included: “Let them be heretikes, Turcks, Jewes, or whatsoever it apperteynes not to the earthly power to punish them in the least measure” (Helwys, Mystery of Iniquity, p. 69).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

None of these writings gives the day on which the congregation baptized itself. Smyth’s Character of the Beast, which defends “that which is done by us”, is dated 1609 on its title page (Smyth, Character of the Beast, title page (Works 2, p. 563)) (Smyth, Character of the Beast, Works 2, pp. 659–660), so the baptism had taken place by then; the timeline puts the event in that year. Helwys’s confession is dated 1611 on its title page (Declaration of Faith (1611), title page and editor’s introduction (McGlothlin, pp. 84–86)), and his Short Declaration of the Mistery of Iniquity carries “Anno 1612” on its own (Helwys, Mystery of Iniquity, title page). Robinson, writing in 1614, speaks of Helwys and his people as being in London (Robinson, Of Religious Communion, Works 3, pp. 160, 162–163).

Primary sources

The Character of the Beast, or The False Constitution of the Church John Smyth · 1609

Epistle to the Reader (Works 2, pp. 564–567); title page (Works 2, p. 563); Works 2, pp. 659–660

Of Plymouth Plantation William Bradford · written over many years; parts dated by the author to about 1645–1646

ch. 3 (p. 23)

Of Religious Communion, Private and Public John Robinson · 1614

Works 3, p. 168; Works 3, pp. 160, 162–163

The Last Book of John Smyth, Called the Retractation of His Errors and the Confirmation of the Truth John Smyth · c. 1612, printed after his death

Works 2, pp. 756–757

A Declaration of Faith of English People Remaining at Amsterdam in Holland Thomas Helwys and his congregation · 1611 title page and editor's introduction (McGlothlin, pp. 84–86); art. 10, 13–14; art. 5, 7; art. 24 and the charges against Smyth

The Schleitheim Confession (Brotherly Union) Swiss Brethren assembled at Schleitheim; drafted by Michael Sattler · 24 February 1527
art. 6

A Short Declaration of the Mistery of Iniquity Thomas Helwys · 1612 title page; p. 69; pp. 205, 212

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Amsterdam, London
Who John Smyth, Thomas Helwys
Threads Reform and Reformation, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Anabaptists 21 January 1525 1029
The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

LEADS TO

George Fox and the Quakers 1652 1183
The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter 24 May 1689 1208

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Book of Concord Before · 25 June 1580 1117
The Synod of Dort After · 1618–1619 1159

CHURCH AND STATE

The Edict of Nantes Before · April 1598 1133
The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia After · 1618–1648 1155

← Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing Earlier · 24 January 1601
→ The King James Bible Later · 1611

THE REFORMATION

The King James Bible

1611 · Firm date

A new English translation of the Bible, asked for at the Hampton Court conference of 1604 and made by companies of scholars at Westminster, Oxford and Cambridge, is published in London in 1611 by command of James I and appointed to be read in churches.

In January 1604, soon after he came to the English throne, James VI and I met the bishops and four spokesmen of the Puritan ministers at Hampton Court (Barlow, Sum and Substance of the Conference, first and second days (Cardwell, pp. 169–170, 177–178)). William Barlow, dean of Chester, who was present, reports that the Puritans' foreman, Dr Rainolds, asked for a new translation of the Bible, saying that those allowed under Henry VIII and Edward VI were corrupt and did not answer to the original. The king, Barlow goes on, replied that he had never yet seen a Bible well translated in English and thought the Geneva version the worst; he wished for one uniform translation, made by the best scholars of both universities, reviewed by the bishops and the chief learned of the church, presented to the privy council and ratified by himself, and without marginal notes, for he found some of those in the Geneva Bible "very partial, untrue, seditious" (Barlow, Sum and Substance of the Conference, second day (Cardwell, pp. 187–188)). The translators' own preface tells the story more briefly (King James Bible (1611), The Translators to the Reader, on the Hampton Court conference).

The rules given to the translators told them to follow the Bishops' Bible, the version then read in church, and to alter it as little as the original allowed; to keep the old church words, "church" and not "congregation"; to add no notes except to explain Hebrew or Greek words; and to use the versions of Tyndale, Matthew, Coverdale, Whitchurch and Geneva where these agreed better with the text (Rules for the translators of 1611, rules 1, 3, 6, 14). English delegates told the Synod of Dort in 1618 that the Bible had been divided into six parts, each given to seven or eight scholars, two parts in London and four at the universities, that twelve men chosen from them all then revised the whole, and that two further revisers gave it a final review (British delegates' report to the Synod of Dort, Pollard, pp. 336–339).

The Bible was printed in London in 1611; its title page calls it newly translated out of the original tongues, with the former translations diligently compared and revised, by the king's special commandment, and "Appointed to be read in Churches" (King James Bible (1611), title page and table of books). Its table of books lists the Apocrypha as a separate group between the Old Testament and the New (King James Bible (1611), title page and table of books).

In the preface the translators say that they never meant to make a new translation, nor to turn a bad one into a good one, "but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones one principal good one"; they worked from the Hebrew and the Greek and consulted translations and commentaries in other languages (King James Bible (1611), The Translators to the Reader, on the translators' purpose and method). They claim to have avoided both the "scrupulosity of the Puritanes", who dropped the old church words, and the "obscurity of the Papists" (King James Bible (1611), The Translators to the Reader, last section).

The version was still being printed a century and a half later: an Oxford edition of 1769 describes itself on its title page in nearly the same words, down to "Appointed to be read in Churches" (King James Bible (1611), title page of the Oxford edition of 1769).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Sum and Substance of the Conference at Hampton Court William Barlow · 1604 first and second days (Cardwell, pp. 169–170, 177–178); second day (Cardwell, pp. 187–188)

The Holy Bible (King James Version), with its preface "The Translators to the Reader" The translators appointed by James I · 1611
The Translators to the Reader, on the Hampton Court conference; title page and table of books; The Translators to the Reader, on the translators' purpose and method; The Translators to the Reader, last section; title page of the Oxford edition of 1769

The Rules to be Observed in the Translation of the Bible c. 1604 rules 1, 3, 6, 14

Report of the British Delegates to the Synod of Dort on the English Bible of 1611 The delegates of Great Britain at the Synod of Dort · 20 November 1618
Pollard, pp. 336–339

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who James VI and I
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Tyndale's English New Testament 1526 1034
The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

LEADS TO

The Westminster Confession 1643–1649 1176

The British and Foreign Bible Society 7 March 1804 1276

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Council of Trent Before · 1545–1563 1075

The Trial of Galileo After · 22 June 1633 1172

← The First Baptist Congregations Earlier · 1609
→ The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia Later · 1618–1648

THE REFORMATION

The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia

1618–1648 · Firm date

A revolt of Bohemian Protestants in 1618 grows into a war that draws in all Germany and its neighbours. The treaties of Osnabrück and Münster in 1648 fix the rights of Catholics, Lutherans and Reformed in the Empire by the year 1624; the pope declares those articles void.

In 1609 the emperor Rudolf II, as king of Bohemia, gave the Protestant estates of that kingdom, which the document calls Utraquist, a Letter of Majesty that promised them the free practice of their confession and the right to build churches (Letter of Majesty (1609) part A, the emperor's patent). On 23 May 1618 nobles of those estates crowded into the chancellery of the castle at Prague, accused two of the king's Catholic regents of working to undo the Letter, and threw them and a secretary from the window (Account of the defenestration of Prague (1618) whole account). The account, written from the Catholic side, credits the Virgin Mary with saving the first man to fall (Account of the defenestration of Prague (1618) whole account).

The peace treaty of 1648 describes what followed: discords in the Empire grew into a long war that drew in all Germany and the neighbouring kingdoms, above all Sweden and France, with the desolation of many provinces; it names as the first opponents the emperor Ferdinand II and King Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden (Treaty of Osnabrück preamble). In 1629 Ferdinand ordered the return of every bishopric, monastery and church property that Catholics had held at the Treaty of Passau of 1552 or since, on pain of the imperial ban (Edict of Restitution (1629) the three articles and the order to the commissioners). In 1631 the imperial and Catholic League armies stormed Magdeburg, and the city burned; Otto Guericke of Magdeburg wrote that the dead could not be counted and were generally reckoned at some twenty thousand (Guericke, Destruction of Magdeburg Hoffmann ed., pp. 82–87). Gustavus Adolphus was killed in battle at Lützen in November 1632; a broadsheet from his own side says that he had taken up arms only to defend God and religion (Lützen broadsheet (1632) title and narrative of the battle).

The two peace treaties are dated 24 October 1648, the one with Sweden at Osnabrück and the one with France at Münster (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 17, closing clause) (Treaty of Münster art. 49 and closing clause). The Osnabrück treaty confirms the religious peace of 1555 (see the Peace of Augsburg), decrees an exact and mutual equality between the estates of the two religions, and makes 1 January 1624 the date to which the possession of church property is restored (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 5, §§1–2). Rulers keep the right to reform religion in their lands, but subjects who practised the other confession in 1624 keep that right, and the rest are to be "patiently tolerated": they may worship at home, attend services nearby and emigrate on fixed terms (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 5, §§30–37). Everything granted to Catholics and to those of the Augsburg Confession is extended to those called Reformed, and no other religion is to be tolerated in the Empire (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 7).

The treaty declared any protest against it, by clergy or laity, void in advance, and ruled out appeals to canon law, council decrees or concordats with the popes (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 5, §1; art. 17, §3). A month later Innocent X declared null and void for ever every article of the two treaties that harmed the Catholic religion or the rights of the church, naming among them the surrender of church lands to "heretics", the free exercise allowed to the Augsburg Confession, and an eighth electorate created without his consent (Innocent X, Zelo domus Dei list of grievances, declaration of nullity and date).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Catholic account of the defenestration dates it to Wednesday 23 May, the eve of the Ascension, and the edition cited gives the year as 1618 (Account of the defenestration of Prague (1618) whole account). The treaty of Osnabrück is dated 14/24 October 1648, in the old and the new calendar (Treaty of Osnabrück art. 17, closing clause), and the treaty of Münster 24 October 1648 (Treaty of Münster art. 49 and closing clause). The pope's brief is dated 26 November 1648 (Innocent X, Zelo domus Dei list of grievances, declaration of nullity and date). The broadsheet on Lützen gives the battle as 6 November 1632 in the old calendar, which is 16 November in the new (Lützen broadsheet (1632) title and narrative of the battle).

Primary sources

The Letter of Majesty of Rudolf II for Bohemia Rudolf II, Holy Roman Emperor and King of Bohemia · July 1609 part A, the emperor's patent

Account of the Defenestration of Prague, 23 May 1618 after May 1618 whole account

The Treaty of Osnabrück (Instrumentum Pacis Osnabrugensis) 14/24 October 1648 preamble; art. 17, closing clause; art. 5, §§1–2; art. 5, §§30–37; art. 7; art. 5, §1; art. 17, §3

The Edict of Restitution Ferdinand II, Holy Roman Emperor · 6 March 1629
the three articles and the order to the commissioners

History of the Siege, Capture and Destruction of Magdeburg Otto Guericke · after 1631
Hoffmann ed., pp. 82–87

True Description of the Great and Bloody Battle near the Town of Lützen (broadsheet) 1632 title and narrative of the battle

The Treaty of Münster (Instrumentum Pacis Monasteriensis) 24 October 1648 art. 49 and closing clause

Zelo domus Dei Pope Innocent X · 26 November 1648 list of grievances, declaration of nullity and date

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Prague, Münster, Osnabrück
Who Ferdinand II, Gustavus Adolphus, Innocent X
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Peace of Augsburg 25 September 1555 1084

CHURCH AND STATE

The First Baptist Congregations Before · 1609 1146

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth After · 1620 1163

← The King James Bible Earlier · 1611
→ The Synod of Dort Later · 1618–1619

THE REFORMATION

The Synod of Dort

1618–1619 · Firm date

A national synod of the Dutch Reformed churches, with delegates from Britain, Germany and Switzerland, judges the five articles of the Remonstrants, the followers of Arminius. Its Canons set out the Reformed teaching on predestination and grace in five heads.

Jacobus Arminius taught theology at the university of Leiden (Arminius, Public Disputations, dedication). He told the States of Holland that he disapproved of the doctrine of predestination taught in the Dutch churches and in the university; in his own account God first appointed Christ as mediator, then decreed to receive those who repent and believe, and chose particular persons on the ground of his foreknowledge of who would believe and persevere by grace (Arminius, Declaration of Sentiments, On Predestination, 5). His opponent Franciscus Gomarus, he reports, said that with such opinions he would not dare to appear before his Maker (Arminius, Declaration of Sentiments, opening address).

In 1610 his followers, who took the name Remonstrants, set out their position in five articles: God has determined to save those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit believe in Christ and persevere; Christ died "for all men and for every man", though only the believer enjoys forgiveness; man has no saving faith of himself and must be born again by the Spirit; grace is the beginning, continuance and accomplishment of all good, but it is "not irresistible"; believers are given power to win the victory, but whether they can fall away again must be determined more fully from Scripture (Remonstrance (1610) art. 1–5).

The States General called a national synod at Dordrecht, with delegates from Great Britain, several German states, Switzerland and Geneva (Canons of Dort preface) (Canons of Dort subscriptions). When the Remonstrant ministers it had summoned appeared, their spokesman, Simon Episcopius, said that they had come to hold a conference; they were told that the synod was not a party against them and that this was no conference (Hales, Letters from the Synod of Dort, letter of 6 December 1618 (Works 3, pp. 46–47)). After weeks of dispute the president dismissed them, and Episcopius went out saying that God would judge (Hales, Letters from the Synod of Dort, letter of 5/15 January 1619 (Works 3, pp. 122–124)). The synod then judged their teaching from their writings (Canons of Dort preface).

Its Canons take the five points in the same order: election is God's unchangeable purpose and is "not founded upon foreseen faith"; others are passed by, a decree that "by no means makes God the author of sin" (Canons of Dort 1.7, 1.9, 1.15). Christ's death is "abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world", yet God willed that it should effectually redeem "all those, and those only" who were chosen (Canons of Dort 2.3, 2.8). Regeneration is God's work "without our aid", yet it does not treat people "as senseless stocks and blocks" (Canons of Dort 3–4.12, 3–4.16). God does not let the converted fall away totally and finally (Canons of Dort 5.6, 5.8). The conclusion calls it slander to say that this doctrine makes God the author of sin, or teaches that he predestined the greater part of the world to damnation without regard to any sin (Canons of Dort conclusion). Gomarus signed among the professors (Canons of Dort subscriptions).

The synod deposed the ministers it had cited until they should repent, and barred from the ministry anyone who refused to subscribe; the States General confirmed its judgment (Canons of Dort sentence on the Remonstrants and approval of the States General). Philip Schaff noted in 1877 that the Canons were in force in the Reformed Church in America beside the Heidelberg Catechism (Canons of Dort editor's note before the English text).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The title of the Canons dates the synod to 1618 and 1619 and their promulgation to 6 May 1619; the approval of the States General is dated at The Hague on 2 July 1619 (Canons of Dort preface) (Canons of Dort sentence on the Remonstrants and approval of the States General). Hales's letters put the Remonstrants' first appearance on 6 December 1618 and their dismissal in the middle of January 1619, both by the new calendar (Hales, Letters from the Synod of Dort, letter of 6 December 1618 (Works 3, pp. 46–47)) (Hales, Letters from the Synod of Dort, letter of 5/15 January 1619 (Works 3, pp. 122–124)).

The Canons take the five articles in the Remonstrants' own order, treating the third and fourth together (Remonstrance (1610) art. 1–5) (Canons of Dort 1.7, 1.9, 1.15). The English acronym TULIP, which rearranges the five heads, is not in the text. Kenneth J. Stewart, "The Points of Calvinism: Retrospect and Prospect", Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology 26.2 (2008), pp. 187–203, found no use of it before the twentieth century; the earliest he could then document was in a book of 1932.

Primary sources

Public Disputations, with the dedication by his children Jacobus Arminius · disputations of 1603–1609, published after his death

dedication

Declaration of Sentiments Jacobus Arminius · 30 October 1608

On Predestination, 5; opening address

The Five Articles of the Remonstrants (The Remonstrance) The Remonstrant ministers of Holland · 1610

art. 1–5

The Canons of the Synod of Dort National Synod of the Reformed Churches of the United Netherlands · promulgated 6 May 1619 preface; subscriptions; 1.7, 1.9, 1.15; 2.3, 2.8; 3–4.12, 3–4.16; 5.6, 5.8; conclusion; sentence on the Remonstrants and approval of the States General; editor's note before the English text

Letters from the Synod of Dort John Hales · 1618–1619 letter of 6 December 1618 (Works 3, pp. 46–47); letter of 5/15 January 1619 (Works 3, pp. 122–124)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Dordrecht
Who Jacobus Arminius, Franciscus Gomarus, Simon Episcopius
Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Heidelberg Catechism 19 January 1563 1104
Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

LEADS TO

The Westminster Confession 1643–1649 1176

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Book of Concord Before · 25 June 1580 1117
The Westminster Confession After · 1643–1649 1176

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The First Baptist Congregations Before · 1609 1146
The Westminster Confession After · 1643–1649 1176

← The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia Earlier · 1618–1648
→ The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth Later · 1620

THE REFORMATION

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth

1620 · Firm date

Part of an English Separatist congregation that had lived in exile at Leiden sails to New England in 1620, forms itself into a civil body by a written covenant, and founds Plymouth. Half die in the first winter; a peace is made with the sachem Massasoit.

William Bradford, who was one of them and later wrote their history, tells how people in the villages where Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire and Yorkshire meet broke with the established church and joined themselves “by a covenant of the Lord” into a church (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 1 (pp. 13–15)). Persecuted, they resolved in 1607 and 1608 to cross to the Low Countries, where they had heard there was freedom of religion (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 1 (pp. 13–15)). After about a year at Amsterdam they moved to Leiden, with John Robinson as pastor (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 3 (pp. 23–24)).

Among their reasons for leaving Holland Bradford gives the hardness of the life, the loss of their children to the ways of the country, and a hope of advancing the gospel (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 4 (pp. 30–32)). The greater number stayed at Leiden and kept Robinson with them (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 6 (p. 53)); he died there in 1625 (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, 1625 (p. 248)). Of those who left, Bradford wrote that "they knew they were pilgrimes" (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 7 (pp. 72–73)).

Their patent was for Virginia, and they had come to land outside it (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620 (pp. 109–110)). Before going ashore at Cape Cod, on 11 November 1620, the men signed an agreement to "covenant and combine" themselves into a "civil Body Politick" and to obey such "just and equal Laws" as should be made for the general good (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620 (pp. 109–110)) (Mayflower Compact text and dating clause). In December they chose a harbour across the bay for their settlement, Plymouth (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 10 (pp. 106–107)). Within three months, Bradford says, half the company of a hundred and odd had died (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620 (p. 111)).

On Cape Cod the newcomers took buried corn and beans, meaning, Bradford says, to pay for them, which they did some six months later (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 10 (p. 100); 1621 (p. 124)). One party was attacked with arrows and fired back (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 10 (pp. 103–104)). In March 1621 Samoset walked into the settlement, and after him Squanto, a native of the place who had been carried off by a shipmaster to be sold in Spain (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620–1621 (pp. 114–116)). With Squanto came the sachem Massasoit, and a peace was made: his people were not to harm the English, stolen goods were to be restored on both sides, and each was to aid the other in war (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620–1621 (pp. 114–116)). Bradford records that a great sickness had swept the region about three years before the English arrived and that thousands had died (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, 1621 (pp. 123–124)). After the first harvest, a letter from Plymouth says, Massasoit came with some ninety men and was feasted for three days, and his men brought five deer (Mourt's Relation, letter of 11 December 1621 (Dexter ed., pp. 132–134)).

In 1623, on a warning from Massasoit that other Indians, provoked by the thefts of a second English settlement, meant to destroy both, the colony's captain, Miles Standish, killed several of their leaders (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, 1623 (pp. 157–159)). Robinson wrote from Leiden: "oh! how happy a thing had it been, if you had converted some, before you had killed any" (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, 1623 (pp. 197–198)). In 1630 John Winthrop, governor of a further company bound for New England, wrote that they would be "as a citty upon a hill" (Winthrop, Model of Christian Charity heading and closing section).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Bradford dates the agreement made on board to 11 November 1620 at Cape Cod, the arrival in Plymouth harbour to 16 December and the start of the first house to 25 December (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620 (pp. 109–110)) (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, ch. 10 (pp. 106–107)). His dates are in the old (Julian) calendar then used in England, ten days behind the new: 11 November is 21 November in the calendar used today. He wrote the history years later; he says of the peace with Massasoit that it "hath now continued this 24 years", which puts that passage about 1645 (Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation, book 2, 1620–1621 (pp. 114–116)).

Primary sources

Of Plymouth Plantation William Bradford · written over many years; parts dated by the author to about 1645–1646

ch. 1 (pp. 13–15); ch. 3 (pp. 23–24); ch. 4 (pp. 30–32); ch. 6 (p. 53); 1625 (p. 248); ch. 7 (pp. 72–73); book 2, 1620 (pp. 109–110); ch. 10 (pp. 106–107); book 2, 1620 (p. 111); ch. 10 (p. 100); 1621 (p. 124); ch. 10 (pp. 103–104); book 2, 1620–1621 (pp. 114–116); 1621 (pp. 123–124); 1623 (pp. 157–159); 1623 (pp. 197–198)

The Mayflower Compact The settlers of New Plymouth · 11 November 1620 (Old Style)

text and dating clause

A Relation or Journal of the English Plantation at Plymouth (Mourt's Relation) Edward Winslow, William Bradford and others · 1622 letter of 11 December 1621 (Dexter ed., pp. 132–134)

A Model of Christian Charity John Winthrop · 1630 heading and closing section

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Plymouth, Massachusetts, Leiden
Who William Bradford, John Robinson
Threads Church and State, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

LEADS TO

The Great Awakening 1734–1743 1229

Religious Freedom in the United States 1786–1791 1249

CHURCH AND STATE

The Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia Before · 1618–1648 1155

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church After · 1622–1632 1167

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing Before · 24 January 1601 1142

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church After · 1622–1632 1167

← The Synod of Dort Earlier · 1618–1619
→ Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church Later · 1622–1632

THE REFORMATION

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church

1622–1632 · Firm date

Emperor Susenyos of Ethiopia professes the Roman faith under Jesuit guidance and in 1626 swears obedience to the pope. After years of revolt he restores the faith of Alexandria in 1632, and under his son Fasilides the Jesuits are sent out of the country.

The Jesuit Pedro Páez reached Fremona in Ethiopia, where Portuguese Catholics lived, in May 1603 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 162). The abridged Ethiopian chronicle says that Susenyos, who reigned as Seltan Sagad, set his residence at Gorgora in the sixth year of his reign, and that in the seventh the disputes about the two natures began (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) p. 122). By the account of the Jesuit historian Balthazar Tellez, it was proclaimed that no one should maintain “but one Nature in Christ” and that all should confess two, and the abuna, Simon, posted an excommunication against all who embraced the faith of the Portuguese (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 205). The chronicle records under the eleventh year that Yolyos and the abuna Sem’on died on the same day, says of a later rebel that, like Yolyos, he had risen because of the Franks, and puts the king's residence at Danqaz from the twelfth year (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) p. 123). Tellez says that Yolyos, the emperor's son-in-law, took arms against those who confessed two natures, that the abuna encouraged his soldiers, and that both were killed (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia pp. 208–209).

In 1622, Tellez says, Susenyos publicly professed "the Latin Faith", and Páez, who had received him into the church, died soon afterwards at Gorgora (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 212). The chronicle says under the seventeenth year that people perished in Wag because of the Franks, and under the nineteenth it notes the arrival of "Afonsu the patriarch", Afonso Mendes, and the death, for the same cause, of a rebel who ruled in Shewa (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) p. 124). On 11 February 1626, by Tellez's account, the emperor knelt before the patriarch with the New Testament in his hands and swore obedience to the pope, and the nobles and clergy after him. It was then proclaimed that no priest or monk should say mass until he had been to the patriarch, because their ordinations were held doubtful, and that all should embrace the Roman faith on pain of death (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 233).

The Jesuit Jerónimo Lobo, who served in the mission, writes that when he published the emperor's edict some sixty monks threw themselves from a precipice rather than obey (Lobo, Voyage to Abyssinia part 2, chapter 11). In the twenty-fifth year, the chronicle says, before the king left Danqaz for the war, his son Fasil told him that everything was desolate and troubled by this belief of the Franks, which was not in the books of their fathers, and asked him to pray as the faith of Alexandria taught (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) p. 125).

The chronicle goes on to tell that the king destroyed a rebel army at Wayna Dega and then returned to the faith of Alexandria by a proclamation: that faith was to be restored and his son Fasil was to reign, for he himself was weak, had done wrong and was ill (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) pp. 125–126). Tellez counts about eight thousand dead in the battle (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 241). He gives the proclamation in these words: "we first gave you this Faith, believing it was good, but innumerable People have been kill'd about it", and so "we restore you the Faith of your Fore-Fathers" (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 242). Tellez, who calls Dancaz the emperor's usual residence (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 241), says that he died there in September 1632, declaring that he died in the Roman faith (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 243).

Under Fasilides, the chronicle says, a new patriarch arrived and the Frank Afonsu returned to his country (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) p. 285). Tellez tells it as an expulsion: the patriarch and the Jesuits were sent to Fremona, which they reached in April 1633 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 246), and in May 1634 they were put into the hands of the Turks on the coast (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia pp. 254–255). Lobo sums up the mission: Susenyos "called us into his dominions in the year 1625, from whence we were expelled in 1634" (Lobo, Voyage to Abyssinia part 2, chapter 1).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The years 1622, 1626 and 1632 are those of the Jesuit writers: Tellez puts the emperor's public profession in 1622 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 212), the oath of obedience on 11 February 1626 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 233), the battle on 27 June 1632 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 241) and the emperor's death in September 1632 (Tellez, Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia p. 243).

The Ethiopian record used here is the abridged chronicle of the kings that René Basset translated in 1881, not the longer Chronicle of Susenyos, of which no freely readable copy was found. Basset held that it was compiled probably under Iyasu II (1729–1753) and that from Susenyos onward it copies the annals written at court in each reign (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) Basset's introduction, Journal asiatique, 7th series, vol. 17, pp. 319–320). It counts by the years of the reign and by Ethiopian months. It puts the battle on Monday the third of the month Sane in the twenty-fifth year, the proclamation on the fifth of Sane, adding that others say the twenty-first, and the king's death on the tenth of Maskaram in the twenty-seventh year (Ethiopian Chronicle (trans. Basset) pp. 125–126). The two reckonings are given here side by side and are not converted.

Primary sources

The Travels of the Jesuits in Ethiopia Balthazar Tellez · Portuguese original 1660; English version 1710
p. 162; p. 205; pp. 208–209; p. 212; p. 233; p. 241; p. 242; p. 243; p. 246; pp. 254–255

Abridged Chronicle of the Kings of Ethiopia Compiled probably 1729–1753 from court annals
p. 122; p. 123; p. 124; p. 125; pp. 125–126; p. 285; Basset's introduction, Journal asiatique, 7th series, vol. 17, pp. 319–320

A Voyage to Abyssinia Jerónimo Lobo · Written between 1634 and 1678; French version 1728; English 1735 part 2, chapter 11; part 2, chapter 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Gorgora
Who Susenyos, Fasilides, Pedro Páez, Afonso Mendes
Threads East and West, Church and State, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

King Ezana of Aksum Becomes Christian c. AD 330–356 598

The Rock-Hewn Churches of Lalibela c. 1200 878

The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067

EAST AND WEST

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath Before · 1599–1653 1137

The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus After · 16 March 1672 1196

CHURCH AND STATE

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth Before · 1620 1163

The Trial of Galileo After · 22 June 1633 1172

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth Before · 1620 1163

The Chinese Rites Controversy After · 1704–1742 1212

← The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth Earlier · 1620
→ The Trial of Galileo Later · 22 June 1633

THE REFORMATION

The Trial of Galileo

22 June 1633 · Firm date

The Roman Inquisition judges Galileo vehemently suspected of heresy for holding that the earth moves round the sun, bans his Dialogue and makes him abjure. He is confined to his house near Florence, where he dies in 1642.

In 1615 Galileo Galilei was denounced to the Holy Office in Rome for holding that the sun stands still and the earth moves (Galileo trial documents, sentence of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 402–406)). That year he argued in a letter to the Grand Duchess Christina that Scripture and nature both come from God, that the Bible speaks in terms suited to common understanding, and that what the senses and necessary demonstrations establish should not be called in question on the strength of biblical passages (Galileo, Letter to the Grand Duchess Christina, opening argument on Scripture and nature). Cardinal Robert Bellarmine wrote in April 1615 that the earth's motion was harmless as a hypothesis but, asserted as fact, contradicted the common reading of the Fathers, which the Council of Trent forbade; were it truly demonstrated, he added, the contrary passages would have to be explained with great caution; but he did not believe there was such a demonstration (Bellarmine, Letter to Foscarini, points 1–3).

On 24 February 1616 the theologians consulted by the Holy Office judged the proposition that the sun is the motionless centre of the world "foolish and absurd" in philosophy and formally heretical, and the motion of the earth at least erroneous in faith (Galileo trial documents, censure of 24 February 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 320–321)). The minutes record that the pope then had Bellarmine warn Galileo to give up the opinion, that the commissary of the Holy Office ordered him not to hold, teach or defend it in any way, and that Galileo promised to obey (Galileo trial documents, minutes of 25 and 26 February 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 321–322)). On 5 March the Congregation of the Index suspended Copernicus's book until it should be corrected (Galileo trial documents, decree of the Index, 5 March 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 322–323)).

The sentence of 1633 says that Galileo's Dialogue, printed at Florence the year before, defended the condemned opinion, and that he had obtained leave to print it without mentioning the order of 1616 (Galileo trial documents, sentence of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 402–406)). On 16 June Pope Urban VIII decided that he should be questioned about his intention under threat of torture, should abjure and be imprisoned, and that the book should be banned (Galileo trial documents, decree of 16 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 282–283)). The record of the examination five days later shows the threat put to him in words, his answer that he had not held the opinion since the order, and his dismissal to his lodging (Galileo trial documents, examination of 21 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 361–362)).

On 22 June the cardinal inquisitors, seven of whom signed the sentence, declared him "vehemently suspected" of heresy, prohibited the Dialogue, and condemned him to imprisonment at their pleasure and to recite the seven penitential psalms weekly for three years (Galileo trial documents, sentence of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 402–406)). Kneeling, he abjured (Galileo trial documents, abjuration of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 406–407)). The next day the pope changed the place of confinement to the grand duke of Tuscany's palace in Rome, a week later to Siena, and in December to Galileo's own house at Arcetri, where he was to live in seclusion (Galileo trial documents, decrees of 23 June, 30 June and 1 December 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 284–286)).

In 1992 Pope John Paul II said that most theologians of the time had failed to distinguish Scripture from its interpretation and had wrongly carried a question of scientific fact into the domain of faith, and that Galileo had seen this more clearly than they (John Paul II, Address of 31 October 1992, §§5, 9).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Trial of Galileo (documents of the Holy Office and the Congregation of the Index, 1616–1633) Roman Inquisition and Congregation of the Index · 1616–1634 sentence of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 402–406); censure of 24 February 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 320–321); minutes of 25 and 26 February 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 321–322); decree of the Index, 5 March 1616 (Opere 19, pp. 322–323); decree of 16 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 282–283); examination of 21 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 361–362); abjuration of 22 June 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 406–407); decrees of 23 June, 30 June and 1 December 1633 (Opere 19, pp. 284–286)

Letter to the Grand Duchess Christina Galileo Galilei · 1615 opening argument on Scripture and nature

Letter to Paolo Antonio Foscarini Robert Bellarmine · 12 April 1615 points 1–3

Address to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, 31 October 1992 Pope John Paul II · 31 October 1992
§§5, 9

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Galileo Galilei, Urban VIII, Robert Bellarmine Threads Church and State, Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

CHURCH AND STATE

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church Before · 1622–1632 1167

Nikon’s Reforms and the Old Believer Schism After · 1652–1667 1187

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The King James Bible Before · 1611 1151

The Tranquebar Mission After · 9 July 1706 1217

← Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church Earlier · 1622–1632
→ The Westminster Confession Later · 1643–1649

THE REFORMATION

The Westminster Confession

1643–1649 · Firm date

An assembly of divines called by the English Parliament in 1643, joined by commissioners from Scotland, draws up a confession of faith and catechisms. The Church of Scotland approves the Confession in 1647, and the Scottish Parliament ratifies it in 1690.

On 12 June 1643 the Lords and Commons of the English Parliament, having resolved that government of the church by bishops was “evil” and should be taken away, called an assembly of divines to advise them (Ordinance calling the Westminster Assembly, 12 June 1643). It was to meet at Westminster, by London, on 1 July and to treat of the liturgy, discipline, government and doctrine of the Church of England, on such matters as Parliament put to it and no others (Ordinance calling the Westminster Assembly, 12 June 1643).

In September the House of Commons took the Solemn League and Covenant, whose signers swore to preserve the Reformed religion in Scotland, to reform religion in England and Ireland "according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches", to bring the churches of the three kingdoms to the nearest uniformity in religion, confession of faith, form of church government, directory for worship and catechising, and to extirpate popery and prelacy (Solemn League and Covenant, art. 1–2). The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had already commissioned five ministers, Samuel Rutherford among them, and three elders to treat with the divines at Westminster (Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, 19 August 1643, commission (pp. 93–94)). The minutes show Rutherford in debate: in October 1645, when a member argued that Christ in some sense paid a price for all, he denied that the general offer of the gospel requires it (Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, Session 522, 22 October 1645 (pp. 152–154)).

The Confession was presented to Parliament as the Assembly's "humble advice" and printed in 1647 (Westminster Confession title of the edition of 1647). Its first chapter lists the books of Scripture and says that the Apocrypha are "no part of the Canon" (Westminster Confession 1.2–4, 1.6, 1.10). The authority of Scripture depends "wholly upon God"; the whole counsel of God on all things necessary for his glory and for man's salvation, faith and life is either expressly set down in it or may be deduced from it "by good and necessary consequence"; and the supreme judge in controversies of religion is "the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scripture" (Westminster Confession 1.2–4, 1.6, 1.10).

The third chapter treats God's eternal decree, the matter judged at the Synod of Dort: God has "freely and unchangeably" ordained whatever comes to pass, "yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures"; some men and angels are predestinated to everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death, and those chosen to life are chosen "without any foresight of faith or good works" (Westminster Confession 3.1, 3.3, 3.5). The Shorter Catechism opens with the question of man's chief end and answers: "to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever" (Westminster Shorter Catechism q. 1).

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland approved the Confession on 27 August 1647 as "a common Confession of Faith for the three kingdomes", with a reservation about the magistrate's power to call synods (Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, 27 August 1647 (pp. 158–159)). In 1690 the Scottish Parliament ratified it as the public confession of that church (Confession of Faith Ratification Act 1690 ratifying clause).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The ordinance of 12 June 1643 fixed the first meeting for 1 July 1643 (Ordinance calling the Westminster Assembly, 12 June 1643). The last session that carries a number in the Assembly's minutes is the 1163rd, dated 22 February 1648 by the English reckoning in which the year began in March, that is 1649 (Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, Session 1163 (p. 539)). The Confession was printed in 1647 (Westminster Confession title of the edition of 1647) and approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on 27 August of that year (Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, 27 August 1647 (pp. 158–159)).

Primary sources

Ordinance for the Calling of an Assembly of Learned and Godly Divines Lords and Commons of the Parliament of England · 12 June 1643
12 June 1643

The Solemn League and Covenant 1643
art. 1–2

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland General Assembly of the Church of Scotland · acts of 1643 and 1647 cited
19 August 1643, commission (pp. 93–94); 27 August 1647 (pp. 158–159)

Minutes of the Sessions of the Westminster Assembly of Divines Scribes of the Westminster Assembly · 1644–1649
Session 522, 22 October 1645 (pp. 152–154); Session 1163 (p. 539)

The Westminster Confession of Faith Westminster Assembly of Divines · printed 1647 title of the edition of 1647; 1.2–4, 1.6, 1.10; 3.1, 3.3, 3.5

The Westminster Shorter Catechism Westminster Assembly of Divines · 1647
q. 1

Confession of Faith Ratification Act 1690 Parliament of Scotland · 1690 ratifying clause

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who Samuel Rutherford
Threads Creeds and Councils, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Scottish Reformation August 1560 1096
The Synod of Dort 1618–1619 1159
The King James Bible 1611 1151

LEADS TO

The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter 24 May 1689 1208

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Synod of Dort Before · 1618–1619 1159
Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus After · 1653–1713 1191

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Synod of Dort Before · 1618–1619 1159
George Fox and the Quakers After · 1652 1183

← The Trial of Galileo Earlier · 22 June 1633
→ George Fox and the Quakers Later · 1652
TIMELINE

Enlightenment, Awakenings and Missions

1650–1900

Toleration and revolution change the place of the churches in society. Pietism, Methodism and the awakenings renew them, and missions carry Christianity to every continent.

States slowly cease to enforce one confession. Revival movements stress personal faith and holy living, and voluntary societies send missionaries and print Bibles on a new scale. Christians take leading parts on both sides of the debates over slavery, science and the authority of the pope.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

George Fox and the Quakers 1652 1183

Nikon’s Reforms and the Old Believer Schism 1652–1667 1187

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus 1653–1713 1191

The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus 16 March 1672 1196
Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200
Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes October 1685 1204
The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter 24 May 1689 1208
The Chinese Rites Controversy 1704–1742 1212
The Tranquebar Mission 9 July 1706 1217
Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221
The Moravians at Herrnhut 13 August 1727 1225
The Great Awakening 1734–1743 1229
John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233
The Suppression of the Jesuits 21 July 1773 1237
The Philokalia Is Published 1782 1241
Korean Scholars Found a Church 1784 1245
Religious Freedom in the United States 1786–1791 1249
Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church 1787–1816 1253
The French Revolution and the Church 1790–1801 1257
William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261
Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska 24 September 1794 1265
Schleiermacher and Modern Theology 1799 1269
The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272
The British and Foreign Bible Society 7 March 1804 1276
Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade 25 March 1807 1280
Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints 6 April 1830 1284
The Oxford Movement 14 July 1833 1289
Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus 1844–1859 1293
The Millerites and the Great Disappointment 22 October 1844 1297
The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom 1851–1864 1301

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception 8 December 1854 1305
Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop 29 June 1864 1310
Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission 25 June 1865 1314
The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward 17 March 1865 1317
William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army July 1865 1321
The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324
The Martyrs of Uganda 1885–1886 1328
The Lambeth Quadrilateral July 1888 1332
Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching 15 May 1891 1336

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

George Fox and the Quakers

1652 · Firm date

In 1652 George Fox preaches across the north of England that Christ has come to teach his people himself, without priest, tithe or consecrated building. Margaret Fell's house at Swarthmoor becomes the meeting place of the people their opponents call Quakers.

George Fox was born in July 1624 at Drayton-in-the-Clay in Leicestershire, the son of a weaver, and left his family in 1643. He went to clergy and to dissenting preachers for help and found none, until, he writes, he heard a voice say: "There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition". He came to hold that God does not dwell "in temples made with hands" but in people's hearts (Fox, Journal ch. 1). He would not take off his hat to anyone and said "thee" and "thou" to rich and poor alike (Fox, Journal ch. 2). In 1650 the justices of Derby sent him to prison for six months as a blasphemer, and one of them, Justice Bennet, he says, "was the first that called us Quakers, because I bade them tremble at the word of the Lord" (Fox, Journal ch. 4).

In 1652, from the top of Pendle Hill in the north of England, he writes, "the Lord let me see in what places he had a great people to be gathered". At Firbank in Westmorland he sat on a rock beside the chapel and spoke for about three hours to a crowd judged to be above a thousand, telling them that the church and its ground were "no more holy than that mountain" and that Christ had come and put an end to temple, priests and tithes. He went on to Swarthmoor, the house of Judge Fell near Ulverston. Margaret Fell, the judge's wife, and her household were convinced, the judge allowed a meeting to be kept in his house, and Fox says that it met there until 1690 (Fox, Journal ch. 6).

After the Fifth Monarchy men rose in London, Fox writes, Friends were seized on their way to meetings, word came of several thousand imprisoned across the country, and Margaret Fell carried accounts of them to the king and council (Fox, Journal 1852 edition, vol. 1, pp. 378–380). Fox and other Friends printed a declaration, presented to Charles II, in which they "utterly deny" all bloody principles and practices, "with all outward wars and strife, and fightings with outward weapons, for any end, or under any pretence whatsoever" (Quaker Declaration to Charles II heading and first paragraph).

In 1666 Fell published Women's Speaking Justified. She argues from Scripture that women who speak by the Spirit of Christ may speak in the church: women first carried the news of the resurrection to the apostles, and Paul's command of silence was addressed to women who were in confusion and "under the Law" (Fell, Women's Speaking Justified opening and the sections on 1 Corinthians 14). She and Fox married in a Friends' meeting at Bristol (Fox, Journal ch. 17).

When Parliament freed Protestant dissenters from the penalties of the laws on worship in 1689, it allowed those who scrupled to take any oath to make a declaration of fidelity and a profession of Christian belief instead (Toleration Act section 10). See the Toleration Act and Locke's Letter.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The printed Journal sets Fox's climb of Pendle Hill, the meeting at Firbank and his arrival at Swarthmoor under the year 1652 (Fox, Journal ch. 6). In the passages cited it gives days of the week, not days of the month.

The declaration to the king is headed the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, 1660 (Quaker Declaration to Charles II heading and first paragraph). The English year then began in March, as the editor of the Journal notes (Fox, Journal ch. 1), so the eleventh month is January and the date is January 1661 by modern reckoning. All the dates in this entry are in the Julian (Old Style) calendar, which England kept until 1752 and which in the seventeenth century ran ten days behind the Gregorian.

Primary sources

The Journal of George Fox George Fox · First printed 1694
ch. 1; ch. 2; ch. 4; ch. 6; 1852 edition, vol. 1, pp. 378–380; ch. 17

A Declaration from the Harmless and Innocent People of God, Called Quakers George Fox and other Friends · January 1661 (dated 1660 in the reckoning of the time) heading and first paragraph

Women's Speaking Justified, Proved and Allowed of by the Scriptures Margaret Fell · 1666 opening and the sections on 1 Corinthians 14

The Toleration Act (1 William and Mary, chapter 18) Parliament of England · Royal assent 24 May 1689
section 10

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Swarthmoor Hall
Who George Fox, Margaret Fell
Threads Revival and Unity, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Baptist Congregations 1609 1146

LEADS TO

The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter 24 May 1689 1208
Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade 25 March 1807 1280

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The New Prophecy of Montanus Before · c. AD 157–172 508

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism After · 1675 1200

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Westminster Confession Before · 1643–1649 1176

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism After · 1652–1667 1187

← The Westminster Confession Earlier · 1643–1649

→ Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism Later · 1652–1667

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism

1652–1667 · Firm date

Patriarch Nikon of Moscow brings Russian service books and rites into line with Greek usage. The archpriest Avvakum and others refuse the changes as a break with the faith of their fathers, a council of 1667 anathematises those who resist, and the Russian church divides.

Nikon was patriarch of Moscow from 1652 (Russian Local Council of 1971, Act on the old rites preamble, resolutions 1–3 and the paragraph that follows them). In Lent, the archpriest Avvakum writes, the new patriarch sent word to the archpriest Ivan Neronov that people were no longer to bow to the knee in church but only to the waist, and were to cross themselves with three fingers. Avvakum says that he and the archpriest Daniel copied out passages from the Fathers on the sign of the cross and on bowing and gave them to Tsar Alexis of Russia (Avvakum, Life pp. 52–54).

Paul of Aleppo, archdeacon and son of Patriarch Macarius of Antioch (Paul of Aleppo, Travels of Macarius vol. 2, translator's preface), was in Moscow with his father and reports the change from the side of those who made it. The Muscovites, he notes, did not cross themselves with three fingers joined, as his own people did (Paul of Aleppo, Travels of Macarius vol. 2, pp. 50–51). Macarius had pointed out to Nikon where Russian usage departed from Greek (Paul of Aleppo, Travels of Macarius vol. 2, pp. 85–86). Nikon held a synod, had the order of the liturgy translated from Greek and printed in thousands of copies, and told the clergy: "I am a Russian, son of a Russian; but my faith and my religion are Grecian." Some of the clergy, Paul adds, refused in their hearts to alter the books and rites they had received and did not dare to say so (Paul of Aleppo, Travels of Macarius vol. 2, pp. 85–86).

Avvakum tells that Daniel was shorn and Neronov exiled (Avvakum, Life pp. 54–55), and that he himself was sent with his wife and children to Siberia (Avvakum, Life pp. 58–59). After his return, by his account, he was brought before the patriarchs in the Chudov monastery. They asked why he alone held out when Palestine, the Serbs, the Albanians, the Wallachians, Rome and Poland all crossed themselves with three fingers. He answered that Rome had fallen long ago, that the patriarchs' own orthodoxy had been weakened under Turkish rule, that in Russia the faith had been pure until Nikon, and that the first shepherds and a Moscow synod under Tsar Ivan had taught the sign with two fingers (Avvakum, Life pp. 120–123). He was banished to Pustozersk (Avvakum, Life pp. 124–125).

The council, at which Patriarchs Paisius of Alexandria and Macarius of Antioch sat with Joasaph of Moscow, issued its decree in May 1667 (Moscow Council of 1667, decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, p. 213)). It orders all to accept the books corrected under Nikon by the tsar's command, to sing the alleluia three times and to make the sign of the cross with the first three fingers, and it anathematises anyone who resists, as a heretic and disobedient, until he repents (Moscow Council of 1667, decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, pp. 214–220)). It also cancels what the council under Tsar Ivan had written about the two-finger sign (Moscow Council of 1667, decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, pp. 220–221)).

Those who kept the old rites call themselves Old Believers. In 1971 a council of the Russian Orthodox Church recognised the old rites as salvific and equal in honour to the new, and declared the anathemas of 1656 and 1667 to be as if they had not been (Russian Local Council of 1971, Act on the old rites preamble, resolutions 1–3 and the paragraph that follows them).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Russian church's Act of 1971 dates Nikon's patriarchate to 1652–1666 (Russian Local Council of 1971, Act on the old rites preamble, resolutions 1–3 and the paragraph that follows them). The council's decree is dated in the year 7175 from the creation of the world and 1667 from the incarnation, in the month of May (Moscow Council of 1667, decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, pp. 214–220)).

In the passages cited Avvakum's Life names no year: the instruction came "in Lent", and his exile and his hearing are not dated. The chronological table printed with the translation by Jane Harrison and Hope Mirrlees, The Life of the Archpriest Avvakum by Himself (1924), places Nikon's installation on 25 July 1652, Avvakum's exile to Siberia in September 1653, Nikon's deposition by the council on 12 December 1666 and the sentence on Avvakum on 17 July 1667 (Avvakum, Life chronological table printed before the text, p. 31). In the passage cited Paul of Aleppo gives no year for the synod he describes.

Primary sources

Act of the Local Council of the Russian Orthodox Church on Lifting the Anathemas on the Old Rites 30 May – 2 June 1971 preamble, resolutions 1–3 and the paragraph that follows them

The Life of the Archpriest Avvakum, Written by Himself Avvakum
pp. 52–54; pp. 54–55; pp. 58–59; pp. 120–123; pp. 124–125; chronological table printed before the text, p. 31

The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch Paul of Aleppo
vol. 2, translator's preface; vol. 2, pp. 50–51; vol. 2, pp. 85–86

Acts of the Moscow Council of 1666–1667 May 1667 decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, p. 213); decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, pp. 214–220); decree of May 1667 (Materialy 2, pp. 220–221)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Moscow
Who Nikon, Avvakum, Alexis of Russia
Threads Temple and Worship, Reform and Reformation, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

LEADS TO

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks 1917–1918 1363

TEMPLE AND WORSHIP

The Book of Common Prayer Before · 1549–1552 1080

The Second Vatican Council After · 1962–1965 1422

REFORM AND REFORMATION

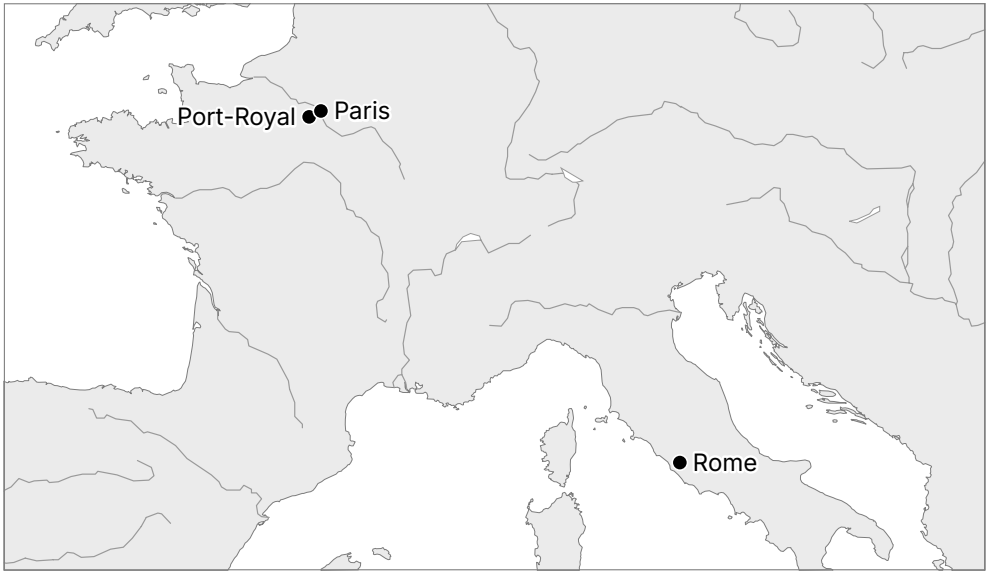
George Fox and the Quakers Before · 1652 1183

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church After · 1787–1816 1253

CHURCH AND STATE

The Trial of Galileo Before · 22 June 1633 1172

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus After · 1653–1713 1191



← George Fox and the Quakers Earlier · 1652
→ Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus Later · 1653–1713

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus

1653–1713 · Firm date

In 1653 Rome condemns five propositions on grace. The defenders of Cornelius Jansen condemn them too but deny that they are in his book; Rome defines that they are, and in 1713 the bull Unigenitus condemns 101 propositions from Quesnel's New Testament.

Cornelius Jansen, bishop of Ypres, died in May 1638. In a will dictated on his deathbed he left his writings in explanation of St Augustine to be published faithfully, and added that if the Roman See wished anything changed he was its obedient son (Jansen, Augustinus, vol. 1, will of 6 May 1638, printed behind the title page). The work was printed at Louvain in 1640 under the title Augustinus; its first volume, the title page says, sets out from Augustine the errors of Pelagius (Jansen, Augustinus, vol. 1, title page) (compare Augustine's dispute with Pelagius).

On 31 May 1653 Innocent X condemned five propositions. They say that some of God's commandments are impossible for just people who wish and strive to keep them, given the strength they now have, and that they also lack the grace that would make them possible; that in the state of fallen nature interior grace is never resisted; that to merit or lose merit in that state a person needs freedom from compulsion but not freedom from necessity; that the Semipelagians admitted the need of prevenient interior grace for every act, even for the beginning of faith, and were heretics in holding that the human will could resist or obey that grace; and that it is Semipelagian to say that Christ died or shed his blood for all people without exception (Innocent X, Cum occasione, Denzinger nos. 1092–1096).

The learned men who lived in retirement at the convent of Port-Royal, Saint-Simon says, were accused of Jansenism (Saint-Simon, Memoirs, chapter 46 (the year is named in chapters 44 and 47)). Blaise Pascal, writing at Paris in January 1656, reported the question of fact then before the Sorbonne: Antoine Arnauld had written that he had read Jansen's book carefully and had not found the condemned propositions in it, though he condemned them wherever they might occur (Pascal, Provincial Letters 1). A year later Pascal wrote that those accused condemned the five propositions and could not admit that Jansen had taught them, and that whether an author holds a doctrine is a question of fact, the denial of which is no heresy (Pascal, Provincial Letters 17).

Rome refused the distinction. In October 1656, before the second of those letters, Alexander VII declared and defined that the five propositions were taken from Jansen's Augustinus and were condemned in the sense that Jansen intended (Alexander VII, Ad sanctam beati Petri sedem, Denzinger no. 1098), and he later prescribed a formula in which the signer swore to condemn them in that sense (Alexander VII, Ad sanctam beati Petri sedem, the formula of submission, Denzinger no. 1099). In 1705 Clement XI ruled that a "respectful silence" on the question did not suffice: the condemned sense of Jansen's book was to be rejected not with the mouth only but with the heart (Clement XI, Vineam Domini, Denzinger no. 1350). The duc de Saint-Simon, a courtier who called Jansenism a heresy invented by the Jesuits, tells that on the night of 28 to 29 October 1709 troops surrounded the convent of Port-Royal des Champs, that the nuns were carried off to other houses, and that the buildings were afterwards razed (Saint-Simon, Memoirs, chapter 46 (the year is named in chapters 44 and 47)).

On 8 September 1713 Clement XI issued the constitution Unigenitus against a French New Testament with moral reflections (Clement XI, Unigenitus, title of the Paris printing of 1713), which the edition cited names as the work of Pasquier Quesnel (Clement XI, Unigenitus, editor's heading and note to nos. 1351–1451 in Denzinger (p. 371)). It condemned 101 propositions taken from the book, among them that without the grace of Jesus Christ nothing good can be done, that the reading of Scripture is for all, and that fear of an unjust excommunication should never keep a person from doing his duty; the censure says that they renew the propositions of Jansen (Clement XI, Unigenitus, propositions 2, 80 and 91 and the closing censure). Saint-Simon called it an "infamous bull", forced upon the pope by the Jesuit Le Tellier and his friends (Saint-Simon, Memoirs, chapter 63).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The formula of submission names the constitution of Innocent X as given on 31 May 1653 and that of Alexander VII as given on 16 October 1656; the edition cited dates the constitution that prescribed the formula 15 February 1664 (Alexander VII, Ad sanctam beati Petri sedem, the formula of submission, Denzinger no. 1099) and Vineam Domini 16 July 1705 (Clement XI, Vineam Domini, Denzinger no. 1350). The Paris printing of Unigenitus is headed 8 September 1713 (Clement XI, Unigenitus, title of the Paris printing of 1713). Saint-Simon gives the night of 28 to 29 October "of this year" for the removal of the nuns of Port-Royal; chapters 44 and 47 of the edition cited name the year as 1709 (Saint-Simon, Memoirs, chapter 46 (the year is named in chapters 44 and 47)).

Primary sources

Augustinus Cornelius Jansen · Printed 1640; the author died in 1638
vol. 1, will of 6 May 1638, printed behind the title page; vol. 1, title page

Cum occasione Pope Innocent X · 31 May 1653
Denzinger nos. 1092–1096

Memoirs Louis de Rouvroy, duc de Saint-Simon chapter 46 (the year is named in chapters 44 and 47); chapter 63

The Provincial Letters Blaise Pascal · January 1656 – March 1657
1; 17

Ad sanctam beati Petri sedem Pope Alexander VII · 16 October 1656
Denzinger no. 1098; the formula of submission, Denzinger no. 1099

Vineam Domini Sabaoth Pope Clement XI · 16 July 1705
Denzinger no. 1350

Unigenitus Pope Clement XI · 8 September 1713 title of the Paris printing of 1713; editor's heading and note to nos. 1351–1451 in Denzinger (p. 371); propositions 2, 80 and 91 and the closing censure

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Port-Royal, Rome, Paris
Who Cornelius Jansen, Blaise Pascal, Pasquier Quesnel, Innocent X, Clement XI Threads Creeds and Councils, Papacy and Church Order, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

Augustine and Pelagius Dispute over Grace AD 411–418 664

LEADS TO

The Suppression of the Jesuits 21 July 1773 1237

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Westminster Confession Before · 1643–1649 1176

The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus After · 16 March 1672 1196

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Synod of Diamper and the Coonan Cross Oath Before · 1599–1653 1137

The Chinese Rites Controversy After · 1704–1742 1212

CHURCH AND STATE

Nikon’s Reforms and the Old Believer Schism Before · 1652–1667 1187

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes After · October 1685 1204

← Nikon’s Reforms and the Old Believer Schism Earlier · 1652–1667
→ The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus Later · 16 March 1672

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus

16 March 1672 · Firm date

Gathered for the dedication of the rebuilt church of the Nativity at Bethlehem, a synod under Patriarch Dositheus of Jerusalem rejects a confession with Reformed teaching printed under the name of Cyril Lucaris and sets out Orthodox doctrine in eighteen decrees.

In March 1672 bishops and clergy came together for the dedication of the rebuilt church of the Nativity at Bethlehem (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts preamble, pp. 6–7) (Confession of Dositheus subscription, p. 174). Dositheus II, patriarch of Jerusalem, used the meeting to answer Western writers who claimed that the Eastern church thought as the Calvinists did (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts preamble, pp. 6–7).

Those writers, the synod says, brought forward a confession in eighteen chapters and four questions as the work of Cyril Lucaris, who had been patriarch of Constantinople forty years before (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts preamble, pp. 16–17).

That confession teaches that the witness of Scripture is of higher authority than that of the church (Confession of Cyril Lucaris ch. 2), that God chose the elect "without having in any wise regard to their works" (Confession of Cyril Lucaris ch. 3), and that a man is justified by faith, not by works (Confession of Cyril Lucaris ch. 13). It confesses a true presence of Christ in the Eucharist received by faith and rejects transubstantiation (Confession of Cyril Lucaris ch. 17).

The synod denied that the chapters were Cyril's. He never taught such things in synod or church, it says, no work undisputedly his contains them, and it quotes sermons he preached at Constantinople that say the opposite (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts ch. 1, pp. 18–20). Even if he wrote them, it adds, he did so in secret, and they are not the confession of the Eastern church (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts preamble, pp. 16–17). It reprints the acts of two earlier synods, at Constantinople and at Jassy, and explains that the first anathematised Cyril by name because he lived six years after the chapters were printed and would not write against them, while the second condemned their author without naming him (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts pp. 106–108).

The synod's own confession follows Cyril's chapter by chapter (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts ch. 6, p. 110). Scripture is to be believed "not otherwise than as the Catholic Church hath interpreted and delivered the same", and the witness of the church is "not of inferior authority" to it (Confession of Dositheus Decree 2). God predestined those whom he foreknew would use their free will rightly, and to say that he had no regard to works is called profane and impious (Confession of Dositheus Decree 3). A man is "not simply justified through faith alone, but through faith which worketh through love, that is to say, through faith and works" (Confession of Dositheus Decree 13). In the Eucharist the bread is "transmuted, transubstantiated, converted and transformed" into the true body of the Lord and the wine into his blood, and the teaching of "the followers of Luther" on the presence is rejected as well (Confession of Dositheus Decree 17). The questions that close the document say that Scripture should not be read by all without preparation (Confession of Dositheus Question 1) and count the Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, the History of the Dragon, the History of Susanna, the Maccabees and the Wisdom of Sirach as Scripture (Confession of Dositheus Question 3).

The acts call themselves the work of "the Local Synod" held in Jerusalem under Dositheus (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts heading, p. 3). The confession was signed at Jerusalem by Dositheus and by the bishops and clergy present (Confession of Dositheus subscription, p. 174).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Confession is subscribed "In the year of Salvation 1672, on the 16th [day] of the month of March, in the Holy City of Jerusalem" (Confession of Dositheus subscription, p. 174); the word in brackets is the translator's. The day belongs to the Julian calendar, which the Greek church used. The synod's preamble says the bishops had come together for the dedication of the church of the Nativity at Bethlehem (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts preamble, pp. 6–7), and the translator of the acts notes that the meeting is for that reason sometimes called the Synod of Bethlehem (Synod of Jerusalem, Acts translator's introduction, first page). The confession it answers is dated at Constantinople in January 1631 in the text printed with the acts (Confession of Cyril Lucaris close, p. 214).

Primary sources

Acts of the Synod of Jerusalem (1672) The Synod of Jerusalem under Dositheus II · March 1672 preamble, pp. 6–7; preamble, pp. 16–17; ch. 1, pp. 18–20; pp. 106–108; ch. 6, p. 110; heading, p. 3; translator's introduction, first page

The Confession of Dositheus Dositheus II of Jerusalem and the Synod of Jerusalem · March 1672

subscription, p. 174; Decree 2; Decree 3; Decree 13; Decree 17; Question 1; Question 3

The Eastern Confession of the Christian Faith Published under the name of Cyril Lucaris · Dated at Constantinople, January 1631

ch. 2; ch. 3; ch. 13; ch. 17; close, p. 214

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Jerusalem, Bethlehem
Who Dositheus II, Cyril Lucaris

Threads Creeds and Councils, East and West

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

Calvin's Institutes and the Reform of Geneva 1536–1541 1059

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus Before · 1653–1713 1191

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception After · 8 December 1854 1305

EAST AND WEST

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church Before · 1622–1632 1167

Rome and Constantinople Lift the Anathemas of 1054 After · 7 December 1965 1432

← Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus Earlier · 1653–1713
→ Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism Later · 1675

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism

1675 · Firm date

In 1675 the Frankfurt pastor Philipp Jakob Spener publishes six proposals for mending the Lutheran church, from Bible reading in small meetings to the training of pastors. From 1695 August Hermann Francke founds a school and an orphan house at Halle.

Philipp Jakob Spener was preacher and senior of the Lutheran clergy at Frankfurt on the Main (Spener, Pia Desideria title page). In 1675 a publisher asked him for a preface to a new edition of the sermons of Johann Arndt, and he put into it what had long grieved him about the state of the church (Spener, Pia Desideria prefatory address to the pastors, unnumbered leaves). Readers asked for the preface by itself (Spener, Pia Desideria prefatory address to the pastors, unnumbered leaves), and it was issued as a small book under the title Pia Desideria, "pious wishes" (Spener, Pia Desideria title page).

The last part of Spener's text makes six proposals. The word of God should be brought more richly among the people: Scripture should be read at home and aloud in church, and besides the sermon there should be meetings of the kind Paul describes in 1 Corinthians 14, where under the preacher's direction members of the congregation read the Bible and talk over its meaning together (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 94–99). The spiritual priesthood of all Christians should be set up and practised, for studying the word and teaching, warning and comforting one's neighbour belong to every Christian and not to the clergy alone (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 104–106). People should learn that Christianity consists not in knowing but in practice, and that love is the mark of Christ's disciples (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 110–111). In disputes about religion believers should first strengthen one another in the truth and then remember what they owe to those in error (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 113–114). Pastors must themselves be true Christians, and the schools and universities must train them so (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 125–126). Sermons should aim at faith and its fruits in the hearers, not at a show of learning (Spener, Pia Desideria pp. 149–150).

Twenty years later August Hermann Francke, minister at Glaucha outside Halle, fixed a box for the poor in his parlour. About a quarter of a year afterwards, he writes, someone put in a sum that his English translator reckons at eighteen shillings and sixpence, and he took it as the fund for a charity school, which began about Easter 1695 (Francke, Footsteps of Divine Providence ch. 1, sections 5–8, pp. 12–16). Finding that what the children learned in school was undone outside it, he resolved to keep and educate some of them himself, and the first he took in were orphaned sisters (Francke, Footsteps of Divine Providence ch. 1, section 13, pp. 19–20). In July 1698 the foundation of a large orphan house was laid, although, he says, he had not money enough to put up a small house and waited from week to week for what God would send (Francke, Footsteps of Divine Providence ch. 1, section 28, pp. 30–31).

The movement that took up Spener's proposals is called Pietism. The two missionaries who landed at Tranquebar in India in 1706 had been sent to the university at Halle (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, preliminary discourse, sections 42–43), and gifts for their mission were passed on through Francke (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, preliminary discourse, section 47, p. xxxvi); see the Tranquebar Mission. The young Nikolaus von Zinzendorf was a pupil at Halle and heard reports of that mission in Francke's house (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 134–135); see the Moravians at Herrnhut.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Spener's text is dated at Frankfurt on 24 March 1675 (Spener, Pia Desideria p. 162), and the prefatory address of the separate edition on 8 September 1675 (Spener, Pia Desideria close of the prefatory address). The copy linked here is the printing of 1676 (Spener, Pia Desideria title page). Francke dates his poor-box to the beginning of 1695, the school to about Easter of that year (Francke, Footsteps of Divine Providence ch. 1, sections 5–8, pp. 12–16) and the laying of the orphan house's foundation to 13 July 1698 (Francke, Footsteps of Divine Providence ch. 1, section 28, pp. 30–31).

Primary sources

Pia Desideria Philipp Jakob Spener · 1675 title page; prefatory address to the pastors, unnumbered leaves; prefatory address to the pastors, unnumbered leaves; pp. 94–99; pp. 104–106; pp. 110–111; pp. 113–114; pp. 125–126; pp. 149–150; p. 162; close of the prefatory address

The Footsteps of Divine Providence August Hermann Francke · 1701, continued 1702; in English from 1705; edition cited 1787
ch. 1, sections 5–8, pp. 12–16; ch. 1, section 13, pp. 19–20; ch. 1, section 28, pp. 30–31

Propagation of the Gospel in the East Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg and other missionaries at Tranquebar · Letters of 1706–1714; English edition 1709–1718
preliminary discourse, sections 42–43; preliminary discourse, section 47, p. xxxvi

The Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren Moravian Church (Unity of the Brethren) · English edition 1822
pp. 134–135

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Frankfurt, Halle
Who Philipp Jakob Spener, August Hermann Francke

Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Book of Concord 25 June 1580 1117

LEADS TO

The Tranquebar Mission 9 July 1706 1217
The Moravians at Herrnhut 13 August 1727 1225
The Great Awakening 1734–1743 1229
Schleiermacher and Modern Theology 1799 1269

REVIVAL AND UNITY

George Fox and the Quakers Before · 1652 1183
The Moravians at Herrnhut After · 13 August 1727 1225

← The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus Earlier · 16 March 1672
→ Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes Later · October 1685

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes

October 1685 · Firm date

By an edict given at Fontainebleau in October 1685, Louis XIV revokes the Edict of Nantes, orders the Reformed churches of France demolished, bans Reformed worship and forbids his Protestant subjects to leave. The Elector of Brandenburg offers those who flee a refuge.

Since 1598 the Edict of Nantes had regulated the standing of the Reformed in France and the places where they might worship (Edict of Fontainebleau preamble); see the Edict of Nantes. In October 1685, at Fontainebleau, Louis XIV revoked it (Edict of Fontainebleau preamble) (Edict of Fontainebleau dating clause).

The preamble gives the king's reasons. His grandfather Henry IV, it says, had granted the edict to keep the peace and in order to work the better for reuniting to the church those who had left it. Henry's sudden death, and then foreign wars under his son, had prevented the design. Now, with the kingdom at peace, "the better and the greater part" of the Reformed had embraced the Catholic faith, so that the edict no longer served any purpose (Edict of Fontainebleau preamble).

The articles then set out the measures. The Edict of Nantes and the Edict of Nîmes of 1629 are revoked and all Reformed churches are to be demolished at once; the Reformed may not meet for worship in any place or private house, and nobles may not hold services on their estates (Edict of Fontainebleau art. 1–3). Ministers who will not become Catholics must leave the kingdom within fifteen days of publication and may not preach in the meantime, on pain of the galleys (Edict of Fontainebleau art. 4). Ministers who convert keep the exemptions from the taille and from billeting that they had as ministers and receive a pension a third larger than their former salary (Edict of Fontainebleau art. 5–6 (French text)). Reformed schools are closed, and children born to Reformed parents are to be baptized by the parish priests and brought up as Catholics (Edict of Fontainebleau art. 7–8). Those who have already left France may recover their property if they return within four months; everyone else is forbidden to leave, the men on pain of the galleys, the women of imprisonment and confiscation (Edict of Fontainebleau art. 9–10). The last article allows the Reformed who remain to live and trade in the kingdom without being troubled for their religion, provided they do not practise it or assemble for prayer (Edict of Fontainebleau final article).

The Elector of Brandenburg, Frederick William, who was himself Reformed, described the situation in other terms. His Edict of Potsdam, dated 29 October 1685, speaks of persecution and harsh treatment that had driven many families out of France, and offers them a safe and free refuge in his lands (Edict of Potsdam preamble). It arranges ships and passports for the journey, frees the newcomers' goods from duties, gives them houses, land, tax exemptions and the rights of native subjects, and provides that they shall have their own pastors and worship in French (Edict of Potsdam art. 1–11). Among the towns it names for their settlement are Magdeburg, Halle and Königsberg (Edict of Potsdam art. 1–11). Roman Catholics are excluded from the offer (Edict of Potsdam art. 13 and dating clause).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The edict is dated only by month: it was "given at Fontainebleau in the month of October" 1685, in the forty-third year of the reign (Edict of Fontainebleau dating clause), and Isambert's collection of old French laws prints it under "Fontainebleau, octobre 1685" (Edict of Fontainebleau heading in Isambert, Recueil général, vol. 19, p. 530). Days are often given for its signing and its registration by the Parlement of Paris, but no document carrying them was read for this entry, so the timeline gives the month; the sourcebook page that carries the English translation is headed 22 October 1685 without saying what happened on that day. The Edict of Potsdam is dated 29 October 1685 (Edict of Potsdam art. 13 and dating clause). Brandenburg still used the Julian calendar, so that day was 8 November in the Gregorian calendar used in France.

Primary sources

The Edict of Fontainebleau (Revocation of the Edict of Nantes) Louis XIV of France · October 1685
preamble; dating clause; art. 1–3; art. 4; art. 5–6 (French text); art. 7–8; art. 9–10; final article; heading in Isambert, Recueil général, vol. 19, p. 530

The Edict of Potsdam Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg · 29 October 1685 (Julian calendar; 8 November in the Gregorian) preamble; art. 1–11; art. 13 and dating clause

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Fontainebleau
Who Louis XIV
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Edict of Nantes April 1598 1133

LEADS TO

The French Revolution and the Church 1790–1801 1257

CHURCH AND STATE

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus Before · 1653–1713 1191

The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter After · 24 May 1689 1208

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan Before · 1597–1614 1129

Korean Scholars Found a Church After · 1784 1245

← Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism Earlier · 1675
→ The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter Later · 24 May 1689

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter

24 May 1689 · Firm date

In May 1689 the English Parliament exempts Protestant dissenters who take the oaths from the penalties of the laws on worship, but not Catholics or those who deny the Trinity. In the same year John Locke's Letter argues that the care of souls is no business of the magistrate.

In London on 24 May 1689 William III, seated on the throne before the Lords and the Commons, gave the royal assent to "An Act for exempting Their Majesties Protestant Subjects dissenting from the Church of England, from the Penalties of certain Laws" (Lords Journal vol. 14, 24 May 1689).

The Act says that some ease to scrupulous consciences in the exercise of religion may help to unite the king's and queen's Protestant subjects. It lists the laws of Elizabeth I and her successors that punished absence from the parish church and attendance at other religious meetings, and it provides that they shall not apply to dissenters who take the oaths appointed by an Act of the same Parliament and subscribe the declaration required by the Act of Charles II that kept Roman Catholics out of Parliament (Toleration Act recital and sections 1–3). Their meetings must be held with the doors unlocked, in places certified to the bishop, the archdeacon or the justices, and they still owe tithes to the parish (Toleration Act sections 4 and 16). Their ministers must subscribe the Articles of Religion, except the thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth and a clause of the twentieth on the church's power to decree rites and its authority in controversies of faith; those who scruple the baptism of infants are excused part of the twenty-seventh as well (Toleration Act sections 6–7). Those who refuse all oaths, as the Quakers did, may make a declaration of fidelity and profess their faith in the Trinity and in Scripture instead (Toleration Act section 10). The Act gives no benefit to "any Papist or Popish Recusant whatsoever" or to anyone who denies the doctrine of the Trinity in his preaching or writing (Toleration Act section 14).

In the same year John Locke's Letter Concerning Toleration appeared in English (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration title and year as given in the edition). Locke calls toleration "the chief characteristic mark of the true Church" (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration opening paragraph). The commonwealth, he argues, exists only to secure civil interests; the care of souls is not committed to the magistrate, because his power is outward force and true religion is the inward persuasion of the mind (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration the definition of the commonwealth and the first two arguments). A church is "a voluntary society of men" (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration the definition of a church). He sets limits of his own: a church whose members deliver themselves to the service of another prince has no right to toleration, and "those are not at all to be tolerated who deny the being of a God" (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration the paragraphs beginning "Again: That Church" and "Lastly"). Within those limits he writes that "neither Pagan nor Mahometan, nor Jew, ought to be excluded from the civil rights of the commonwealth because of his religion" (Locke, Letter Concerning Toleration the paragraph beginning "Ecclesiastical assemblies", near the end).

The Act did not repeal the old laws. It lifted their penalties from those who met its conditions (Toleration Act recital and sections 1–3) and declared the laws on attending divine service on Sunday still in force against everyone who did not go to a congregation it allowed (Toleration Act section 13). In 1744 a pamphlet against the Methodists charged that their preachers had not qualified themselves under "the Act of Toleration" and were therefore defying the law (Observations upon the Methodists (1744) pp. 3–4); see John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The Journal of the House of Lords records that the king gave the royal assent to the Act on Friday 24 May 1689 (Lords Journal vol. 14, 24 May 1689). The date is in the Julian (Old Style) calendar, which England used until 1752; in the Gregorian calendar it was 3 June 1689, also a Friday. Statutes of the Realm prints it as chapter 18 of the first year of William and Mary, under the year 1688 (Toleration Act recital and sections 1–3). The online editions of Locke's Letter date William Popple's English translation to 1689; the day of its publication was not established for this entry.

Primary sources

Journal of the House of Lords House of Lords
vol. 14, 24 May 1689

The Toleration Act (1 William and Mary, chapter 18) Parliament of England · Royal assent 24 May 1689 recital and sections 1–3; sections 4 and 16; sections 6–7; section 10; section 14; section 13

A Letter Concerning Toleration John Locke · 1689 title and year as given in the edition; opening paragraph; the definition of the commonwealth and the first two arguments; the definition of a church; the paragraphs beginning "Again: That Church" and "Lastly"; the paragraph beginning "Ecclesiastical assemblies", near the end

Observations upon the Conduct and Behaviour of a Certain Sect, Usually Distinguished by the Name of Methodists Anonymous; attributed in library catalogues to Edmund Gibson, bishop of London · 1744
pp. 3–4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who John Locke, William III
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Westminster Confession 1643–1649 1176
The First Baptist Congregations 1609 1146
George Fox and the Quakers 1652 1183

LEADS TO

Religious Freedom in the United States 1786–1791 1249

CHURCH AND STATE

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes Before · October 1685 1204
Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod After · 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221

← Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes Earlier · October 1685
→ The Chinese Rites Controversy Later · 1704–1742

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Chinese Rites Controversy

1704–1742 · Firm date

Jesuit missionaries let Chinese converts honour Confucius and their ancestors as civil customs; others call the rites superstitious. Rome forbids them in 1704, 1715 and 1742, the Kangxi emperor says Westerners should no longer preach, and in 1939 Rome allows them as civil acts.

The quarrel was about the ceremonies with which the Chinese honoured Confucius and their dead. Some missionaries, Benedict XIV wrote in looking back, held these to be purely civil and allowed them to converts; others held that they smelled of superstition and could not be permitted (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari § 1). The Society of Jesus, by its own account, had long permitted them as merely political (see Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing) (Jesuits of Beijing, Brevis Relatio pp. 1–2).

Rome at first answered each side according to its description, as Benedict XIV himself said in reviewing the decrees (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari §§ 2–3). In 1645 it was told that governors offered sacrifice to Confucius in his temples, with animals, wine and incense, to obtain wisdom from him; it ruled that Christians could take no part (Propaganda Fide, decree of 12 September 1645 question 8). In 1656 it was told that scholars bowed to Confucius as pupils bow to a living teacher, in a hall that was a school and not a temple; it ruled that this could be allowed, as a cult that appeared merely civil and political (Holy Office, decree of 23 March 1656 question 3).

In March 1692 the Board of Rites, at the Kangxi emperor's order, ruled that all the churches of the empire be left as they were and that anyone might go to them to worship (Kangxi, edict of 1692 order of 19 March and decision of the Board of Rites of 20 March 1692, in Le Gobien, pp. 181–185); the Jesuit Charles Le Gobien, who printed the text in French in 1698, says that the emperor confirmed it and gave it the force of law (Kangxi, edict of 1692 Le Gobien, p. 190). In 1700 the Jesuits at Beijing put their reading of the rites before him: Confucius is honoured as a teacher and is not asked for talent or office; the offerings to ancestors show love and gratitude; the sacrifices to Heaven are offered to the Lord of heaven and earth, not to the visible sky. The emperor answered that this was very well written and needed no correction (Jesuits of Beijing, Brevis Relatio pp. 8–11).

Clement XI decided otherwise. On 20 November 1704 he confirmed answers of the Holy Office that forbade the rites as tainted with superstition, and sent them to his visitor in China, Charles Maillard de Tournon, who published them there in 1707 (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari §§ 6 and 8, pp. 189–190). The constitution Ex illa die repeated the rulings in 1715: God is to be named "Tien Chu", Lord of Heaven, and not "Tien" or "Xang Ti"; Christians may not preside, serve or be present at the solemn sacrifices to Confucius and to ancestors, though a merely passive presence, where enmity cannot otherwise be avoided, is not condemned (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari pp. 191–192, the text of Ex illa die).

Having read the proclamation, Kangxi wrote in 1721 that the Westerners did not understand Chinese matters and should no longer be allowed to preach in China (Kangxi, comment of 1721 excerpt). A second visitor, Carlo Ambrogio Mezzabarba, published a list of permissions at Macao that year (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari pp. 198–200, Mezzabarba's pastoral letter); in 1742 Benedict

XIV declared them void and confirmed Ex illa die (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari §§ 12 and 21–24, pp. 197 and 202; dating clause, p. 204).

In 1939 Propaganda Fide, with the approval of Pius XII, stated that certain ceremonies in the East, though once bound up with pagan rites, had come in the course of centuries to keep only a civil meaning. It allowed Catholics to attend the honours paid to Confucius and to bow before the dead and their tablets, and dispensed priests from the oath that Benedict XIV had imposed (Propaganda Fide, Plane compertum est AAS 32 (1940), pp. 24–26).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The entry runs from the decision confirmed by Clement XI on 20 November 1704 to Benedict XIV's constitution, dated the fifth day before the Ides of July 1742, that is 11 July (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari §§ 6 and 8, pp. 189–190) (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari §§ 12 and 21–24, pp. 197 and 202; dating clause, p. 204). The earlier Roman decrees are dated 12 September 1645 and 23 March 1656 in the collection of Propaganda Fide (Propaganda Fide, decree of 12 September 1645 question 8) (Holy Office, decree of 23 March 1656 question 3). The Jesuits date their declaration to the emperor 30 November 1700 (Jesuits of Beijing, Brevis Relatio pp. 8–11). Ex illa die is dated 19 March 1715 and Mezzabarba's letter 4 November 1721 in the texts Benedict XIV reproduces (Benedict XIV, Ex quo singulari pp. 198–200, Mezzabarba's pastoral letter). The instruction Plane compertum est is dated 8 December 1939 (Propaganda Fide, Plane compertum est AAS 32 (1940), pp. 24–26).

The Roman decrees cited here speak only of "some missionaries" on either side and do not say to which orders those who put the questions belonged. The documents are collected in English in 100 Roman Documents Concerning the Chinese Rites Controversy (1645–1941), translated by Donald F. St. Sure and edited by Ray R. Noll (1992).

Primary sources

Ex quo singulari Pope Benedict XIV · 11 July 1742
§ 1; §§ 2–3; §§ 6 and 8, pp. 189–190; pp. 191–192, the text of Ex illa die; pp. 198–200, Mezzabarba's pastoral letter; §§ 12 and 21–24, pp. 197 and 202; dating clause, p. 204

Brevis Relatio (A Short Account of the Declaration of the Emperor of China on the Honours Paid to Heaven, Confucius and the Ancestors) Jesuit missionaries at Beijing · Declaration of 30 November 1700; this reprint 1703
pp. 1–2; pp. 8–11

Decree of Propaganda Fide on Questions from the China Mission (1645) Congregation de Propaganda Fide · 1645 question 8

Decree of the Holy Office on Questions from the China Mission (1656) Congregation of the Holy Office · 1656
question 3

The Kangxi Emperor's Edict of Toleration Board of Rites, at the order of the Kangxi emperor · 20 March 1692 (decision of the Board of Rites) order of 19 March and decision of the Board of Rites of 20 March 1692, in Le Gobien, pp. 181–185; Le Gobien, p. 190

The Kangxi Emperor's Comment on the Papal Decree The Kangxi emperor · 1721 excerpt

Plane compertum est Congregation de Propaganda Fide · 8 December 1939
AAS 32 (1940), pp. 24–26

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Beijing, Rome
Who Kangxi, Clement XI, Charles Maillard de Tournon Threads Mission and Expansion, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142

LEADS TO

The Suppression of the Jesuits 21 July 1773 1237

The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom 1851–1864 1301

Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission 25 June 1865 1314

The Chinese Church under the People's Republic 1950–1954 1409

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Susenyos, the Jesuits and the Ethiopian Church Before · 1622–1632 1167

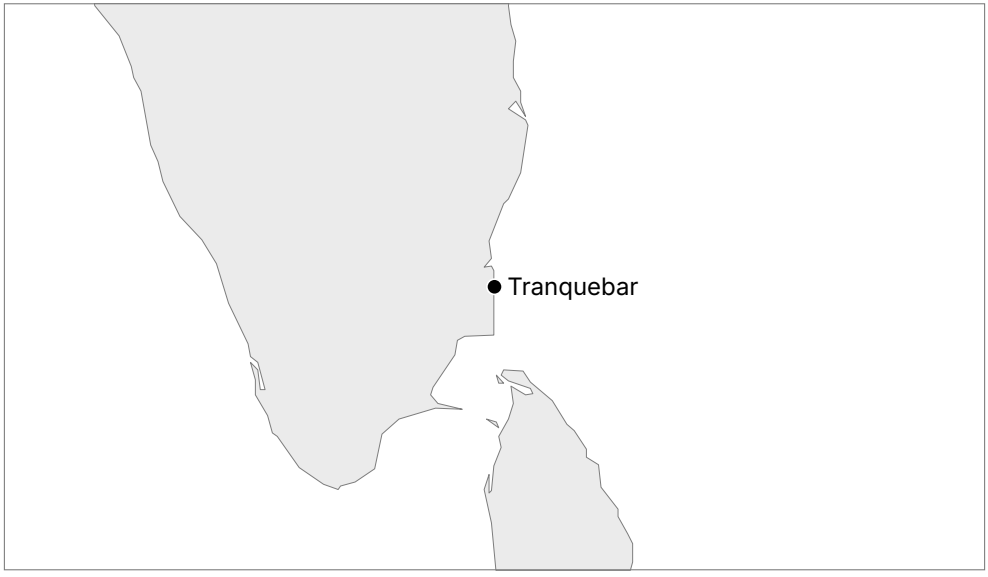
The Tranquebar Mission After · 9 July 1706 1217

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus Before · 1653–1713 1191

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod After · 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221

← The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter Earlier · 24 May 1689



→ The Tranquebar Mission Later · 9 July 1706

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Tranquebar Mission

9 July 1706 · Firm date

Two German Lutherans trained at Halle, sent under the protection of the king of Denmark, land at Tranquebar in South India in July 1706. They learn Tamil and Portuguese, baptize converts, build a church, open schools and begin to translate and print the New Testament in Tamil.

Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg and Heinrich Plütschau were Germans and Lutherans, educated at Berlin and then at the university of Halle, as the English editor of their letters records (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, preliminary discourse, sections 42–43). They went to India under King Frederick IV of Denmark; a Danish account printed with their letters dates the king's care for the mission from 1705 (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part III, p. 134). On 9 July 1706 their ship reached Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast, and three days later Ziegenbalg wrote home that the place was inhabited by "Malabarian Heathens" and would give them work enough without going further inland (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, pp. 17–18).

Their first care, he says, was language. Having learned Portuguese, they took a Tamil schoolmaster into their house and then hired a translator who had served the East India Company, and within eight months Ziegenbalg could read, write and speak "Malabarick", as he calls Tamil. The two agreed that he would catechize in Tamil and Plütschau in Portuguese. From December 1706 they preached in the Danish church of the settlement (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 9, pp. 66–69). The first baptism, of five converts who had given an account of the articles of the faith, was held there. They also built a stone church of their own outside the town, among the Tamil houses, consecrated it on 14 August and named it Jerusalem. By the time of the letter the congregation numbered sixty-three (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 9, pp. 69–72).

Ziegenbalg writes that converts were cast off by their own people and needed support, and that the missionaries had opened a charity school (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 8, pp. 60–61). In October 1707 he sent to Europe the four Gospels translated into Tamil (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 10, pp. 75–78). A letter from Madras in January 1710 counts about one hundred and sixty baptized persons and catechumens and is headed as reporting that a translation of the New Testament was being attempted (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part II, letter 7, pp. 44–50). In December 1713 the missionaries wrote that their Tamil press and type foundry were well advanced (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part III, letter of 11 December 1713, pp. 76–78), and in September 1714 that the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles were printed, the rest waiting for paper (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part III, letter 15, pp. 116–120).

The English chaplain at Madras, George Lewis, wrote of the mission in 1712: "It is the first Attempt the Protestants ever have made in that Kind" (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part III, letter 4, pp. 41–42). The letters were printed in German and English to raise support, and gifts for Tranquebar were sent through August Hermann Francke at Halle (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, preliminary discourse, sections 42–43) (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, preliminary discourse, sections 47–48, pp. xxxv–xxxvi). See Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Ziegenbalg's letter from Tranquebar of 12 July 1706 says that the ship arrived on the ninth of July (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, pp. 17–18). The letter describing the church gives 14 August as the day of its consecration (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 9, pp. 69–72) and is dated 12 September 1707 (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part I, letter 9, close, p. 74). It calls that 14 August the eighth Sunday after Trinity, which fits the Gregorian calendar, in use in Denmark since 1700. The printing of the Gospels and Acts in Tamil is reported in a letter of 27 September 1714 (Ziegenbalg, Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Part III, letter 15, pp. 116–120).

Primary sources

Propagation of the Gospel in the East Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg and other missionaries at Tranquebar · Letters of 1706–1714; English edition 1709–1718
preliminary discourse, sections 42–43; Part III, p. 134; Part I, pp. 17–18; Part I, letter 9, pp. 66–69; Part I, letter 9, pp. 69–72; Part I, letter 8, pp. 60–61; Part I, letter 10, pp. 75–78; Part II, letter 7, pp. 44–50; Part III, letter of 11 December 1713, pp. 76–78; Part III, letter 15, pp. 116–120; Part III, letter 4, pp. 41–42; preliminary discourse, sections 47–48, pp. xxxv–xxxvi; Part I, letter 9, close, p. 74

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Tranquebar
Who Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg, Heinrich Plütschau
Threads Mission and Expansion, Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071

LEADS TO

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261

The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions 27 September 1947 1397

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Chinese Rites Controversy Before · 1704–1742 1212

The Moravians at Herrnhut After · 13 August 1727 1225

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Trial of Galileo Before · 22 June 1633 1172

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement After · 2 October 1792 1261

← The Chinese Rites Controversy Earlier · 1704–1742

→ Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod Later · 25 January 1721 (Old Style)

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod

25 January 1721 (Old Style) · Firm date

In January 1721 (Old Style) Tsar Peter I puts the Russian church under a board of clergy sworn to him as its supreme judge. It takes the patriarch's place and the name of Most Holy Synod, and in 1723 the patriarch of Constantinople recognises it.

Adrian, the last patriarch of Moscow, was given no successor; Metropolitan Stephen of Ryazan filled his place "but without that Title", as Thomas Consett, the English translator of these documents, noted (Spiritual Regulation, signatures, with Consett's note (p. 113)). For the office itself see the founding of the patriarchate in 1589. Consett, who published the documents in 1729, wrote that Peter the Great had "prevented the Succession of Patriarchs" because he thought that their power would obstruct his designs (Spiritual Regulation, Consett's preface, p. xv).

On 25 January 1721, by the Old Style calendar, Peter signed at Saint Petersburg a manifesto establishing a Spiritual College (Spiritual Regulation, manifesto, closing lines, in the Russian edition of 1904). He wrote that he saw much disorder among the clergy, feared to answer to God for neglecting it and found no better remedy than government by a council. All his subjects were to obey the college's decrees, and it might add to its rules only with his consent. Its members were a president, two vice-presidents, four councillors and four assessors (Spiritual Regulation, manifesto (pp. 3–5)). Each swore an oath acknowledging that the monarch of all Russia "is the Supreme Judge of this Spiritual College" (Spiritual Regulation, oath of the members (p. 10)).

The first part of the Regulation argues the case for a council. It finds the truth better than one man can, its work does not stop when a member is absent or dies, and it leaves less room for partiality and bribes (Spiritual Regulation, part 1, reasons 1, 4 and 5 (pp. 15–18)). Above all, the common people do not know how the spiritual power differs from the sovereign's. Seeing the honour paid to a single chief pastor, they take him for "a second Sovereign, equal in Power to the King himself, or above him", and in a quarrel they side with him against their ruler (Spiritual Regulation, part 1, reason 7 (pp. 18–20)). Consett judged this section "particularly level'd against Patriarchal Power" (Spiritual Regulation, Consett's preface, p. xv). Feofan Prokopovich, bishop of Pskov, signed the Regulation with the other bishops (Spiritual Regulation, signatures, with Consett's note (p. 114)); Muravyov, a nineteenth-century official of the Synod, says that its composition had been entrusted to him (Muravyov, History of the Church of Russia, p. 283).

The college then put questions to the tsar. For the church services in which the patriarch used to be named it proposed a title of its own, and Peter wrote in his own hand: "the most holy Synod". The college also asked that no orders be issued in the name of a patriarch, because it was "invested with the Patriarchal Honour, Power, and Dignity" (Spiritual Regulation, the college's points with the tsar's resolutions (pp. 124–126)).

On 23 September 1723 Patriarch Jeremias of Constantinople wrote that he confirmed the Synod instituted by Peter. It was to be called "our Brother in Christ, the Holy and Sacred Synod" and had authority to do all that the four patriarchal thrones do, and he charged it to keep the canons of the seven ecumenical councils (Muravyov, History of the Church of Russia, letter of Patriarch Jeremias, 23 September 1723 (pp. 287–288)). A council of the Russian church restored the patriarchate in November 1917 (Local Council of 1917–1918, Determinations, no. 1 (4 November 1917)); see the church in the Russian Revolution.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The manifesto closes with its place and date: St Petersburg, 25 January 1721 (Spiritual Regulation, manifesto, closing lines, in the Russian edition of 1904). That is a date of the Julian calendar, the Old Style then used in Russia, which in the eighteenth century ran eleven days behind the Gregorian; the day is 5 February 1721 in the New Style. A note at the end of the Regulation says that the tsar had the draft read and amended on 11 February 1720 and that the clergy and senators signed it on 23 February (Spiritual Regulation, signatures, with Consett's note (p. 113)). The letter of Jeremias is dated 23 September 1723 as Muravyov prints it (Muravyov, History of the Church of Russia, letter of Patriarch Jeremias, 23 September 1723 (pp. 287–288)); the determination of the council of 1917 is dated 4 November in the Julian calendar (Local Council of 1917–1918, Determinations, no. 1 (4 November 1917)).

Primary sources

The Spiritual Regulation Issued in the name of Peter I of Russia · Manifesto of 25 January 1721 (Old Style); printed September 1721 signatures, with Consett's note (p. 113); Consett's preface, p. xv; manifesto, closing lines, in the Russian edition of 1904; manifesto (pp. 3–5); oath of the members (p. 10); part 1, reasons 1, 4 and 5 (pp. 15–18); part 1, reason 7 (pp. 18–20); signatures, with Consett's note (p. 114); the college's points with the tsar's resolutions (pp. 124–126)

A History of the Church of Russia Andrei Nikolaevich Muravyov · 1838; English translation 1842

p. 283; letter of Patriarch Jeremias, 23 September 1723 (pp. 287–288)

Determinations of the Local Council of the Orthodox Church of Russia, 1917–1918 1917–1918

no. 1 (4 November 1917)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Saint Petersburg
Who Peter the Great, Feofan Prokopovich
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism 1652–1667 1187

LEADS TO

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks 1917–1918 1363

CHURCH AND STATE

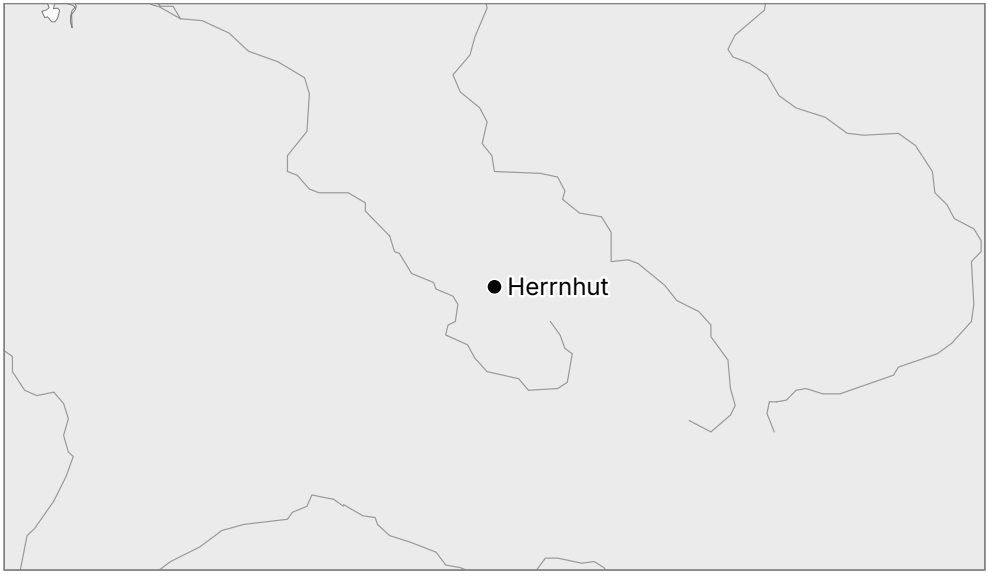
The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter Before · 24 May 1689 1208

The Suppression of the Jesuits After · 21 July 1773 1237

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Chinese Rites Controversy Before · 1704–1742 1212

The Suppression of the Jesuits After · 21 July 1773 1237



← The Tranquebar Mission Earlier · 9 July 1706
→ The Moravians at Herrnhut Later · 13 August 1727

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Moravians at Herrnhut

13 August 1727 · Firm date

Emigrants from Moravia settle on Count Zinzendorf's estate at Herrnhut. In 1727 they pledge themselves to common statutes, and their church dates its renewal from a communion service on 13 August of that year. In 1732 Herrnhut sends two men to the slaves of St Thomas.

In 1722 a few families who had left Moravia for the sake of their faith were given leave to build on the estate of Count Nikolaus von Zinzendorf in Upper Lusatia (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 20–32). The carpenter Christian David, who had led them out, and his companions felled the first tree for the first house on 17 June, on a wild slope below the hill called the Hutberg, and the count's steward named the place Herrnhut, "the Lord's Watch" (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 20–32). The church that grew there holds that these settlers were the descendants and survivors of the ancient Church of the Brethren (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, preface).

The settlement drew people of different opinions, and by 1727 it was divided. Zinzendorf drew up statutes, which the Lutheran pastor of the parish and the leading inhabitants approved. On 12 May 1727 he spoke to the whole community for three hours, the statutes were read, and each inhabitant gave his hand in pledge (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 86–90). The statutes declare that Herrnhut is to remain in love with the children of God in all religious persuasions and to judge none. They count as a genuine brother one who confesses that he owes his awakening and salvation wholly to the mercy of God in Christ and who shows by his whole life that he is determined to be delivered from sin, and they say that such a person is not to be despised for holding sectarian or defective opinions (Herrnhut Statutes of 1727, arts. 1–3).

On 13 August the congregation walked to the parish church at Berthelsdorf for the Lord's Supper. The Herrnhut diary, as the church's history quotes it, says that on the way those who had been estranged embraced one another, that during the hymns it could hardly be told whether the people were singing or weeping, and that they went home at noon "with feelings of holy extacy" and spent the following days "learning the lesson of love" (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 101–105). Two weeks later twenty-four men and twenty-four women agreed to divide the hours of day and night among them by lot, so that prayer should not cease (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, p. 133).

The same history traces the missions to Zinzendorf's schooldays at Halle, where he heard of the Tranquebar mission in Francke's house, and to his visit to Copenhagen in 1731, where Brethren of his household met Anthony, a black servant from St Thomas in the West Indies who had been baptized in Denmark and who described the condition of the slaves on the island (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 134–137). Leonard Dober offered himself, writing to the congregation that he was ready to become a slave in order to tell them of the Saviour. He set out on foot with David Nitschmann on 21 August 1732 (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 140–143), and they reached St Thomas on 13 December (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, p. 148).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The dates are those of the Moravian Church's own record. Its account of 13 August 1727 is quoted from the congregation's diary (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 101–105); the statutes were introduced on 12 May 1727 (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 86–90); the first tree at Herrnhut was felled on 17 June 1722 (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 20–32). The departure of the first missionaries on 21 August and their arrival at St Thomas on 13 December are placed in 1732 (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 140–143) (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, p. 148). The book that gives these dates was compiled for the church's centenary and printed in English in 1822 (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, preface). It calls 10 August 1727 a Sunday (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, pp. 101–105) and the day after the landing at St Thomas a Sunday (Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren, p. 148), which fits the Gregorian calendar, in use in Saxony and Denmark since 1700.

Primary sources

The Memorial-Days of the Renewed Church of the Brethren Moravian Church (Unity of the Brethren) · English edition 1822

pp. 20–32; preface; pp. 86–90; pp. 101–105; p. 133; pp. 134–137; pp. 140–143; p. 148

Statutes of the Congregation at Herrnhut (the Brotherly Agreement) Nikolaus von Zinzendorf and the congregation at Herrnhut · 12 May 1727

arts. 1–3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Herrnhut
Who Nikolaus von Zinzendorf, Leonard Dober
Threads Revival and Unity, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200

The Council of Constance and the Burning of Jan Hus 1414–1418 959

LEADS TO

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261

REVIVAL AND UNITY

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism Before · 1675 1200

The Great Awakening After · 1734–1743 1229

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Tranquebar Mission Before · 9 July 1706 1217

Korean Scholars Found a Church After · 1784 1245

← Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod Earlier · 25 January 1721 (Old Style)

→ The Great Awakening Later · 1734–1743

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Great Awakening

1734–1743 · Firm date

A revival in Jonathan Edwards's congregation at Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1734 and 1735 becomes known through his printed account. In 1740 George Whitefield preaches to great crowds in New England, and Charles Chauncy of Boston answers that much of the stir is disorder.

Jonathan Edwards was the third minister of Northampton in Massachusetts and the grandson of his predecessor, Mr Stoddard. In a letter of 1736 he described what had happened in his congregation. In 1734 there was alarm in the region about Arminianism, and things were said from the pulpit about justification by faith alone. "And then it was, in the latter part of December, that the Spirit of God began extraordinarily to set in": five or six people were converted one after another. In the spring and summer of 1735 "the town seemed to be full of the presence of God". The same concern appeared in neighbouring towns. Edwards hoped that more than three hundred people in Northampton had been converted in half a year (Edwards, Faithful Narrative section 1).

From the latter part of May 1735 the work slackened; a respected townsman, of a family prone to melancholy, cut his own throat, and two people in other towns were "led away with strange enthusiastic delusions" (Edwards, Faithful Narrative section 3, close). The letter was printed with a preface by Isaac Watts and John Guyse (Edwards, Faithful Narrative preface of the first editors).

In the autumn of 1740 the itinerant preacher George Whitefield toured New England. At Boston on 20 September he preached, by his own count, to about 6,000 in a meeting-house and then to about 8,000 on the Common (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, p. 28), and on 12 October he gave his farewell sermon there to a crowd he put at nearly thirty thousand (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, p. 43). On 17 October he came to Northampton and over three days held four meetings in Edwards's church; "Mr. Edwards wept during the whole Time of Exercise", he noted (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, pp. 47–49). On 8 July 1741 Edwards preached at Enfield the sermon printed as Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God. Its doctrine is that "there is nothing that keeps wicked men at any one moment out of hell, but the mere pleasure of God", and it closes by urging the hearers to come to Christ while the door of mercy stands open (Edwards, Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God heading, doctrine and close).

Others judged differently. Charles Chauncy, pastor of the First Church in Boston, published Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New-England in 1743 (Chauncy, Seasonable Thoughts title page). He wrote that itinerant preaching had begun in those parts with Whitefield and that he could see no warrant in Scripture or reason for a man's preaching from parish to parish where the gospel was already preached (Chauncy, Seasonable Thoughts Part I, p. 36). He listed the swoonings, the "bitter Shriekings and Screamings" and the "Convulsion-like Tremblings and Agitations" that went with the preaching (Chauncy, Seasonable Thoughts Part I, p. 77). A good number, he trusted, had been truly wrought upon by the Spirit of God, but in a far greater number he took the terrors to be "a mechanical Impression on animal Nature", produced by "awful Words and frightful Gestures" (Chauncy, Seasonable Thoughts Part I, pp. 80–81).

See also John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Edwards dates the beginning of the awakening at Northampton to the latter part of December 1734 (Edwards, Faithful Narrative section 1) and signs his account on 6 November 1736 (Edwards, Faithful Narrative section 3, close); the preface of its first editors is dated 12 October 1737 (Edwards, Faithful Narrative preface of the first editors). Whitefield's journal gives the days of his tour of New England in September and October 1740 (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, p. 28) (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, pp. 47–49). The sermon at Enfield is headed 8 July 1741 (Edwards, Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God heading, doctrine and close), and Chauncy's book was printed at Boston in 1743 (Chauncy, Seasonable Thoughts title page). The span shown runs from the first of these documents to the last. All the days are in the Julian (Old Style) calendar, which Britain and its colonies kept until 1752: Whitefield's journal calls 20 September 1740 a Saturday and 12 October a Sunday, as that calendar requires (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, p. 28) (Whitefield, Journal seventh journal, p. 43).

Primary sources

A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God Jonathan Edwards · Dated 6 November 1736; preface of the first editors 12 October 1737

section 1; section 3, close; preface of the first editors

Journals George Whitefield · Printed in parts, 1738–1741

seventh journal, p. 28; seventh journal, p. 43; seventh journal, pp. 47–49

Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God Jonathan Edwards · Preached 8 July 1741 heading, doctrine and close

Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New-England Charles Chauncy · 1743

title page; Part I, p. 36; Part I, p. 77; Part I, pp. 80–81

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Northampton, Massachusetts, Boston
Who Jonathan Edwards, George Whitefield
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth 1620 1163

Spener's Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200

LEADS TO

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Moravians at Herrnhut Before · 13 August 1727 1225

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism After · 24 May 1738 1233

← The Moravians at Herrnhut Earlier · 13 August 1727
→ John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism Later · 24 May 1738

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism

24 May 1738 · Firm date

On 24 May 1738, at a meeting in Aldersgate Street in London, the clergyman John Wesley feels his heart "strangely warmed". The next year he begins to preach in the open air at Bristol, and the societies he and his brother Charles organise come to be called Methodist.

At Oxford John Wesley and a few friends met regularly, took communion every week and visited prisoners; one of them was mocked at his college for belonging to "the Holy Club" (Wesley, Journal, letter on the Oxford society). In October 1735 Wesley sailed for Georgia with his brother Charles Wesley. There were twenty-six Germans on board (Wesley, Journal, 14–21 October 1735), and during a storm that split the mainsail the English passengers screamed while "the Germans calmly sang on" (Wesley, Journal, 25 January 1736).

Back in London, on 7 February 1738, he met Peter Böhler and two companions newly landed from Germany, and from then on lost no chance of talking with them (Wesley, Journal, 7 February 1738). On Whitsunday he heard that his brother "had found rest to his soul" (Wesley, Journal, 19–24 May 1738). On Wednesday 24 May he went "very unwillingly" to a society in Aldersgate Street, where someone was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. "About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation", he wrote (Wesley, Journal, 24 May 1738). He later wrote of having visited the Moravian church (Wesley, Journal, letter printed under June 1739); see the Moravians at Herrnhut.

In March 1739 George Whitefield pressed him to come to Bristol. On Monday 2 April he "submitted to be more vile" and preached from a little rise beside the city to about three thousand people (Wesley, Journal, 15 March – 12 May 1739). That September in London he preached to crowds he reckoned at ten and twenty thousand on the old Christianity which "under the new name of Methodism" was everywhere spoken against (Wesley, Journal, 16 September 1739).

The rules that the two brothers signed in 1743 divide each society into classes of about twelve, whose leader sees every member once a week. The one condition of admission is a desire to flee from the wrath to come and to be saved from sin, shown by doing no harm, by doing good and by attending the ordinances of God, among them public worship and the Lord's Supper (Wesley, General Rules paragraphs 1–7, pp. 3–9).

Wesley preached, he said, by the authority conveyed to him when the bishop who ordained him laid hands on him, and he met objections from several sides. At Bath a man named Nash told him that his meeting was a conventicle, contrary to Act of Parliament (Wesley, Journal, 5 June 1739). To a friend who asked how he could gather Christians in other men's parishes he answered: "I look upon all the world as my parish" (Wesley, Journal, letter printed under June 1739). In 1741 Whitefield told him that they preached "two different gospels" (Wesley, Journal, 28 March 1741). An anonymous pamphlet of 1744 charged that the Methodists neither heeded the laws against separate assemblies nor qualified under the Act of Toleration, and called this "an open Defiance of Government" (Observations upon the Methodists (1744) pp. 3–4). See the Toleration Act and Locke's Letter.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The dates are those of Wesley's own Journal: Wednesday 24 May 1738 for the meeting in Aldersgate Street (Wesley, Journal, 19–24 May 1738) (Wesley, Journal, 24 May 1738) and Monday 2 April 1739 for the first sermon in the open air at Bristol (Wesley, Journal, 15 March – 12 May 1739). The General Rules are signed 1 May 1743 (Wesley, General Rules paragraphs 1–7, pp. 3–9). All these days are in the Julian (Old Style) calendar, which England kept until 1752, as the weekdays the Journal gives confirm; 24 May 1738 was 4 June in the Gregorian calendar.

Primary sources

The Journal of John Wesley John Wesley · Entries from October 1735 letter on the Oxford society; 14–21 October 1735; 25 January 1736; 7 February 1738; 19–24 May 1738; 24 May 1738; letter printed under June 1739; 15 March – 12 May 1739; 16 September 1739; 5 June 1739; 28 March 1741

The Nature, Design, and General Rules of the United Societies John Wesley and Charles Wesley · 1 May 1743 paragraphs 1–7, pp. 3–9

Observations upon the Conduct and Behaviour of a Certain Sect, Usually Distinguished by the Name of Methodists Anonymous; attributed in library catalogues to Edmund Gibson, bishop of London · 1744
pp. 3–4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London, Bristol
Who John Wesley, Charles Wesley
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Moravians at Herrnhut 13 August 1727 1225

The Great Awakening 1734–1743 1229

LEADS TO

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church 1787–1816 1253
The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272
Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade 25 March 1807 1280
William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army July 1865 1321
The Azusa Street Revival 9 April 1906 1342

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Great Awakening Before · 1734–1743 1229
The Philokalia Is Published After · 1782 1241

← The Great Awakening Earlier · 1734–1743
→ The Suppression of the Jesuits Later · 21 July 1773

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Suppression of the Jesuits

21 July 1773 · Firm date

By the brief Dominus ac Redemptor of 21 July 1773 Pope Clement XIV abolishes the Society of Jesus, which the Catholic kings of France, Spain, Portugal and the Two Sicilies had already expelled. In 1814 Pius VII restores it in all countries.

On 21 July 1773 Clement XIV issued at Rome the brief Dominus ac Redemptor, dated from St Mary Major in the fifth year of his pontificate (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, closing line, ‘Given at Rome’). It recalls religious orders that earlier popes had dissolved, among them the Templars, suppressed by Clement V in 1312 (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning ‘Other Roman Pontiffs’). Those popes, the brief says, acted from the fullness of their power, without a judicial trial and without letting the orders answer the charges against them (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning ‘But in deciding’).

The brief then turns to the Society of Jesus (see the Society of Jesus Is Founded). It says the Society was founded for the salvation of souls and the conversion of heretics and unbelievers (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'We have before our eyes'), and that Paul III approved it in 1540 (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'Pope Paul III'). Almost from the beginning, it goes on, there was discord inside the Society and between it and other orders, the secular clergy, universities and princes (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'Nevertheless, from the tone'). Among the quarrels it lists is the dispute over rites used in some places that departed from those approved by the universal Church (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'To the great sorrow') (compare the Chinese Rites Controversy). It reports that the kings of France, Spain, Portugal and the Two Sicilies had expelled the Jesuits from their realms (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'After so many') and had pressed first Clement XIII and then Clement XIV to suppress the Society altogether (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'Our aforementioned dearest sons').

Clement declares that the Society can no longer bear the fruit for which it was founded and that lasting peace can hardly be restored to the Church while it exists, and by his apostolic power he abolishes it, with its offices, houses, schools, colleges and constitutions (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'We have used many'). The authority of the general and the other superiors passes to the local bishops, and no more novices may be received (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'Therefore we declare'). Members not yet ordained are released from their simple vows (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'But our efforts'). Ordained members may enter another order or live as secular clergy under the bishops, supported from the revenues of their former houses (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'To all ordained members'). The suppression extends to the missions (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'We wish that whatever'). Clergy are forbidden to speak or write about the suppression and its causes without the pope's leave (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'In addition, we order').

The bull of Pius VII that undid the brief tells what followed. Former Jesuits living as secular priests in the Russian Empire asked to remain united in one body, and the emperor Paul I recommended them to the pope in a letter of 11 August 1800 (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 2). In March 1801 Pius allowed them to form a congregation of the Society of Jesus within Russia (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 3), and in 1804, at King Ferdinand's request, he extended the grant to the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 4). On 7 August 1814 (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum closing line), citing requests from archbishops, bishops and other distinguished persons (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 5), he extended it to the Papal States and to all other states (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 7) and set aside Dominus ac Redemptor so far as it stood in the way (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 12).

Clement's brief rests the suppression on the peace of the Church and on other reasons which, he writes, he keeps in his own mind (Clement XIV, Dominus ac Redemptor, para. beginning 'We have used many'). Forty-one years later Pius restored the Society by the same fullness of apostolic power (Pius VII, Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum 7).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Dominus ac Redemptor Pope Clement XIV · 21 July 1773 closing line, 'Given at Rome'; para. beginning 'Other Roman Pontiffs'; para. beginning 'But in deciding'; para. beginning 'We have before our eyes'; para. beginning 'Pope Paul III'; para. beginning 'Nevertheless, from the tone'; para. beginning 'To the great sorrow'; para. beginning 'After so many'; para. beginning 'Our aforementioned dearest sons'; para. beginning 'We have used many'; para. beginning 'Therefore we declare'; para. beginning 'But our efforts'; para. beginning 'To all ordained members'; para. beginning 'We wish that whatever'; para. beginning 'In addition, we order'

Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum Pope Pius VII · 7 August 1814
2; 3; 4; closing line; 5; 7; 12

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome

Who Clement XIV, Pius VII
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Monasticism and Religious Life, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Society of Jesus Is Founded 27 September 1540 1067
The Chinese Rites Controversy 1704–1742 1212
Jansenism and the Bull Unigenitus 1653–1713 1191

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod Before · 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221
The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception After · 8 December 1854 1305

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

Teresa of Ávila Reforms Carmel Before · 24 August 1562 1100
The Philokalia Is Published After · 1782 1241

CHURCH AND STATE

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod Before · 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221
Religious Freedom in the United States After · 1786–1791 1249

← John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism Earlier · 24 May 1738
→ The Philokalia Is Published Later · 1782

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Philokalia Is Published

1782 · Firm date

A Greek anthology of writers on watchfulness and the prayer of the heart, gathered from the libraries of Mount Athos, is printed at Venice in 1782. Its preface offers the prayer to laypeople as well as monks. A Slavonic version follows at Moscow in 1793.

In 1782 a volume in Greek was printed at Venice by Antonio Bortoli under the title Philokalia of the Holy Neptic Fathers (Philokalia (1782), Onassis Library copy, catalogue record). The preface explains the word: books are called neptic that treat of attention and watchfulness (nepsis) (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. γ′). The title says that the book was gathered from the holy and God-bearing fathers and that through the moral philosophy of practice and contemplation set out in it the mind is purified, illumined and perfected (Philokalia (1782), title page (as reprinted, Athens 1893)).

An account from the time of how it was made is a letter of Paisius Velichkovsky, who governed the monasteries of Neamț and Secu in Moldavia (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), Life, title and sections 66–68). It was written while the book was still at the press (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша'). He says that Macarius of Corinth, formerly metropolitan of Corinth, had loved from his youth the books of the fathers that teach watchfulness, attention, stillness and the prayer performed by the mind in the heart (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша'). In the letter's account Macarius searched the libraries of the great monasteries of Mount Athos; at Vatopedi he found a collection on the union of the mind with God, gathered in earlier times; he had the texts copied, checked the copies himself and set a life of each author before his writings; and from Smyrna he sent thirty-six such books to Venice to be printed, with money given as alms (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша').

The preface starts from what it calls God's purpose from eternity, to make human beings divine (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. α′). The grace given in baptism, it says, has been buried under the passions, and the Spirit taught the fathers a way to find it again: to pray without ceasing to the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, not with mind and lips alone but with the whole mind turned inward, calling on the Lord's name in the depth of the heart and asking his mercy (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. β′). Books that teach this, it says, had all but disappeared through age and rarity and had never been printed, and what remained was moth-eaten (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. γ′). It names John Mavrogordatos as the benefactor who paid for the printing (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. δ′). To the objection that such things should not be laid before everyone, it answers that Scripture commands all the faithful to pray without ceasing, and it invites laypeople and monks together (Philokalia (1782), preface, p. ε′).

Paisius's letter speaks only of Macarius (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша'). The publisher of the Athens reprint of 1893 wrote that Nicodemus the Hagiorite, a monk of Athos, had contributed much to the book when he brought it out together with Macarius (Philokalia (1782), publisher's dedication of the Athens reprint, 1893), and the library record names both men as its authors (Philokalia (1782), Onassis Library copy, catalogue record).

Paisius had for years been correcting old Slavonic versions of these writers against Greek manuscripts and translating others afresh (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Начах дело мое'). A Slavonic volume, Dobrotolubiye, was printed at Moscow in May 1793 with the blessing of the Holy Synod (Dobrotolubiye (Moscow, 1793), title leaf, recto and verso). Its title leaf names no translator; the Russian editors who published Paisius's Life and letters in 1847 say that the translation was his and that it was compared with the Greek before it was printed (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), editors' preface (1847)). For the earlier dispute over this way of prayer see Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The place, printer and year (Venice, Antonio Bortoli, 1782) are those given in the description of the copy of the first edition in the Onassis Library; the same record's date field reads 1783 (Philokalia (1782), Onassis Library copy, catalogue record). Paisius's letter, written before he had seen the book, says that the texts had been sent to Venice to be printed and were expected shortly (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша').

The title leaf of the Slavonic volume dates its printing at Moscow to May 1793, the year 7301 from the creation of the world (Dobrotolubiye (Moscow, 1793), title leaf, recto and verso); the month is that of the Julian calendar, which Russia then used. The Russian editors of Paisius's writings in 1847 say it was first printed in 1795 (Life and Writings of Paisius Velichkovsky (1847), editors' preface (1847)); the title leaf is followed here.

Primary sources

Philokalia of the Holy Neptic Fathers Compiled by Macarius of Corinth and Nicodemus the Hagiorite · Venice, 1782
Onassis Library copy, catalogue record; preface, p. γ′; title page (as reprinted, Athens 1893); preface, p. α′; preface, p. β′; preface, p. δ′; preface, p. ε′; publisher's dedication of the Athens reprint, 1893

Life and Writings of the Moldavian Elder Paisius Velichkovsky letters of the 1780s and 1790s; Life written after 1794; published Moscow, 1847
Life, title and sections 66–68; letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Святыня же ваша'; letter to Archimandrite Theodosius, para. beginning 'Начах дело мое'; editors' preface (1847)

Dobrotolubiye (Slavonic Philokalia) Moscow, May 1793 title leaf, recto and verso

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Venice, Mount Athos
Who Macarius of Corinth, Nicodemus the Hagiorite, Paisius Velichkovsky Threads Monasticism and Religious Life, Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast Councils 1341–1351 937

MONASTICISM AND RELIGIOUS LIFE

The Suppression of the Jesuits Before · 21 July 1773 1237

REVIVAL AND UNITY

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism Before · 24 May 1738 1233

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church After · 1787–1816 1253

← The Suppression of the Jesuits Earlier · 21 July 1773
→ Korean Scholars Found a Church Later · 1784

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Korean Scholars Found a Church

1784 · Firm date

Korean scholars who had read Christian books from Beijing send one of their own with an embassy; Yi Seung-hun is baptized there in 1784, returns to Seoul and baptizes his friends. A church grows with no priest in the country, and meets persecution.

Christian books written in Chinese by European missionaries were brought home to Korea by the embassies that went each year to Beijing (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 14–15). Charles Dallet's history of 1874, which for this period follows the memoirs of Bishop Daveluy, themselves for the most part a literal translation of Korean documents (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, p. 13, note), tells how in 1777 a group of scholars, Yi Byeok among them, withdrew to a mountain temple to study, examined these books, and began to pray morning and evening and to set apart every seventh day (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 14–15).

In the winter of 1783 Yi Byeok's friend Yi Seung-hun was to accompany his father, an envoy, to Beijing, and Dallet reports that Yi Byeok urged him to go to the church there, question the European teachers and bring back books (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 16–17). A missionary at Beijing, M. de Ventavon, wrote on 25 November 1784 that the Korean ambassadors had visited the church at the end of the previous year; that the son of one of them, twenty-seven years old and a good scholar, read the books he was given and resolved to become a Christian; and that before leaving, with his father's consent, he was baptized by M. de Grammont and named Peter (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 18–19 (letter of M. de Ventavon, 25 November 1784)).

Yi Seung-hun came back to Seoul in the spring of 1784 with books, crosses and images, and Yi Byeok studied them and began to teach others (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 19–20). Yi Seung-hun then baptized Yi Byeok, who took the name John the Baptist, and Kwon Il-sin, who took the name Francis Xavier (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, p. 22). The Catholic bishops of Korea date the beginning of their church from this baptism and say that it was established by Koreans themselves and not by European missionaries (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, History, 'Development of the Early Catholic Church in Korea', sections 1–2) (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, History, 'Dawn of Catholicism in Korea', foreword).

Early in 1785 a convert was arrested, tortured and exiled, and Dallet records that under pressure from their families Yi Seung-hun burned his books and Yi Byeok gave way; Yi Byeok died in 1786 (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 26–28). About 1787, having no priests, the leaders chose a bishop and priests from among themselves, Yi Seung-hun among them, who preached, baptized, heard confessions and celebrated mass (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 30–31). In 1789 their reading made them doubt that this was valid; they stopped, and Yi Seung-hun and Kwon Il-sin wrote to the bishop of Beijing in a letter that Paul Yun Yu-il carried, disguised as a merchant (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 31–33). The bishop judged what they had done to be illegitimate but done in good faith, and promised a priest (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, History, 'Development of the Early Catholic Church in Korea', sections 1–2). The Chinese priest James Zhou Wen-mo entered Korea in December 1794 (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, 124 Korean Martyr Blesseds, no. 2, James Zhou Wen-mo).

In 1790 the bishop of Beijing forbade Catholics to perform the ancestral rites, and Paul Yun Ji-chung, whom Yi Seung-hun had baptized in 1787, burned his family's ancestral tablet and was beheaded at Jeonju on 8 December 1791 (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, 124 Korean Martyr Blesseds, no. 1, Paul Yun Ji-chung). Yi Seung-hun was beheaded with five others outside the West Gate of the capital on 8 April 1801; Dallet judges that he died without retracting his denials of the faith (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 121–122). At the canonization of Korean martyrs in Seoul in 1984 John Paul II called this first community unique in the history of the Church because it was founded entirely by laypeople (John Paul II, Homily at the canonization of the Korean martyrs 3).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The year is fixed by a letter written at Beijing on 25 November 1784: the Korean embassy visited the church at the end of the previous year, and the envoy's son was baptized before it left for home (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 18–19 (letter of M. de Ventavon, 25 November 1784)). Dallet has Yi Seung-hun back in Seoul in the spring of 1784 (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, pp. 19–20) and places his baptism of Yi Byeok about the ninth lunar month of that year (Dallet, Histoire de l'Église de Corée, vol. 1, p. 22). The Korean bishops' conference gives September 1784 for the baptism of Yi Byeok in one account (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, History, 'Development of the Early Catholic Church in Korea', sections 1–2) and October 1784 for the founding of the community in another (Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea, History, 'Dawn of Catholicism in Korea', foreword).

Primary sources

Histoire de l'Église de Corée Charles Dallet · 1874

vol. 1, pp. 14–15; vol. 1, p. 13, note; vol. 1, pp. 16–17; vol. 1, pp. 18–19 (letter of M. de Ventavon, 25 November 1784); vol. 1, pp. 19–20; vol. 1, p. 22; vol. 1, pp. 26–28; vol. 1, pp. 30–31; vol. 1, pp. 31–33; vol. 1, pp. 121–122

History of the Catholic Church in Korea Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea · 2009
'Development of the Early Catholic Church in Korea', sections 1–2; 'Dawn of Catholicism in Korea', foreword

124 Korean Martyr Blesseds Catholic Bishops' Conference of Korea · c. 2014
no. 2, James Zhou Wen-mo; no. 1, Paul Yun Ji-chung

Homily at the Canonization of the Korean Martyrs John Paul II · 6 May 1984
3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Seoul, Beijing
Who Yi Seung-hun, Yi Byeok
Threads Mission and Expansion, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Matteo Ricci at the Court of Beijing 24 January 1601 1142

LEADS TO

The Pyongyang Revival 14 January 1907 1346

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Moravians at Herrnhut Before · 13 August 1727 1225

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement After · 2 October 1792 1261

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes Before · October 1685 1204

The French Revolution and the Church After · 1790–1801 1257

← The Philokalia Is Published Earlier · 1782
→ Religious Freedom in the United States Later · 1786–1791

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Religious Freedom in the United States

1786–1791 · Firm date

In January 1786 Virginia enacts Jefferson's statute that no one shall be compelled to support any worship or suffer for his religious opinions. The federal Constitution bars religious tests, and the First Amendment, ratified in 1791, forbids Congress to establish a religion.

Thomas Jefferson drafted for Virginia a bill for establishing religious freedom, which stands as no. 82 among the bills that the committee revising the state's laws reported in June 1779 (Virginia, Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, Jefferson's draft, Bill no. 82 (1779)). In 1785 James Madison wrote a Memorial and Remonstrance for citizens to sign against another bill, printed by order of the last session of the General Assembly, "establishing a provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion" (Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance opening address). Religion, it argues, "can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence"; it is a duty owed to the Creator before any claim of civil society, and so is "wholly exempt" from society's authority (Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance 1). A power that can establish Christianity to the exclusion of other religions can as easily establish one sect of Christians over the rest (Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance 3). Christianity, Madison adds, flourished without the support of human laws, and fifteen centuries of legal establishment had produced pride and indolence in the clergy and "ignorance and servility in the laity" (Madison, Memorial and Remonstrance 6–7).

Madison reported the outcome to Jefferson on 22 January 1786: the assembly's table had been loaded with petitions against any interference of the legislature in religion, and a convention of the Presbyterian church had asked expressly that the bill for religious freedom be made law (Madison to Jefferson, 22 January 1786, para. beginning 'Our Assembly last night'). The Senate altered some words of the preamble; the enacting clauses passed unchanged (Madison to Jefferson, 22 January 1786, para. beginning 'Our Assembly last night'). The assembly sat at Richmond (Virginia, Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, heading of the enrolled acts).

The act's preamble declares that Almighty God created the mind free and that the "holy author of our religion" chose not to spread it by coercion (Virginia, Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, preamble). It enacts "that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever", nor suffer in body or goods for his religious opinions, and that all shall be free to profess and argue for their opinions in religion without any effect on their civil capacities (Virginia, Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, enacting clause).

The Constitution of the United States, signed on 17 September 1787, provides that "no religious Test shall ever be required" for any federal office (U.S. Constitution, Article VI). The first Congress, meeting at New York, proposed amendments on 25 September 1789, and those ratified by 15 December 1791 became the Bill of Rights (U.S. Bill of Rights, heading and introductory note). The first begins: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" (U.S. Bill of Rights, Amendment I). Jefferson sent the ratified articles to the governors of the states from Philadelphia on 1 March 1792 (Jefferson, Circular to the Governors, 1 March 1792).

The amendment speaks of Congress (U.S. Bill of Rights, Amendment I). The Baptists of the Danbury association in Connecticut, assembled in October 1801, wrote to Jefferson, now president, that in their state religion was still treated as an object of legislation, so that what they enjoyed they held "as favors granted, and not as inalienable rights"; they acknowledged that the national government could not undo the laws of a state (Danbury Baptist Association, Address to Jefferson (October 1801), paras. 2–3). Jefferson replied on 1 January 1802 that the American people, by the First Amendment, had built "a wall of separation between Church & State" (Jefferson, Letter to the Danbury Baptists, 1 January 1802, para. 2).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

An Act for Establishing Religious Freedom General Assembly of Virginia, from a bill drafted by Thomas Jefferson · January 1786 (bill reported 1779)
Jefferson's draft, Bill no. 82 (1779); heading of the enrolled acts; preamble; enacting clause

Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments James Madison · about 20 June 1785
opening address; 1; 3; 6–7

Letter to Thomas Jefferson, 22 January 1786 James Madison · 22 January 1786 para. beginning 'Our Assembly last night'

Constitution of the United States signed 17 September 1787
Article VI

Bill of Rights (Amendments to the United States Constitution) proposed 25 September 1789, ratified 15 December 1791 heading and introductory note; Amendment I

Circular to the Governors of the States, 1 March 1792 Thomas Jefferson · 1 March 1792 founders.archives.gov

Address of the Danbury Baptist Association to Thomas Jefferson Danbury Baptist Association · after 7 October 1801

paras. 2–3

Letter to the Danbury Baptist Association, 1 January 1802 Thomas Jefferson · 1 January 1802

para. 2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Richmond, Philadelphia
Who Thomas Jefferson, James Madison
Threads Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Toleration Act and Locke's Letter 24 May 1689 1208

The Pilgrims Land at Plymouth 1620 1163

CHURCH AND STATE

The Suppression of the Jesuits Before · 21 July 1773 1237

The French Revolution and the Church After · 1790–1801 1257

← Korean Scholars Found a Church Earlier · 1784
→ Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church Later · 1787–1816

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church

1787–1816 · Estimated date

Black Methodists pulled from their knees at prayer in St George's Church, Philadelphia, walk out with Richard Allen and Absalom Jones. Allen opens Bethel church in 1794, and in 1816 Black congregations unite as the African Methodist Episcopal Church with Allen as bishop.

Richard Allen tells his own story. He was born on 14 February 1760, a slave of Benjamin Chew of Philadelphia, was sold with his family into Delaware, was converted there and joined the Methodist society, and bought his freedom from his master (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, pp. 5–7). After some years as a travelling preacher he came to Philadelphia in February 1786, preached at St George's Church at five in the morning, and gathered a society of forty-two members among the Black people of the city (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 12). He proposed a separate place of worship for them, and three men joined him, among them Absalom Jones (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 12).

As Black worshippers at St George's grew in number they were moved from their seats to the wall and then sent to the gallery (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 13). One Sunday, Allen writes, they knelt there for prayer:

> We had not been long upon our knees before I heard considerable scuffling and low talking. I raised my head up and saw one of the trustees, H-- M--, having hold of the Rev. Absalom Jones, pulling him up off of his knees, and saying, "You must get up--you must not kneel here."

Jones asked to be left until the prayer was over, and a second trustee came to pull up another man. "By this time prayer was over, and we all went out of the church in a body, and they were no more plagued with us in the church" (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 13).

They hired a store-room, worshipped by themselves and raised money for a building. When the Methodist elder threatened to disown them, they answered that he could not "seal up the scriptures from us, and deny us a name in heaven" (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, pp. 14–15). When the members voted on which denomination to join, a large majority chose the Church of England; only Allen and Jones voted for the Methodists (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 16). Bishop White ordained one of their number as pastor of that church (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), p. 4), and the title page of a sermon that Jones printed in 1808 names him rector of St Thomas's, the African Episcopal Church (Jones, Thanksgiving Sermon (1808), title page). Allen refused the post: he "could not be any thing else but a Methodist" (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 17).

Allen bought an old blacksmith's shop, moved it to his own lot and fitted it for worship; Bishop Asbury opened it in July 1794, and it was named Bethel (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, pp. 17–18). For years the white Methodist elders of the city claimed control of its property and pulpit, until a suit before the Supreme Court ended in Bethel's favour (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, pp. 18–21).

In April 1816 delegates from Baltimore and other places met those of Philadelphia and resolved to "become one body, under the name of the African Methodist Episcopal Church" (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 21). On 11 April Allen was set apart as bishop by the laying on of hands of five ordained ministers (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), p. 10). The new church's Doctrines and Discipline, printed in 1817, kept the Methodism that Allen said had first brought the gospel to his people (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 17); the church governed itself in order to be free of what its founders called "spiritual despotism" (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), pp. 8–9), and refused membership to slaveholders (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), p. 190).

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The founding of the denomination is fixed: the conference met in April 1816 (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 21) and Allen was set apart as bishop on 11 April (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), p. 10). The walk-out from St George's is not. Allen gives it no date and warns in his preface that much of his book was written many years after the events, some of them without day or date (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 3); he tells it after his arrival in Philadelphia in February 1786 (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 12) and before the events of 1793 (Allen, Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours, p. 17). The church's first Discipline (1817) dates the meeting at which the Black Methodists resolved to act to November 1787 (AME Church, Doctrines and Discipline (1817), p. 3), and the timeline follows it.

Gary B. Nash, Forging Freedom: The Formation of Philadelphia's Black Community, 1720–1840 (1988), and Richard S. Newman, Freedom's Prophet: Bishop Richard Allen, the AME Church, and the Black Founding Fathers (2008), date the walk-out to 1792; Nash argues from the building records of St George's that the gallery in which the incident took place was finished only in that year.

Primary sources

The Life, Experience, and Gospel Labours of the Rt. Rev. Richard Allen

Richard Allen · written before 1831; published Philadelphia, 1833

pp. 5–7; p. 12; p. 13; pp. 14–15; p. 16; p. 17; pp. 17–18; pp. 18–21; p. 21; p. 3

The Doctrines and Discipline of the African Methodist Episcopal Church African Methodist Episcopal Church · 1817
p. 4; p. 10; pp. 8–9; p. 190; p. 3

A Thanksgiving Sermon, Preached January 1, 1808 Absalom Jones · 1808 title page

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Philadelphia
Who Richard Allen, Absalom Jones
Threads Revival and Unity, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

LEADS TO

The Churches and the Civil Rights Movement 16 April 1963 1428

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Philokalia Is Published Before · 1782 1241

The Second Great Awakening After · August 1801 1272

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism Before · 1652–1667 1187

Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade After · 25 March 1807 1280

← Religious Freedom in the United States Earlier · 1786–1791
→ The French Revolution and the Church Later · 1790–1801

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The French Revolution and the Church

1790–1801 · Firm date

The National Assembly takes the church's lands and in 1790 remakes the French church by law, demanding an oath that Pius VI condemns. Priests who refuse it are killed in Paris in 1792 and outlawed in 1793. In 1801 Bonaparte and Pius VII restore Catholic worship by a concordat.

On 2 November 1789 the National Assembly of France decreed that all the church's estates were at the disposal of the nation, which was to provide in return for worship, the clergy and the poor (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 6A, pp. 15–16). The Civil Constitution of the Clergy of 12 July 1790 then reorganised the church itself. Each department became a diocese (Civil Constitution of the Clergy, Title I, art. 1). Bishops and parish priests were to be chosen by election; a new bishop was not to ask the pope for confirmation but to write to him as the visible head of the universal Church, in witness of unity of faith (Civil Constitution of the Clergy, Title II, arts. 1–3 and 19). The clergy were to be paid by the nation (Civil Constitution of the Clergy, Title III, art. 1). A decree of 27 November 1790 required bishops and parish priests to swear to maintain the constitution; those who did not were held to have resigned (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 6D, pp. 22–23).

Pius VI answered on 13 April 1791 (Pius VI, Charitas closing line). He wrote that almost all the bishops and most of the parish priests had refused the oath (Pius VI, Charitas 9). He judged the Civil Constitution heretical in many of its decrees and in others sacrilegious and schismatic (Pius VI, Charitas 11), suspended every cleric who had taken the oath unless he withdrew it within forty days, and declared the elections of the new bishops void and their consecrations unlawful (Pius VI, Charitas 20–22).

The abbé Barruel, an exile in London who in 1794 published accounts gathered from fellow refugees (Barruel, History of the Clergy, dedication), tells what happened to priests imprisoned for refusing the oath in the church of the Carmelites in Paris. On Sunday 2 September 1792, he writes, armed men broke into the garden where the priests were walking and began to kill them; the archbishop of Arles was among the first to die (Barruel, History of the Clergy, part 3, pp. 61–65). In April 1793 the Convention ordered clergy who had not sworn the oath of liberty and equality shipped to French Guiana, on pain of death within twenty-four hours if they returned (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 29B, pp. 134–135); in October it ordered priests liable to deportation who had returned to France put to death, and offered a hundred livres for denouncing one (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 29C, pp. 135–136). From September 1794 the Republic paid no clergy, and a decree of February 1795 allowed worship while refusing it salaries and buildings (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, nos. 29F–G, pp. 138–139).

The First Consul of France from the end of 1799 was Napoleon Bonaparte (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 58 (dated 13 December 1799, p. 270), art. 39, p. 275). The convention between him and Pius VII, done at Paris on 26 Messidor of the Year IX (15 July 1801) (Concordat of 1801, closing line), recognised the Catholic religion as that of the great majority of French citizens (Concordat of 1801, preamble). Its worship was to be free and public, within such police regulations as the government judged necessary (Concordat of 1801, art. 1). The pope would ask the existing bishops to resign; the First Consul would name new ones, the pope would institute them, and they would swear fidelity to the government (Concordat of 1801, arts. 3–6). Churches not sold were returned, the pope undertook not to trouble the buyers of church lands, and the government was to pay the clergy (Concordat of 1801, arts. 12–14). A French law of 8 April 1802 added that no papal document might be published in France without the government's leave (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 64B, Title I, art. 1, p. 299).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The decrees and the papal letters carry their own dates. The Concordat closes "Done at Paris, 26 Messidor, Year IX" (Concordat of 1801, closing line), which in the Gregorian calendar is 15 July 1801. F. M. Anderson's collection heads the text with two other dates, 10 September 1801 and 8 April 1802, which his note explains as those of its signature by the envoys and of its promulgation in France (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 64, editor's note, p. 296); the Organic Articles bear the second date (Anderson, Constitutions and Documents of France, no. 64B, Title I, art. 1, p. 299).

Primary sources

The Constitutions and Other Select Documents Illustrative of the History of France, 1789–1901 Frank Maloy Anderson (editor and translator) · documents of 1789–1810 cited; collection published 1904

no. 6A, pp. 15–16; no. 6D, pp. 22–23; no. 29B, pp. 134–135; no. 29C, pp. 135–136; nos. 29F–G, pp. 138–139; no. 58 (dated 13 December 1799, p. 270), art. 39, p. 275; no. 64B, Title I, art. 1, p. 299; no. 64, editor's note, p. 296

Civil Constitution of the Clergy National Constituent Assembly of France · 12 July 1790

Title I, art. 1; Title II, arts. 1–3 and 19; Title III, art. 1

Charitas Pope Pius VI · 13 April 1791

closing line; 9; 11; 20–22

The History of the Clergy during the French Revolution Augustin Barruel · London, 1794 (English translation of the French original) dedication; part 3, pp. 61–65

Concordat of 1801 Pope Pius VII and the French Republic · done at Paris, 26 Messidor Year IX (15 July 1801); promulgated 8 April 1802 closing line; preamble; art. 1; arts. 3–6; arts. 12–14

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Paris
Who Pius VI, Pius VII, Napoleon
Threads Church and State, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Louis XIV Revokes the Edict of Nantes October 1685 1204

LEADS TO

The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324

CHURCH AND STATE

Religious Freedom in the United States Before · 1786–1791 1249
Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade After · 25 March 1807 1280

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

Korean Scholars Found a Church Before · 1784 1245
The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward After · 17 March 1865 1317

← Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church Earlier · 1787–1816
→ William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement Later · 2 October 1792

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement

2 October 1792 · Firm date

The English Baptist minister William Carey argues in 1792 that Christ's command to teach all nations still binds the churches. A missionary society is formed at Kettering that October, and in 1793 Carey sails for India. In 1805 the Serampore mission sets down its principles.

In 1792 William Carey published An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians, to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens (Carey, Enquiry, title page). Its first section takes up the opinion that Christ's commission to "teach all nations" was given to the apostles alone; if that were so, Carey answers, baptism would have ended with them too, and so would the promise "Lo, I am with you always" (Carey, Enquiry, section 1). He reviews earlier missions, from the apostles to the Moravians (Carey, Enquiry, section 2), and answers the practical objections one by one: distance, danger, the difficulty of living and of learning languages (Carey, Enquiry, section 4). He ends with a plan: Christians should pray, and they should also act. He supposes that "a company of serious Christians, ministers and private persons," were to "form themselves into a society", with a committee to choose missionaries and collect money (Carey, Enquiry, section 5). He proposes that his own Particular Baptist denomination begin, and that congregations subscribe a penny or more a week (Carey, Enquiry, section 5).

The society's own record tells how it came about. Carey wrote the Enquiry at Moulton, where he lived from 1786 (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, p. 1). At a ministers' meeting at Clipstone in 1791 Carey had asked whether it was not their duty to attempt something toward spreading the gospel in the heathen world, and was asked to publish his thoughts (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, p. 2). On 31 May 1792, at Nottingham, he preached from Isaiah 54:2 and pressed two things, that they should expect great things and attempt great things (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, pp. 2–3). On 2 October 1792, at Kettering, the ministers resolved to act together "agreeably to what is recommended in brother Carey's late publication" as the Particular Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel amongst the Heathen; twelve of them subscribed £13 2s. 6d., and Andrew Fuller was made secretary (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, pp. 3–4).

On 10 January 1793 the society agreed that brethren Thomas and Carey should go to the East Indies (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, p. 94). Carey embarked with his family on 13 June 1793 (Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionary Society, vol. 1, p. 157).

On 7 October 1805 the missionaries, by then settled at Serampore in Bengal, agreed on a statement of the principles of their work (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), title, p. 441). They would keep out of sight whatever in English manners gave offence, and would neither do violence to images nor interrupt worship (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), article 3, pp. 442–443). Their preaching was to keep to "Christ the Crucified" (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), article 5, p. 444). They held that the gospel could spread through India only by Indian preachers, and that Indian churches should choose pastors from among their own countrymen (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), article 8, pp. 446–447). They bound themselves to translate the Scriptures into the languages of India and to open free schools (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), article 9, pp. 448–449), and to hold all things in common, no one trading on his own account (Serampore Form of Agreement (1805), closing articles, p. 450).

Carey's proposal was a voluntary society of ministers and private persons, paid for by subscriptions (Carey, Enquiry, section 5). The British and Foreign Bible Society, founded twelve years later, was likewise a society of subscribers (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, Laws and Regulations I–V, p. 3); see the British and Foreign Bible Society. For the earlier Protestant missions that the Enquiry reviews, see the Tranquebar Mission and the Moravians at Herrnhut.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians, to Use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens William Carey · 1792 title page; section 1; section 2; section 4; section 5

Periodical Accounts Relative to the Baptist Missionary Society Baptist Missionary Society · volume 1, 1800
vol. 1, p. 1; vol. 1, p. 2; vol. 1, pp. 2–3; vol. 1, pp. 3–4; vol. 1, p. 94; vol. 1, p. 157

Form of Agreement of the Serampore Missionaries William Carey, Joshua Marshman, William Ward and their colleagues · 7 October 1805 title, p. 441; article 3, pp. 442–443; article 5, p. 444; article 8, pp. 446–447; article 9, pp. 448–449; closing articles, p. 450

Reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society British and Foreign Bible Society · first five annual reports, 1805–1809; collected 1810
Laws and Regulations I–V, p. 3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Kettering, Serampore
Who William Carey
Threads Mission and Expansion, Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Tranquebar Mission 9 July 1706 1217

The Moravians at Herrnhut 13 August 1727 1225

LEADS TO

The British and Foreign Bible Society 7 March 1804 1276

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop 29 June 1864 1310

Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission 25 June 1865 1314

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh 14–23 June 1910 1350

MISSION AND EXPANSION

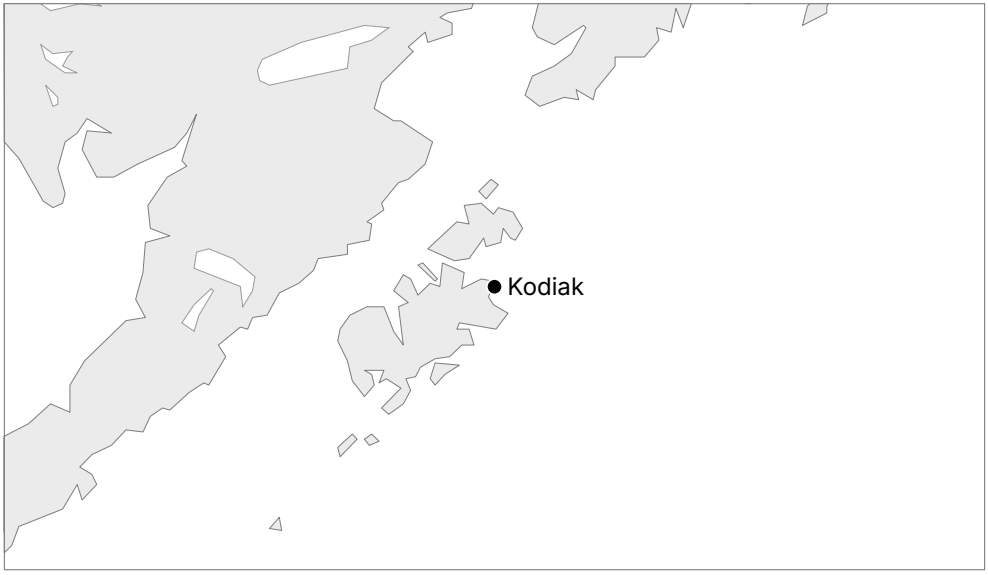
Korean Scholars Found a Church Before · 1784 1245

Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska After · 24 September 1794 1265

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Tranquebar Mission Before · 9 July 1706 1217

The British and Foreign Bible Society After · 7 March 1804 1276



← The French Revolution and the Church Earlier · 1790–1801
→ Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska Later · 24 September 1794

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska

24 September 1794 · Firm date

Ten missionaries, most of them monks of Valaam, cross Siberia and reach Kodiak Island in September 1794. Their letters report thousands of baptisms. The monk Herman stays for life, and the priest John Veniaminov, later Bishop Innocent, writes for the Aleuts in their own language.

A history of the mission published by the monastery of Valaam in 1894 quotes the missionaries' own letters at length. It says that the mission was formed in 1793 of eight monastics and two church servers, most of them monks of Valaam, that it travelled through Siberia at the expense of the trading company of Shelikhov and Golikov, and that it reached Kodiak in the autumn of 1794 (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 66). The monk Herman of Alaska wrote to his abbot that all ten had arrived safely after almost a year on the road (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 66–67 (letter of Herman, May 1795)). The head of the mission, Archimandrite Ioasaph, wrote that he left Moscow on 22 January 1794 and travelled by river, on horseback and by sea, and that on Unalaska they baptized more than a hundred people who, he says, had long been ready for it because they lived among Russian traders (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 67–68 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795)).

Both men wrote to Abbot Nazarius of Valaam in May 1795 (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 66). Ioasaph reported that he had baptized more than seven thousand "Americans" and married more than two thousand couples, and that a church had been built; the people, he wrote, were kind but poor, they and the monks loved one another, and they had broken and burned their shamans' gear (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 68 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795)). Herman put the baptized at nearly seven thousand and described with delight how the priest-monks Macarius and Juvenal argued over which of them should have Alaska to preach in (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 70–71 (letter of Herman, May 1795)).

The same history records losses and quarrels. An account it quotes says that Juvenal baptized more than seven hundred Chugach in 1795 and was killed the next year near Lake Iliamna (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 72). Ioasaph wrote to the company's partners about "various disorders" (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 68–69 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795)).

Herman stayed. By 1818 he was living on Spruce Island, near Kodiak, in a cell with a garden; a Russian official who knew him there says that Aleuts came to him for counsel and with complaints of ill-treatment, and that he visited the sick in an epidemic; the history adds that he kept a small school on the island (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 107–110). He died there on 13 December 1837 (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 115).

A married priest from Irkutsk, John Veniaminov, reached Unalaska in 1824, learned the Aleut dialects, devised an alphabet and translated the Gospel of Matthew (Russian Orthodox Church, Act on the canonization of Innocent (1977), paras. beginning ‘On May 7, 1823’, ‘His travels over the islands’ and ‘Father John Veniaminov’s first translations’). He also wrote in Aleut an Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of Heaven (Russian Orthodox Church, Act on the canonization of Innocent (1977), paras. beginning ‘On May 7, 1823’, ‘His travels over the islands’ and ‘Father John Veniaminov’s first translations’). It tells its readers that there is one way, the way Jesus Christ walked (Veniaminov, Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of Heaven, introduction), and that Christ compels no one to follow him (Veniaminov, Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of Heaven, part 3). As the monk and bishop Innocent of Alaska he was given the new see of Kamchatka, the Kuriles and the Aleutians in 1840 (Russian Orthodox Church, Act on the canonization of Innocent (1977), para. beginning ‘At the same time, the Holy Synod’). He wrote in 1867 that in 1842, kept from Kodiak harbour for three days by a contrary wind, he had looked toward Spruce Island and said inwardly that if Father Herman had found favour with the Lord the wind should change; within a quarter of an hour, he says, it turned, and he later went to Herman’s grave and served a memorial service there (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), pp. 169–170 (letter of Archbishop Innocent, 1 March 1867)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The head of the mission, Archimandrite Ioasaph, wrote in May 1795 that he had been living on Kodiak since 24 September 1794 (Valaam Monastery, History of the Kodiak Mission (1894), p. 68 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795)). Russian dates of this period are in the Julian calendar, which in the 1790s ran eleven days behind the Gregorian; the day corresponds to 5 October 1794 in the Gregorian calendar. The other days named in the entry are also Julian dates, as the Russian sources give them.

Primary sources

Sketch of the History of the American Orthodox Mission (the Kodiak Mission, 1794–1837) Valaam Monastery · St Petersburg, 1894, printing letters of 1795–1867

p. 66; pp. 66–67 (letter of Herman, May 1795); pp. 67–68 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795); p. 68 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795); pp. 70–71 (letter of Herman, May 1795); p. 72; pp. 68–69 (letter of Ioasaph, May 1795); pp. 107–110; p. 115; pp. 169–170 (letter of Archbishop Innocent, 1 March 1867)

Act of the Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church on the Canonization of Saint Innocent Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church · 6 October 1977

paras. beginning 'On May 7, 1823', 'His travels over the islands' and 'Father John Veniaminov's first translations'; para. beginning 'At the same time, the Holy Synod'

Indication of the Way into the Kingdom of Heaven Innocent Veniaminov · written on Unalaska between 1824 and 1834

introduction; part 3

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Kodiak
Who Herman of Alaska, Innocent of Alaska
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Sergius of Radonezh and the Trinity Monastery c. 1337–1345 933

MISSION AND EXPANSION

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement Before · 2 October 1792 1261

The British and Foreign Bible Society After · 7 March 1804 1276

← William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement Earlier · 2 October 1792
→ Schleiermacher and Modern Theology Later · 1799

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Schleiermacher and Modern Theology

1799 · Firm date

In 1799 Friedrich Schleiermacher, a hospital preacher in Berlin, publishes Speeches on Religion for its cultured despisers: religion is neither knowledge nor morals but feeling, a sense and taste for the Infinite. His later dogmatics builds Christian doctrine on that ground.

Friedrich Schleiermacher was preacher at the Charité hospital in Berlin when he wrote On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (Schleiermacher, Life in Letters, vol. 1, pp. 138–140 (recollections of Henriette Herz)). His friend Henriette Herz recalled that he began it at Potsdam in the middle of February 1799 and sent her each speech as he finished it, to be passed on to the censor and the printer (Schleiermacher, Life in Letters, vol. 1, pp. 138–140 (recollections of Henriette Herz)). On 15 April he wrote to her that the last stroke had been put to it (Schleiermacher, Life in Letters, vol. 1, p. 207 (letter of 14–15 April 1799)).

The first speech addresses educated readers who, he says, have made their earthly life so rich that they no longer need an eternity and who will listen least of all to a priest; he admits that he belongs to that order (Schleiermacher, On Religion, First Speech). The second asks what religion is, and answers first that it is not knowledge, whether of the world or of God: "Quantity of knowledge is not quantity of piety" (Schleiermacher, On Religion, Second Speech). The contemplation of the pious, he says, is "the immediate consciousness of the universal existence of all finite things, in and through the Infinite" (Schleiermacher, On Religion, Second Speech). In the wording of the first edition, as his translator John Oman gives it, religion "is neither thinking nor acting, but intuition and feeling", and "religion is sense and taste for the Infinite" (Schleiermacher, On Religion, Oman's appendix, 'The First Edition').

The fifth speech turns from religion in general to the religions. Against the "natural religion" his readers preferred, he holds that the positive religions "are just the definite forms in which religion must exhibit itself" (Schleiermacher, On Religion, Fifth Speech). He describes Christianity by what he calls its original intuition, in which "corruption and redemption, hostility and mediation" are the two fundamental elements, and says of Jesus that his idea was that everything finite needs a higher mediation to be at one with God (Schleiermacher, On Religion, Fifth Speech).

He carried the same starting point into his dogmatics, The Christian Faith, first published in 1821–22 and revised in 1830–31 (Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, translator's note). The first edition says that piety in itself is neither a knowing nor a doing but a disposition and modification of feeling, and that its essence is the feeling of dependence on God (Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, §§8–9 (first edition)). The second edition defines the element common to all piety as "the consciousness of our absolute dependence, or, which is the same thing, of our relation with God" (Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, §§3–4 (second edition)).

It draws the consequence for theology: "Christian doctrines are accounts of the Christian religious affections set forth in speech" (Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, §15 (second edition)). The seat of religion is the same in both books, in feeling and not in knowledge or in conduct, and in the later one doctrine is treated as the description of that feeling (Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, §§3–4 (second edition)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Life of Schleiermacher, as Unfolded in His Autobiography and Letters Friedrich Schleiermacher · autobiography of 1794 and letters to 1834; published in English 1860
vol. 1, pp. 138–140 (recollections of Henriette Herz); vol. 1, p. 207 (letter of 14–15 April 1799)

On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers Friedrich Schleiermacher · first edition 1799; revised 1806 and 1821
First Speech; Second Speech; Oman's appendix, 'The First Edition'; Fifth Speech

The Christian Faith Friedrich Schleiermacher · first edition 1821–22; second edition 1830–31 translator's note; §§8–9 (first edition); §§3–4 (second edition); §15 (second edition)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Berlin
Who Friedrich Schleiermacher

In context

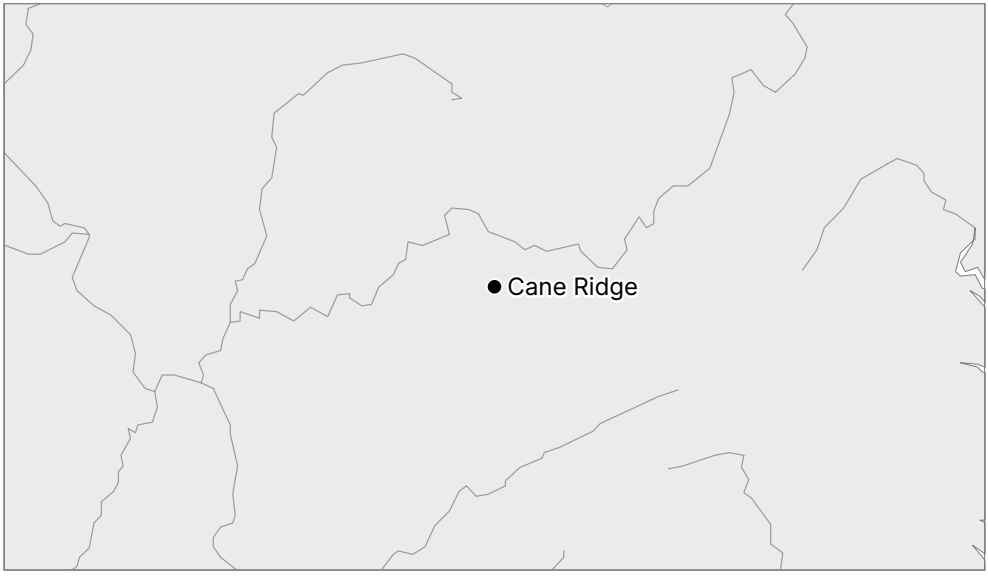
GROWS OUT OF

Spener’s Pia Desideria and the Rise of Pietism 1675 1200

LEADS TO

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy 1910–1925 1354

The Barmen Declaration 31 May 1934 1375



← Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska Earlier · 24 September 1794
→ The Second Great Awakening Later · August 1801

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Second Great Awakening

August 1801 · Firm date

In August 1801 a great crowd camps for a week of preaching at Cane Ridge, Kentucky, the church of the Presbyterian minister Barton Stone, and carries the revival home. In the 1830s Charles Finney teaches that a revival is the result of the right use of means.

Barton Stone was the Presbyterian minister of two congregations in Bourbon County, Kentucky, Cane Ridge and Concord (Stone, Biography, p. 25). In the spring of 1801, hearing of a "religious excitement" in the south of the state under James McGready and other Presbyterian ministers, he went to a camp-meeting in Logan County, where he saw many fall "as men slain in battle" and lie for hours as if dead, then rise "shouting deliverance" and exhort the crowd (Stone, Biography, pp. 34–35). He judged it "a good work—the work of God", though he adds that he saw then and later much that he thought fanaticism (Stone, Biography, pp. 34–35).

When he told his own people what he had seen, the same things began among them, and the effect, he says, was "like fire in dry stubble driven by a strong wind" (Stone, Biography, pp. 36–37). A great meeting was appointed at Cane Ridge for August 1801 (Stone, Biography, pp. 37–38). Stone describes roads crowded with wagons, carriages, riders and people on foot; four or five preachers speaking at once in different parts of the camp; and Methodist and Baptist preachers working alongside the Presbyterians, all urging "free salvation" by faith and repentance; military men on the ground, he reports, judged the crowd at between twenty and thirty thousand (Stone, Biography, pp. 37–38). The meeting went on for six or seven days and nights and ended when food ran short (Stone, Biography, pp. 37–38). He lists the bodily "exercises" seen in those years: falling, the jerks, dancing, barking, laughing and singing (Stone, Biography, p. 39).

People who had come from Ohio and other distant parts carried the same spirit home with them (Stone, Biography, pp. 37–38). Stone and several colleagues then withdrew from the Synod of Kentucky, which suspended them, and he records "great commotion and division in the churches" (Stone, Biography, pp. 47–50). They formed the Springfield Presbytery, rejecting "all authoritative creeds, but the Bible alone"; within about a year they gave up that name too and called themselves simply Christians (Stone, Biography, pp. 47–50). Their Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery is dated 28 June 1804: "We will, that this body die, be dissolved, and sink into union with the Body of Christ at large" (Stone, Biography, pp. 51–53).

A generation later Charles Finney, an evangelist who had become a pastor, gave a course of lectures to his congregation, which the editor of a religious newspaper took down (Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, preface); they were in print by 1835 (Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, title page of the New York printing of 1835). A revival, he taught, "is not a miracle, or dependent on a miracle, in any sense. It is a purely philosophical result of the right use of the constituted means" (Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, Lecture I). He defended new measures such as the "anxious seat", a place set apart where those troubled about their souls could come forward to be spoken with and prayed for (Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, Lecture XIV).

Stone wrote that he had always believed the work to be of God (Stone, Biography, pp. 34–35); Finney taught his hearers to expect revivals wherever the appointed means were rightly used (Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, Lecture I). For the earlier revivals see the Great Awakening and John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Stone, writing in his seventies, says that the meeting began "on Thursday or Friday before the third Lord's-day in August, 1801" and lasted six or seven days and nights (Stone, Biography, pp. 37–38). The timeline gives the month and year only.

Primary sources

The Biography of Eld. Barton Warren Stone, Written by Himself Barton W. Stone, with additions by John Rogers · written about 1843; published Cincinnati, 1847
p. 25; pp. 34–35; pp. 36–37; pp. 37–38; p. 39; pp. 47–50; pp. 51–53

Lectures on Revivals of Religion Charles G. Finney · 1835 preface; title page of the New York printing of 1835; Lecture I; Lecture XIV

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Cane Ridge
Who Barton Stone, Charles Finney
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Great Awakening 1734–1743 1229
John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

LEADS TO

Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints 6 April 1830 1284
The Millerites and the Great Disappointment 22 October 1844 1297

The Azusa Street Revival 9 April 1906 1342

Billy Graham and Postwar Evangelicalism 25 September 1949 1405

REVIVAL AND UNITY

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church Before · 1787–1816 1253

Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints After · 6 April 1830 1284

← Schleiermacher and Modern Theology Earlier · 1799
→ The British and Foreign Bible Society Later · 7 March 1804

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The British and Foreign Bible Society

7 March 1804 · Firm date

Moved by the want of Bibles in Wales, Christians of several denominations meet in London on 7 March 1804 and found a society with one object, the wider circulation of the Scriptures without note or comment, at home and abroad.

John Owen, a clergyman of the Church of England who declined to be one of the Society's secretaries when they were first chosen and took the post on 23 April 1804, seven weeks after the founding (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 59–60 (compare pp. 53–54)), wrote its history. He traces it to a visit to London in December 1802 by Thomas Charles of Bala, a clergyman of the established church who served among the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists and knew the needs of his countrymen from his travels and his Sunday schools (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 15–16). On 7 December, before the committee of the Religious Tract Society, Charles described the want of Welsh Bibles and the failure of every attempt to obtain them by the usual channel (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 15–16). In the conversation that followed, the Baptist minister Joseph Hughes suggested that Wales was not the only part of the kingdom in want, and that something should be done toward a general dispersion of the Scriptures (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 16–17). To that suggestion, Owen says, the Society owes its beginning (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 16–17).

A printed address invited supporters to a public meeting at the London Tavern on Wednesday 7 March 1804 (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 35–36). The proposed society, it said, "presenting nothing but the inspired volume, would be sure to circulate truth, and truth alone", and so would open a channel into which "Christians of every name" could pour their gifts (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 35–36). Owen, who says he came reluctant to be persuaded, puts the company at about three hundred people of different denominations (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 38, 41–44). Granville Sharp took the chair; a German minister, Steinkopff, described the scarcity of the Scriptures he had seen abroad; and Owen rose to support the plan, struck, he writes, at being surrounded by Christians "whose doctrinal and ritual differences had for ages kept them asunder" (Owen, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1816), vol. 1, pp. 38, 41–44).

The Society's first law states its "sole object": "to encourage a wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures" (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, Laws and Regulations I–II, p. 3). In the languages of the United Kingdom it would circulate only the authorized version (see the King James Bible), "without Note or Comment", and it would extend its work to other countries, "whether Christian, Mahometan, or Pagan" (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, Laws and Regulations I–II, p. 3). Its committee was to be thirty-six laymen: six foreigners living in or near London, and of the rest half members of the Church of England and half of other denominations (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, Laws and Regulations IX, p. 4). By 1805 Lord Teignmouth was president, with four bishops and William Wilberforce among the vice-presidents (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, list of officers for 1805, p. 7).

The first report, read in May 1805, shows the range of the work. A Bible society had been formed at Nuremberg on the British model, with a grant of a hundred pounds from London (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, First Report (1805), pp. 12–14). The committee ordered two thousand copies of the Gospel of John in Mohawk, translated by Captain Norton, a chief of that nation (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, First Report (1805), pp. 19–20). Twenty thousand Welsh Bibles were ordered from the university press at Cambridge, and the committee recorded that nearly nineteen hundred pounds had been given in Wales, much of it by the poor (British and Foreign Bible Society, Reports, First Report (1805), pp. 22–23).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The History of the Origin and First Ten Years of the British and Foreign Bible Society John Owen · 1816
vol. 1, pp. 59–60 (compare pp. 53–54); vol. 1, pp. 15–16; vol. 1, pp. 16–17; vol. 1, pp. 35–36; vol. 1, pp. 38, 41–44

Reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society British and Foreign Bible Society · first five annual reports, 1805–1809; collected 1810
Laws and Regulations I–II, p. 3; Laws and Regulations IX, p. 4; list of officers for 1805, p. 7; First Report (1805), pp. 12–14; First Report (1805), pp. 19–20; First Report (1805), pp. 22–23

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who Thomas Charles
Threads Scripture and Canon, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261

The King James Bible 1611 1151

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement Before · 2 October 1792 1261

Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus After · 1844–1859 1293

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Orthodox Monks Reach Alaska Before · 24 September 1794 1265

The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom After · 1851–1864 1301

← The Second Great Awakening Earlier · August 1801
→ Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade Later · 25 March 1807

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade

25 March 1807 · Firm date

After twenty years of campaigning by Quakers, Anglicans and a formerly enslaved writer, Parliament makes the British slave trade unlawful. Other Christians had defended the trade from the Bible, and a missionary society held slaves of its own.

In June 1783 the Quakers, gathered for their yearly meeting, petitioned the House of Commons against the slave trade; Thomas Clarkson calls it the first petition for abolition ever presented to Parliament (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 4). John Wesley had written in 1774 that slave-holding could not be consistent with any degree of natural justice (Wesley, Thoughts upon Slavery IV.3), and had called on captains, merchants and planters to give it up (Wesley, Thoughts upon Slavery V.1–5).

Clarkson, a Cambridge graduate in deacon's orders, won a prize in 1785 for a Latin essay on whether it is right to enslave people against their will, and gave himself to the cause (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 7) (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 8). On 22 May 1787 a committee for abolishing the trade was formed in London; all but three of its members were Quakers, and William Wilberforce, a member of Parliament, had agreed to raise the question in the Commons (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 10). His sons print from his journal for 28 October 1787: "God Almighty has set before me two great objects, the suppression of the slave trade and the reformation of manners" (Life of Wilberforce vol. 1, p. 149).

In March 1789 Olaudah Equiano, who had been a slave, dedicated his autobiography to Parliament in the hope of relieving his "suffering countrymen" (Equiano, Interesting Narrative dedication). He describes the hold of a slave ship and a sale at which brothers were parted, and asks the "nominal Christians" responsible whether they learned this from their God (Equiano, Interesting Narrative ch. 2).

Other Christians defended the trade. In 1788 Raymund Harris, by Clarkson's account a former clergyman and Jesuit (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 22), dedicated to the corporation of Liverpool a pamphlet arguing that the trade agreed with the law of nature, the law of Moses and the Christian law (Harris, Scriptural Researches dedication and preface, p. vii). A missionary society owned slaves. Bishop Beilby Porteus preached before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in February 1783 (Porteus, Sermons contents, sermon 17). He spoke of "the slaves employed on their plantations" in Barbados, on lands left to the Society by General Codrington, and urged it to begin the work of conversion with them (Porteus, Sermons sermon 17, pp. 406–407).

Wilberforce brought the question before the Commons on 12 May 1789 (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 24). In April 1791 his motion to stop the import of slaves from Africa was lost by 163 votes to 88 (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 26). On 23 February 1807 the Commons voted by 283 to 16 to proceed with a bill from the Lords, and it received the royal assent on 25 March (Clarkson, History of the Abolition ch. 33). The Act declared the African slave trade "utterly abolished, prohibited, and declared to be unlawful" from 1 May 1807 (Slave Trade Act 1807 s. 1). It ended the British trade, not slavery: a further Act of 1833 declared the slaves in the British colonies free from 1 August 1834, bound them to work on as apprenticed labourers, and granted twenty million pounds to compensate their owners (Slavery Abolition Act 1833 s. 1, 12 and 24). In 1839 Pope Gregory XVI condemned the trade, wrote that numerous Christians still practised it, and forbade any Catholic to defend it as permissible (Gregory XVI, In supremo apostolatus par. 5–6).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The History of the Rise, Progress and Accomplishment of the Abolition of the African Slave-Trade by the British Parliament Thomas Clarkson · 1808; revised edition 1839
ch. 4; ch. 7; ch. 8; ch. 10; ch. 22; ch. 24; ch. 26; ch. 33

Thoughts upon Slavery John Wesley · 1774
IV.3; V.1–5

The Life of William Wilberforce Robert Isaac Wilberforce and Samuel Wilberforce · 1838
vol. 1, p. 149

The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African Olaudah Equiano · 1789 dedication; ch. 2

Scriptural Researches on the Licitness of the Slave-Trade Raymund Harris · 1788 dedication and preface, p. vii

Sermons on Several Subjects Beilby Porteus · 1783 and later editions contents, sermon 17; sermon 17, pp. 406–407

An Act for the Abolition of the Slave Trade Parliament of the United Kingdom · 25 March 1807
s. 1

An Act for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Colonies Parliament of the United Kingdom · 28 August 1833
s. 1, 12 and 24

In Supremo Apostolatus Pope Gregory XVI · 1839
par. 5–6

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who William Wilberforce, Olaudah Equiano, Thomas Clarkson
Threads Church and State, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

George Fox and the Quakers 1652 1183
John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

LEADS TO

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop 29 June 1864 1310
The Churches and the Civil Rights Movement 16 April 1963 1428

CHURCH AND STATE

The French Revolution and the Church Before · 1790–1801 1257
The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom After · 1851–1864 1301

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Richard Allen and the African Methodist Episcopal Church Before · 1787–1816 1253
The Oxford Movement After · 14 July 1833 1289

← The British and Foreign Bible Society Earlier · 7 March 1804
→ Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints Later · 6 April 1830

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints

6 April 1830 · Firm date

On 6 April 1830, the year the Book of Mormon is printed, Joseph Smith and five others organize a church in western New York. Its leaders declare it to be Christ's church restored. The Catholic Church and some other churches do not accept its baptism.

Joseph Smith says in the history he began in 1838 that in his fifteenth year, at Manchester in the state of New York, there was "an unusual excitement on the subject of religion" among Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists (Joseph Smith, History, JS–H 1:3–9); see the Second Great Awakening. In the spring of 1820, he writes, he went into the woods to ask God which church to join and saw two Personages in a pillar of light, one of whom called the other his beloved Son; he was told to join none of the sects, "for they were all wrong" (Joseph Smith, History, JS–H 1:14–20). He left other accounts: one written about 1832 says "I saw the Lord", who told him that his sins were forgiven (Joseph Smith, History (c.

1832), p. 3); a sketch printed in 1842 speaks of "two glorious personages" (Joseph Smith, Church History (1842), p. 707).

The same history says that in 1823 a messenger named Moroni told him of a book written on gold plates, that he was given the plates in 1827, and that he translated them (Joseph Smith, History, JS—H 1:27–35, 59–67). The title page of the Book of Mormon, with the imprint Palmyra, 1830, calls it an abridgment of the record of the people of Nephi, written "to the convincing of the Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ, the Eternal God" (Book of Mormon (1830) title page). At the end of the volume three men state that an angel showed them the plates (Book of Mormon (1830) p. [589]), and eight more that Smith showed them plates with "the appearance of gold", which they handled (Book of Mormon (1830) p. [590]).

On 6 April 1830, the history says, Smith and five others met at the house of Peter Whitmer to organize a church, and a revelation given that day at Fayette called Smith "a seer, a translator, a prophet, an apostle of Jesus Christ" (Joseph Smith, History, vol. A-1, p. 37). The church's Articles and Covenants order baptism by immersion "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost", by one who has authority from Jesus Christ (Doctrine and Covenants 20:72–74). A revelation that the church dates to the same month, given for some who wished to join without rebaptism, says that to be baptized even a hundred times avails nothing (Doctrine and Covenants 22, heading and verses 1–4). In 1842 Smith wrote that the Latter-day Saints believe in God the Eternal Father, in his Son Jesus Christ and in the Holy Ghost, in the Bible as the word of God "as far as it is translated correctly", and in the Book of Mormon as the word of God (Joseph Smith, Church History (1842), p. 709).

Smith and his brother Hyrum were shot by a mob in the jail at Carthage, Illinois, on 27 June 1844 (Doctrine and Covenants 135, heading and verse 1). An epistle of December 1847, signed by Brigham Young as president on behalf of the Twelve Apostles (General Epistle of the Twelve (1847), p. 88), reports that members of that council and 143 pioneers reached the Great Basin in the latter part of July 1847 (General Epistle of the Twelve (1847), p. 82) and chose the site of a city there, to be called Great Salt Lake City (General Epistle of the Twelve (1847), p. 83).

One of the church's revelations calls it "the only true and living church upon the face of the whole earth" (Doctrine and Covenants 1:30), and its First Presidency and Twelve Apostles declared in 2020 that it is "Christ's New Testament Church restored" (Latter-day Saints, Bicentennial Proclamation (2020) paragraph 6). Documents of three other churches do not accept its baptism. Asked in 2001 whether baptism conferred by the Latter-day Saints is valid, the Catholic Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith answered "Negative", with the approval of John Paul II (Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Response of 5 June 2001 question and response). A leaflet of the ecumenical office of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) calls Mormonism "a new religious tradition distinct from the historic apostolic tradition of the Church" and advises that people who come from it be received on profession of faith and baptized (Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), Presbyterians and Latter-day Saints opening paragraph and 'Support the search for witness'). A page of the United Methodist Church's website says that the Latter-day Saints baptize with the words Father, Son and Holy Spirit but mean such different things by them that this "is not what we consider Christian baptism" (United Methodist Church, Does the UMC accept the baptism of other denominations? paragraph on baptisms not recognized).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The church's Articles and Covenants give the day of its organization as the sixth day of April 1830 (Doctrine and Covenants 20:1), and Smith's history has the same date (Joseph Smith, History, vol. A-1, p. 37).

The sources differ on the place. Smith's manuscript history puts the meeting in the house of Peter Whitmer and heads the revelation received there "Given at Fayette, Seneca Co N Y" (Joseph Smith, History, vol. A-1, p. 37). His sketch of 1842 says that the church was first organized in the town of Manchester, Ontario County (Joseph Smith, Church History (1842), p. 708). The editors of the Joseph Smith Papers, in their note to that sentence of the 1842 text, say that the earliest sources place the meeting at Fayette and call the Manchester reading inaccurate; they suggest that it may go back to William W. Phelps, one of the editors of the Book of Commandments, who added "given in Manchester" to the revelation of 6 April 1830 (Joseph Smith, Church History (1842), p. 708). The church's present edition heads that revelation as given at Fayette, in the home of Peter Whitmer (Doctrine and Covenants 21, heading). The timeline follows the manuscript history.

Primary sources

History of Joseph Smith (begun 1838) Joseph Smith · Begun in 1838; the first manuscript volume written 1839–1843
JS—H 1:3–9; JS—H 1:14–20; JS—H 1:27–35, 59–67; vol. A-1, p. 37

History of Joseph Smith (about 1832) Joseph Smith · c. summer 1832
p. 3

Church History (the Wentworth letter) Joseph Smith · 1 March 1842
p. 707; p. 709; p. 708

The Book of Mormon (first edition, 1830) Published by Joseph Smith · 1830 title page; p. [589]; p. [590]

Doctrine and Covenants The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints · Sections cited here: 1830–1847
20:72–74; 22, heading and verses 1–4; 135, heading and verse 1; 1:30; 20:1; 21, heading

General Epistle from the Council of the Twelve Apostles (1847) The Twelve Apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, signed by Brigham Young · 23 December 1847
p. 88; p. 82; p. 83

The Restoration of the Fulness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ: A Bicentennial Proclamation to the World The First Presidency and Council of the Twelve Apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints · 5 April 2020
paragraph 6

Response to a Dubium on the Validity of Baptism Conferred by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith · 5 June 2001 question and response

Presbyterians and Latter-day Saints Office of Ecumenical and Interfaith Relations, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) · c. 1997–1998 opening paragraph and 'Support the search for witness'

Ask The UMC: Does the UMC Accept the Baptism of Other Denominations? The United Methodist Church · Dated 19 September 2019 on the page; read in October 2026 paragraph on baptisms not recognized

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Fayette, New York, Salt Lake City
Who Joseph Smith, Brigham Young
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Second Great Awakening Before · August 1801 1272

The Oxford Movement After · 14 July 1833 1289

← Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade Earlier · 25 March 1807
→ The Oxford Movement Later · 14 July 1833

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Oxford Movement

14 July 1833 · Firm date

John Keble's sermon on national apostasy and the Tracts for the Times call the Church of England back to its claim to be a catholic church with bishops in succession from the apostles. After Tract 90 is censured, Newman becomes a Roman Catholic.

On 14 July 1833 John Keble preached the assize sermon at St Mary's in Oxford (Newman, Apologia ch. 1, p. 35) (Keble, National Apostasy heading). He asked by what signs a nation that had counted itself part of Christ's church might be judged to be turning from God, and whether apostasy was too hard a word for a people that threw off the church's restraint (Keble, National Apostasy introduction and part 1). Churchmen, he said, should answer with intercession and remonstrance and should go on obeying the state (Keble, National Apostasy part 2). R. W. Church, who lived in Oxford through these years, connects the sermon with the government's suppression of ten Irish bishoprics (Church, The Oxford Movement ch. 6). John Henry Newman wrote that he always kept the day as the start of the movement (Newman, Apologia ch. 1, p. 35).

That September Newman began, on his own initiative, a series of Tracts for the Times (Newman, Apologia ch. 2, pp. 40–41) (Church, The Oxford Movement ch. 6). The first asks the clergy on what they will rest their authority if the state casts the church off, and answers that it rests on their "apostolical descent": the bishops who ordained them stand in succession from the apostles (Tracts for the Times Tract 1). Edward Bouverie Pusey, a professor and canon of Christ Church, contributed a tract on fasting dated 21 December 1833, and Newman says that he gave the movement "a position and a name" (Newman, Apologia ch. 2, pp. 60–62).

Tract 90, dated 1841, turned to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Elizabethan Settlement. Newman argued that they were "not uncatholic" and could be signed by those who aimed at being "catholic in heart and doctrine" (Tracts for the Times Tract 90, introduction), and that they should be taken in the most catholic sense they would admit (Tracts for the Times Tract 90, conclusion). Church quotes the resolution of 15 March 1841 in which the heads of the Oxford colleges declared that such interpretations were "evading rather than explaining the sense" of the Articles (Church, The Oxford Movement ch. 14). Newman agreed to stop the Tracts, and he says that for three years one bishop after another spoke against him in their charges (Newman, Apologia ch. 3, pp. 137–140). Pusey's Life prints the sentence of 2 June 1843 by which the vice-chancellor suspended him from preaching in the university for two years after a sermon on the Eucharist (Liddon, Life of Pusey vol. 2, ch. 29).

On 8 October 1845 Newman wrote from Littlemore that he meant to ask a Passionist priest that night for admission into "the One Fold of Christ" (Newman, Apologia ch. 4, pp. 234–235). Pusey stayed: his Life says that the claim of the catholic church, which called Newman to submit to Rome, kept Pusey steadfast in the Anglican communion, and that the work the three friends had begun had "changed the whole aspect of the English Church" (Liddon, Life of Pusey vol. 4, ch. 5).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Apologia pro Vita Sua John Henry Newman · 1864; revised 1865
ch. 1, p. 35; ch. 2, pp. 40–41; ch. 2, pp. 60–62; ch. 3, pp. 137–140; ch. 4, pp. 234–235

National Apostasy John Keble · 14 July 1833 heading; introduction and part 1; part 2

The Oxford Movement: Twelve Years, 1833–1845 R. W. Church · 1891
ch. 6; ch. 14

Tracts for the Times John Henry Newman, John Keble, Edward Pusey and others · 1833–1841
Tract 1; Tract 90, introduction; Tract 90, conclusion

Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey Henry Parry Liddon · c. 1894
vol. 2, ch. 29; vol. 4, ch. 5

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Oxford
Who John Henry Newman, John Keble, Edward Bouverie Pusey
Threads Revival and Unity, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Elizabethan Settlement 1559 1091

LEADS TO

The Lambeth Quadrilateral July 1888 1332

REVIVAL AND UNITY

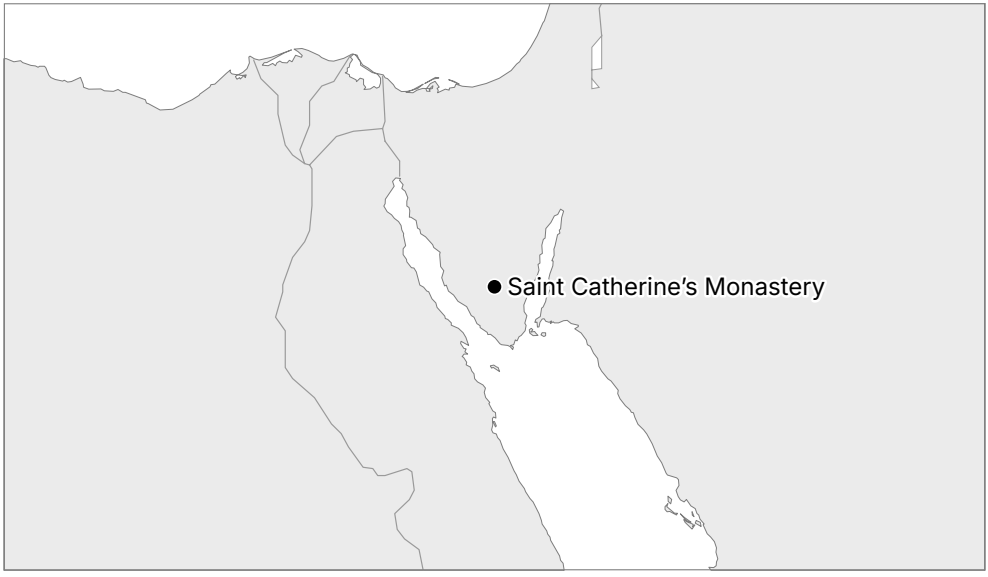
Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints Before · 6 April 1830 1284

The Millerites and the Great Disappointment After · 22 October 1844 1297

REFORM AND REFORMATION

Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade Before · 25 March 1807 1280

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy After · 1910–1925 1354



← Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saints Earlier · 6 April 1830
→ Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus Later · 1844–1859

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus

1844–1859 · Firm date

On three visits to St Catherine's Monastery the German scholar Constantin von Tischendorf finds a Greek Bible of the fourth century and takes it away, first in part and then on loan. He and the monastery tell the story differently.

In May 1844 Constantin von Tischendorf, a German scholar searching for early manuscripts of the Bible, visited Saint Catherine's Monastery in Sinai (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraph on 1844). By his own account, printed in 1866, he saw in the library a basket of old parchments, was told by the librarian that two such heaps had already been burned, and found among them leaves of a Greek Old Testament that seemed to him one of the most ancient he had ever seen (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 28–29). He says the monks let him take about forty-five leaves, since they were destined for the fire, and refused him the rest (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 28–29). The history agreed by the four institutions that now hold the manuscript says that the monks showed him 129 leaves, that he obtained 43, now at Leipzig, and that no record but his own has been identified (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraph on 1844). The monastery calls the story of the burning a slander against which it has always protested (Sinai Monastery, Codex Sinaiticus par. 2–4).

He came back in 1853 and again in 1859, the last time with funds from Tsar Alexander II (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 30–35). On 4 February 1859, he writes, the steward took down in his cell a volume wrapped in red cloth, which held the leaves Tischendorf had seen before, more of the Old Testament, the whole New Testament, the Epistle of Barnabas and part of the Shepherd of Hermas (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 30–35). The manuscript was sent to Cairo for him to copy, and he suggested to the monks that they present it to the tsar (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 36–37). On 28 September he received it "under the form of a loan", to take to St Petersburg (Tischendorf, Narrative of the Discovery pp. 39–41). According to the agreed history he signed a receipt for 347 leaves and promised to return them as soon as the monastery asked, and the Russian ambassador acknowledged in writing that, until a donation was made, the manuscript belonged to the monastery (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraph on 1859).

Tischendorf published the text in 1862 and handed the manuscript to the tsar, and in November 1869 the archbishop of Sinai and the community signed an act of donation (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraphs on 1862–1869). The agreed history says that the evidence conflicts on whether a gift was intended in 1859, and that there is evidence that Russian diplomats tied the donation to their help in a dispute over who was archbishop (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraphs on 1862–1869). The monastery says that he promised to return the manuscript and that it was kept instead (Sinai Monastery, Codex Sinaiticus par. 2–4).

In 1933 the Soviet government sold the manuscript to the British Museum for £100,000; in January 1934 the archbishop of Sinai claimed that the monastery was the "sole rightful owner"; and in 1975 more leaves came to light at the monastery (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) paragraphs on 1933–1934 and 1975). The four institutions state that they "have not come to a full accord" over this history, and record that in 2005 they agreed to conserve and publish all the surviving pages together (History of Codex Sinaiticus (agreed text) opening paragraphs). See Codex Sinaiticus.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

History of Codex Sinaiticus The British Library, Leipzig University Library, the National Library of Russia and St Catherine's Monastery, Sinai paragraph on 1844; paragraph on 1859; paragraphs on 1862–1869; paragraphs on 1933–1934 and 1975; opening paragraphs

Narrative of the Discovery of the Sinaitic Manuscript Constantin von Tischendorf · 1866
pp. 28–29; pp. 30–35; pp. 36–37; pp. 39–41

Codex Sinaiticus The Holy Monastery of Sinai (Saint Catherine's)
par. 2–4

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Saint Catherine's Monastery
Who Constantin von Tischendorf
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619

Erasmus Publishes the Greek New Testament 1516 1003

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The British and Foreign Bible Society Before · 7 March 1804 1276

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy After · 1910–1925 1354

← The Oxford Movement Earlier · 14 July 1833
→ The Millerites and the Great Disappointment Later · 22 October 1844

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Millerites and the Great Disappointment

22 October 1844 · Firm date

William Miller reckons from the book of Daniel that Christ will return about 1843, and by his own estimate some fifty thousand people come to expect it. On 22 October 1844 the last date set passes. Seventh-day Adventists, who give the date another meaning, organize in 1863.

William Miller tells his own story in the Apology and Defence he published in 1845. For about twelve years he had defended the opinions of the Deists (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 3). After serving as a captain in the United States army from 1813 until the peace, he settled at Low Hampton in the state of New York (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 4). In 1816 he came to hold the Bible to be a revelation from God (Miller, Apology and Defence, pp. 4–5), and he gave about two years to reading it through with a concordance (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 6). He concluded that the 2300 days of Daniel's vision (Daniel 8:13–14) stood for years and began in 457 BC, so that they would end "about A. D. 1843" (Miller, Apology and Defence, pp. 10–11), and that in about twenty-five years the affairs of the present world would be wound up (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 12).

By his recollection he gave his first public lecture in August 1833, at Dresden, about sixteen miles from his home (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 18); his biographer says 1831 (see the dating note). In 1836 he wrote out sixteen lectures, which were printed at Troy (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 20) under the title Evidence from Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ, about the Year 1843 (Miller, Evidence from Scripture and History (1836), title page); its third lecture does the sum: "take 457 from 2300 and it will leave A. D. 1843" (Miller, Evidence from Scripture and History (1836), Lecture III, p. 49). Miller estimated in 1845 that about two hundred ministers had embraced his views and that nearly a thousand Advent congregations had been raised up, with some fifty thousand believers (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 22). He had never wished, he wrote, to set up an interest separate from the existing denominations (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 23).

He says that he was never positive about a day. In December 1842 he published his belief that the Lord would come between 21 March 1843 and 21 March 1844; that time passed, and "Our disappointment was great" (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 24). In 1844 came "the seventh month movement", as he says it was called, which looked to 22 October. Miller held back until two or three weeks before the day and then accepted it. "But that time passed; and I was again disappointed" (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 25). The following year he wrote that "we were certainly disappointed", that to contend otherwise was dishonest, and that he had no confidence in the new theories that had grown out of the movement, among them that Christ had then come as the Bridegroom or that the door of mercy was closed (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 28).

Some who had shared the expectation kept the date and gave it another meaning. Ellen White, who had heard Miller lecture at Portland, Maine, when she was thirteen (Ellen G. White, Early Writings, p. 7), relates that in December 1844, while she prayed with four other women, she was shown in a vision the Advent people travelling a narrow path to the holy city, lit from behind by a light that an angel told her was "the midnight cry" (Ellen G. White, Early Writings, pp. 9–10). In a vision she dates to 24 March 1849 she saw, she says, that in 1844 Jesus had passed into the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, where the ark holds the ten commandments, and that God's people were now being tested on the Sabbath (Ellen G. White, Early Writings, pp. 34–35).

In May 1863 delegates from six states met at Battle Creek, Michigan, and organized the General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists (Report of General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, Review and Herald, 26 May 1863, pp. 204–205). That church teaches today that in 1844, at the end of the prophetic period of 2300 days, Christ entered the second and last phase of his atoning ministry, a work of investigative judgment (Seventh-day Adventist Church, Fundamental Beliefs 24), and that the gift of prophecy was manifested in the ministry of Ellen G. White (Seventh-day Adventist Church, Fundamental Beliefs 18). For earlier revivals see the Second Great Awakening.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The day is given by Miller himself, writing within ten months: the movement looked to 22 October 1844 (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 25). The earlier dates of his life are his recollections of 1845. He puts his first lecture "as nearly as I can remember" in August 1833 (Miller, Apology and Defence, p. 18). His first biographer, Sylvester Bliss, Memoirs of William Miller (1853), p. 98, concluded from Miller's letters that he must have begun to lecture in August 1831, and took the printed year for a slip of the printer or of memory.

Primary sources

Scripture

Daniel 8:13–14

Apology and Defence William Miller · 1 August 1845
p. 3; p. 4; pp. 4–5; p. 6; pp. 10–11; p. 12; p. 18; p. 20; p. 22; p. 23; p. 24; p. 25; p. 28

Evidence from Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ, about the Year 1843 William Miller · 1836 title page; Lecture III, p. 49

Early Writings of Mrs. White Ellen G. White · First part published 1851; collected 1882
p. 7; pp. 9–10; pp. 34–35

Report of General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists (1863) General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists · Meeting opened 20 May 1863; printed 26 May 1863
pp. 204–205

28 Fundamental Beliefs General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists · 2020 edition
24; 18

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Low Hampton, Battle Creek
Who William Miller, Ellen White
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

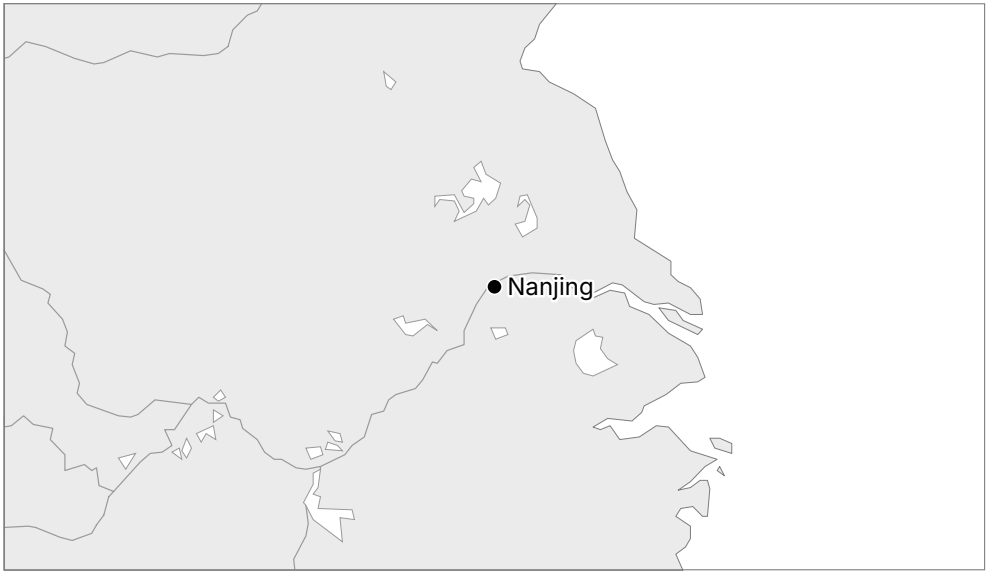
GROWS OUT OF

The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Oxford Movement Before · 14 July 1833 1289

William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army After · July 1865 1321



← Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus Earlier · 1844–1859
→ The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom Later · 1851–1864

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom

1851–1864 · Firm date

Hong Xiuquan, a village teacher who read Christian tracts in the light of his own visions, is proclaimed ruler of a new dynasty in 1851 and holds Nanjing from 1853. The missionary who once taught him later denounces his religion; Qing armies take the city in 1864.

What is known of the early life of Hong Xiuquan comes chiefly from the Basel missionary Theodore Hamberg, who had it in 1852 from Hong's relative Hong Rengan; his booklet is read here as the British naval officer Lindesay Brine quoted and summarised it in 1862 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 63). By that account Hong was born in 1813 in a village some thirty miles from Canton, became the village schoolmaster and failed the examinations at Canton (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 64–67, following Hamberg). In 1837, ill after another failure, he had visions that lasted about forty days. An old man in a black robe told him that the people he had made were worshipping demons, and gave him a sword to exterminate the demons and a seal; a man of middle age, whom he called his Elder Brother, went with him to fight them (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 67–70, quoting Hamberg). Six years later he read a set of Christian tracts by the Chinese convert Liang Afa that he had been given at Canton, and took them as the key to the visions: the old man was God the Heavenly Father and the Elder Brother was Jesus (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 64–67, following Hamberg) (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 72–73, quoting Hamberg). He and a relative baptised themselves and threw out their idols (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 72–73, quoting Hamberg).

In 1847, Brine says, Hong went to Canton to the American missionary Issachar Roberts. Roberts wrote in 1852 of a pupil who, he thought, had been Hong: the man had studied the Scriptures with him for two months or more, had given him a written account of his vision and had asked for baptism, but left for Guangxi "before we were fully satisfied of his fitness" (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 76–79, with Roberts's letter of 1852).

The texts that the movement printed in 1852 and 1853 give ten "celestial commands", beginning with the worship of the great God and the rejection of "corrupt spirits" and keeping the seventh day for praise (Taiping tracts (trans. Medhurst), Decalogue (Brine, pp. 367–368)). Their Trimetrical Classic says that God sent his Son, who in 1837 was received up into heaven, was given a seal and a sword, and was told to drive out the fiends together with "the elder brother", Jesus (Taiping tracts (trans. Medhurst), Trimetrical Classic (Brine, p. 374)). Hong was proclaimed emperor of a new dynasty of Taiping, "Great Peace", in 1851 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 124). On 19 March 1853 his army took Nanjing (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 157), which his proclamations called the heavenly capital (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 166).

Hong Rengan, baptised and for some years a catechist of the London Missionary Society at Hong Kong, reached Nanjing in 1859 and was made Kan-wang, the Shield King (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 239–242). Roberts settled there in October 1860 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 295) and left on 20 January 1862. He wrote that he now believed Hong "a crazy man, entirely unfit to rule without any organised government", and that Hong's religion made him "equal with Jesus Christ, who with God the Father, himself, and his own son, constitutes one Lord over all" (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 296–298, Roberts's letter of January 1862).

The Taiping general Li Xiucheng, writing as a prisoner, says that Hong poisoned himself as the Qing armies closed in and that his young son succeeded him (Li Xiucheng, Deposition p. 70). The Qing commander Zeng Guofan reported that on 19 July 1864 a mine brought down part of the wall and his troops entered the city (Li Xiucheng, Deposition appendix, memorial no. 1 (pp. 74–75)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Brine, writing in 1862, puts the first armed stand of Hong's followers at the close of 1850 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 112) and his proclamation as emperor of the new dynasty at Yung-gnan in 1851 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 124); the capture of Nanjing he dates 19 March 1853 (Brine, Taeping Rebellion p. 157). Zeng Guofan's memorial, dated 26 July 1864 (Li Xiucheng, Deposition appendix, close of memorial no. 1), reports that his troops entered the city on the sixteenth day of the sixth moon, which the translator gives as 19 July (Li Xiucheng, Deposition appendix, memorial no. 1 (pp. 74–75)).

The sources differ on the year of Hong's visions. The Taiping Trimetrical Classic and Hamberg, as Brine reports him, give 1837 (Taiping tracts (trans. Medhurst), Trimetrical Classic (Brine, p. 374)) (Brine, Taeping Rebellion pp. 67–70, quoting Hamberg); Li Xiucheng's deposition, as translated, puts his sickness in 1847 and makes the trance last seven days (Li Xiucheng, Deposition chapter 1, opening).

The sources cited here give no count of the dead. S. Wells Williams, The Middle Kingdom, revised edition (1883), vol. 2, p. 624, reports an estimate by foreigners living at Shanghai that fully twenty million people perished in connection with the rebellion between 1851 and 1865. It is an estimate of contemporaries and is given here as theirs.

Primary sources

The Taeping Rebellion in China Lindesay Brine · 1862

p. 63; pp. 64–67, following Hamberg; pp. 67–70, quoting Hamberg; pp. 72–73, quoting Hamberg; pp. 76–79, with Roberts's letter of 1852; p. 124; p. 157; p. 166; pp. 239–242; p. 295; pp. 296–298, Roberts's letter of January 1862; p. 112

Taiping Precepts and Odes Published under Hong Xiuquan · 1852–1853
Decalogue (Brine, pp. 367–368); Trimetrical Classic (Brine, p. 374)

The Autobiography of the Chung-Wang Li Xiucheng · 1864; English translation 1865
p. 70; appendix, memorial no. 1 (pp. 74–75); appendix, close of memorial no. 1; chapter 1, opening

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nanjing
Who Hong Xiuquan, Hong Rengan, Issachar Roberts
Threads Mission and Expansion, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Chinese Rites Controversy 1704–1742 1212

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The British and Foreign Bible Society Before · 7 March 1804 1276

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop After · 29 June 1864 1310

CHURCH AND STATE

Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade Before · 25 March 1807 1280

The First Vatican Council After · 1869–1870 1324

← The Millerites and the Great Disappointment Earlier · 22 October 1844
→ The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception Later · 8 December 1854

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception

8 December 1854 · Firm date

On 8 December 1854 Pius IX defines that Mary was preserved from all stain of original sin from the first instant of her conception, a point long disputed among Latin theologians. Orthodox and Old Catholic statements reject the definition, and Anglicans record difficulty with it.

Whether Mary was conceived free of original sin was long disputed among Latin theologians. Thomas Aquinas taught that she was sanctified in the womb, but only after her soul had been infused: had her soul never incurred the stain of original sin, "this would be derogatory to the dignity of Christ, by reason of His being the universal Saviour of all" (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae III.27.2, answer and reply to objection 2). John Duns Scotus argued from the same ground, the excellence of Christ as redeemer, to the opposite conclusion: the most perfect mediator would mediate most perfectly for his mother, and that means meriting to preserve her from original sin (Duns Scotus, Ordinatio III d.3 q.1, nn. 17–18). God, he said, could have kept her from it altogether, or cleansed her after an instant or after a time; which he did God knows, but unless the authority of the church or of Scripture stood against it, it seemed probable to attribute to Mary what is more excellent (Duns Scotus, Ordinatio III d.3 q.1, nn. 28 and 34 (pp. 84–85 of the file)).

In 1483 Sixtus IV, noting that the Roman church kept the feast of Mary's conception, condemned as false the assertion of some preachers that those who hold her to have been conceived without original sin commit mortal sin, or that those who keep the office of the feast are heretics (Sixtus IV, Grave nimis Denzinger 735). He also reproved those who charged the contrary opinion with heresy, because the Roman church and the apostolic see had not yet decided (Sixtus IV, Grave nimis Denzinger 735). The Council of Trent, in its decree on original sin of 1546, declared that it did not intend to include "the blessed and immaculate Virgin Mary" and renewed the constitutions of Sixtus (Council of Trent Session 5, decree on original sin, closing paragraph).

In February 1849 Pius IX, writing from Gaeta, asked the bishops how their clergy and people regarded the doctrine and what they themselves thought about defining it (Pius IX, Ubi primum 6 and dating clause). He says that they answered "with one voice" in favour (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus 'The Mind of the Bishops'). In the letter Ineffabilis Deus, given at St Peter's in Rome on 8 December 1854, he declared, pronounced and defined that the doctrine which holds that Mary, in the first instant of her conception, by a singular grace and privilege of almighty God and in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the saviour of the human race, was preserved free from all stain of original sin, is revealed by God and therefore to be believed firmly and constantly by all the faithful (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus 'The Definition' and dating clause).

The bishop of Tarbes wrote in 1862 that Bernadette Soubirous, a child of fourteen born at Lourdes, had by her own account, taken from her mouth before his commission, seen and heard a being that called itself the Immaculate Conception ("se disant l'Immaculée-Conception") (Bishop Laurence of Tarbes, Mandement of 18 January 1862, p. 399). He judged that Mary had really appeared to her eighteen times in a grotto near the town, beginning on 11 February 1858 (Bishop Laurence of Tarbes, Mandement of 18 January 1862, art. 1, p. 408). The sanctuary at Lourdes gives the words as Bernadette recounted them, Que soy era

Immaculada Concepciou, and dates them to 25 March 1858 (Sanctuary of Our Lady of Lourdes, The apparitions, 25 March 1858).

Statements of other churches rejected or questioned the definition. The patriarch of Constantinople and his synod wrote in 1895 that the "Papal Church" had made "an innovation" by laying down a dogma that the ancient church did not know (Patriarchal Encyclical of 1895 sect. 13). The Old Catholic bishops at Utrecht rejected it in 1889 as without foundation in Scripture and in the tradition of the first centuries (Declaration of Utrecht (1889) art. 3). A paper written for the Church of England's General Synod in 2011 says that many Anglicans and other Christians found the definitions of 1854 and 1950 without a proper basis in the New Testament and the early church, and denied the pope's authority to define the faith of the whole church (Church of England, GS 1818 (2011), section 2, The Marian Dogmas). The Anglican–Roman Catholic commission recorded in 1981 that the two dogmas, promulgated by the bishop of Rome apart from a synod, raise a special problem for Anglicans who do not consider their precise definitions sufficiently supported by Scripture (ARCIC, Authority in the Church II (1981), 30); see the council of 1869–1870 and the definition of 1950.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Summa Theologiae Thomas Aquinas · c. 1265–1273
III.27.2, answer and reply to objection 2

Ordinatio John Duns Scotus · Early fourteenth century
III d.3 q.1, nn. 17–18; III d.3 q.1, nn. 28 and 34 (pp. 84–85 of the file)

Grave nimis Pope Sixtus IV · 4 September 1483
Denzinger 735

The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent The Council of Trent · 1545–1563
Session 5, decree on original sin, closing paragraph

Ubi primum Pope Pius IX · 2 February 1849
6 and dating clause

Ineffabilis Deus Pope Pius IX · 8 December 1854
'The Mind of the Bishops'; 'The Definition' and dating clause

Mandement Giving Judgment on the Apparition at the Grotto of Lourdes Bertrand-Sévère Laurence, bishop of Tarbes · 18 January 1862
p. 399; art. 1, p. 408

The Apparitions and Bernadette Soubirous (Sanctuary of Our Lady of Lourdes) Sanctuary of Our Lady of Lourdes · Undated web pages, read in October 2026
The apparitions, 25 March 1858

Patriarchal and Synodical Encyclical of 1895 Patriarch Anthimus VII of Constantinople and his synod · August 1895
sect. 13

Declaration of Utrecht The Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany and Switzerland · 24 September 1889
art. 3

Briefing paper on the ARCIC report Mary: Grace and Hope in Christ (GS 1818) Faith and Order Advisory Group of the Church of England · February 2011 section 2, The Marian Dogmas

Authority in the Church II Anglican–Roman Catholic International Commission · 1981 30

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome, Lourdes
Who Pius IX, Bernadette Soubirous
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Ephesus June AD 431 668
The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075

LEADS TO

The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324

The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary 1 November 1950 1414

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Suppression of the Jesuits Before · 21 July 1773 1237

The First Vatican Council After · 1869–1870 1324

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Synod of Jerusalem and the Confession of Dositheus Before · 16 March 1672 1196

The First Vatican Council After · 1869–1870 1324

← The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom Earlier · 1851–1864
→ Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop Later · 29 June 1864

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop

29 June 1864 · Firm date

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, enslaved as a boy and freed at Sierra Leone, is consecrated at Canterbury as bishop for the Niger, to lead a mission planned as purely African. By the mission society's own account, English missionaries sent in 1890 override him; he dies the next year.

Samuel Ajayi Crowther told his own story in a letter of 1837: early in 1821 raiders took his town, and he was parted from his mother and sisters and sold from owner to owner until Portuguese traders bought him at a town on the coast that he calls E'-ko (Crowther, Letter of 1837 pp. 371–382). Two British warships seized the slave ship on the river Lagos on 7 April 1822 and landed him at Sierra Leone, where the Church Missionary Society taught him and where he was baptized in 1825 (Crowther, Letter of 1837 pp. 382–384). The Society's history records that the bishop of London ordained him in 1843 and that in 1846 he went as a missionary to Abeokuta, in the Yoruba country (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 1, pp. 457–458).

Henry Venn, the Society's secretary, had laid down in 1851 that the aim of a mission was a native church under native pastors, supporting itself, after which the missionary should move on (Memoir of Henry Venn Appendix C, first paper (1851), par. 10, pp. 413–414). When it seemed that Europeans could not live on the Niger, the Society's historian writes, Venn proposed a purely African mission under an African bishop, and persevered though the English missionaries in West Africa doubted the plan (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 2, p. 454).

The queen's licence, as the same history reports it, empowered the archbishop of Canterbury to consecrate Crowther as a bishop of the Church of England in the West African territories beyond the British dominions (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 2, p. 454). It records that Oxford gave him a doctorate, for which his Yoruba grammar, his dictionary and his Yoruba versions of many books of the Bible were submitted, and it quotes Venn's own account of 29 June 1864, when Archbishop Longley consecrated him in Canterbury Cathedral together with bishops for Peterborough and Tasmania (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 2, pp. 455–456). Two years later Crowther gathered his clergy for the first time and reviewed the mission begun in 1857: stations at Onitsha, Gbebe, Lokoja, Idda, Akassa and Bonny, worked by clergy, catechists and Scripture readers (Crowther, Charge of 1866 pp. 5–11).

What follows is the Society's own account, printed in 1899. In 1890, that history relates, the Society sent a party of English missionaries to the Niger, and at a committee meeting at Onitsha that August they and the African members, the bishop among them, could not agree on the policy or the staff of the mission (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 3, pp. 391–393). The stricter party carried the dismissal of certain agents of the mission, and the English secretary suspended others in the Society's name; a committee in London afterwards confirmed some of these acts and reversed others (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 3, pp. 391–393). Its historian, who calls Crowther "the first Negro Bishop", judged eight years later that two leaders of the new party had been "too severe" on their African fellow-workers and impatient with the bishop, though he credited them with the mission's later improvement, and that Crowther's death at Lagos on 31 December 1891 was "certainly hastened by anxiety and disappointment" (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 3, pp. 395–396). The Society then chose an Englishman to succeed him, and the churches at Bonny in the Niger Delta declared their independence of the Society, without leaving the Church of England (Stock, History of the CMS vol. 3, p. 397).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Letter to William Jowett Narrating His Capture Samuel Ajayi Crowther · 22 February 1837
pp. 371–382; pp. 382–384

The History of the Church Missionary Society: Its Environment, Its Men and Its Work Eugene Stock · 1899
vol. 1, pp. 457–458; vol. 2, p. 454; vol. 2, pp. 455–456; vol. 3, pp. 391–393; vol. 3, pp. 395–396; vol. 3, p. 397

Memoir of Henry Venn William Knight · 1882
Appendix C, first paper (1851), par. 10, pp. 413–414

A Charge Delivered on the Banks of the River Niger in West Africa Samuel Ajayi Crowther · 1866
pp. 5–11

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Canterbury, Abeokuta
Who Samuel Ajayi Crowther, Henry Venn
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Christians and the Abolition of the Slave Trade 25 March 1807 1280

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom Before · 1851–1864 1301

Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission After · 25 June 1865 1314

← The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception Earlier · 8 December 1854
→ Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission Later · 25 June 1865

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission

25 June 1865 · Firm date

Hudson Taylor, a missionary invalided home from China, resolves on Brighton beach to lead a new mission to the inland provinces. The China Inland Mission accepts workers without restriction as to denomination, guarantees no income and makes no personal appeals for money.

James Hudson Taylor first sailed for China in September 1853, sent by the Chinese Evangelisation Society, and landed at Shanghai on 1 March 1854 (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 8–9). He resigned from the society because it was often in debt, which he believed Scripture forbade, and went on working at Ningpo, depending, as he puts it, on God alone for supplies (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 15).

Ill health forced him back to England, where, he writes, a map of China hung on his study wall, and he came to the conviction that a special agency was needed to evangelise the inland provinces, though for a long time he shrank from leading it (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 18). On Sunday 25 June 1865, staying with a friend at Brighton, he left a congregation of a thousand or more and walked out alone on the sands (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 18). He says that there he gave himself up for the work and asked for twenty-four fellow workers, two for each of eleven inland provinces that had no missionary and two for Mongolia, and that he wrote the request in the margin of his Bible (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 18).

That year he wrote China's Spiritual Need and Claims, and a later edition recalls that in the first he had asked for twenty-four European and twenty-four native evangelists (Taylor, China's Spiritual Need and Claims prefatory note and p. 49). He writes that the China Inland Mission was organised in 1865, with a friend, W. T. Berger, directing it at home, and that he had resolved never to use personal solicitation or collections for its funds (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 19). On 26 May 1866 a party of sixteen missionaries, with his four children, sailed in the Lammermuir (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 19).

The mission's history, quoting the letters of the party, records that they anchored off Shanghai on 30 September 1866 (Guinness, Story of the China Inland Mission vol. 1, p. 282) and that on the journey inland all of them put on Chinese dress (Guinness, Story of the China Inland Mission vol. 1, pp. 292–293). At the end of November, it says, they reached Hangzhou, where another missionary lent them a house (Guinness, Story of the China Inland Mission vol. 1, pp. 294–295).

Writing in 1894, Taylor set out how the mission worked: candidates were accepted without restriction as to denomination and were promised no income, the mission would not go into debt, and its expenses were met by gifts sent without personal solicitation (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 20). By May 1893, he says, it had 552 missionaries and had opened stations in ten of the eleven provinces that had been without Protestant missionaries (Taylor, A Retrospect ch. 20).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

A Retrospect James Hudson Taylor · 1894
ch. 8–9; ch. 15; ch. 18; ch. 19; ch. 20

China's Spiritual Need and Claims James Hudson Taylor · 1865; seventh edition 1887
prefatory note and p. 49

The Story of the China Inland Mission M. Geraldine Guinness · 1893–1894
vol. 1, p. 282; vol. 1, pp. 292–293; vol. 1, pp. 294–295

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Brighton, Hangzhou
Who James Hudson Taylor
Threads Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261

The Chinese Rites Controversy 1704–1742 1212

LEADS TO

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh 14–23 June 1910 1350

The Chinese Church under the People's Republic 1950–1954 1409

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop Before · 29 June 1864 1310

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward After · 17 March 1865 1317

← Samuel Ajayi Crowther, the First African Anglican Bishop Earlier · 29 June 1864
→ The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward Later · 17 March 1865

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward

17 March 1865 · Firm date

On 17 March 1865 villagers from Urakami tell the French missionary Bernard Petitjean, in his new church at Nagasaki, that their hearts are the same as his. They had kept baptism in secret under the ban. Deported from 1868, the survivors come home in 1873.

The edicts that proscribed Christianity in Japan (see the ban of 1614) were still posted in the 1860s; the French missionary Bernard Petitjean later called them three centuries old (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, pp. 265–266, circular of 6 May 1873). At Nagasaki he and his colleagues built a church dedicated to the twenty-six martyrs. It was blessed on 19 February 1865, with the commanders of the European warships in the harbour attending, while the Japanese crowd, Francisque Marnas writes, held back (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 1, pp. 482–483).

Marnas tells what happened next from two letters of Petitjean. About half past twelve on Friday 17 March 1865, twelve or fifteen men, women and children stood at the church door. Petitjean let them in and knelt before the altar. Three women of fifty or sixty knelt beside him, and one said in a low voice, her hand on her breast, that the heart of all of them was the same as his. They were from Urakami, she said, where nearly everyone had the same heart, and she asked where the image of Santa Maria was. They told him that they kept the birth of Jesus on the twenty-fifth day of the eleventh month and were now in the season of sorrow, which he understood to be Lent (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 1, pp. 487–489).

For the following days Marnas quotes the journal that Petitjean sent to Paris in his letters. It records crowds of visitors and Japanese officers watching the church; he and his colleague kept apart and told the Christians to come in smaller numbers, for fear of exposing them (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 1, pp. 492–494). On 23 March a man named Paolo told them that Urakami had never been without Christians and that baptism had always been given there: when a child was born, a neighbour who knew how poured water on its head with the sign of the cross, gave it a name and said prayers (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 1, pp. 495–496).

The government answered with deportation. A decree of the emperor's council, sent to Washington in translation in July 1868, says that the Christian religion is strictly prohibited by the law of the empire and that the people of Urakami are to be placed in the charge of the daimyos, urged to renounce "their evil ways" and put to labour (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1868, part 1, document 349, enclosure 4). In January 1870 the Japanese foreign ministers told the American envoy that the Christians still at Urakami would be distributed in the same way, and the consuls at Nagasaki protested (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1870, document 282, enclosures 2 and 3). The Nagasaki authorities reported 2,810 people sent to eighteen places, with 185 more to follow by sea; the eighteen figures as printed add up to 2,631 (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1870, document 284).

Petitjean, by then bishop and vicar apostolic, wrote in May 1873 that the government had ordered the edicts taken down toward the end of February and the prisoners freed toward the end of March. It was not yet religious liberty, he added, nor even official toleration (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, pp. 265–266, circular of 6 May 1873). The government's notification, as Marnas prints it, orders the boards of the standing edicts withdrawn because the people know them fully (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, p. 265, note 1 (the notification as Marnas prints it)). By the count Petitjean drew up at Nagasaki, which Marnas calls incomplete, 3,404 people had been deported from Urakami, 660 had died and 1,981 had come home (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, p. 270).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Marnas, working from Petitjean's letters of 18 and 22 March 1865, puts the meeting on Friday 17 March 1865, about half past twelve (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 1, pp. 487–489). The dates of 1868 and 1870 are those of the documents printed with the American dispatches (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1868, part 1, document 349, enclosure 4) (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1870, document 282, enclosures 2 and 3). For 1873 Petitjean says that the order to remove the edicts was given toward the end of February (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, pp. 265–266, circular of 6 May 1873), that they had been taken down almost everywhere since the first days of March and that the decree freeing the prisoners appeared on 14 March (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, pp. 258–259 and 265). Marnas prints the notification of the Supreme Council itself, dated in his text the second day of the second month, which he gives as 22 March 1873 (Petitjean, in Marnas, vol. 2, p. 265, note 1 (the notification as Marnas prints it)); that does not agree with Petitjean's letters, and no exact day is given here.

Primary sources

Letters and Journal of Bernard Petitjean Bernard Petitjean · 1865–1873; printed 1896

vol. 2, pp. 265–266, circular of 6 May 1873; vol. 1, pp. 482–483; vol. 1, pp. 487–489; vol. 1, pp. 492–494; vol. 1, pp. 495–496; vol. 2, p. 265, note 1 (the notification as Marnas prints it); vol. 2, p. 270; vol. 2, pp. 258–259 and 265

Papers Relating to Foreign Affairs of the United States, 1868 and 1870: Japan United States Department of State · 1868–1870

1868, part 1, document 349, enclosure 4; 1870, document 282, enclosures 2 and 3; 1870, document 284

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nagasaki
Who Bernard Petitjean
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Martyrs of Nagasaki and the Ban on Christianity in Japan 1597–1614 1129

Francis Xavier in India and Japan 1542–1552 1071

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The French Revolution and the Church Before · 1790–1801 1257

The Martyrs of Uganda After · 1885–1886 1328

MISSION AND EXPANSION

Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission Before · 25 June 1865 1314

The Martyrs of Uganda After · 1885–1886 1328

← Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission Earlier · 25 June 1865
→ William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army Later · July 1865

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army

July 1865 · Firm date

William Booth, a former Methodist minister, begins preaching in a tent in the East End of London in 1865. The mission he and his wife Catherine build takes the name Salvation Army in 1878 and adds to its preaching a scheme of work, food and shelter for the destitute.

William Booth was a minister of the Methodist New Connexion (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 5). When its Conference refused to release him for work as a travelling evangelist he left it, and, in words quoted by his biographer George Railton, went out with his wife and four children not knowing who would give him a shilling (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 5). His wife, Catherine Booth, had begun to speak in his services (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 5). In a pamphlet, Female Ministry, she argued that the public ministry of women is not merely unforbidden but "absolutely enjoined by both precept and example in the word of God" (Catherine Booth, Female Ministry pp. 4–5). She appealed to the prophecy of Joel that sons and daughters would prophesy, which Peter applies to Pentecost, and to Galatians 3:28, which she quotes as "there is neither male nor female" (Catherine Booth, Female Ministry pp. 9–10, 19) (Acts 2:16–18; Galatians 3:28).

In July 1865 Booth began work in the East End of London (Railton, Life of William Booth table of dates). He had been asked to take services in a tent on an old burial ground in Whitechapel when the expected preacher fell ill (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 7). Railton quotes his recollection of walking home that night and telling his wife that he had found his destiny, and hers of answering that they had trusted the Lord once for their support and could trust him again (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 7). The work was called first the East London Christian Revival Society, then the East London Christian Mission, and then simply the Christian Mission (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 8).

A deed enrolled in the Court of Chancery on 7 August 1878 fixed its constitution (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 9). At the end of that year, in which its stations grew from thirty to eighty, the mission was described as a "Salvation Army" (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 9), and Booth took the title of General (Railton, Life of William Booth table of dates). Women held command in it: Booth appointed a Swedish woman, Major Ouchterlony, to open the Army's work in her own country (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 13).

Catherine Booth died on 4 October 1890 (Railton, Life of William Booth ch. 19). That year William published In Darkest England and the Way Out, dedicated to her memory, and wrote in its preface that the usual remedies of Christian philanthropy were "lamentably inadequate" (Booth, In Darkest England dedication and preface). He reckoned the destitute at three million, a "submerged tenth" of the population, and asked for them what every London cab horse had: shelter, food and work (Booth, In Darkest England part 1, ch. 2). He proposed three kinds of self-supporting community, a City Colony, a Farm Colony and a Colony Over-Sea, governed on the principles of the Salvation Army (Booth, In Darkest England part 2, ch. 1).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Scripture

Acts 2:16–18; Galatians 3:28

The Authoritative Life of General William Booth, Founder of the Salvation Army George Scott Railton · 1912
ch. 5; table of dates; ch. 7; ch. 8; ch. 9; ch. 13; ch. 19

Female Ministry; or, Woman's Right to Preach the Gospel Catherine Booth · 1859, revised later
pp. 4–5; pp. 9–10, 19

In Darkest England and the Way Out William Booth · 1890
dedication and preface; part 1, ch. 2; part 2, ch. 1

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London
Who William Booth, Catherine Booth
Threads Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Millerites and the Great Disappointment Before · 22 October 1844 1297

The Lambeth Quadrilateral After · July 1888 1332

← The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward Earlier · 17 March 1865
→ The First Vatican Council Later · 1869–1870

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The First Vatican Council

1869–1870 · Firm date

A council of Catholic bishops at Rome defines that the pope has full jurisdiction over the whole church and is infallible when he defines a doctrine of faith or morals ex cathedra. A minority of bishops stays away from the final vote, and other churches reject the definition.

In 1854 Pius IX had defined the Immaculate Conception of Mary (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus definition), and in 1864 he had condemned eighty propositions, the last being that the Roman pontiff should reconcile himself with progress, liberalism and modern civilization (Pius IX, Syllabus of Errors prop. 80). On 8 December 1869 he opened a council in St Peter's at Rome (Manning, True Story of the Vatican Council p. 87). On 24 April 1870 it approved the constitution Dei Filius, which teaches that God can be certainly known by the natural light of reason from created things, and that there can never be any real discrepancy between faith and reason (First Vatican Council, Dei Filius ch. 2 and 4).

Pastor aeternus followed on 18 July. Its third chapter condemns anyone who denies that the pope has "full and supreme power of jurisdiction over the universal Church", in discipline and government as well as in faith and morals, a power "ordinary and immediate" over all churches, pastors and faithful (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus ch. 3). The fourth chapter says that the Holy Spirit was promised to Peter's successors not to make known new doctrine but to guard and expound the faith delivered through the apostles (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus ch. 4). It then defines, in Archbishop Manning's translation of 1871, > that the Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme Apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals to be held by the universal Church, by the divine assistance promised to him in blessed Peter, is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed for defining doctrine regarding faith or morals; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church (First Vatican Council, Pastor Aeternus ch. 4).

Manning, who sat in the council and supported the definition, gives the votes: in the last preliminary vote 451 for the text, 88 against and 62 for it conditionally. On 17 July fifty-five bishops declared that they would not attend the public session. The next day 533 voted for the decree and two against, and those two submitted at once (Manning, True Story of the Vatican Council pp. 144–146). On 20 September Rome fell (Holy See, biographical profile of Pius IX).

Others refused the definition. The Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany and Switzerland declared in 1889 that the decrees contradicted the faith of the ancient church, while acknowledging the historic primacy of the bishop of Rome as first among equals (Declaration of Utrecht (1889) art. 2). The patriarch of Constantinople and his synod wrote in 1895 that the Orthodox Church knows no one infallible on earth except the Son of God (Patriarchal Encyclical of 1895 sect. 18). The Anglican bishops at Lambeth in 1878 called the act of 1870 "an invasion of the attributes of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Lambeth Conference 1878, Letter p. 35). The Second Vatican Council repeated the teaching in 1964 and set beside it the teaching office of the bishops in communion with the pope (Second Vatican Council, Lumen Gentium 18, 25).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Ineffabilis Deus Pope Pius IX · 8 December 1854
definition

Syllabus of Errors Pope Pius IX · 8 December 1864
prop. 80

The True Story of the Vatican Council Henry Edward Manning · 1877
p. 87; pp. 144–146

Dei Filius The First Vatican Council · 24 April 1870
ch. 2 and 4

Pastor Aeternus The First Vatican Council · 18 July 1870
ch. 3; ch. 4

Biographical Profiles of the Popes The Holy See · Published online 1997–2019
Pius IX

Declaration of Utrecht The Old Catholic bishops of the Netherlands, Germany and Switzerland · 24 September 1889
art. 2

Patriarchal and Synodical Encyclical of 1895 Patriarch Anthimus VII of Constantinople and his synod · August 1895
sect. 18

Letter from the Bishops, including the Reports Adopted by the Conference The Lambeth Conference of 1878 · July 1878
p. 35

Lumen Gentium The Second Vatican Council · 21 November 1964
18, 25

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Pius IX
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Council of Trent 1545–1563 1075
Boniface VIII Issues Unam Sanctam 18 November 1302 925
The French Revolution and the Church 1790–1801 1257
The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception 8 December 1854 1305

LEADS TO

Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching 15 May 1891 1336
The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City 11 February 1929 1371
The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary 1 November 1950 1414
The Second Vatican Council 1962–1965 1422

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception Before · 8 December 1854 1305
Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching After · 15 May 1891 1336

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception Before · 8 December 1854 1305
The Lambeth Quadrilateral After · July 1888 1332

CHURCH AND STATE

The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom Before · 1851–1864 1301
Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching After · 15 May 1891 1336

← William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army Earlier · July 1865
→ The Martyrs of Uganda Later · 1885–1886

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Martyrs of Uganda

1885–1886 · Firm date

In 1885 and 1886 King Mwanga of Buganda has Christian converts killed, Anglicans and Catholics alike, many of them burned together in 1886, and an Anglican bishop put to death. Both churches honour them as martyrs.

Anglican missionaries from Britain came to the kingdom of Buganda first, and the Catholic White Fathers followed two years later (Paul VI, Homily of 18 October 1964 par. 4). King Mutesa, who had received them, died in October 1884, and his son Mwanga II succeeded him (Mackay of Uganda p. 467).

The first deaths came within months: the Anglican missionary Alexander Mackay wrote that on 30 January 1885 three Christian youths were mutilated and burned alive for no crime but that they were learning from the missionaries (Mackay of Uganda p. 257). His colleague Robert Ashe names them, Seruwanga, Kakumba and the boy Lugalama, and dates Lugalama's death to 31 January (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 143–147). In October the Anglican bishop James Hannington was seized in Busoga on his way to Buganda (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 181–195). His diary, as Ashe prints it, ends on 29 October, and Ashe tells that the king's messengers then had him speared to death with his porters (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 181–195). Mackay, who does not name him, reports that the head of the king's personal servants told Mwanga that it was wrong to kill the bishop and was burned that day (Mackay of Uganda p. 268). The Catholic bishops of Uganda record that Joseph Mukasa Balikuddembe, the king's major-domo, was killed and burned on 15 November 1885 (Uganda Episcopal Conference, The Uganda Martyrs St Joseph Mukasa Balikuddembe).

In a letter of June 1886 Mackay reported that a violent persecution had broken out a month before: a Christian page had refused "to be made the victim of an unmentionable abomination", and the king had declared that the Christians learned disobedience from the white men and that he would kill them all (Mackay of Uganda pp. 276–277). About a dozen, he wrote, were hacked to pieces on the first day, and over thirty were killed by the bands sent out to seize them (Mackay of Uganda pp. 276–277). Ashe writes that the king killed several of the French priests' leading pupils, that the Anglican missionaries heard daily of the murder of one of their own converts, and that the blacksmith Walukaga and some thirty others were bound and burned on one great pyre (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 220–226). The Catholic bishops of Uganda record that Charles Lwanga, head of the pages, was burned at Namugongo on 3 June 1886 (Uganda Episcopal Conference, The Uganda Martyrs St Charles Lwanga).

Paul VI canonized Lwanga, Matthias Mulumba Kalemba and twenty companions on 18 October 1964 (Paul VI, Homily of 18 October 1964 title and par. 7, 9). In his homily he said that Anglicans too had met death for the name of Christ, and that a long list could be drawn up of them (Paul VI, Homily of 18 October 1964 title and par. 7, 9). The Church of England keeps 3 June as the day of the Martyrs of Uganda, whom it dates to 1885–7 (Church of England, Calendar 3 June). Preaching at Namugongo in 2015, Pope Francis said that the deaths of the Anglican martyrs "testify to the ecumenism of blood" (Francis, Homily at Namugongo par. 2).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The deaths told here are dated by letters written in Buganda at the time, by the memoir of a missionary who was there, and by the record of the Catholic bishops of Uganda: 30 and 31 January 1885 (Mackay of Uganda p. 257) (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 143–147), October and November 1885 (Ashe, Two Kings of Uganda pp. 181–195) (Uganda Episcopal Conference, The Uganda Martyrs St Joseph Mukasa Balikuddembe), and May and June 1886 (Mackay of Uganda pp. 276–277) (Uganda Episcopal Conference, The Uganda Martyrs St Charles Lwanga). The Church of England's calendar gives the years of its Martyrs of Uganda as 1885–7 (Church of England, Calendar 3 June). None of the documents cited here records a death in 1887; Mackay wrote that in that year Christianity was still proscribed in the country (Mackay of Uganda p. 468). The entry gives no total for the dead of either church, only the figures of the missionaries who were there.

Primary sources

Homily at the Canonization of the Martyrs of Uganda Pope Paul VI · 18 October 1964

par. 4; title and par. 7, 9

A. M. Mackay, Pioneer Missionary of the Church Missionary Society to Uganda Alexander Mackay, edited by his sister · 1890

p. 467; p. 257; p. 268; pp. 276–277; p. 468

Two Kings of Uganda; or, Life by the Shores of Victoria Nyanza Robert P. Ashe · 1889

pp. 143–147; pp. 181–195; pp. 220–226

The Uganda Martyrs Uganda Episcopal Conference

St Joseph Mukasa Balikuddembe; St Charles Lwanga

Common Worship: The Calendar The Church of England

3 June

Homily at the Mass for the Martyrs of Uganda Pope Francis · 28 November 2015

par. 2

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Namugongo
Who Charles Lwanga, Mwanga II, James Hannington
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Mission and Expansion

In context

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward Before · 17 March 1865 1317

The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians After · 1915–1916 1358

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Hidden Christians of Japan Come Forward Before · 17 March 1865 1317

The Azusa Street Revival After · 9 April 1906 1342

← The First Vatican Council Earlier · 1869–1870
→ The Lambeth Quadrilateral Later · July 1888

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

The Lambeth Quadrilateral

July 1888 · Firm date

The Anglican bishops meeting at Lambeth in 1888 name four things as a basis for reunion with other churches (the Scriptures, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the two sacraments and the historic episcopate), taking them from a declaration of the American bishops in 1886.

In 1870 William Reed Huntington, rector of All Saints, Worcester, published The Church-Idea: An Essay towards Unity (Huntington, The Church-Idea title page). He did not wish to impose the whole Anglican system on America, but he held that the Anglican principle was the country's best hope (Huntington, The Church-Idea pp. 155–156). That principle, he wrote, lies "foursquare": the Holy Scriptures as the Word of God, the primitive creeds as the rule of faith, the two sacraments ordained by Christ himself, and the episcopate as the keystone of governmental unity (Huntington, The Church-Idea pp. 156–157). He called the four "the Quadrilateral" of pure Anglicanism (Huntington, The Church-Idea pp. 156–157).

In 1886 the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church, meeting at Chicago, issued a declaration to Christians of other communions (House of Bishops, Chicago Declaration (1886) Prayer Book, pp. 876–877). The bishops said that all who have been duly baptized with water in the name of the Trinity are members of the Holy Catholic Church, that their church was ready to forgo its own preferences in things of human ordering, and that it did not seek to absorb other communions (House of Bishops, Chicago Declaration (1886) Prayer Book, pp. 876–877). They then named four things as "essential to the restoration of unity": the Holy Scriptures "as the revealed Word of God", the Nicene Creed "as the sufficient statement of the Christian Faith", the two sacraments of Baptism and the Supper of the Lord, and "the Historic Episcopate, locally adapted in the methods of its administration" to the needs of different peoples (House of Bishops, Chicago Declaration (1886) Prayer Book, pp. 876–877). The church's House of Deputies did not enact the declaration; a note printed with it says that it was referred, as part of a general plan, to a new joint commission on reunion (House of Bishops, Chicago Declaration (1886) Prayer Book, pp. 876–877).

In July 1888 one hundred and forty-five Anglican bishops met at Lambeth Palace in London under the archbishop of Canterbury (Lambeth Conference 1888 encyclical letter, p. 264). Their committee on home reunion took the American articles as its basis and submitted them with some changes (Lambeth Conference 1888 report of the committee on home reunion, pp. 333–336). Resolution 11 of the conference declares that four articles "supply a basis on which approach may be by God's blessing made towards home reunion" (Lambeth Conference 1888 Resolution 11). The first now describes the Scriptures as "containing all things necessary to salvation" and as "the rule and ultimate standard of faith"; the second adds the Apostles' Creed, "as the baptismal symbol", to the Nicene; the third speaks of the two sacraments "ordained by Christ himself"; and the fourth, on the historic episcopate, keeps the American wording (Lambeth Conference 1888 Resolution 11).

The Lambeth Conference of 1920 restated the four points in an appeal to all Christian people (Lambeth Conference 1920, Resolution 9 sect. 6–7). It claimed the episcopate as the means of providing a ministry that every part of the church could acknowledge, and it acknowledged at the same time the spiritual reality of the ministries of churches that have no bishops (Lambeth Conference 1920, Resolution 9 sect. 6–7).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Church-Idea: An Essay towards Unity William Reed Huntington · 1870 title page; pp. 155–156; pp. 156–157

Declaration of the House of Bishops on Christian Unity The House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States · 1886
Prayer Book, pp. 876–877

Resolutions and Reports of the Lambeth Conference of 1888 The Lambeth Conference of 1888 · July 1888 encyclical letter, p. 264; report of the committee on home reunion, pp. 333–336; Resolution 11

An Appeal to All Christian People The Lambeth Conference of 1920 · 1920
sect. 6–7

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where London, Chicago
Who William Reed Huntington
Threads Revival and Unity, Creeds and Councils

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Oxford Movement 14 July 1833 1289

LEADS TO

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh 14–23 June 1910 1350
The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest 25 January 1944 1382
The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions 27 September 1947 1397

REVIVAL AND UNITY

William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army Before · July 1865 1321

The Azusa Street Revival After · 9 April 1906 1342

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The First Vatican Council Before · 1869–1870 1324

The Barmen Declaration After · 31 May 1934 1375

← The Martyrs of Uganda Earlier · 1885–1886

→ Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching Later · 15 May 1891

ENLIGHTENMENT, AWAKENINGS AND MISSIONS

Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching

15 May 1891 · Firm date

Pope Leo XIII addresses the condition of industrial workers. His encyclical rejects socialism and class war, defends private property, and teaches that workers are owed a living wage, limits on their hours, the protection of the law and the right to form unions.

Leo XIII dated his encyclical on capital and labour at St Peter's in Rome on 15 May 1891 (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 64). It begins from the conflict of the age: the growth of industry, the changed relations of masters and workmen, the enormous fortunes of a few and the poverty of the masses (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 1, 3). A remedy, the pope says, must be found quickly for the misery pressing unjustly on the majority of the working class (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 1, 3). The old guilds had been abolished and nothing had replaced them, working men had been left isolated and helpless before the greed of unchecked competition, and a small number of very rich men had laid on the labouring poor "a yoke little better than that of slavery itself" (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 1, 3).

The letter rejects the socialist remedy: to make all possessions the common property of the community, it says, would hurt the working man first and would rob lawful owners (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 4). Private ownership is in accordance with the law of nature, and the law should favour ownership and lead as many people as possible to become owners (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 9, 46). It rejects equally the idea that class is naturally hostile to class: capital cannot do without labour, nor labour without capital (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 19).

Each side has duties. Workers are to do the work they have freely agreed to and never to use violence (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 20). Employers are not to treat their workers as bondsmen, are to respect their dignity as persons, and must not tax them beyond their strength; to defraud anyone of wages that are due is a crime that cries to heaven (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 20). Public authority must step in when the general interest or any class is harmed and the harm cannot otherwise be met, and the poor have a claim to its special care (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 36–37). Hours of work must not exceed what strength allows, children must not be put into workshops before they are sufficiently grown, and Sunday is to be a day of rest (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 41–42). Wages may be freely agreed, yet a dictate of natural justice older than any bargain requires that they be enough to support a frugal and well-behaved wage-earner (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 45). The most important of the associations that can help are workingmen's unions, and to form such societies is a natural right, which the state exists to protect (Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum 49, 51).

The year before, the Protestant William Booth had written that the usual remedies of Christian philanthropy were "lamentably inadequate" to the misery of the poor (Booth, In Darkest England preface); see William and Catherine Booth Found the Salvation Army. Forty years later Pius XI called Leo's letter the "Magna Charta" on which Christian activity in the social field ought to be based (Pius XI, Quadragesimo Anno 39).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Rerum Novarum Pope Leo XIII · 15 May 1891
64; 1, 3; 4; 9, 46; 19; 20; 36–37; 41–42; 45; 49, 51

In Darkest England and the Way Out William Booth · 1890
preface

Quadragesimo Anno Pope Pius XI · 15 May 1931
39

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Leo XIII
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324

LEADS TO

Medellín and Liberation Theology 24 August 1968 1436

CHURCH AND STATE

The First Vatican Council Before · 1869–1870 1324

The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians After · 1915–1916 1358

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The First Vatican Council Before · 1869–1870 1324

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks After · 1917–1918 1363

← The Lambeth Quadrilateral Earlier · July 1888
→ The Azusa Street Revival Later · 9 April 1906
TIMELINE

Modern and Global Christianity

1900 to the present

Pentecostalism, the ecumenical movement and the Second Vatican Council reshape the churches, while persecution, secularisation and growth in Africa, Asia and Latin America shift the faith's centre of gravity.

In 1900 most Christians lived in Europe and North America; today most live elsewhere. The century brought the fiercest persecutions in the churches' history and also the first sustained efforts to heal their divisions, some of them reaching back to the councils of the fifth century.

WHERE THIS ERA UNFOLDED

EVENTS OF THIS ERA

The Azusa Street Revival 9 April 1906 1342

The Pyongyang Revival 14 January 1907 1346

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh 14–23 June 1910 1350

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy 1910–1925 1354
The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians 1915–1916 1358
The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks 1917–1918 1363
Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church 1921 1367
The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City 11 February 1929 1371
The Barmen Declaration 31 May 1934 1375
Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich 14 March 1937 1379
The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest 25 January 1944 1382
The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer 9 April 1945 1386
The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found c. December 1945 1390
The Dead Sea Scrolls Are Discovered 1947 1394
The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions 27 September 1947 1397
The World Council of Churches Is Founded 23 August 1948 1401
Billy Graham and Postwar Evangelicalism 25 September 1949 1405
The Chinese Church under the People's Republic 1950–1954 1409
The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary 1 November 1950 1414
The Charismatic Renewal 1960–1967 1418
The Second Vatican Council 1962–1965 1422
The Churches and the Civil Rights Movement 16 April 1963 1428
Rome and Constantinople Lift the Anathemas of 1054 7 December 1965 1432
Medellín and Liberation Theology 24 August 1968 1436
Humanae Vitae 25 July 1968 1441
Ancient Christological Divisions Are Addressed 1973–1994 1445
The Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization 16–25 July 1974 1450
John Paul II and the Churches under Communism 1978–1979 1454
The Assassination of Óscar Romero 24 March 1980 1458
The Churches and Apartheid 1982–1986 1462

Churches and the Fall of Communism 9 October 1989 1467
The Catechism of the Catholic Church 11 October 1992 1471
Lutherans and Catholics Agree on Justification 31 October 1999 1474
The Clergy Sexual Abuse Crisis 6 January 2002 1479
Benedict XVI Resigns and Francis Is Elected 11 February 2013 1484
The Twenty-One Martyrs of Libya 15 February 2015 1488
The Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox Church June 2016 1493
Catholics and Lutherans Mark 500 Years of the Reformation Together 31 October 2016 1498
Constantinople Grants Autocephaly to the Orthodox Church of Ukraine 6 January 2019 1502
Leo XIV, the First Pope from the United States 8 May 2025 1507
The Churches Mark 1,700 Years since Nicaea 28 November 2025 1510

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Azusa Street Revival

9 April 1906 · Firm date

In April 1906 a prayer meeting in Los Angeles led by the Black preacher William Seymour begins to speak in tongues. The mission it opens at 312 Azusa Street meets daily, draws people of many races and sends the Pentecostal message abroad.

William Seymour came to Los Angeles from Houston, Texas, at the call of a group of believers there, who sent his fare (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 4 (December 1906), p. 1). He taught that the baptism with the Holy Ghost was something more than sanctification and was shown, as in Acts 2, by speaking in tongues, and the mission on Santa Fe Street that he had come to take charge of locked its door against him (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1). Frank Bartleman, who met him at a cottage meeting shortly before 26 March, remembered him as “a colored man, very plain, spiritual, and humble”, blind in one eye, and says that white and colored believers were meeting for prayer in a house on Bonnie Brae Street (Bartleman, How Pentecost Came to Los Angeles p. 43).

On 9 April, the mission's newspaper says, the fire of God fell in the cottage on Bonnie Brae; Seymour himself received the experience three days later (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 4 (December 1906), p. 1). The meetings moved to Azusa Street, into a former Methodist church that had been partly turned into a tenement, with a large unplastered room on the ground floor, and ran from about ten in the morning until late at night (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1). By September the paper counted about 150 people in the city who had received the gift of tongues (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1).

The paper set out the mission's teaching in three steps: justification; sanctification as a second work of grace; and the baptism with the Holy Ghost as "a gift of power upon the sanctified life", with speaking in new tongues as its evidence (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 2). It reported healings, and held that the tongues were the languages of other nations, given for missionary work (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1). "The work began among the colored people," it said, and "Ethiopians, Chinese, Indians, Mexicans, and other nationalities worship together" (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 3). Bartleman wrote that at Azusa the "color line" was washed away in the blood (Bartleman, How Pentecost Came to Los Angeles p. 54).

The paper traced the movement to a Bible school at Topeka, Kansas, led by Charles Parham, where students had spoken in tongues in January 1901 (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 2 (October 1906), p. 1). Its first issue called Parham "God's leader in the Apostolic Faith Movement" and announced his visit (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1). In December it said that he was not the leader of the work at Azusa, and described Seymour as "simply a humble pastor of the flock" (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 4 (December 1906), p. 1).

By January 1907 the paper reported that the news had spread "in two hemispheres" and that some of those baptized with the Holy Ghost were at work in foreign lands (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 5 (January 1907), p.

1). Its first issue had said that the movement was too large to be confined in any denomination or sect (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The mission's own newspaper names the day. Its issue of December 1906 says that the fire of God fell on 9 April in a cottage on Bonnie Brae Street (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 4 (December 1906), p. 1), and the issue of January 1907 repeats that Pentecost first fell in Los Angeles on 9 April (The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) vol. 1 no. 5 (January 1907), p. 1). The four issues cited here do not give the day on which the meetings moved to Azusa Street.

Primary sources

The Apostolic Faith (Los Angeles) The Apostolic Faith Mission, 312 Azusa Street · September 1906 – May 1908
vol. 1 no. 4 (December 1906), p. 1; vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 1; vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 2; vol. 1 no. 1 (September 1906), p. 3; vol. 1 no. 2 (October 1906), p. 1; vol. 1 no. 5 (January 1907), p. 1

How Pentecost Came to Los Angeles Frank Bartleman · 1925
p. 43; p. 54

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Los Angeles
Who William Seymour, Charles Parham
Threads Revival and Unity, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Second Great Awakening August 1801 1272
John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism 24 May 1738 1233

LEADS TO

The Charismatic Renewal 1960–1967 1418

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Lambeth Quadrilateral Before · July 1888 1332

The Pyongyang Revival After · 14 January 1907 1346

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Martyrs of Uganda Before · 1885–1886 1328

The Pyongyang Revival After · 14 January 1907 1346

← Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching Earlier · 15 May 1891
→ The Pyongyang Revival Later · 14 January 1907

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Pyongyang Revival

14 January 1907 · Firm date

At a winter Bible class in Pyongyang in January 1907, hundreds of Korean Presbyterian men pray aloud together and confess their sins in public through two nights. Those who were there carry the revival to churches across Korea.

The Presbyterian mission at Pyongyang held a general Bible class for men, usually in the first two weeks of January, and most of those who came walked in from the country churches (Blair, The Korea Pentecost p. 43). William Blair, one of the missionaries, writes that after the Russo-Japanese War Japan stayed in Korea, that a wave of national feeling swept the country, and that the missionaries and Korean church leaders preached forbearance (Blair, The Korea Pentecost pp. 39–40). They wanted the church, he says, to repent of hating the Japanese and to turn from the national situation to its own relation with God (Blair, The Korea Pentecost p. 42). Graham Lee, another of them, writes that the missionaries came out of a Bible conference in August 1906 wanting such a blessing, and that Koreans and missionaries had prayed for it since a visiting preacher told the Korean Christians of manifestations of the Spirit in India (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 33 (Graham Lee)).

The evening meetings in the Central Church began on 6 January 1907, for men only, with the building full each night (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 33 (Graham Lee)). On the Monday of the following week, after a short address, the whole congregation prayed aloud together; those who wished were then allowed to leave, and between five and six hundred stayed (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee)). Man after man stood, confessed his sins, broke down and wept, and the meeting went on until two in the morning (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee)). Blair, who was present, says the prayer sounded like the falling of many waters (Blair, The Korea Pentecost p. 45).

On the Tuesday evening Kil Sun-joo, whom Lee calls "our most gifted Korean preacher", gave the address (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee)). One of the leading men of the church, a Mr. Kim, then confessed that he had hated other members and Blair in particular, and the congregation broke into weeping (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee)). Blair writes that the missionaries feared some would lose their minds, and that every kind of sin was confessed that night (Blair, The Korea Pentecost p. 47). In the days that followed, Lee reports, the same thing happened in the mission's schools and at meetings for women (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 36–37 (Graham Lee)).

Blair says that the class ended with that meeting, that the men carried the revival home and it spread through the churches of the whole peninsula, and that people went from house to house returning stolen money and goods (Blair, The Korea Pentecost p. 48). Kil went to preach in the churches of Seoul, where the magazine reports the same weeping and confession (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 41).

On 17 September 1907 the Presbytery of Korea was constituted in the Central Church at Pyongyang and ordained seven Korean ministers, Kil among them (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 11 (November 1907), pp. 162–163). The accounts cited here were all written by missionaries or printed in their magazine.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Graham Lee, writing within weeks, says that the evening meetings began on 6 January, grew until the Saturday, went dead on the Sunday and broke open on the Monday (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 33 (Graham Lee)) (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee)). 6 January 1907 was a Sunday, so the Monday of the following week was 14 January and the Tuesday, when the class closed, was 15 January. The accounts give weekdays and not these two dates. W. B. Hunt, in the same number of the magazine, puts a first outbreak of prayer and confession on 6 January itself (The Korea Mission Field vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 37 (W. B. Hunt)).

Primary sources

The Korea Pentecost and Other Experiences on the Mission Field William Newton Blair · 1910

p. 43; pp. 39–40; p. 42; p. 45; p. 47; p. 48

The Korea Mission Field 1907 (volume 3)

vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 33 (Graham Lee); vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 34–35 (Graham Lee); vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), pp. 36–37 (Graham Lee); vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 41; vol. 3 no. 11 (November 1907), pp. 162–163; vol. 3 no. 3 (March 1907), p. 37 (W. B. Hunt)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Pyongyang
Who Kil Sun-joo, William Blair
Threads Revival and Unity, Mission and Expansion

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Korean Scholars Found a Church 1784 1245

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Azusa Street Revival Before · 9 April 1906 1342

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh After · 14–23 June 1910 1350

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Azusa Street Revival Before · 9 April 1906 1342

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh After · 14–23 June 1910 1350

← The Azusa Street Revival Earlier · 9 April 1906
→ The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh Later · 14–23 June 1910

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh

14–23 June 1910 · Firm date

About 1,200 delegates of missionary societies, most of them from Britain, North America and continental Europe, meet at Edinburgh in June 1910 to consider the evangelisation of the non-Christian world, and appoint a Continuation Committee to carry the work on.

The conference was a meeting of delegates from missionary societies of differing scope and purpose, and its organisers therefore set limits: it would deal only with missionary work among non-Christian peoples, and it would seek no opinion on any question of doctrine or church order on which those taking part differed (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 8). British and American societies each sent rather more than 500 delegates and Continental societies over 170 (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 18–19). The record says that they stood for nearly every type of doctrine and polity except the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and that members of the "young churches of the East" came from Japan, Korea, China, Assam, Burma, India and Ceylon (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 18–19).

It opened on 14 June 1910 in the Assembly Hall of the United Free Church of Scotland in Edinburgh (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 20) (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 23). Lord Balfour of Burleigh, in his opening address that evening, spoke of about 1,200 members from 160 churches and organisations (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 142). John Mott was chosen to chair the day sessions, at which the reports of eight commissions were debated (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 23). The first report, from the commission of which he was chairman (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 11), began by saying that the church faced, as in no earlier generation, a world-wide opportunity to make Christ known (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 1, p. 1).

V. S. Azariah of south India told an evening meeting that relations between foreign missionaries and Indian workers were too often not what they should be, and ended: "You have given your goods to feed the poor. You have given your bodies to be burned. We also ask for love. Give us FRIENDS!" (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 306–315). Cheng Jingyi, speaking for the Chinese church in the debate on unity, said that Chinese Christians hoped to see "a united Christian Church without any denominational distinctions" (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 8, pp. 195–197).

The report on co-operation held that the ideal of missionary work was to plant in every non-Christian nation "one united Church of Christ" (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 8, p. 131). On 21 June the conference voted unanimously to appoint a Continuation Committee, international and interdenominational, to carry on its work on the lines of the conference itself, which did not involve the idea of organic and ecclesiastical union, and to confer about a permanent international missionary committee (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 95–98). Cheng was the member named from China (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 101–102), and the committee elected Mott as its chairman (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, p. 135). The conference closed on 23 June (World Missionary Conference, 1910, vol. 9, pp. 106–107).

The World Council of Churches counts the Edinburgh conference among its historical roots (World Council of Churches, History first paragraph); see the World Council of Churches Is Founded.

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

World Missionary Conference, 1910: Reports of the Commissions and Records of the Conference 1910
vol. 9, p. 8; vol. 9, pp. 18–19; vol. 9, p. 20; vol. 9, p. 23; vol. 9, p. 142; vol. 9, p. 11; vol. 1, p. 1; vol. 9, pp. 306–315; vol. 8, pp. 195–197; vol. 8, p. 131; vol. 9, pp. 95–98; vol. 9, pp. 101–102; vol. 9, p. 135; vol. 9, pp. 106–107

History of the World Council of Churches World Council of Churches · Web page, current in 2026 first paragraph

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Edinburgh
Who John Mott, V. S. Azariah, Cheng Jingyi
Threads Mission and Expansion, Revival and Unity

In context

GROWS OUT OF

William Carey and the Modern Missionary Movement 2 October 1792 1261
Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission 25 June 1865 1314
The Lambeth Quadrilateral July 1888 1332

LEADS TO

The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions 27 September 1947 1397
The World Council of Churches Is Founded 23 August 1948 1401
The Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization 16–25 July 1974 1450

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The Pyongyang Revival Before · 14 January 1907 1346
Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church After · 1921 1367

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The Pyongyang Revival Before · 14 January 1907 1346
Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church After · 1921 1367

← The Pyongyang Revival Earlier · 14 January 1907
→ The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy Later · 1910–1925

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy

1910–1925 · Firm date

Twelve volumes called The Fundamentals are sent free to Protestant ministers from about 1910. In the 1920s a dispute between Fundamentalists and liberals over the Bible, miracles and modern knowledge divides American churches and reaches a courtroom at Dayton.

From about 1910 a publishing company in Chicago issued twelve volumes of essays under the title The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth (The Fundamentals, vol. 1, foreword and contents) (The Fundamentals, vol. 12, pp. 3–4). The foreword to the first says that two Christian laymen bore the cost because they believed the time had come for "a new statement of the fundamentals of Christianity", and that the series would be sent to every pastor, missionary, theological teacher and student and Sunday school superintendent in the English-speaking world whose address could be found (The Fundamentals, vol. 1, foreword and contents). That volume contains essays on the virgin birth, the deity of Christ and the Holy Spirit, and a history of the higher criticism of the Bible (The Funda-mentals, vol. 1, foreword and contents). R. A. Torrey belonged to the committee that supervised the series and edited its last two volumes; by then, the two laymen state, nearly three million copies had been printed (The Fundamentals, vol. 12, pp. 3–4).

On 21 May 1922 Harry Emerson Fosdick preached at the First Presbyterian Church in New York a sermon entitled "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? title page). People who called themselves Fundamentalists, he said, meant to drive men and women of liberal opinions out of the evangelical churches (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? pp. 4–5). He named the tests he saw them setting: belief in the virgin birth as historical fact, in Scriptures dictated without error, in an atonement by substitution, and in Christ's return on the clouds to set up a millennium (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? pp. 4–5). He did not ask that these opinions be given up; he asked whether anyone had the right to deny the Christian name to those who differed about them (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? p. 6), and he called for tolerance from liberals as well (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? pp. 11–12).

J. Gresham Machen, who taught New Testament at Princeton Theological Seminary, published Christianity and Liberalism in February 1923 (Machen, Christianity and Liberalism title page, its verso and preface). He traced liberal religion in all its forms to naturalism, the denial that God's creative power entered into the origin of Christianity (Machen, Christianity and Liberalism p. 2). Liberalism, he argued, "not only is a different religion from Christianity but belongs in a totally different class of religions" (Machen, Christianity and Liberalism p. 7), and he called a separation of the two parties in the church "the crying need of the hour" (Machen, Christianity and Liberalism p. 160).

Fosdick had said in 1922 that Fundamentalists had tried to put on the statute books of a whole state laws against the teaching of modern biology (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? p. 6). In 1925 Tennessee made it unlawful to teach in its public schools any theory that denies the story of the divine creation of man as taught in the Bible, and John Scopes, a teacher at Dayton, Tennessee, was indicted under the act (Scopes trial transcript p. 309). On the seventh day of the trial Clarence Darrow, for the defence, examined William Jennings Bryan, who was acting with the prosecution, on his study of the Bible (Scopes trial transcript p. 284) (Scopes trial transcript table of contents). The jury found Scopes guilty and the judge fined him $100 (Scopes trial transcript p. 313).

The word "modernism" was already in use in the Catholic Church: in the encyclical Pascendi of 1907 Pius X had condemned under that name a body of opinions held by some Catholic clergy and laity (Pius X, Pascendi 2), called it "the synthesis of all heresies" (Pius X, Pascendi 39), and ordered a council of vigilance in every diocese to watch for it (Pius X, Pascendi 55).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The volumes of The Fundamentals carry no date. The statement printed in the twelfth says that the publishing company was organised in the autumn of 1909 and that its first editor had brought out five volumes before he left for London early in the summer of 1911 (The Fundamentals, vol. 12, pp. 3–4); the Internet Archive's record of the New York Public Library copy cited here gives 1910 for the first volume. The twelfth gives notice of a change of address "after May 1, 1915" (The Fundamentals, vol. 12, p. 6). The later dates are firm: Fosdick's sermon was preached on 21 May 1922 (Fosdick, Shall the Fundamentalists Win? title page), Machen's book was published in February 1923 (Machen, Christianity and Liberalism title page, its verso and preface), and the verdict at Dayton was given on the eighth day of the trial (Scopes trial transcript p. 313), which the transcript's table of contents dates Tuesday 21 July 1925 (Scopes trial transcript table of contents).

Primary sources

The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth 1910–1915
vol. 1, foreword and contents; vol. 12, pp. 3–4; vol. 12, p. 6

Shall the Fundamentalists Win? Harry Emerson Fosdick · 21 May 1922 title page; pp. 4–5; p. 6; pp. 11–12

Christianity and Liberalism J. Gresham Machen · 1923 title page, its verso and preface; p. 2; p. 7; p. 160

The World's Most Famous Court Trial: Tennessee Evolution Case July 1925
p. 309; p. 284; table of contents; p. 313

Pascendi Dominici Gregis Pope Pius X · 8 September 1907
2; 39; 55

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Chicago, Dayton, Tennessee
Who R. A. Torrey, Harry Emerson Fosdick, J. Gresham Machen
Threads Scripture and Canon, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Schleiermacher and Modern Theology 1799 1269

LEADS TO

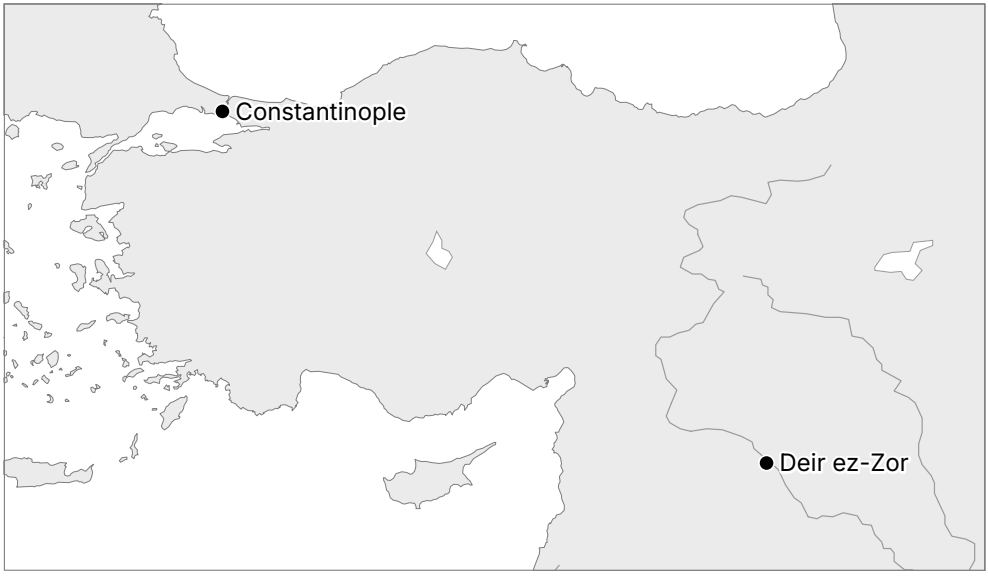
Billy Graham and Postwar Evangelicalism 25 September 1949 1405

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

Tischendorf and the Codex Sinaiticus Before · 1844–1859 1293
The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found After · c. December 1945 1390

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Oxford Movement Before · 14 July 1833 1289
The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest After · 25 January 1944 1382



← The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh Earlier · 14–23 June 1910
→ The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians Later · 1915–1916

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians

1915–1916 · Firm date

From April 1915 the Ottoman government deports Armenians from across the empire toward the Syrian desert, and the American ambassador reports massacre, starvation and the destruction of a people. Assyrian Christians of Urmia and Hakkari are attacked in the same months.

In 1915 the Ottoman Empire was at war with Russia, France and Britain (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1400 (10 July 1915)). On the nights of 24 and 25 April numerous Armenians were arrested in Constantinople, among them doctors, journalists, writers, clergy and members of parliament, and most were sent into the interior (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 38, pp. 59–60). The German embassy heard of about 500 arrests (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 38, pp. 59–60); the American ambassador, Henry Morgenthau, cabled of more than a hundred (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1395 (27 April 1915)). The Armenian Patriarch, Archbishop Zaven (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 34, p. 53), asked the Grand Vizier and the Minister of the Interior for the reason and was told that leading men were being removed from the capital as a precaution against disorder (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 38, pp. 59–60).

On 24 May the Allied governments declared that Armenians were being massacred "with the connivance and often assistance of Ottoman authorities", spoke of crimes "against humanity and civilization", and said they would hold the members of the Ottoman government personally responsible (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1398 (28 May 1915)). The Grand Vizier resented this as interference with his government's rights over its own subjects (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1399 (18 June 1915)).

On 10 July Morgenthau reported a "systematic attempt to uproot peaceful Armenian populations" by arrest, torture and deportation "from one end of the Empire to the other", with rape, pillage and murder, directed from Constantinople in the name of military necessity (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1400 (10 July 1915)). He gave the cause as he understood it: Armenian volunteers had joined the Russian army and some had helped the Russians at Van, and vengeance was being taken on people most of whom were innocent (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1400 (10 July 1915)). In August he wrote of people "herded like cattle into the arid and hostile wastes of the interior" (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1406 (11 August 1915)), and in September that the "destruction of Armenian race in Turkey is progressing rapidly" (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1410 (3 September 1915)). The Minister of the Interior had told him that Protestant and Catholic Armenians would be exempted; Morgenthau reckoned them at a tenth of the whole, the rest belonging to the Armenian national ("Gregorian") church (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1408 (18 August 1915)).

A German missionary sister who came through Deir ez-Zor, a town in the Syrian desert, in the summer of 1915 found its inn crowded with deported Armenians, most of them women and children, who had had no bread for days (Bryce and Toynbee, Treatment of Armenians doc. 145, pp. 566–567). The British collection of testimony published in 1916 also reports on the Christians it calls Nestorians, Syrians or Assyrians: Turkish troops and Kurdish tribesmen held their villages around Urmia in Persia from January to May 1915 (Bryce and Toynbee, Treatment of Armenians section IV, p. 99), and in June attacked Hakkari, where the house of the patriarch Mar Shimun at Qudshanis was plundered and burned and its people fled to Persia (Bryce and Toynbee, Treatment of Armenians doc. 37, p. 169).

In December Pope Benedict XV told the cardinals that utter ruin hung over Armenia (Benedict XV, Allocution of 6 December 1915 paragraph 2), and the Patriarch told the German embassy that Armenians who had come from Anatolia were still being arrested and expelled from the capital (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 214, p. 206). Johannes Lepsius, who edited the German documents, writes that a law of 1 August 1916 abolished the Armenian patriarchate of Constantinople and removed its office to Jerusalem (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien introduction, p. XLIII).

The International Association of Genocide Scholars holds that this was genocide against Armenians, Assyrians and Greeks (International Association of Genocide Scholars, Resolution (2007)). The United States House of Representatives has used the word, and it stands in the title of a motion laid before the German Bundestag (U.S. House of Representatives, H. Res. 296 (2019) preamble and resolution) (Deutscher Bundestag, Drucksache 18/8613 title and section I). The government of Turkey rejects it: it acknowledges the loss of many Armenian lives, describes the measures as a wartime relocation, and denies that there was a plan to destroy the Armenians (Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, The Events of 1915).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The arrests in Constantinople are dated by the German embassy to the nights of 24–25 and 25–26 April 1915 (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien no. 38, pp. 59–60), and Morgenthau reported them on 27 April (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1395 (27 April 1915)). His telegrams follow the deportations through the summer and autumn of 1915 (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1400 (10 July 1915)) (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement, doc. 1410 (3 September 1915)). The attack on the Assyrians of Hakkari is placed in June 1915 (Bryce and Toynbee, Treatment of Armenians doc. 37, p. 169). The end date is that of the law of 1 August 1916 on the Armenian patriarchate (Lepsius, Deutschland und Armenien introduction, p. XLIII); the documents cited do not say when the deportations ceased. No count of the dead is given here.

Primary sources

Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, 1915, Supplement: The World War United States Department of State · Telegrams of 1915, published 1928
doc. 1400 (10 July 1915); doc. 1395 (27 April 1915); doc. 1398 (28 May 1915); doc. 1399 (18 June 1915); doc. 1406 (11 August 1915); doc. 1410 (3 September 1915); doc. 1408 (18 August 1915)

Deutschland und Armenien 1914–1918: Sammlung diplomatischer Aktenstücke Johannes Lepsius (editor) · Documents of 1914–1918, published 1919
no. 38, pp. 59–60; no. 34, p. 53; no. 214, p. 206; introduction, p. XLIII

The Treatment of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire, 1915–16 Viscount Bryce and Arnold J. Toynbee · 1916
doc. 145, pp. 566–567; section IV, p. 99; doc. 37, p. 169

Allocution Nostis profecto Pope Benedict XV · 6 December 1915
paragraph 2

Resolution on the Ottoman Genocides (2007) International Association of Genocide Scholars · 2007
genocidescholars.org

House Resolution 296, 116th Congress United States House of Representatives · 29 October 2019 preamble and resolution

Erinnerung und Gedenken an den Völkermord an den Armeniern und anderen christlichen Minderheiten in den Jahren 1915 und 1916 German Bundestag (motion of the CDU/CSU, SPD and Green parliamentary groups) · 31 May 2016 title and section I

The Events of 1915 and the Turkish-Armenian Controversy over History: An Overview Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Türkiye · Web page, current in 2026

mfa.gov.tr

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Constantinople, Deir ez-Zor
Who Henry Morgenthau, Zaven I Der Yeghiayan
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Armenia Adopts Christianity AD 301 (traditional) or c. 314 553

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Martyrs of Uganda Before · 1885–1886 1328

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks After · 1917–1918 1363

CHURCH AND STATE

Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching Before · 15 May 1891 1336

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks After · 1917–1918 1363

← The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy Earlier · 1910–1925
→ The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks Later · 1917–1918

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks

1917–1918 · Firm date

In November 1917 a council of the Russian Orthodox Church restores the patriarchate and Tikhon takes the patriarchal seat. Two months later the Soviet government separates church and state by decree and declares all church property to be the people's.

On 4 (17) November 1917 the Local Council of the Russian Orthodox Church, meeting in Moscow, resolved that the highest authority in the church belongs to a council of bishops, clergy and laity, and that the patriarchate is restored, with the patriarch first among bishops who are his equals and accountable to the council (Local Council of 1917–1918, Determinations, no. 1 (4 November 1917)) (Tikhon, Letter on his accession (18 December 1917)). The Russian church had been without a patriarch for more than two centuries; the Council named candidates, and the lot fell on Tikhon of Moscow (Tikhon, Letter on his accession (18 December 1917)). He took the patriarchal seat in the Dormition Cathedral of the Kremlin on 21 November (4 December), and said in his address that the patriarchate was being restored amid fire and gunfire, and that churches and the shrines of the Kremlin had been shot at (Tikhon, Address in the Dormition Cathedral (21 November 1917)).

On 19 January (1 February) 1918 Tikhon sent a message to the whole church, in which he wrote of daily reports of innocent people killed without trial, of churches shelled and plundered, of monasteries seized and of church property taken as the people's (Tikhon, Message of 19 January 1918). He forbade those who did the killing to come to the sacraments and pronounced anathema on them, if they still bore the Christian name (Tikhon, Message of 19 January 1918). He called on the faithful to defend the church by the strength of their faith and, if need be, to suffer for it (Tikhon, Message of 19 January 1918).

The next day the Council of People's Commissars, with Vladimir Lenin as chairman, issued its decree on freedom of conscience and on church and religious societies (Decree on the Separation of Church and State (1918) articles 1–13). It separated the church from the state and the school from the church, allowed every citizen to profess any religion or none, abolished religious oaths, gave the registration of births and marriages to the civil authorities, and forbade the teaching of religion in schools of general education while leaving citizens free to teach and learn it privately (Decree on the Separation of Church and State (1918) articles 1–13). Its last articles laid down that no church or religious society may own property or be a legal person, and that all their property is the people's; buildings and objects meant for worship might be given to congregations to use without charge (Decree on the Separation of Church and State (1918) articles 12–13).

In April 1918 the Council adopted measures in answer to what it called the persecution of the church: prayers for those persecuted for the faith, a yearly commemoration, on 25 January or the Sunday after, of the confessors and martyrs who had died, and steps to recover what had been taken from churches and monasteries (Local Council of 1917–1918, Determinations, no. 25 (5/18 April 1918)).

In the famine of 1922 Tikhon allowed parishes to give church valuables not used in worship, and when the government ordered all valuables removed, sacred vessels included, he called the act sacrilege (Tikhon, Message of 15 (28) February 1922). In a secret letter to the Politburo of 19 March 1922 Lenin wrote that the famine was the moment to seize church property and to crush the clergy he called the "Black Hundreds", proposed that those who had resisted at Shuya be tried and shot in large numbers, and advised that Tikhon himself be left untouched for the present (Lenin, Letter of 19 March 1922 whole letter).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The church documents of 1917 and January 1918 are dated in the Julian calendar then in use in Russia, thirteen days behind the Gregorian; the Gregorian date is given here in brackets. The Council's first determination is dated 4 November 1917 (Local Council of 1917–1918, Determinations, no. 1 (4 November 1917)), Tikhon's address 21 November 1917 (Tikhon, Address in the Dormition Cathedral (21 November 1917)) and his message 19 January 1918 (Tikhon, Message of 19 January 1918). The edition cited dates the decree 20 January (2 February) 1918 (Decree on the Separation of Church and State (1918) articles 1–13).

Primary sources

Determinations of the Local Council of the Orthodox Church of Russia, 1917–1918 1917–1918
no. 1 (4 November 1917); no. 25 (5/18 April 1918)

Messages and Addresses of Patriarch Tikhon Tikhon, Patriarch of Moscow · 1917–1922
Letter on his accession (18 December 1917); Address in the Dormition Cathedral (21 November 1917); Message of 19 January 1918; Message of 15 (28) February 1922

Decree on Freedom of Conscience and on Church and Religious Societies Council of People's Commissars of the Russian Soviet Republic · 20 January (2 February) 1918 articles 1–13; articles 12–13

Letter to Molotov for the Members of the Politburo, 19 March 1922 Vladimir Lenin · 19 March 1922
whole letter

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Moscow
Who Tikhon of Moscow, Vladimir Lenin
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Moscow Becomes a Patriarchate 26 January 1589 1121

Nikon's Reforms and the Old Believer Schism 1652–1667 1187

Peter the Great Replaces the Patriarch with the Holy Synod 25 January 1721 (Old Style) 1221

LEADS TO

John Paul II and the Churches under Communism 1978–1979 1454

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians Before · 1915–1916 1358

Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church After · 1921 1367

CHURCH AND STATE

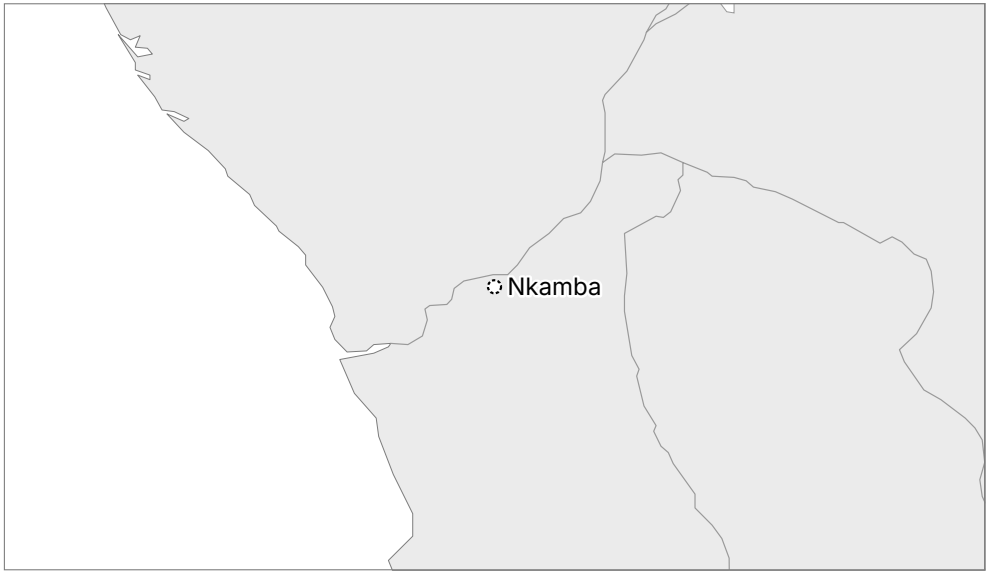
The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians Before · 1915–1916 1358

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City After · 11 February 1929 1371

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Rerum Novarum and Christian Social Teaching Before · 15 May 1891 1336

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City After · 11 February 1929 1371



← The Destruction of the Armenian and Assyrian Christians Earlier · 1915–1916
→ Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church Later · 1921

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church

1921 · Firm date

In 1921 Simon Kimbangu, a Baptist of the Lower Congo, begins to preach and to pray over the sick at Nkamba, and crowds come to him. A Belgian military court sentences him to death; reprieved, he dies in prison thirty years later, and a church grows from his followers.

Simon Kimbangu belonged to the Baptist church at Wathen, a station of the English Baptist mission in the Lower Congo (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 270–272); a Kimbanguist account of 2004 calls him a former catechist of that mission (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, section 1.1). The story of his call, as the American mission secretary P. H. J. Lerrigo heard it in 1921 from a man who had it from Kimbangu, is that a stranger came to him in dreams, gave him a Bible and told him to preach and to heal, and that he refused more than once (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 270–272). At last he was told that his soul would be required of him if he did not go to a sick child in a nearby village; he went, prayed, laid his hands on the child and shook violently, and the child recovered (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 270–272).

Kimbangu settled in his own village of Nkamba, and people came from every direction with their sick, by trail and by rail, so that the medical work of the missions came to a standstill (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 272–273). Lerrigo, who travelled through the district that August, records cases in which no cure followed and regarded the movement as a delusion (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 272–273) (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 276–277). The Kimbanguist account says that Kimbangu preached repentance, the commandments of God and the equality of all peoples, opposed fetishes, sorcery and polygamy, and was the envoy of Jesus Christ and not his equal (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, section 1.1).

Lerrigo reports talk that God was about to drive the whites out of the Congo, says that some of the movement's prophets were said to have told people not to work for them or pay taxes, and writes that the teaching that the Lord would return at once, so that planting was useless, led the government to act (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, p. 275). In the Kimbanguist account Kimbangu told his judge that he had raised no revolt and had only preached the gospel (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, section 1.1). According to Jules Chomé, a Belgian lawyer who wrote a book on the trial in 1959, a court-martial at Thysville consisting of a single officer tried him without a defender (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579). It found that by spreading false reports of healings and resurrections and presenting himself as one sent by God he had alarmed the native population and gravely disturbed public order, and it sentenced him to death, though the prosecutor had asked for penal servitude for life (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579). Lerrigo thought the sentences out of proportion to the facts brought out at the trial, and reports that missionaries petitioned King Albert, who reprieved Kimbangu (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 276–277). He was held in the prison at Elisabethville until his death thirty years later (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579).

Followers of his were scattered to places of banishment across the colony (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, sections 1.2–1.3). At the end of 1959 the colonial administration allowed the movement to exist as a church, and in the 1960s it was led by Kimbangu's son Joseph Diangienda (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579) (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, sections 1.2–1.3). The church became a member of the World Council of Churches; in June 2021 the council's central committee ended that membership "for theological reasons", which its published summary does not specify (World Council of Churches, Central Committee overview (June 2021) New members and specialized ministries).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The year is fixed by Lerrigo's report, written after a visit in August 1921 (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 270–272). The days are less secure. A Kimbanguist account published in 2004 gives 6 April 1921 as the day on which Kimbanguism was born, the day on which it says Kimbangu healed a woman named Nkiantondo (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, section 1.1); Lerrigo says the movement began in May (Lerrigo, The Prophet Movement in Congo, pp. 270–272). Chomé puts the arrest on 15 September and the judgment on 3 October 1921 (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579); the Kimbanguist account gives 12 September and 12 October (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, sections 1.2–1.3). For Kimbangu's death Chomé gives 10 October 1951 and the Kimbanguist account 3 October 1951 (Chomé, Kimbangu (Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer VI), cols. 576–579) (Nduku-Fessau Badze, Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans, sections 1.2–1.3).

Primary sources

The 'Prophet Movement' in Congo P. H. J. Lerrigo · 1922
pp. 270–272; pp. 272–273; pp. 276–277; p. 275

Le Kimbanguisme a quatre-vingt-trois ans Nduku-Fessau Badze · 2004 section 1.1; sections 1.2–1.3

Kimbangu (Simon), in Biographie Belge d'Outre-Mer, vol. VI Jules Chomé · Dated 25 April 1966; published 1968
cols. 576–579

WCC shares overview of June central committee meeting 2021 World Council of Churches · 2021
New members and specialized ministries

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nkamba
Who Simon Kimbangu
Threads Revival and Unity, Mission and Expansion, Persecution and Martyrdom

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The King of Kongo Is Baptised 3 May 1491 992

REVIVAL AND UNITY

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh Before · 14–23 June 1910 1350

The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions After · 27 September 1947 1397

MISSION AND EXPANSION

The World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh Before · 14–23 June 1910 1350

The Church of South India Unites Four Traditions After · 27 September 1947 1397

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks Before · 1917–1918 1363

The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer After · 9 April 1945 1386

← The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks Earlier · 1917–1918
→ The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City Later · 11 February 1929

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City

11 February 1929 · Firm date

On 11 February 1929 the Holy See and Italy sign a treaty and a concordat in the Lateran Palace. Italy recognises the pope's sovereignty over Vatican City, and the Holy See recognises the Kingdom of Italy with Rome as its capital.

The treaty's preamble names the dispute it was made to end: the "Roman question", which arose in 1870 when Rome was annexed to the Kingdom of Italy. To give the Holy See an independence that could be seen, it says, a sovereignty beyond dispute had to be guaranteed, and for that purpose Vatican City was to be constituted (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, preamble). The plenipotentiaries were Cardinal Pietro Gasparri, Secretary of State, for Pius XI, and Benito Mussolini, prime minister and head of the government, for King Victor Emmanuel III (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, preamble). They signed on 11 February 1929 in the Lateran Palace, while the pope was telling the parish priests of Rome what was being done (Pius XI, Address of 11 February 1929).

By the treaty Italy reaffirmed that the Catholic religion is the only religion of the state, recognised the sovereignty of the Holy See in the international field, and recognised its full ownership of and exclusive sovereign jurisdiction over the Vatican, so creating Vatican City, in which the Italian government would not interfere (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, arts. 1–4). The Holy See declared that it would stay outside the temporal rivalries of other states unless the parties appealed together to its mission of peace, and Vatican City was to be neutral and inviolable territory (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, art. 24). The Holy See declared the Roman question settled finally and irrevocably and recognised the Kingdom of Italy under the House of Savoy with Rome as its capital; Italy recognised the State of Vatican City under the sovereignty of the pope (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, arts. 26–27). A financial convention bound Italy to pay 750 million lire and to hand over state bonds with a face value of one thousand million, which the Holy See accepted as the final settlement of its claims arising from 1870 (Lateran Pacts (1929), Financial Convention, arts. 1–2).

The concordat signed with the treaty assured the church the free exercise of spiritual power and of public worship (Lateran Pacts (1929), Concordat, art. 1). The choice of bishops belonged to the Holy See, which would first tell the government the name so that it could raise any political objection, and bishops were to swear loyalty to the Italian state (Lateran Pacts (1929), Concordat, arts. 19–20). The state gave civil effect to marriage celebrated under canon law and called Catholic teaching the foundation and crown of public instruction (Lateran Pacts (1929), Concordat, arts. 34 and 36). It recognised the organisations of Catholic Action so far as they worked outside every political party, and the Holy See renewed its ban on clergy joining any party (Lateran Pacts (1929), Concordat, art. 43).

Pius XI said that he had wanted the concordat from the first to be bound up with the treaty (Pius XI, Address of 11 February 1929). Two days after the signing he said that it had perhaps needed a man such as Providence had caused him to meet, one without the preoccupations of the liberal school, and that he believed he had with the concordat given God back to Italy and Italy to God (Pius XI, Address of 13 February 1929). The treaty came into force when the ratifications were exchanged, which it required within four months (Lateran Pacts (1929), Treaty, arts. 26–27).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Lateran Pacts: Treaty, Financial Convention and Concordat between the Holy See and Italy The Holy See and the Kingdom of Italy · 11 February 1929
Treaty, preamble; Treaty, arts. 1–4; Treaty, art. 24; Treaty, arts. 26–27; Financial Convention, arts. 1–2; Concordat, art. 1; Concordat, arts. 19–20; Concordat, arts. 34 and 36; Concordat, art. 43

Addresses of 11 and 13 February 1929 Pope Pius XI · 11 and 13 February 1929
Address of 11 February 1929; Address of 13 February 1929

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Pius XI, Benito Mussolini, Pietro Gasparri
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The First Vatican Council 1869–1870 1324

The Donation of Pepin and the Papal States AD 754–756 766

LEADS TO

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich 14 March 1937 1379

CHURCH AND STATE

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks Before · 1917–1918 1363

The Barmen Declaration After · 31 May 1934 1375

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Russian Church under the Bolsheviks Before · 1917–1918 1363

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich After · 14 March 1937 1379

← Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church Earlier · 1921
→ The Barmen Declaration Later · 31 May 1934

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Barmen Declaration

31 May 1934 · Firm date

Meeting at Barmen in May 1934, a synod of Lutheran, Reformed and United Protestants declares against the German Christians that Jesus Christ is the one Word of God the church has to hear, and that the state may not become the total order of human life.

The German Evangelical Church had been constituted in July 1933 as a federation of the confessional churches that came out of the Reformation (Barmen Declaration, preamble). The synod of Lutheran, Reformed and United churches that met at Barmen declared that the basis of that union was being destroyed by the teaching and the actions of the ruling church party, the "German Christians", and of the church government they controlled (Barmen Declaration, preamble). The Evangelical Church in Germany, in the introduction it now publishes with the text, describes the German Christians as a movement that saw no conflict between Christianity and National Socialism (Barmen Declaration, EKD introduction (English)). It names the pastors Hans Asmussen, Karl Koch, Karl Immer and Martin Niemöller and the theologian Karl Barth among those who brought 139 delegates together in the Gemarke church at Barmen, in the city of Wuppertal, from 29 to 31 May 1934 (Barmen Declaration, EKD introduction (English)).

Each of the declaration's six theses opens with Scripture and closes with the rejection of a false doctrine (Barmen Declaration, theses 1–6). The first says that Jesus Christ, as he is attested in holy Scripture, is the one Word of God which we have to hear, and to trust and obey in life and in death, and rejects the teaching that the church could and must acknowledge, apart from and beside this one Word, other events and powers, figures and truths as God's revelation and as a source of its proclamation (Barmen Declaration, thesis 1). The next three say that no area of life belongs to other lords than Christ, that the church may not leave the form of its message and order to its own pleasure or to prevailing ideological and political convictions, and that its offices are a ministry and give no ground for special leaders with ruling powers (Barmen Declaration, theses 2–4).

The fifth thesis says that the state has by divine appointment the task of providing for justice and peace, by the threat and use of force and according to the measure of human judgment and ability, in a world not yet redeemed (Barmen Declaration, thesis 5). It rejects the teaching that the state, going beyond its special commission, should and could become the single and totalitarian order of human life and so fulfil the church's vocation as well, and equally the teaching that the church, going beyond its own commission, should take on the characteristics, tasks and dignity of the state and become its organ (Barmen Declaration, thesis 5). The sixth says that the church's commission is to deliver the message of the free grace of God to all people, and that it may not put the Word of the Lord at the service of purposes of its own choosing; the synod called the six theses the indispensable theological basis of the German Evangelical Church (Barmen Declaration, thesis 6 and conclusion).

In its appeal the synod said that it did not intend to found a new church or to do away with the Lutheran, Reformed and United confessions, and asked the congregations to test its words by Scripture (Barmen Declaration, appeal to the congregations). The EKD's introductions say that the declaration was adopted on 31 May without amendment and that the Confessing Church gathered around it (Barmen Declaration, EKD introduction (English)) (Barmen Declaration, EKD introduction (German)). Today, by the EKD's account, its constitution affirms the decisions of the synod; some member churches place the declaration beside the confessions of the Reformation, and most regard it as a guiding testimony of doctrine and faith (Barmen Declaration, EKD introduction (German)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

The Theological Declaration of Barmen Confessional Synod of the German Evangelical Church · 31 May 1934

preamble; EKD introduction (English); theses 1–6; thesis 1; theses 2–4; thesis 5; thesis 6 and conclusion; appeal to the congregations; EKD introduction (German)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Wuppertal
Who Karl Barth, Martin Niemöller
Threads Creeds and Councils, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Augsburg Confession 25 June 1530 1046

Schleiermacher and Modern Theology 1799 1269

LEADS TO

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich 14 March 1937 1379

The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer 9 April 1945 1386

The Churches and Apartheid 1982–1986 1462

CREEDS AND COUNCILS

The Lambeth Quadrilateral Before · July 1888 1332

The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary After · 1 November 1950 1414

CHURCH AND STATE

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City Before · 11 February 1929 1371

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich After · 14 March 1937 1379

← The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City Earlier · 11 February 1929
→ Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich Later · 14 March 1937

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich

14 March 1937 · Firm date

In an encyclical to the German bishops dated 14 March 1937, Pius XI protests that the concordat of 1933 has been broken and rejects as contrary to faith in God the exalting of race, people or state to the highest value.

On 20 July 1933 Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, Secretary of State to Pius XI, and the German vice-chancellor Franz von Papen signed a concordat between the Holy See and the German Reich (Reichskonkordat (1933), preamble and signatures). The Reich guaranteed the freedom of profession and public practice of the Catholic religion, the keeping and founding of Catholic confessional schools, and the protection of Catholic organisations serving exclusively religious, purely cultural and charitable purposes; the Holy See undertook to bar clergy from membership of political parties (Reichskonkordat (1933), arts. 1, 23, 31 and 32).

In January 1937 Cardinal Michael von Faulhaber of Munich was in Rome; his diary notes that he was twice with the bishops at Cardinal Pacelli's, and that on Sunday 17 January he was with the pope for an hour in his sickroom (Faulhaber, Diaries, 14–28 January 1937). The encyclical that followed says that representatives of the German episcopate had visited the pope in his sickroom and reported things hard and unpleasant (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 2). The editors of Faulhaber's diaries state that he took a decisive part in the preparatory work for it (Faulhaber, Diaries, editors' biography).

The letter, addressed to the archbishops and bishops of Germany, is dated Passion Sunday, 14 March 1937 (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge heading and closing date). The pope writes that he agreed to the concordat in 1933 despite grave misgivings, and that the other party has emptied its terms of meaning and made its violation a normal policy (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 3–5). Whoever exalts race, or the people, or the state, or those who hold power, above their proper worth and makes idols of them, he writes, perverts the order created by God and is far from true faith in God (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 7–8). Only superficial minds could speak of a national God or a national religion (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 11). Whoever wants the history and teaching of the Old Testament banished from church and school blasphemes the name of God (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 16). The believer has a right to profess his faith, parents have the first right to educate their children in it, and laws that deny these rights are against natural law (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 31). The letter does not use the name of Hitler or of his party (Pius XI, Mit brennender Sorge 1–43).

A second encyclical of Pius XI, on atheistic communism, is dated five days later, 19 March; it calls communism intrinsically wrong and says that no one who would save Christian civilisation may collaborate with it (Pius XI, Divini Redemptoris 58 and date).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

Primary sources

Concordat between the Holy See and the German Reich The Holy See and the German Reich · 20 July 1933
preamble and signatures; arts. 1, 23, 31 and 32

Diaries of Michael Cardinal von Faulhaber, 1911–1952 Michael von Faulhaber · 1911–1952
14–28 January 1937; editors' biography

Mit brennender Sorge Pope Pius XI · 14 March 1937
2; heading and closing date; 3–5; 7–8; 11; 16; 31; 1–43

Divini Redemptoris Pope Pius XI · 19 March 1937
58 and date

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Rome
Who Pius XI, Pius XII, Michael von Faulhaber
Threads Church and State, Papacy and Church Order

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City 11 February 1929 1371
The Barmen Declaration 31 May 1934 1375

CHURCH AND STATE

The Barmen Declaration Before · 31 May 1934 1375
The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer After · 9 April 1945 1386

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

The Lateran Treaty Creates Vatican City Before · 11 February 1929 1371
The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest After · 25 January 1944 1382

← The Barmen Declaration Earlier · 31 May 1934
→ The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest Later · 25 January 1944

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest

25 January 1944 · Firm date

In unoccupied China the Anglican bishop of Hong Kong ordains the deaconess Li Tim Oi a priest, so that her wartime congregation in Macau may have the sacraments. The Lambeth Conference of 1948 advises against such ordinations; that of 1978 accepts churches that ordain women.

In 1943 the deaconess Florence Li Tim Oi was in charge of an Anglican congregation in Macau, and the war kept her bishop, Ronald Hall of Hong Kong, from reaching her. In June of that year Hall wrote to William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury, that he had given her permission to celebrate the Lord's Supper for a congregation of 150 and would ordain her priest if he could reach her. He added that he was no advocate of the ordination of women, but would not let prejudice keep the sacraments from his people (Li and Harrison, Much Beloved Daughter ch. 4, pp. 41–42 (Hall to Temple, 4 June 1943)).

In January 1944 she crossed Japanese-held territory to meet him at Xingxing, in unoccupied China. From there, by her own later account, they went the short distance to Zhaoqing, where he ordained her in a small Anglican church; she speaks of herself there as the first woman to become a priest (Li and Harrison, Much Beloved Daughter ch. 4, pp. 43–45). Two days later Hall told Temple that he had ordained a Chinese deaconess "a priest in the Church of God". He had acted, he wrote, outside the canons of the Chinese church, which made no such provision; he did not expect her orders to be recognised for the present, and he would report to the General Synod after the war (Li and Harrison, Much Beloved Daughter ch. 4, p. 48 (Hall to Temple, 27 January 1944)).

The Chinese House of Bishops, meeting at Shanghai in March 1946, voted its regret at Hall's "uncanonical action" and asked him to accept the resignation from her priestly ministry which, it understood, she had already placed in his hands (Li and Harrison, Much Beloved Daughter pp. 58–59 (resolution of the House of Bishops, March 1946)). In April 1948 an Anglican group in England cited the ordination in a memorial to the Lambeth Conference (Anglican Group for the Ordination of Women, Memorial to the Lambeth Conference (1948) II (2), Appeal from China). The Lambeth Conference of that year had before it a proposal from the diocese of South China that for twenty years a deaconess might be ordained priest as an experiment. It answered that this would be against Anglican tradition and order (Lambeth Conference 1948, Resolution 113), reaffirmed that the order of deaconess was the one order of ministry it could recommend for women (Lambeth Conference 1948, Resolution 114), and judged that the time had not come to reconsider the matter (Lambeth Conference 1948, Resolution 115).

Twenty years later the bishops called the theological arguments for and against inconclusive (Lambeth Conference 1968, Resolution 34) and asked every province to study the question (Lambeth Conference 1968, Resolution 35). In 1978 they noted that Hong Kong, Canada, the United States and New Zealand had admitted women to the presbyterate, recognised the right of each member church to decide, and declared their acceptance both of churches that ordain women and of churches that do not (Lambeth Conference 1978, Resolution 21.1, 21.3, 21.6).

John Paul II declared in 1994 that the Church has "no authority whatsoever" to confer priestly ordination on women and that this judgment is to be held definitively (John Paul II, Ordinatio sacerdotalis 4). The Orthodox members of the joint commission with the Anglicans stated in 1978 that women cannot be admitted to the priesthood and that their ordination is an innovation without basis in Holy Tradition (Anglican-Orthodox Dublin Agreed Statement (1984), Appendix 2, Athens Report 1978, III (3)).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The day comes from the bishop himself. Writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury on 27 January 1944, Hall says that he ordained her "on St Paul's Day" (Li and Harrison, Much Beloved Daughter ch. 4, p. 48 (Hall to Temple, 27 January 1944)). That is the feast of the Conversion of St Paul, kept on 25 January in the Anglican calendar. The letter is known here from the extracts printed in Li Tim Oi's memoir of 1985, and her own account of the journey and the service was given forty years after the event.

Primary sources

Much Beloved Daughter: The Story of Florence Li Florence Tim Oi Li and Ted Harrison · 1985
ch. 4, pp. 41–42 (Hall to Temple, 4 June 1943); ch. 4, pp. 43–45; ch. 4, p. 48 (Hall to Temple, 27 January 1944); pp. 58–59 (resolution of the House of Bishops, March 1946)

A Memorial Submitted to the Lambeth Conference 1948 on Deaconesses The Anglican Group for the Ordination of Women to the Historic Ministry of the Church · April 1948
II (2), Appeal from China

Resolutions of the Lambeth Conference of 1948 Lambeth Conference · 1948
Resolution 113; Resolution 114; Resolution 115

Resolutions of the Lambeth Conference of 1968 Lambeth Conference · 1968
Resolution 34; Resolution 35

Resolutions of the Lambeth Conference of 1978 Lambeth Conference · 1978
Resolution 21.1, 21.3, 21.6

Ordinatio sacerdotalis John Paul II · 22 May 1994
4

Anglican-Orthodox Dialogue: The Dublin Agreed Statement 1984 Anglican-Orthodox Joint Doctrinal Commission · 1984
Appendix 2, Athens Report 1978, III (3)

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Zhaoqing, Macau
Who Florence Li Tim Oi, Ronald Hall
Threads Papacy and Church Order, Reform and Reformation

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Lambeth Quadrilateral July 1888 1332

PAPACY AND CHURCH ORDER

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich Before · 14 March 1937 1379

The Dogma of the Assumption of Mary After · 1 November 1950 1414

REFORM AND REFORMATION

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy Before · 1910–1925 1354

The Churches and the Civil Rights Movement After · 16 April 1963 1428

← Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich Earlier · 14 March 1937
→ The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer Later · 9 April 1945

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer

9 April 1945 · Firm date

The pastor and theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer, held for two years for his part in the German resistance, is condemned by an SS court-martial at Flossenbürg concentration camp and hanged the next morning. His letters from prison are published in 1951.

In 1937 Dietrich Bonhoeffer published Nachfolge, known in English as The Cost of Discipleship. Its first chapter calls "cheap grace" the deadly enemy of the church: a grace that justifies the sin and not the sinner, so that everything can stay as it was. Grace, he wrote, is costly because it calls a person to follow Jesus Christ (Bonhoeffer, Nachfolge, ch. 1, Die teure Gnade (DBW 4, pp. 29–40, extracts)). In prison he remembered Finkenwalde, one of the places in Pomerania where the Confessing Church kept its seminary for preachers (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, letter of 28 November 1943, p. 83, with the editor's note). On that church see the Barmen Declaration.

He was arrested on 5 April 1943 and spent the next eighteen months in the military section of Tegel prison in Berlin, as Eberhard Bethge, his friend and the editor of his letters, records (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, editor's foreword, pp. 7–8). A German court later found that he was held as a member of the resistance circle in military intelligence (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe A.I). From Tegel he wrote to Bethge on 30 April 1944 that the question which never left him was who Christ really is for us today, and that a time without religion was coming (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, letter of 30 April 1944, pp. 131–132). On 21 July 1944 he wrote that he still stood by Nachfolge but now saw its dangers, and that a person learns to believe only by living fully in this world and taking seriously the suffering of God in it (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, letter of 21 July 1944, pp. 182–183).

After files of the conspirators were found at Zossen in September 1944 the Gestapo moved him to its own prison in Berlin, and from there, as his family later learned, to Buchenwald and Schönberg (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, editor's foreword, pp. 7–8). On Sunday 8 April 1945 he led a service for his fellow prisoners at Schönberg and was then called away. The English prisoner Payne Best, who was among them, reported that Bonhoeffer gave him a greeting for the Bishop of Chichester, with the words that this was the end, but for him the beginning of life (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, appendix Die letzten Tage, pp. 219–220).

The court found that he cannot have reached Flossenbürg concentration camp before the late afternoon of that day (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe A.I). There an SS judge, sitting with the camp commandant and one other, tried him and four others: Admiral Canaris, General Oster, the army judge Sack and Captain Gehre (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe A.I) (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, appendix Die letzten Tage, pp. 219–220). The appendix to the letters names a sixth man, Strünk, among those heard (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, appendix Die letzten Tage, pp. 219–220). No defence counsel was appointed and no clerk was present to keep a record. All five were sentenced to death, and on the morning of 9 April they were hanged, naked, before any confirmation of the sentences had been obtained (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe A.I). The court held that the law required such confirmation in every case (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe C.II.1 b).

Six months later the council of the Evangelical Church in Germany, meeting at Stuttgart, declared itself bound to the German people in a "solidarity of guilt" and accused itself of not having confessed more courageously or prayed more faithfully (Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt). The church's own account says that the document was addressed to the Bishop of Chichester, George Bell, whom it calls Bonhoeffer's friend (Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt introduction by the Evangelical Church in Germany). Bethge's edition of the letters from prison followed in 1951 (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, editor's foreword, pp. 7–8).

How this is dated

Firm date. Fixed by contemporary documentation and not seriously disputed.

The West German courts that tried the SS prosecutor after the war found that the five prisoners were hanged at Flossenbürg on 9 April 1945 between six and seven in the morning (Bundesgerichtshof, judgment of 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56), Gründe A.I). The editor of the prison letters, in his foreword dated August 1951, gives the same day (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, editor's foreword, pp. 7–8).

A description of Bonhoeffer's last minutes, kneeling in prayer and dying within seconds, is often quoted. It comes from a statement written in 1955 by the camp doctor, H. Fischer-Hüllstrung. Ferdinand Schlingensiepen, Dietrich Bonhoeffer 1906–1945: Martyr, Thinker, Man of Resistance (2010), calls the doctor's report "unfortunately a lie" and sets against it the testimony of a Danish prisoner of the camp. The appendix to the prison letters repeats one detail of it, that the doctor saw Bonhoeffer kneeling in prayer (Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, appendix Die letzten Tage, pp. 219–220). It is not used here.

Primary sources

Nachfolge (The Cost of Discipleship) Dietrich Bonhoeffer · 1937
ch. 1, Die teure Gnade (DBW 4, pp. 29–40, extracts)

Letters and Papers from Prison (Widerstand und Ergebung) Dietrich Bonhoeffer · 1943–1945; first published 1951 letter of 28 November 1943, p. 83, with the editor's note; editor's foreword, pp. 7–8; letter of 30 April 1944, pp. 131–132; letter of 21 July 1944, pp. 182–183; appendix Die letzten Tage, pp. 219–220

Judgment of the Federal Court of Justice in the case against Huppenkothen and Thorbeck, 19 June 1956 (1 StR 50/56) Bundesgerichtshof (Federal Court of Justice of Germany) · 19 June 1956
Gründe A.I; Gründe C.II.1 b

The Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt Council of the Evangelical Church in Germany · 18–19 October 1945
ekd.de; introduction by the Evangelical Church in Germany

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Flossenbürg
Who Dietrich Bonhoeffer
Threads Persecution and Martyrdom, Church and State

In context

GROWS OUT OF

The Barmen Declaration 31 May 1934 1375

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM

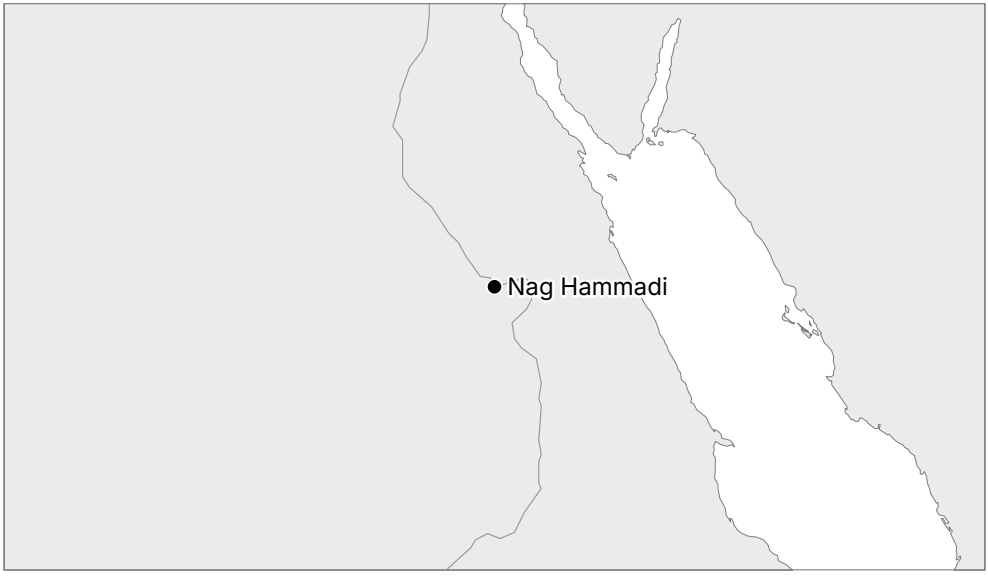
Simon Kimbangu and the Kimbanguist Church Before · 1921 1367

The Chinese Church under the People's Republic After · 1950–1954 1409

CHURCH AND STATE

Mit brennender Sorge: Pius XI on the Church in the German Reich Before · 14 March 1937 1379

The Chinese Church under the People's Republic After · 1950–1954 1409



← The First Woman Is Ordained an Anglican Priest Earlier · 25 January 1944
→ The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found Later · c. December 1945

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Nag Hammadi Library Is Found

c. December 1945 · Estimated date

Papyrus books in Coptic, holding over fifty religious texts including the Gospel of Thomas, come to light near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt. The first reaches the Coptic Museum in 1946; the story of the find was gathered from villagers thirty years later.

In October 1946 the Coptic Museum in Cairo bought a papyrus book from a man of the district of Nag Hammadi (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90). A year later its director, Togo Mina, showed it to the French scholar Jean Doresse, who recognised a collection of Gnostic writings in Coptic, among them a Secret Book of John (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 87–88). Doresse and Henri-Charles Puech judged the handwriting to be no later than the second half of the fourth century (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), p. 88). In their report, printed in 1948, they knew of at least five volumes from the same find, which they placed at the foot of a hill near Nag Hammadi (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90).

How the books were found was already uncertain. The report repeats what was being said: that peasants had chanced on a tomb with a jar full of bound manuscripts, that two had been burned and the rest sold cheaply to dealers. Its authors ask how far the story of the tomb can be trusted (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90). The account usually told today comes from James M. Robinson, who interviewed villagers some thirty years later. In it Muhammad Ali, of the al-Samman clan, and his brother were digging for fertiliser under the cliff of Jabal al-Tarif in December when they came on a jar, and Muhammad Ali broke it open and carried the books home (Robinson, The Nag Hammadi Library in English, Introduction, section 3, The Discovery). The archive of Robinson's project keeps photographs, dated 1975, of the man and of the cliff (Nag Hammadi Codices Claremont archive, photograph of Muhammad Ali (1975), description) (Nag Hammadi Codices Claremont archive, photograph of Jabal al-Tarif (1975), description).

The codices hold over fifty texts and are kept in the Coptic Museum (Nag Hammadi Codices Claremont archive, description of the collection). Codex II contains the Gospel according to Thomas, whose title stands at its end (Nag Hammadi Codices Codex II, pp. 50–51, photographed by Jean Doresse; description). It begins: "These are the hidden sayings that the living Jesus spoke and Didymos Judas Thomas wrote down" (Gospel of Thomas prologue). Some of its sayings resemble those of the New Testament: asked when the kingdom will come, Jesus answers that it is already spread out over the earth and people do not see it (Gospel of Thomas saying 113), which may be compared with (Luke 17:20–21). Another volume held a work called the Gospel of Truth, and Puech and Doresse asked at once whether this was the book of that name which Irenaeus, about 180, says the followers of Valentinus had written (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90) (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.11.9).

Until then, the report observes, such groups were known mainly from the polemical notices of their opponents and from three Coptic manuscripts made known in the nineteenth century; writings that came from the groups themselves were almost wholly lacking (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), p. 93). In his Easter letter of 367 Athanasius had warned the churches of Egypt against books "called apocryphal", which he said heretics wrote and passed off as ancient (Athanasius, Festal Letter 39.2, 39.7). Whether that letter had anything to do with the burial of these books is disputed; see the dating note. See also Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith and Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament.

How this is dated

Estimated date. A scholarly estimate from primary evidence, with a margin of years.

The earliest date given by a report of the time is that of the purchase: the Coptic Museum bought its first codex in October 1946 (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90). The scholars who announced the find in 1948 thought it had "perhaps" been made early in 1946 (Puech and Doresse, Nouveaux écrits gnostiques (1948), pp. 88–90).

December 1945 is the date given by James M. Robinson, who questioned villagers in the 1970s and tied the find to the season when they dug fertiliser and to a murder in the finder's family in May 1945 (Robinson, The Nag Hammadi Library in English, Introduction, section 3, The Discovery). His account is the source of the usual story, and it is late testimony. Mark Goodacre, "How Reliable is the Story of the Nag Hammadi Discovery?", Journal for the Study of the New Testament 35 (2013), pp. 303–322, shows that Robinson's successive versions conflict and prefers the earlier account published by Jean Doresse in 1958. Nicola Denzey Lewis and Justine Ariel Blount, "Rethinking the Origins of the Nag Hammadi Codices", Journal of Biblical Literature 133 (2014), pp. 399–419, doubt the story as a whole and suggest that the books were grave goods of private owners. They also dispute Robinson's proposal that monks buried the books after Athanasius's letter of 367.

Primary sources

Scripture

Luke 17:20–21

Nouveaux écrits gnostiques découverts en Égypte Henri-Charles Puech and Jean Doresse · 1948

pp. 88–90; pp. 87–88; p. 88; p. 93

The Nag Hammadi Library in English: Introduction James M. Robinson · 1977
Introduction, section 3, The Discovery

The Nag Hammadi Codices 4th century AD
Claremont archive, photograph of Muhammad Ali (1975), description; Claremont archive, photograph of Jabal al-Tarif (1975), description; Claremont archive, description of the collection; Codex II, pp. 50–51, photographed by Jean Doresse; description

The Gospel according to Thomas (Nag Hammadi Codex II, 2) Coptic copy of the 4th or 5th century
prologue; saying 113

Against Heresies Irenaeus of Lyons · c. AD 180
3.11.9

Festal Letters, with the Festal Index Athanasius of Alexandria · AD 329–373
39.2, 39.7

Every citation on this page was independently checked against its source on 3 October 2026.

About this event

Where Nag Hammadi
Threads Scripture and Canon

In context

GROWS OUT OF

Irenaeus Sets Out the Rule of Faith c. AD 180 515

Athanasius Lists the Twenty-seven Books of the New Testament AD 367 619

SCRIPTURE AND CANON

The Fundamentals and the Modernist Controversy Before · 1910–1925 1354

The Dead Sea Scrolls Are Discovered After · 1947 1394

← The Execution of Dietrich Bonhoeffer Earlier · 9 April 1945
→ The Dead Sea Scrolls Are Discovered Later · 1947

MODERN AND GLOBAL CHRISTIANITY

The Dead Sea Scrolls Are Discovered

1947 · Estimated date

Bedouin bring seven ancient scrolls from a cave near Qumran to dealers in Bethlehem. A Syrian Orthodox archbishop and a Hebrew University professor buy them, and scholars find Hebrew manuscripts about a thousand years older than any biblical text then known.

The Israel Antiquities Authority tells the discovery "as the story goes". A shepherd of the Ta'amireh Bedouin, looking for a stray animal among the cliffs near Qumran, threw a stone into a cave and heard pottery break. Inside were large clay jars, and in a few of them old scrolls, some wrapped in linen. The Authority's caption to a photograph of two goatherds says that they "claimed" to have found the first scrolls (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Discovery and Publication).

The Bedouin took their finds to a dealer in Bethlehem, who sent them back for more. Seven scrolls came out of the cave. Four were sold on to Archbishop Athanasius Yeshue Samuel, head of the Syrian Orthodox Monastery of St Mark in Jerusalem. The other three went to a second dealer, and there Eleazar Sukenik, professor at the Hebrew University, saw them, having first been shown a fragment through the wire at the edge of a British military zone in Jerusalem. He wrote in his diary that his hands shook as he unwrapped one of them, and that he felt he was looking at a Hebrew scroll which had not been read for more than two thousand years (Dead Sea Scrolls Leon Levy Digital Library, Discovery and Publication).

